A student of *Valentinus the Gnostic, *Ptolemy, who lived during the 2nd half of the 2nd c. and authored a commentary on the Prologue of the gospel of *John, the contents of which are known thanks to *Irenaeus and *Epiphanius, allegorically interprets the Prologue itself as referring to the pleroma. From his point of view, in fact, it symbolically alludes to the origin of the first *Ogdoad, i.e., the first eight eons of the Valentinian pleroma, composed in all of 30 eons formed by the deployment of the first principle, Bythos or the abyss. The eons of the pleroma subsequent to the first eight were produced by the Logos emitted from the only Begotten Son; then, Sophia produced the reality existing outside the pleroma. According to *Tertullian (Adv. Val. 4), one must differentiate between Valentinus's and Ptolemy's understandings of the pleroma: the pleromatic eons acc. to Valentinus were feelings and affections of the divinity, while Ptolemy conceived of them as personal substances and external to the divinity itself. The divine pleroma, acc. to the gnostic perspective, is also the true homeland of pneumatic human beings, i.e., spiritual persons (see pneuma*)—which as such are opposed to the illici and psychici*—that are called by different names, such as, in the writings of Basilides, the "Third Filiation" and "the church of the spirituals," and by the *Ophites and the *Sethians, the "sons of the light" or the "race that does not falter." The entire pleroma is also conceived as the nuptial chamber (νυμφών) into which spiritual people enter who—once divested of their souls, their psychic element—reach the angels-spouses and become pure spirits, intellectual eons, αἰῶνες νεοροί (Exc. ex Theod. 64). Likewise *Heracleon—another student of Valentinus whose commentary on John remains, thanks to the citations of it that Origen inserted in his own, and has thereby come down to us in a fragmentary form—interpreted the husband of the Samaritan woman in Jn 4:17 allegorically as her pleroma (πλήρωμα αὐτῆς), her spiritual counterpart, her σύζυγος ἀπὸ πληρώματος, with which she, as an allegory of the pneumatic human being, must unite herself to reach salvation (ap. Orig., Comm. in Ioh. XIII, 11).

In *Hermetic literature, the pleroma acquired an ambivalence of meaning that reflected the fundamental ambivalence toward the cosmos one finds in gnostic writings. On the one hand, the cosmos, (ap. Lact. Inst. IV, 6,4) is presented as a second god and defined as πληρέστατος πάντων τῶν ἀγαθῶν, and in the Corp. Herm. XII, 15 it "is the fullness of life," πλήρωμα ἐστι τῆς ζωῆς. On the other hand (ibid. VI, 4), ὁ κόσμος πλήρωμα ἐστι τῆς κακίας, ὁ δὲ θεὸς τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, "the cosmos is the fullness of evil, God, however, is the fullness of good." Again, the pleroma is associated with God (ibid., XVI, 3), where it is said that God, the creator of the totality of the universe, is all in one, because the pleroma of everything—i.e., the totality and the fullness of the universe—is one and in one.

LTK[2] 8, 560-561; TWNT 6, 283-309; Lampe, 1094-1095; G. Delling, πλήρωμα: GLNT 10, 674-696 [πλήρης, κτλ, TDNT 6, 283-311]; A. Feuillet, L'Église, plérôme du Christ, d'après Ephés. 1,22: NRTh 78 (1956) 449-472, 593-610; J. Ernst, Pleroma und Pleroma Christi. Geschichte und Deutung eines Begriffs der paulinischen Antilegomena, Regensburg 1970; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica, Bari 1973; D. J. Good, Sophia in Valentinianism: The Second Century 4 (1984) 193-220; C. Scholten, Martyrium und Sophiamythos im Gnostizismus nach den Texten des N.H., Münster 1987; K.L. King, Images of the Feminine in Gnosticism, Philadelphia 1988; Pléroma, ed. E. Romero-Pose - J. Rius-Camps - J. Montserrat-Torrents, Santiago de Compostela 1990; G. Zuntz, Αἰών in der Literatur der Kaiserzeit, Vienna 1992; G. Iacopino, Il Vangelo di Giovanni nei testi gnostici copti, Rome 1995; G. Filoramo, Antropologie in conflitto. Il caso di Ireneo e degli gnostici: Humanitas 1 (1996) 52-67; R.T. Wallis - J. Bregman (eds.), Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, Albany 1992; G. Filoramo, Il tema della caduta nello gnosticismo: Annuario Filosofico 9 (1999) 95-110; G. Casadio, From Hellenistic Αἰών to Gnostic Αἰῶνες, in Religion im Wandel der Kosmologien, ed. D. Zeller, Bern et al. 1999, 175-190, 383-392; Gnosticism and Later Platonism, ed. J.D. Turner - R. Majercik, Atlanta 2000; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism and the Platonic Tradition, Québec-Louvain-Paris 2001; K.L. King, What Is Gnosticism? Cambridge-London 2003; M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004.

I. Ramelli

PLEROPHORIAE. From the Greek term πληροφορεῖν (to give full assurance). This was the name assigned to the collection of anecdotes attributed to various individuals who lived around the time of the Council of *Chalcedon (451), who, primarily through miraculous events, demonstrated the validity of the anti-Chalcedonian theses. The most famous of these collections, in which many episodes remain nonetheless the same, was redacted by *John of Maiuma, a monk from the monastery of Rufinus (Beit-Rufin) and therefore known as John Rufus, who was also the bishop of Maiuma (Palestine). John's name was therefore commonly used to refer by antonomasia to this work, but it has come down to us in a *Syriac translation from the Greek original. But fragments of analogous works have come down in *Coptic, and works that today bear a different title (e.g., the Life of *Peter the Iberian or the Memories of Dioscorus) should be considered as belonging to the same literary genre.

F. Nau, Jean Rufus évêque de Maiouma, Plérophories, PO 8, 1; T. Orlandi, Un frammento delle Pleroforie in copto: Studi e Ricerche sull'Oriente Cristiano 2 (1979) 3-12; Patrologia V, 565-569.

T. Orlandi

PLINY the Younger (61/62–after 113). Nephew and adopted son of Pliny the Elder, Gaius Pliny Caecilius Secundus was born at Como around AD 61/62. He had a thorough education, first in the province, then at *Rome in the rhetorical schools of Quintilian and Nicetes Sacerdos. The practice of civil and criminal law prepared him for a swift and successful political career, favored by his moderate nature and by his wealth, that allowed him to be a munificent benefactor. He was therefore a judge in 81 and a military tribune in *Syria in 82, then a quaestor in 88, a praetor in 93, prefect of the military treasury in 95–97, prefect of the Treasury of Saturn from 98 to 100, and consul in 100, augur in 103 and lastly legatus Augusti in *Bithynia from 110/111 to 112/113. He died shortly thereafter.

He composed the *Panegyric for Trajan (a speech of thanksgiving and a model of courtly elegy for the optimus princeps) and the Epistolary, a collection of letters in 10 books written precisely for publication: they inform us not only about private and public life, but also on the social and political customs of the time. The style of his letters is formal and vaguely eclectic; reading the letters is pleasurable and interesting. Pliny shows himself to be fundamentally honest and open, a scrupulous official in respecting the laws (he often asked for advice from the emperor on their application).

Pliny sent a famous and important letter to Trajan on the Christians (Ep. X, 96) and provided a document of incontestable authenticity and of primary interest for 2nd-c. Christianity in *Asia Minor.

Pliny sought advice from the emperor on the course of action to take with Christians, who were becoming more numerous, and against whom he had received anonymous accusations. The point requiring explanation was the following: should the Christians be persecuted for the specific crimes implicit in the profession of their religion or for the simple name of "Christian," i.e., for the "religious crime" in itself, even in the absence of proven crimes of the common law? In any case, it was evident to him that the practice of Christianity was prohibited and demanded the death penalty. He described the procedure he carried out: he would interrogate them, threaten them if they continued, condemn them to death if they did not recant. He affirmed that there were numerous Christians not only in the cities, but also in the villages and the countryside; he offered details on their liturgical and social life. They gathered "on the day established [almost certainly *Sunday] before the rising of the sun"; they sang "a hymn to Christ as God"; they bound themselves with an oath not to commit crimes and to live honestly (an allusion to the obligations deriving from *baptism). Then they would gather again during the evening "to take part in a meal, but entirely ordinary and innocent" (*agape). Investigating further, Pliny also subjected two ancillae, perhaps *deaconesses, to torture but did not learn anything except that the religion was a superstitio prava immodica. He was then exasperated by their refusal to offer sacrifice before the image of the emperor and the statues of the gods: in Pliny's eyes this refusal implied a lack of loyalty and therefore a subversive attitude.

From the text, therefore, it appears that Christ was at the center of the worship service, the synaxis was characteristic of the faithful and the obligation for a morally irreprehensible life was foundational. On the other hand, it is also the first document that provides legal arguments for *persecution (a punishment religious in character, a crime of opinion), but at the same time it also had an apologetic value for Christians: the *pagan Pliny recognized that crimes were not necessarily connected to the nomen christianum and that the Christians were not "citizens dangerous" to the empire.

In response (Ep. X, 97), Trajan praised the flexible line taken by Pliny; he strongly disapproved of anonymous denunciations, but he was ambiguous in his solution: Christians should not be sought out by juridical order, but if accused and convicted as such they must be punished; if they denounce their faith they should be released. *Tertullian would expose the contradiction of "this judgment confused by necessity" (Apol. 2,8).

J. Beaujeu: Lustrum 6 (1961) 272-303; B.V. Cova: BStudLat 4 (1974) 274-291; E. Aubrion, La Correspondence de Pline le Jeune. Problèmes et orientations actuelles de la recherche, in ANRW II, 33, 1, Berlin-New York 1989, 304-374.

Editions: A.M. Guillemin - M. Durry, Paris 1947–1955; M. Schuster - R. Hanslik, Leipzig 1958; R.A.B. Mynors, Oxford 1963; H. Kasten, Munich 1968, [5]1984 (with German tr.); B. Radice, 2 Bände, London-Cambridge, MA 1969 (with Eng. tr.); F. Trisoglio, 2 vols. Turin 1973 (with It. tr.); W. Williams, Pliny, Correspondence with Trajan from Bithynia (Epistles X) (Classical Texts), Warminster 1990 (with commentary).

Studies (concerning the problems with the Christians): J. Moreau, La persécution du christianisme dans l'empire romain, Paris 1956; L. Rusca, Saggio sulle persecuzioni, Plinio il Giovane, Carteggio con Traiano, Milan 1963; R. Scarcia (ed.), Plinio il Giovane, Lettere scelte, Rome 1967 (extensive bibl., 29-35); A. Hamman, Chrétien et christianisme vus et jugés par Suétone, Tacite e Pline le Jeune, in Forma futuri, Turin 1975, 91-109; P.V. Cova, Plinio il Giovane e il problema delle persecuzioni: BStudLat 5 (1975) 293-314; P. Carrara, I pagani di fronte al Cristianesimo, Florence 1984, 49-61; BBKL 7 (1994) 745-749 (bibl.); M. Testard, ". . . Carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere . . .": REL 72 (1994) 138-158; J. Siat, La persécution des chrétiens au début du II^e s. d'après la lettre de Pline le Jeune et la réponse de Trajan en 112: Les Études Classiques 63 (1995) 161-170, A. Mitescu, La liturgia orale dei cristiani sotto Traiano secondo l'interrogatorio di Plinio il Giovane: Ricerche Teologiche 11 (2000) 9-53; A.A. Nascimento, "Nomen Ipsum." Os primeiros cristãos face ao poder ou a coragem de uma identidade incómoda: Igreja e Missão 54 (2001) 139-191; A. Reichert, Durchdachte Konfusion. Plinius, Trajan und das Christentum: ZNTW 93 (2002) 227-250.

M. Maritano

PLOTINUS (ca. 204–270). His biographical information has come down to us from *Porphyry, who composed his Life of Plotinus between 301 and 305. It provides the only primary source (as R. Schwyzer noted [PWK 21/1, 476]; *Firmicus Maternus, *Eunapius, the Lexicon Suidae and ps.-Eudoxia cannot be considered sources independent from Porphyry; the only piece of information that does not appear in Porphyry's work and that is instead supplied by Eunapius is the identification of Lykon as his city of birth (either Lycopolis in Upper *Egypt or Lykon on the Nile Delta).

Born during the 13th year of the reign of *Septimius Severus, namely 204–205 (the date calculated by Porphyry [Vita Plot. 2, vol. I, p. 2,34-3,37 Bréhier] on the basis of the information provided by the doctor Eustochius, acc. to which Plotinus was 66 years old at the age of his death, which occurred in the second year of the reign of Claudius II [see Vita Plot. 2, p. 2,29-31]). At 28 years old, therefore in 232–233, in *Alexandria he heard various teachers of philosophy. He remained profoundly disillusioned by these teachers until he met *Ammonius Saccas, who was for him a revelation and at whose side he remained for 11 years. At the beginning of 243—Ammonius in all likelihood had died shortly before—desirous of knowing more about the Persian religion, Plotinus joined the emperor Gordian III's military expedition against *Persia. In the first months of 244, following the failure of the campaign and the death of the emperor, he went to *Antioch; that same year he reached Rome, where he settled definitively and began his teaching activity. For 10 years, following the example of Ammonius, he restricted himself to oral teaching; only during the first year of the reign of Gallienus (253) did he begin to write a certain treatise. When during the summer of 263—during the ten-year anniversary of the reign of Gallienus—*Porphyry came to Rome and met him, he had already written 21 treatises. Between 263 and 268, during the period in which Porphyry remained near him before leaving Rome, he wrote another 24. The last five treatises were composed during the first year of the reign of *Claudius II (268–269). Likewise in 269, after a stay in Rome that lasted 26 years and by then beset by a persistent illness that worsened, Plotinus retired to Campania near Manturnus under the care of his friend Zeto, where he died in 270 at the age of 66. His project of establishing a Platonopolis, the ideal city governed acc. to the model established by Plato in the Laws, was originally approved by the emperor *Gallienus, but then left by the wayside and never implemented.

For his teachings, see *eon, *apatheia, *cosmos, *nous and esp. *Neoplatonism; for his influence on the Greek and Latin Fathers, see *Platonism and the Fathers and *Neoplatonism.

H. Oppermann, Plotinos' Leben, Heidelberg 1929; H.R. Schwyzer, PWK 21/1, 472-477; BBKL 7, 753-756; Porphyre, La vie de Plotin, par L. Brisson . . . [et al.], 2 vols. Paris 1982–1992; O. Montevecchi, Ritorniamo a Licopoli e a Plotino: Aegyptus 80 (2000) 139-143 (on his homeland).

S. Lilla

PNEUMA - SPIRIT (πνεῦμα)

I. Greek meanings - II. Old Testament Hebrew and Greek meanings - III. Postbiblical Jewish meanings - IV. New Testament meanings - V. Patristic and gnostic meanings.

I. Greek meanings. In Greek, πνεῦμα is found in place of the Homeric term πνο(ι)ή beginning with Aeschylus and Herodotus. Originally, it meant "breath," "wind," "blowing," therefore "vital breath" (πνεῦμα βίου —Aesch., Pers. 507) and "living being," and lastly "spirit" and "inspiration": in this sense he speaks of the pneuma of love, folly, the poetic and prophetic πνεῦμα, often indicated as "divine" (πνεῦμα θεῖον, θεῶν, θεοῦ). In poetry, already in the writings of Hesiod, Theo. 31-32, using the corresponding verb, he proclaimed: ἐνέπνευσαν δέ μοι αὐδὴν θείην, "they inspired me with a divine song"; in the context of manticism, for example, Piatia was inspired by a πνεῦμα ἐνθουσιαστικόν (Plut., Def. or. 50). In medical theory, the pneuma was understood both as air and as a life-giving fluid of natural material such as respiration or blood circulation (e.g., V. Langholf, L'air (pneuma) et les maladies, in La maladie et les maladies dans la Collection hippocratique, ed. P. Potter - G. Maloney - J. Desautels, Québec 1990, 339-359). Generally, it was understood as the link to the living body, but such that it separated from it upon death: for Aristotle, esp., pneuma is a fundamental concept, and his characterization of it was developed in particular by *Chrysippus (P. Hager, Chrysippus' Theory of Pneuma: Prudentia 14 [1982] 97-108; N. Aujoulat, De la phantasia et du pneuma stoïciens, d'après Sextus Empiricus, au corps lumineux néo-platonicien: Pallas 34 [1988] 123-146, who in SVF II 1009 defines the substance of God as πνεῦμα νεορὸν καὶ πυρῶδες, and in II 1027 as πνεῦμα that pervades the entire cosmos). This is in fact identified with the soul of the cosmos, a fiery and ethereal breath, material but very thin and fine, which, endowed with its own motion, pervades the cosmos, and the τόνος (i.e., the cohesive tension) maintains it. This energy is to be identified chiefly with divinity itself, Zeus, a symbol of the ethereal fire, very thin and pure acc. to the theological-allegorical system of the Stoics (see my Allegoria, I, L'età classica, in collaboration with G. Lucchetta, Milan 2004; ch. 2 provides documentation). This hot and fiery breath (ἔνθερμον καὶ διάπυρον, SVF II, 897) is also present in human beings, whom it pervades, bestowing on them not only vital functions but also psychic and spiritual; it is rendered in Latin with the term spiritus (e.g., in Seneca, Ep. 66,12), the divine part present in human beings.

In Neostoicism, until the time of Epictetus and *Marcus Aurelius, the materialistic understanding of pneuma developed and acquired *Platonic overtones; with respect to Seneca in particular and his understanding of pneuma, see T.G. Rosenmeyer, Seneca and Nature: Arethusa 33 (2000) 99-119; with respect to *Neoplatonism, I will restrict myself to recommending M. Morford's synthesis, The Roman Philosophers: From the Time of Cato the Censor to the Death of Marcus Aurelius, London-New York 2002, 161-239. Although the *Stoics tended to join πνεῦμα to νοῦς, and to ἡγεμονικόν, in the writings of Marcus Aurelius, πνεῦμα, used in the diminutive form (πνευμάτικον), is distinguished from νοῦς, which is divine and inferior to it (12, 3. 26). Pneuma is also an important element in *Neoplatonic thought, as M. Di Pasquale Barbanti brought to light (Ochema-pneuma e phantasia nel neoplatonismo, Catania 1998), although in the writings of *Plotinus, pneuma was seen negatively. The doctrine of the ethereal and luminous pneuma is of great significance in the Corpus Hermeticum, a pneuma which enwraps the world and the human soul, of which it is a vehicle, inasmuch as it is a bridge between the *body and *soul. Even if in *Hellenism it was not conceived as entirely immaterial, this would take place in Christianity, where pneuma in the highest sense would become the πνεῦμα ἅγιον, the *Holy Spirit of charity, and where God himself, who is entirely immaterial, is defined as πνεῦμα (Jn 4:24).

II. Old Testament Hebrew and Greek meanings. In the OT, the concept of πνεῦμα is expressed primarily by the term rûaḥ, which means "breath," "wind," often sent by God, or "vanity"; in the human being, rûaḥ is the living spirit and life itself, such as nefeš; it is the seat of perception, affect, intelligence and the will. Rûaḥ is often connected to God: He produces it, or is the rûaḥ of God, the operating force of God that creates (the rûaḥ that broods over the primordial waters in Gen 1:2), or inspires the leaders and prophets with visions and descends on the elect of God such as *David (1 Sam 16:13). It is that with which God executes judgment, and it is also God's innermost essence, the rûaḥ qodšô, spirit of holiness or Holy Spirit.

In the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible known as the LXX, from which the term passed into the lexicon of the *Fathers, πνεῦμα usually translates the term rûaḥ and acquires the meanings of "wind," "air," "vital breath," which comes from God and creates and sustains the world, the life-giving "spirit," which at the end of time will bring about the resurrection (Ezek 37:6, 14). The πνεῦμα in human beings is the seat of all the *soul's functions. In the Wisdom of Solomon, the πνεῦμα is both the vital principle of human beings and is to be identified with Σοφία itself. If understood as an immaterial and invisible power, the πνεῦμα represents the spiritual nature of God (Ps 139:7) that existed before the beginning of creation (Gen 1:2) in which God blows into adam, made of dust, to render him a living being in Gen 2:7 (P.H. Poirier, Pour une histoire de la lecture pneumatologique de Gn 2,7: REAug 40 [1994] 1-22). It inspires the prophets (Num 11:25-29) and, inasmuch as it is the spirit of wisdom, also endows with special artistic abilities (Ex 28:3; 31:3). It is therefore not surprising that πνεῦμα was found frequently in prophetic language, where it appears closely connected to the divine Logos (Dan 5:11; Wis 7:12). This conception, in ancient Christianity, undoubtedly influenced Logos-*Christology, e.g., in the writings of *Justin Martyr and *Clement of Alexandria. In Is 11:2, the divine πνεῦμα is attributed to the Messiah and is also promised to all the righteous.

The Old Testament's use of the term πνεῦμα in the plural (πνεύματα) is more ambiguous, which, as one sees, e.g., from Num 5:14; Hos 4:12; 5:4; Zech 13:2, can refer to both good and bad spirits, *angels or *demons. The first were often seen as people's guardians, paracletes or intercessors, who carried the prayers of the righteous to God, acc. to an understanding that had remained in a prayer from the Roman Canon: Supplices te rogamus: iube haec perferri per manus sancti Angeli tui in sublime altare tuum, in conspectum divinae maiestatis tuae. The angels, moreover, perform a permanent *liturgy, acc. to a Jewish idea that then transferred into Christianity.

III. Postbiblical Jewish meanings. In the writings of *Philo of Alexandria, πνεῦμα referred both, on the physical level, to the higher and more pure part of the air (Ebr. 106), the wind, or the human or animal breath (Spec. leg. I, 338), and to that which confers structure and compactness to wood, stones and other substances, which it completely permeates, providing a more natural bond (συμφυέστατος δεσμός; Rer. div. her. 242): acc. to this decisively Stoic conception, the πνεῦμα depends on the νοῦς, which is the soul's ἡγεμονικόν (Fug. 182). Philo also recovered the Stoic idea of the soul as the πνεῦμα ἔνθερμον, which is the stamp and mark of divine power (τύπον τινὰ καὶ χαρακτῆρα θείας δυνάμεως; Det. pot. ins. 83). This πνεῦμα is analogous to that of God the Creator, inasmuch as, being λογικὸν πνεῦμα, rational, it generates thoughts. In the Op. mund. 135, Philo also spoke of a πνεῦμα θεῖον, a divine spirit that is breathed within humanity and is added to the earthly nature and, in Gig. 27, is "wise, undefinable, undivided and excellent, that fills all things with itself," and in Plant. 24 it is an omnipotent force. Philo himself, inasmuch as he was an exegete of allegory, believed himself to be inspired by the divine πνεῦμα (Somn. II, 252), which had already inspired *Moses (Vit. Mos., passim). The most excellent expression of divine pneumatic inspiration was that experienced by the prophets (see B. Besnier, Migration et telos d'après le "De migratione Abrahami": StudPhilon 11 [1999] 74-103). Even Flavius Josephus's linguistic use is similar to that of the LXX and Philo; πνεῦμα often indicates a part of human beings or a demonic spirit, and the expression πνεῦμα θεῖον was also used many times.

In Palestinian Judaism, then, one finds the OT meanings of rûaḥ reused and developed: wind, spirits (in the plural), that is angels or demons, or the dead who dwell in the tombs; likewise, the vital force present in the human being, the seat of psychic functions, Spirit of life (rûaḥ ḥayyîm) placed by God in the person, whose body is of an earthly origin, while the soul is celestial and pure (Ber. b. 60b.) and the person must return it to God pure (Sheb. b. 152B). From the eschatological point of view, in the Book of Jubilees we find the survival of the spirit without the resurrection of the body; in the Ethiopic version of Enoch it is theorized as both the survival of the soul immediately after death and the *resurrection of the body at the final judgment (see also 4 Esdras and Baruch syr.)

With respect to the pneuma of God, among the rabbis there is found the common and almost formulaic syntagma rûaḥ haqqōdeš, "Spirit of holiness," therefore "Holy Spirit," which is above all the Spirit of prophecy (rûaḥ nebû'â), through which divine revelation passes, but can also be a spirit of power (rûaḥ gebûrâ), with which God clothes the elect, and a spirit of righteousness that has inspired all the righteous and godly people of the OT. In the end, on the basis of Is 11:2, the Messiah will be the one to possess the Spirit of God, and the redeemed righteous will receive such a spirit, and all the Israelites will be prophets (in rabbinic literature there is no one answer to the question of whether the Spirit of God withdrew from Israel after the last of the biblical prophets). During the time of Jesus, the members of the *Qumran sect of the New Covenant believed themselves to be in possession of the Holy Spirit, whose Rule of the Community (1QS) is characterized by the presence of two spirits, namely, that of light and that of darkness, who struggle for dominion over humanity, but were created by God. "Spirit" in the texts from Qumran also refers to the spirit of the human being.

IV. New Testament meanings. The use of the term in the NT and the patristic period is set against this conceptual background. In the NT, πνεῦμα in the plural indicates different spirits, although in the singular it generally refers to the *Holy Spirit, who in the trinitarian theology of the Fathers became the third person of the *Trinity. In *Mark and *Matthew, the term πνεῦμα refers both to the demonic and the human spirit, as well as the Spirit as the power of God. In Mark, the term appears in 23 passages, 14 of which contain the expression πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον, which is the equivalent of "demon." In Mk 2:8, e.g., πνεῦμα instead refers to the seat of the human perceptions and affective reactions, and in Mt 27:50 it designates the life force. The famous passage from Mk 14:38 is important, in which πνεῦμα πρόθυμον, "willing spirit," is set against the flesh inasmuch as it is "weak" (σὰρξ ἀσθενής). In the pronouncement of blessing of Mt 5:3 it is the human spirit to which the dative of relation refers in the expression πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι, referring to "the poor in spirit."

In Mk 3:28-30 the Spirit of God is the one against whom one can blaspheme, a practice which is there condemned; the Spirit is also described as a universal gift in Mk 1:8, while in 1:9ff., it is said to have been the gift given to Jesus in his *baptism: that this pertains to the Holy Spirit becomes clear from the command to baptize in Mt 28:19, where the Spirit appears alongside the other two persons in the formula "in the *name of . . .". The Holy Spirit in Mt 1:18-20 also has a special role in the virginal conception of Jesus. In the gospel of *Luke, πνεῦμα refers to the Spirit of God three times more than in Mark: analogously in the first 12 chapters of Acts, another work written by Luke, πνεῦμα is used in this sense 37 times. And, in relation to Mark, Luke seems to want to eliminate every impression of Jesus' submission to the Spirit, as one can see from the comparison between Mk 1:12 and Lk 4:1. According to Lk 12:10, the πνεῦμα, blasphemy against whom one does not find forgiveness, is the πνεῦμα of God that is manifested in the inspired words of the witnesses to Jesus. In Luke 11:13 the πνεῦμα ἅγιον is promised to those who ask for it from God, while in Mt 7:11 the objects of the promise are simply some "good things." Likewise in Luke, one also finds some occurrences of the term πνεῦμα with an anthropological meaning, e.g., in Lk 1:47 and 80, referring to that part of humanity that survives death: Lk 8:55.

In *John πνεῦμα is used precisely for the definition for God: πνεῦμα ὁ θεός (4:24). Moreover σάρξ is opposed to πνεῦμα (3:6; 6:63), and only the spirit grants life (6:63 = 2 Cor 3:6); the flesh profits nothing. The Spirit is the water of life for those who believe (7:38-39), it is bestowed on the Eleven, who also represent all believers (20:22), and is identified with the *Paraclete who was called the πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας (14:17; 15:26; 16:13), which shares many characteristics with Jesus Christ: both were sent from the *Father (14:24-26) and proceed from him (16:27-15:26), they teach (7:14; 14:26), they bear witness (8:14; 15:26), they convict the world of *sin (3:18-20; 16:8-11) and do not speak of themselves (14:10; 16:13). On the idea of πνεῦμα in the gospel of *John, see C.K. Barrett, The Holy Spirit in the Fourth Gospel: JTS 1 (1950) 1-15; F. Porsch, Pneuma und Wort. Ein exegetischer Beitrag zur Pneumatologie des Johannesevangeliums, Frankfurt 1974.

In St. Paul, 1 Th 5:23, the πνεῦμα is depicted as the constituent part alongside the ψυχή and the σῶμα; in 1 Tim 3:16, we find a strict opposition between πνεῦμα and σάρξ, that returns in Gal 4:23, 29, where the one who is begotten acc. to the flesh is compared to the one who is begotten acc. to the πνεῦμα. In Rom 8:13, by virtue of the πνεῦμα, believers put to death the deeds of the σῶμα, and in Rom 1:3-4, where Jesus is called the Son of *David "according to the flesh," he is Son of God from the spiritual point of view (on the flesh/spirit polarity in St. Paul's epistles, see J. Frey, Die paulinische Antithese von Fleisch und Geist und die palästinisch-jüdische Weisheitstradition: ZNTW 90 [1999] 45-77). In 2 Cor 3:17, πνεῦμα and Κύριος are identified as the same entity. In effect, in 1 Cor 15:45, Paul announces the identity between the risen Christ and the ζωοποιοῦν πνεῦμα. Paul connects the future resurrection of believers to the resurrection of Jesus, thanks to the πνεῦμα (Rom 8:11). For this reason, the πνεῦμα is the first fruits, ἀπαρχή, of the redemption of the body (Rom 8:23), and the promise of the new dwelling that awaits us (2 Cor 5:5; 1:22).

The πνεῦμα is also a force that manifests itself in extraordinary ways in 1 Th 5:19; in 1 Cor 14:14-16 it confers the ability to speak in tongues; in Rom 15:19, the "power of the πνεῦμα" is placed parallel with that of the "signs and wonders," and in Gal 3:5 with the "wonders" (δυνάμεις). In 1 Cor 2:6ff., the πνεῦμα is a power that grants the highest understanding, σοφία enshrouded in mystery, which in 1:23-24 is to be identified in turn with Christ crucified. The πνεῦμα is therefore the "spirit of faith" in 2 Cor 4:13, and possesses its equivalent obligation of "walking in faith" (2 Cor 5:5, 7). In fact, this allows one to know Jesus as Lord, leading one to profess this faith (1 Cor 12:3), closely connected to the πνεῦμα also in Gal 3:14. According to Rom 8:15, 25-26 and Gal 4:6, the specific duty of the πνεῦμα is prayer, and the first of its gifts, acc. to Gal 5:22, is love (ἀγάπη) that embraces in itself all the others (on πνεῦμα in Gal, see P.-G. Klumbies, Zwischen Pneuma und Nomos. Neuorientierung in den galatischen Gemeinden: WD 19 [1987] 109-135). In Rom 8, the indwelling of the πνεῦμα in the believer and of the believer in the πνεῦμα seems to be parallel to the indwelling of Christ and being in Christ. (For this inhabitation of the Spirit within the believer, see H.D. Wendland, Das Wirken des Hl. Geistes in den Gläubigen nach Paulus: ThLZ 77 [1952] 457-470, and for the action of the Spirit in the believer, see G. Haufe, Das Geistmotiv in der paulinischen Ethik: ZNTW 85 [1994] 183-191; on the relation between πνεῦμα and Christ in Paul's epistles, see Paulinische Christologie, ed. U. Schnelle - T. Söding - M. Labah, Göttingen 2000.)

In Ephesians, πνεῦμα is the power of revelation (1:17; 3:15), that which builds the community (3:16), and the power of prayer (6:18). In the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles, πνεῦμα appears rarely; in Hebrews the πνεύματα are the dead, or the angels; in 10:29, πνεῦμα is the Spirit of grace. In Rev 16:13-14 and 18:2, we find πνεύματα in the sense of demons and spirits and πνεῦμα in the sense of a vital force given by God or also by a demon (11:11; 13:15). The seven spirits are the archangels, situated between God and Christ, from whom proceeds *grace and *peace, sent on earth as messengers of God and Christ (1:4; 4:5), and they correspond to the seven churches. In effect, the two designations for spirits and angels alternate frequently, not only in the book of Revelation (e.g., 27:3; 21:10), but also in other early Christian texts such as the Shepherd of *Hermas (Mand. 11:9). Likewise, in certain Jewish apocryphal texts one finds angelic figures with almost divine-like dignity such as in 4 Esdr 5:43, or on a par with the Messiah such as in the Ethiopic version of Enoch 39:5-7. Moreover, in the book of Revelation, the πνεῦμα is that which inspires prophecy (19:10) and grants extraordinary visions (17:3; 21:10). The most theologically relevant point is that such a πνεῦμα is the glorious Christ (2:1; 7:8, etc.).

V. Patristic and gnostic meanings. Following the foundational NT meanings, the Fathers used πνεῦμα in the singular form, generally only for the Holy Spirit, although in the plural they used it to refer to the angels, souls, wind, virtue, sins and demons, as one sees, e.g., in the writings of *Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 16,13).

Among the Apostolic Fathers, in the Shepherd of Hermas, we find a "spirit of truth" or an "angel of righteousness," which is identified with the Spirit of God, opposed by the "angel of wickedness," which enters into many spirits: both fight for control over humanity. This use finds a parallel in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs*, which, acc. to some, originated in Jewish Christianity and presents affinities to texts from *Qumran: there appear two spirits or angels, one good, identified with the Holy Spirit of God, and one wicked, named also in the plural, between which humans must choose due to their "spirit of intellectual acumen." In Past. vis. 1,1,3 and 2,1,1, the πνεῦμα is characterized by extraordinary physical phenomena. Moreover, in Past. sim. 9,1,1, as in 2 Clem. 9,15 and 14,2, it expresses the idea that the Christ is constituted of a spiritual substance from the moment of his preexistence. For *Ignatius of Antioch, Christ's resurrection makes possible the resurrection of the believer because of the union, in Christ, of the substance of the πνεῦμα and the flesh (Eph. 7,2; Magn. 1,2; Smyrn. 3,2-3; 12,2). At the ecclesial level, the Spirit immediately became the requirement and, at the same time, the gift with which a minister is clothed, as the following Fathers seems to suggest: Ignatius (Phld. 7,1-2; Magn. 13,1), *Clement of Rome, Ep. 41ff., and St. *Irenaeus, who in Haer. IV, 26,2 attributes the specific charism of truth to the members of the episcopal succession.

In the anthropological context, pneuma no longer designated only breath or circulation, as it did in medicine, but soon also the νοῦς in the human, the intellect, the rational and spiritual element, e.g., in *Ignatius of Antioch's epistles, Ep. Polyc. 5,1 (see T. Rüsch, Die Entstehung der Lehre vom Hl. Geist bei Ignatius, Theophilus und Irenäus, Zürich 1952; R.G. Tanner, Pneuma in Saint Ignatius, Berlin 1975), or in *Justin Martyr's, Dial. 135,6. This intellect-Spirit is clearly distinct from the soul, the principle of lower animal life, as one can see, e.g., in *Tatian's Or. 12. At the foundation of this understanding is the tripartite Pauline and Late Antique division of human nature into body, soul and spirit (M.C. Simon, Entstehung und Inhalt der spätantiken trichotomischen Anthropologie: Kairos 23 [1981] 43-50; I. Ramelli, Tricotomia, in Encicl. Filosofica, Milan 2006, 11772-11776). Or rather, the pneuma was understood as a spiritual being superior to the soul of the world, e.g., in the writings of Tatian (Or. 4), *Athenagoras (Leg. 22,3) or *Theophilus (Ad Autol. 2,4ff.) (see P. Nautin, Ciel, pneuma et lumière chez Théophile d'Antioche [Notes critiques sur Ad Autol. 2,13]: VChr 27 [1973] 165-171).

The term πνεῦμα in the writings of the Fathers can also refer to the inspiration of human moral and intellectual disposition, as occurs in the writings of *Origen (In Io. X, 39), or the spirit of a certain person, as in *Justin Martyr (Dial. 49,7), or also a supernatural power of the Christian soul that, inasmuch as it is saved, is capable of resisting idols, as one finds in the ps.-Clementine Homilies (9,15). Elsewhere, as in *Basil of Caesarea's De Sp. sancto 38, πνεῦμα refers to the immaterial substance of the angels (on pneumatology in Basil's writings, see J. Verhees, Die Bedeutung der Transzendenz des Pneuma bei Basilius: OS 25 [1976] 285-302; Id., Pneuma, Erfahrung und Erleuchtung in der Theologie des Basilius des Grossen, ibid. 43-59; Id., Mitteilbarkeit Gottes in der Dynamik von Sein und Wirken nach der Trinitätstheologie des Basilius des Grossen: OS 27 [1978] 3-24). Or πνεῦμα refers to God's nature, as in Athenagoras (Legatio 16,8), or even to the Logos, which is the preexistent Son of God, e.g., in Origen's Dial. Her. SC 67, p. 60, and therefore to God himself, who is πνεῦμα (see J. Boada, El pneuma en Orígenes: Estudios Eclesiásticos 46 [1971] 475-510; C. Blanc, Dieu est pneuma. Le sens de cette expression d'après Origène: SP 16, Berlin 1985, 224-241; and H. Saake, Der Tractatus pneumatico-philosophicus des Origenes in Περὶ ἀρχῶν I,3: Hermes 101 [1973] 91-114). In *Irenaeus (Haer. V, 1,2 and Epid. 42), it refers to the Spirit of God as a force that resurrects the body and the soul, acc. to an understanding also present in the Martyrium Polycarpi (4,2); this spirit makes the human being perfect when it is joined to the body and the soul (Iren., Haer. V, 6,1). One finds a similar idea presented in the writings of other Christian authors such as Clement (Strom. V, 87,4-88,4) and Tatian (Or. Graec. 15,2). *Gregory of Nyssa also devotes his attention to discussing the πνεῦμα in its various ἐνέργειαι (J.J. Verhees, Die energeiai des Pneuma als Beweis für seine Transzendenz in der Argumentation des Gregor von Nyssa: OCP 45 [1979] 5-31). In Crete patristic reflection on the soul, ψυχή acquired feminine connotations, while in Syriac Christian theology the feminine gender of "Spirit" (rûaḥ) also established the association of feminine images with the Spirit.

According to the *gnostics, God has a spiritual nature, as defined in the statements of Heracleon (frag. 24, ap. Orig. Comm. in Ioh. 13,25) and in a manner conforming to what one also finds in the Corp. Herm. (XVIII, 3). The spiritual substance of the divine nature is generally distinguished from the earthly ψυχή (Iren., Haer. I, 21,4; Philosoph. V, 26,8.25; VI, 34,1; VII, 27,6); it is like a foreigner in relation to matter and must strive to free itself (see Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 26,3-4; Heracl. fr. 23 ap. Orig. Comm. in Ioh. 13,20; Philosoph. V, 10,2). The pneuma has the same nature of God and Christ (e.g., Heracl. frag. 24 ap. Orig. Comm. in Ioh. 13,24; Od. Salom. 26.6ff.). In Irenaeus (Haer. I, 18,2) πνευματικὸς ἄνθρωπος was identified by the gnostics with Philo's first human being, the one created in the image of God, of both genders, in Gen 1:27, and distinct from that material human of Gen 2:7 (Opif. 46,134; Leg. all. I, 12,31), acc. to a dichotomy that is also found in Origen's writings (see M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004, 111-122). For *Valentinus, in particular, the sowing of a superior nature (σπέρμα τῆς ἄνωθεν οὐσίας), which is spiritual (πνευματικόν), is mixed by the Redeemer with the ψυχή, unbeknownst to the demiurge (see, e.g., Iren., Haer. I, 4,5; 5,6; II, 19,1-3; Clem. Alex., Exc. ex Theod. 2; 53,2-5). Such a sowing, however, is killed as a result of the existence of the material world; this is why only the second eon survives, i.e., the angel, its spiritual counterpart, which is to be identified with Christ, who enters the individual (Exc. ex Theod. 22,2 and 36,1ff.; Heracl. frag. 35 ap. Orig. Comm. in Ioh. 13,49). These angels are defined as πνεύματα νεόρα (intellectual spirits) (e.g., Exc. ex Theod. 42,2). From this perspective, redemption is the reunification of all the particles of the πνεῦμα, which is only accomplished when the Redeemer, who is also a pneumatic (Iren., Haer. I, 26,1; Epiph., Haer. 30,34), comes down to matter, collects the remaining pneumatics dispersed in it and ascends with these through all the spheres in the pleroma* (e.g., Exc. ex Theod. 42,2). At the end, he restores his somatic and psychic part to chaos, and the pneumatic part to God (Philosoph. V, 26,31-32; VII, 27,10-12); but the πνεῦμα that Jesus gives to the Father ends up being identified with the entire number of the elect (Exc. ex Theod. 64), which become pure πνεύματα like the Redeemer, as one gathers from Iren., Haer. I, 7,1 and Exc. ex Theod. 64, and reenter that pneumatic body which is the mystical body of Christ (Act. Io. 100).

One should also recall that, from the anthropological point of view, in the tripartate division of σῶμα, ψυχή and πνεῦμα, the πνεῦμα in gnostic texts is often replaced by νοῦς, as occurs in the Corpus Hermiticum, where the concept of νοῦς is interchangeable with that of πνευματικὸς λόγος. Nevertheless, there also exists for the gnostics a πνεῦμα σαρκικόν inferior to the rational part, λογιστικὸν καὶ ἡγεμονικόν (see Clem., Strom. VI, 135,3-5). Moreover, in the Ethiopian Enoch 16,1, we find the expression "soul of flesh." This πνεῦμα, at least in certain gnostic sects such as the *Ophites and the *Sethians, seems to refer to a type of intermediary kingdom between the light and the darkness (Philosoph. V, 19,4), to which, acc. to the Ophites, the bodies of the risen belong (Iren., Haer. I, 30,13).

The gnostics usually subdivided human beings into the following categories: hylics (ὑλικοί, in which matter prevailed), psychics* (ψυχικοι, in which the vital soul, inferior to the spirit dominated) and pneumatics (πνευματικοί), who belonged to the Spirit and whose true homeland is the divine πλήρωμα (see, e.g., G. Stroumsa, Another Seed. Studies in Gnostic Mythology, Leiden 1984; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Creazione e antropologia nello Gnosticismo: Dizionario di Spiritualità Biblico-Patristico 11, 2, Rome 1995, 61-81). This terminology in part goes back to St. Paul himself, who in 1 Cor 2:13-15 distinguished the πνευματικός who, due to the Spirit, recognizes God's action, and the ψυχικός, who does not recognize it. In addition, 1 Cor 15:44-46 directly attests to the distinction between σῶμα πνευματικόν and the σῶμα ψυχικόν (see B. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology in 1 Corinthians: A Study in the Theology of the Corinthian Opponents of Paul and Its Relation to Gnosticism, Missoula, MT 1976). The so-called Valentinian sacrament of the nuptial room symbolizes the union of the "pneumatic" human being with its own angel and the restoration of the original unity; in a similar sense, one can speak of a spiritual wedding (see A. Orbe, Los Valentinianos y el matrimonio espiritual: Gregorianum 58 [1977] 5-53).

Spiritual human beings are variously defined by the Ophites and Sethians as the "Sons of the Light" or the "race that does not falter," by *Basilides as "the Third Filiation," and by Valentinus as the "church of the spiritual." The light, opposed to the darkness, which is connected to matter, is in effect tied to the pneumatics, and its symbology is particularly important in gnosticism and is obviously tied to the illumination of the conscience. G. Filoramo's study in particular showed this: Luce e gnosi. Saggio sull'illuminazione nello Gnosticismo, Rome 1980; Pneuma e luce in alcuni testi gnostici: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 595-613; Pneuma e conoscenza in alcuni testi gnostici, in Gnosticisme et monde hellénistique, ed. J. Ries, Y. Janssens and J.M. Sevrin, Louvain 1982, 236-244. One should keep in mind the fact that already Clement of Alexandria, in his teaching on the true γνῶσις, connected the πνεῦμα to illumination, φωτισμός, which not by chance also refers to Christian *baptism in its sacramental meaning (G. Filoramo, Pneuma e photismos in Clemente Alessandrino: Augustinianum 21 [1981] 329-337). The ontological dualism between the material and spiritual world is a frequent characteristic in the writings of the gnostics, who tended to distinguish the two chief creators, one for the material world, often identified with the God of the OT, and another for that of the spiritual, considered to be the true God, unknowable and ineffable, acc. to the principles of apophatic theology. Similarly, the creation of human beings, acc. to the gnostics, though often derived from the biblical account, nevertheless, distinguished between the formation of the material part, worked by the demiurge in its own image, and the breathing in of the pneumatic principle that likened *Adam to God and had a salvific function.

The πνεῦμα also appeared in other gnostic currents of thought, such as that of the Sethians, who, acc. to the account of the Philosoph. VI, 19,2, rather than considering evil a result of the progressive fragmentation and extenuation of the divine world, originally postulated a principle of good and a principle of evil that was accompanied by an intermediary divine principle, Πνεῦμα or the Λόγος. This principle was used in the creation of the world, accomplishing a mixing between the two principles. The world's salvation, however, was attributable to the pneumatic principle alone. In gnostic literature, one often finds the plural form πνεύματα in reference to the dualism of the world of spirits.

F. Mussner, LTK² 8, 568-576; H. Kleinknecht - F. Baumgärtel - W. Bieder - E. Sjöberg - E. Schweizer, πνεῦμα: GLNT 10, 767-1099 [TDNT 6, 332-455]; S. Mowinckel, Die Vorstellungen des Spätjudentums vom Hl. Geist: ZNTW 32 (1933) 97-130; P. van Imschoot, L'action de l'esprit de Jahwé dans l'A.T.: RSPh 23 (1934) 553-587; Id., L'esprit de Jahvé, source de vie, dans l'A.T.: RB 44 (1935) 481-501; Id., L'esprit de Jahvé et l'alliance nouvelle dans l'A.T.: EThL 22 (1936) 201-226; F.B. Allo, Sagesse et Pneuma dans la première épître aux Corinthiens: RBi 43 (1934) 321-346; J. Barbel, Christos Angelos, Bonn 1941; M. Goguel, Pneumatisme et eschatologie dans le Christianisme primitif: RHR 132 (1946) 124-169; 133 (1947–48) 103-161; E. Schweizer, The Spirit of Power: Interpretation 6 (1952) 259-278; A. Recheis, Engel, Tod und Seelenreise. Das Wirken der Geister beim Heimgang des Menschen in der Lehre der alexandrinischen und kappadokischen Väter, Rome 1958; H. Dörries, De Spiritu Sancto, Göttingen 1956; J. Jervell, Imago Dei, Göttingen 1960, part. 127ff.; H. Opitz, Der heilige Geist nach den Auffassungen der römischen Gemeinde bis ca. 150, Berlin 1960; O. Benz, Der Paraklet, Leiden-Köln 1963; A. Miklósházy, East-Syrian Eucharistic Pneumatology, Rome 1968; G. Dautzenberg, Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund der διάκρισις πνευμάτων (1 Kor 12, 10): ByZ 15 (1971) 93-104; M. Putscher, Pneuma, Spiritus, Geist. Vorstellungen vom Lebensantrieb in ihren geschichtlichen Wandlungen, Wiesbaden 1973; H. Saake, Pneuma: RE Suppl. 14 (1974) 387-412; C.K. Barett, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition, London 1975; H.J. Jaschke, Der Heilige Geist im Bekenntnis der Kirche, Münster 1976; Aristotle on Mind and the Senses. Proceedings of the Seventh Symposium Aristotelicum, ed. G.E.R. Lloyd - G.E.L. Owen, Cambridge 1978; J.P. Martín, Il rapporto tra Pneuma ed Ecclesia nella letteratura dei primi secoli cristiani: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 471-483; The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, II, Sethian Gnosticism, ed. B. Layton, Leiden 1981; J.T. Lienhard, Discernment of Spirits in the Early Church: SP 17,2 (1982) 519-522; C. Tibiletti, Azione cosmica dei Cristiani in A Diogneto 6,7: Orpheus 4 (1983) 32-41; J.P. Couliano, Les gnoses dualistes d'Occident, Paris 1989², It. tran. Milan 1989; C. Moreschini, Divinazione e demonologia in Plutarco e Apuleio: Augustinianum 29 (1989) 269-280; Atoms, Pneuma, and Tranquillity: Epicurean and Stoic Themes in European Thought, ed. M.J. Osler, Cambridge 1991; M.D. Boeri, El valor de Alejandro de Afrodisia como fuente de la Stoa antigua (a propósito de pneûma, tónos y krâsis): Méthexis 4 (1991) 129-136; M.F. Frompton, Aristotle's Cardiocentric Model of Animal Locomotion: Journal of the History of Biology 24 (1991) 291-330; Monotheismus und Christologie. Zur Gottesfrage im hellenistischen Judentum und im Urchristentum, ed. H.-J. Klauck, Freiburg 1992; R.T. Wallis - J. Bregman, eds., Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, Albany 1992; H.S. Schibli, Hierocles of Alexandria and the Vehicle of the Soul: Hermes 121 (1993) 109-117; W. Wink, Cracking the Gnostic Code: The Powers in Gnosticism, Atlanta 1993; E. Domingo García, La complejidad del hombre: Helmantica 45 (1994) 65-79; B. Macías, 1Cor 12,13: Filologia Neotestamentaria 7 (1994) 209-214; G. Freudenthal, Aristotle's Theory of Material Substance, Oxford-New York 1995; A. Stimpfle, Buchstabe und Geist: BZ 39 (1995) 181-202; G. Filoramo, Antropologie in conflitto. Il caso di Ireneo e degli gnostici: Humanitas 1 (1996) 52-67; K. Rudolph, Gnosis und spätantike Religionsgeschichte, Leiden 1996; M. Tardieu - P. Hadot, Recherches sur la formation de l'Apocalypse de Zostrien et les sources de Marius Victorinus, Leuven 1996; G. Casadio, Vie gnostiche all'immortalità, Brescia 1997; N. Aujoulat, Le pneuma et le corps lumineux de l'âme d'après le Prologue du Commentaire sur le De Anima d'Aristote de Jean Philopon: Byzantinoslavica 59 (1998) 1-23; G. Lekkas, La féminité de l'âme chez Origène: Revue de philosophie ancienne 16 (1998) 23-36; A. Setaioli, La vicenda dell'anima nella Consolatio di Cicerone: Paideia 54 (1999) 145-174; F. Dünzl, Pneuma, Münster 2000; Pneuma und Gemeinde, ed. J. Eckert et al., Düsseldorf 2001; I. Ramelli, Μυστήριον negli Στρώματα di Clemente Alessandrino, in Il mistero nella carne, II, ed. A.M. Mazzanti, Castel Bolognese 2006, 83-120.

I. RAMELLI

PNEUMATOMACHOI. *Athanasius and others initially used this term (πνευματομαχοῦντες, πνευματομάχοι) to refer to those who, though not *Arians, did not accept the divinity of the *Holy Spirit. They were subsequently called "Macedonians."

P. Meinhold, Pneumatomachoi: PWK 41, 1066-1101; W.-D. Hauschild, Die Pneumatomachen, Hamburg 1967; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 760-772; M.A.G. Haykin, The Spirit of God: The Exegesis of 1 and 2 Corinthians in the Pneumatochian Controversy of the Fourth Century, Leiden 1994.

M. SIMONETTI

POEMA ULTIMUM. A poetic composition of 255 hexameters discovered by Muratori in the last document contained in the Codex Ambrosianus C74; hence its name (carmen ultimum), which is found in the editio princeps of 1697. Some falsely attributed it to *Paulinus of Nola and others to a certain Antony, who appears in the first verse, who could be the recipient or even the author. It is an antipagan work and is to be set against the background of polemics and the interactions between pagans and Christians from the 2nd half of the 4th c., just like the other composition Carmen ad senatorem (CSEL 23 Peiper). The criticism directed toward paganism is not political, but philosophical and doctrinal. It is aimed at those currents of thought such as Pythagoreanism and *Platonism, which were very popular in the 2nd half of the 4th c. The first verses could very likely indicate that the author became a Christian after having undergone many tests and having undertaken numerous investigations. For this reason, the Poema is considered important for the information it provides on pagan cults. The attribution to Paulinus should be ruled out because, in comparison to the poetic style of his works, the Poema appears to be inferior. Scholars have suggested that it be dated to the end of the 4th or the beginning of the 5th c.

CPL 206; CPPM 2, 100; PL 5, 261-282; 61, 689-710; CSEL 30, 329-338; Paolino di Nola, I Carmi, ed. A. Ruggiero, Marigliano 1996, 376-399 (text and It. tr.); P. Fabre, Essai sur la chronologie de l'oeuvre de S. Paulin de Nola, Paris 1948; Id., S. Paulin de Nola et l'amitié chrétienne, Paris 1949; A. Chastagnol, Le sénateur Volusien et la conversion d'une famille de l'aristocratie romaine au Bas Empire: REA 58 (1956) 241-253; F.G. Sirna, Sul c.d. Poema ultimum Ps. Paoliniano: Aevum 35 (1961) 87-107; Patrologia III, 290; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien. Esquisse d'une histoire de la poésie latine chrétienne du IIIe au VIe siècle, Paris 1981, 217-219; J.M. Poinsotte, La présence des poèmes antipaïens anonymes dans l'oeuvre de Prudence: REAug 28 (1982) 33-58; A. Bartalucci, Alcune considerazioni sul Poema ultimum del pseudo-Paolino e sui motivi polemici contro orfici, gnostici e filosofi: Koinonia 17 (1993) 125-142; M. Corsano, Un incontro problematico. Cristiani e pagani in tre carmi adespoti: Orpheus 21 (2000) 26-43; M. Cutino, Sui rapporti fra il cosiddetto "Poema ultimum" (CSEL 30 Hartel) e il "Carmen ad senatorem" (CSEL 23 Peiper): Emerita 67 (1999) 49-64; Id., Per una interpretazione del "Poema ultimum" (CSEL 30 Hartel): BStudLat 31 (2001) 73-101; R. Palla - M. Corsano, Ps.-Paolino Nolano, "Poema ultimum," Pisa 2002 (text, tr. and commentary).

L. Dattrino - A. Di Berardino

POEMENIA (4th c.). Knowledge about this female pilgrim is owed to the research of P. Devos. This scholar gathered disparate pieces of information and reconstructed her biography. She was a Spanish woman from the imperial family of *Theodosius. Using her own ships, Poemenia traveled with various groups: bishops and priests, her eunuchs and servants. She went to spend time with the hermit John of Lycopolis, in Thebes, to be healed from an illness. *Palladius narrates that the hermit did not want to receive Poemenia—for 40 years he had never seen a woman—but instead he warned her not to pass through *Alexandria again. Poemenia, going down the Nile on her boats, stopped at Nycopolis, where one of her eunuchs was killed and Bishop Dionysius was thrown into the river; the others were treated badly (Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca 35, 14-15). At *Jerusalem, she paid for the construction of the church of the Anastasis (ca. 394) and ordered that an idol be destroyed on Mount Gerizim (Samaria). *Jerome criticized her because she traveled to the East with great pomp and apparatus regius.

P. Devos, La "Servante de Dieu" Poemenia: AB 87 (1969) 189-212; Id., Saint Jérôme contre Poemenia?: AB 91 (1973) 117-120; R. Teja, Poemenia. Una peregrina hispana de la familia de Teodosio I, in Homenaje a Josè María Blázquez, Hispania Romana II, ed. J. Alvar, Madrid 2000, 279-290.

A. Di Berardino

POETRY, CHRISTIAN

I. Preface - II. Greeks - III. Latins.

I. Preface. Poetic compositions connected to certain literary genres and respective metric forms—poetry in the sense of the concept beginning at least from Hellenism—are not found in the canonical texts of the OT nor in early Christian writings, including *apocryphal texts. In fact, textual units such as the prologue of the gospel of *John (Jn 1:1-14), the hymn to Christ in the letter to the Philippians (2:6-11), the songs in the *Acts of Thomas (6ff.; 108-113: the so-called Hymn of the Pearl) and the song of dance in the Acts of John (95) are outside the horizon of Greek literary theory. This certainly holds also with respect to the song—undoubtedly Greek—acc. to the testimony of *Pliny the Younger (Ep. 10,96,7), sung by Christians in *Bithynia in honor of Christ.

In fact, we find the very earliest examples of Christian poetry in the strict sense of the term in the literary production of the gnostics, who accepted ancient philosophies and aesthetics. For example, we can cite the Greek hymn of the Valentinians in rhythmic prose preserved for us in the Philosoph. 6,37,7 (E. Heitsch, Die griechischen Dichterfragmente der römischen Kaiserzeit, Göttingen ²1963, 155) and the song of the Naassenes, likewise passed down in 5,10,2 (Ibid. 155ff.). Also for the heretics of subsequent ages such as (perhaps) *Melitius of Lycopolis (W. Riedel - W.E. Crum, The Canons of Athanasius of Alexandria, London 1904), *Arius (Athan., Ar. 1,5ff.; Syn. 25) and the *Apollinarians serve as a testimony to the production of poems (propagandist-didactic).

According to these testimonies one must suppose that orthodox-Christian poetry arose during conflicts with the *heresies. For example, in the 4th c., *Gregory of Nazianzus wrote against Apollinarianism (Carm. 1,10), and St. *Augustine composed his rhythmic psalm Contra Partem Donati; both had a predecessor in the political propaganda of *Parmenian (Liber praedest. 43). In this context, one must remember that in the *Hellenistic Jewish community there already existed a wide gamut of poetic collaborations on the OT such as the works of the tragedian Ezekiel (Clem. Alex., Strom. 1,23; 155; Eus., Praep. ev. 9,28). Works such as these would have contributed to the opinion, already widespread in the Jewish community of the Hellenized Diaspora, that certain parts of the Jewish Bible were composed in Greek meter, an opinion still held by St. *Jerome centuries later (e.g., Prol. in Iob), who in turn referred to *Philo and Flavius Josephus. The most salient testimonies for the continuation of Hellenistic Jewish poetry through the Christians of the first three centuries are found in the oracles written in hexameters of the Sibylline books: books 5-8 of the collection contain exclusively Christian material.

II. Greeks. The Christian production of poetry deriving from pagan precedents in the Greek world began with lyric poems, whose short verses resembled pagan texts in the manner of Mesomedes of Crete from the Hadrian period such as the anonymous hymn to the light Phos hilaron (ed. W. Christ - M. Paranikas, Anthologia Graeca carminum Christianorum, Leipzig 1871 [repr. Darmstadt 1963], 40). We find one particular feature of Christian poetry in the heteronymous function of lyric poems such as the summary of vast works of prose that were philosophical-theological-didactic in character; testimonies of this method are rarely found in antiquity. This conferred an unmistakable character on *Clement of Alexandria's Paidagogos (3,12,101,1-3), with his anapestic poetry of thanksgiving, as well as on *Methodius of Olympus's Symposion (285–292). In both works, one finds a reflection of the scholastic practice: the "sons" of the ideal educator, i.e., Christ, and the versions of the Symposion are found at the end of these respective works and at the end of their teaching. Bestowing on his Parthenion, written in iambics with a refrain, the abecedarian form, Methodius employed a principal technique that was Semitic in origin, i.e., the alphabetic structure, uniting it to the classical form. His verses would not be considered to be at the highest point of traditional quantitative meter; still, one observes his intention initially was not specifically to write Christian Greek poetry. His intention, rather, emphasized more the didactic character of the work and is presumably in contrast to the lyric compositions such as those that have come down to us from the Egyptian ascetic *Hieracas (Eus., HE 7,24,4). Of Egyptian origin, it could possibly be an abecedarian song which is perhaps to be placed in the context of baptismal *catechesis (ed. Heitsch, ibid. 161-164).

Gregory of Nazianzus (ca. 329–390) is also one of the most important representatives of Greek Christian poetry of the 4th c. All of his literary work should be understood as a Christian response to the new pagan Hellenism of that period. But aside from his non-Christian epigrams, Gregory's rich poetic works in the edition of the *Maurists (PG 37) is divided into two groups, i.e., theological poems (which in turn include a dogmatic and an ethical subclass) and historiographical poems (that pertain to the author himself or other persons and events). The individual works are very different both in formal and quantitative meaning; they encompass biblical-paraphrastic and polemical *epigrams, various hints of scholastic poetry (such as the Σύγκρισις βίων, the model of the various forms of life), didactic poems of popular philosophical influence on ethical conduct and a long autobiographical poem "on his life" (Περὶ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ βίου). Following the tendency partly existent in Hellenism, Gregory used iambic trimeter, alongside dactyl meters and lyrics such as the hexameter, the elegiac and the Anacreontic distychs. The rhythmic texts (Carm. 1,32: "evening hymn"; Carm. 2,3: "counsels for virgins"), a hymn, in hexameters, *Neoplatonic in character, dedicated to the transcendent God (1,29), as well as the drama Christos paschon, primarily a cento of Euripidean verses—none of these are his work. The didactic aspect, also dominant in the theological poems of Gregory, is also present in the Iambi ad Seleucum of his cousin *Amphiliocus of Iconium.

It is also true, however, that the use of epic forms began in the 4th c. with the poems of *Apollinaris of Laodicea (the younger?) who—in addition to the Christian comedies and tragedies—composed a *paraphrase of the books of the OT to match Homer's poems (*Socrates, HE 3,16, speaks of Apollinaris the Elder), but all that work—if it ever existed—has been lost. Instead, there exists an epic paraphrase of a lyric theme, the "Homeric Psalter" (the author of which indisputably used the name Apollinaris). Some things considered epic—acc. to the concept of epic—do not appear before the 5th c., i.e., in the form of biblical paraphrastic columns or centos. At the beginning there were—it seems—the *Homeric centos of a certain Bishop Patricius, whose work was continued by the empress *Eudoxia (d. 460). A philosopher by the name of Optimus and the ecclesiastical poet Cosmas of Jerusalem (8th c.) collaborated on the corpus of the Homerokentra. Eudoxia herself also paraphrased some books of the OT and the NT (Fozio, Bib., cod. 183; 184), and a biography of *Cyprian of Antioch. One should not exclude the possibility that Eudoxia was motivated by the biblical Latin cento of *Proba, a copy of which was found in the imperial library at *Constantinople (Cento Probae, Praef.). But the most important epic work of the century was the Metabolē of the gospel according to John by *Nonnus of Panopolis (perhaps one of the bishops who participated at the Council of *Chalcedon) in hexameters composed acc. to the rules of the art. It remains an open question whether the person who wrote the longest epic poem in antiquity, i.e., the Dionysiaka (in 48 books), also composed the Metabolē after a supposed conversion. In fact, it could also be two different expressions of the same mystical theology, as in the case of the lyric hymns of Bishop *Synesius Cyrene at the beginning of the 5th c, where part of it is explicitly Christian, and part of it is decisively *Neoplatonist. But while Synesius enriched his rigorously metrical poems with references to the ancient Doric tradition of choral lyric, the first signs of new rhythmic forms of liturgical song foreshadowed the future. These songs developed under the influence of Syriac ecclesiastical song, esp. through the Greek translations of *Ephrem the Syrian's syllabic verses (ca. 306–373). It is also true that the few fragments of liturgical pieces written by *Auxentius do not provide a clear image of the way things were. According to the most recent research, the rhythmic song more known in that form, later called Kontakion, i.e., the Akathist Hymn to the Madonna, belongs to the period of the Council of *Ephesus (431).

The culmination of liturgical rhythmic poetry was reached during the *Justinian period with a production achieved by the monk *Romanus, nicknamed "Melodus," a poet, composer, singer and propagator of Greek-Syriac culture. His nearly 60 poems considered authentic are a type of rhythmic sermon and for this reason should be attributed to the genre of biblical poetry in the broadest sense of the term. They consist of a primary part (at most 18 strophes with a final prayer), before which is placed one or more proems of varying versification. These proems and the strophes have a common refrain. Biblical events (e.g., Elijah and the widow of Zarephath) are depicted also in several small rhythmic poems of the 6th c. A classicist piece characterized esp. by description and epigrams (as in the case of the church of the Hagia Sophia) is opposed to more recent poetry, represented by Romanus. The most important representative of the style was *Paul Silentiarius. Both trends had a relationship with the cultural and concrete politics of the emperor Justinian, who was the central point of reference for that period.

Apart from the Christian lyric style of *Sophronius of Jerusalem and *Maximus the Confessor—imitative of the ancient tradition, having composed an Anacreontic hymn in imitation of Gregory of Nazianzus—the 7th c., or more specifically the era of the emperor *Heraclius, saw an excellent poet in *George of Pisidia, whose works—profane, *panegyric and spiritual, all in classical meter—were composed for the most part in iambic trimeter. In his Hexameron, a didactic poem, in lyric tone, on beauty and the usefulness of creation, he appealed to concepts that were fundamentally *Stoic, which he introduced into a Christian framework. The antiheretical poem, even if under the form of poetic invective, is also didactic Κατὰ Σευήρου (against *Severus of Antioch). The secondary genres in the work of George of Pisidia are represented by a hymn on the resurrection of Christ, a corpus of epigrams in large part Christian and a brief autobiographical poem. George's work in its totality represents a brief classicist pause at the cusp of the middle-Byzantine era.

III. Latins. Christian poetry in the Latin world was incomparably richer and more diversified. Regardless of the end of the era in question, it presented itself primarily in the classicist form, which was brought about by the social-cultural circumstances of the Western empire. The most frequently used verse was the quantitative hexameter. The great exceptions, the works of *Commodian (Carmen Apologeticum, Instructiones), written in heavily popularized syllabic hexameters, probably to express some distance from traditional culture, are hard to date. Attempts to date this author's work fluctuate between the 3rd and 5th c. because of, on the one hand, the ancient poet's theology and, on the other, his language. An abecedarian hymn on *papyrus and rhythmic verses with end rhyme and refrain, therefore comparable to the Greek Kontakia, belongs to the end of the 3rd c. One can detect here a popular tradition, probably liturgical, that reappeared in the late 4th c. in Augustine's previously mentioned invective codified in the abecedarian hymn and refrain against *Donatists, i.e., the Psalmus contra partem Donati. The first product of Latin Christian poetry of certain chronology is therefore the anonymous Laudes Domini, written in hexameters, from the 2nd decade of the 4th c., in which the miracle pertaining to a deceased person who died in the country of the Aedui should be interpreted as a sign of the approaching *parousia.

In contradistinction to its Greek counterpart, Latin Christian literature, moreover, produced—contemporaneously to the most ancient known classical texts—the genre of the biblical epic poem, which survived until the Baroque period even in the national languages. The first representative author of this genre is the Spanish presbyter *Juvencus with his Virgilizing paraphrase of the gospels (Evangeliorum libri), esp. of the gospel acc. to *Matthew, from the late Constantinian period. He provided the motif of the epic poem in his preface to the liturgical prayer Munda cor that was said before the reading of the gospel. Juvencus held closely to his original text, but his literary successors increasingly transformed the biblical text, e.g., through personal meditation on the Bible or with exegetical insertions, as in the case of *Sedulius (5th c.), a poet perhaps of Italian origin. In his Carmen paschale, he put together—presumably by means of criticisms of poetic presentation—even a prose version, the Opus paschale; the Greek *Basil of Seleucia did the same for his *Life of Thecla (Photius, Bib., cod. 168, which speaks of a spurious text), obviously following scholastic practice. Almost contemporaneous in S *Gaul, *Claudius Marius Victorius, on the basis of his interpretation of Genesis, composed the didactic poem Alethia in open controversy against the didactic work of the Epicurean materialist Lucretius. Possibly following this path, ps.-Hilary also described the creation (In Genesin) and the new creation (De Evangelio) in brief interdependent poems with a clear, but not polemical, reference to Lucretius in the first poem. He also affirmed in his preface, metrically separated and dedicated to Pope *Leo, that his poetry must be understood as a liturgical praise to God in its function as a high *eucharistic prayer. At the end of the 5th c., the African poet *Dracontius, in order to demonstrate the goodness of God, chose several biblical scenes in his epic-didactic poem De Laudibus Dei, beginning with creation, which he presented almost as a commentator. Alcimus *Avitus of *Vienne in France gave up paraphrasing the entire biblical text; in his biblical epic De spiritalis historiae gestis, he limited himself to some typologically relevant passages in the OT, e.g., the crossing of the Red Sea. Lastly, the Roman deacon Arator, in a public reading in the church of S. Pietro in Vincoli in 544 presented the Acts of the Apostles, composed in hexameters, which gave an ecclesiological interpretation of the text under discussion. He concentrated on the patronage of the princes of the apostles for a Rome threatened by the Byzantine-Ostrogothic war.

A fragmentary paraphrase in hexameters of parts of the Heptateuch of the so-called Poet of the Heptateuch (first called Cyprian the Gaul—a text datable to the 4th or 5th c.) represents an entirely different current of the biblical poem. In it, the author does not present himself as a director or even serving in a fictitious liturgical function; instead he contents himself with transforming the original prose into traditional epic hexameters. Only in the paraphrases of the lyric portions of the original text, as in the case of *Moses's song of thanksgiving (Ex 15:1-19), did he use ancient lyrical forms, perhaps influenced by the aforementioned biblical aesthetic of St. *Jerome. Because of its equally fragmentary state, it is not possible to date the biblical poetry of *Severus of Malaga written in the high late 6th-c. style.

Like hagiography, Latin Christian poetry defined itself at times as a continuation of the gospels so that already in the 5th c. with *Paulinus of Périgueux's Vita Sancti Martini, *Sulpicius Severus's paraphrase written in the ambitious style of the Vita, appears as a hagiographic epic. Hagiography and paraphrase united in the poems on the martyrdom of the Maccabean brothers. One should also attribute to the classical biblical epic poems the Virgilian centos of the Roman woman Faltonia Betitia *Proba from the mid-4th c., who treated both testaments. We have already spoken of its possible influence on Eudoxia. Proba explicitly maintained that ultimately Virgil sang the deeds of Christ (23). Although the poetess believed that she was explaining the Christian core of the Aeneid, *Pomponius, in his cento, puts the same Virgil, the bucolic Christian, next to that poem. A third work of Virgil, the Georgics, and more precisely the famous description of the plague of the cattle, is formally separated by a lyrical meter, and is Christianized in connection to the bucolic in *Endelechius's poem titled De mortibus boum.

The final decades of the 4th c., esp. during the *Theodosian era, and the first decades of the 5th c. led the classicist current to its apex. The most important representative and the Christian poet of greatest fame (not only of Late Latin Antiquity) was the Spaniard *Prudentius (348–after 405). His work includes all poetic genres with the exception of drama. Ethical poetry is represented by the allegorical-historical poem Psychomachia (The Soul's Combat), the didactic epic from the Liber Apotheosis (i.e., the apotheosis of the human being through the correct faith) and the Hamartigenia (The Origin of Sin), antiheretical poems that appealed to, among other writings, the works of *Tertullian. Lyric poetry is represented by two cycles composed in various meters, i.e., the Liber Cathemerinon (Book of Daily Songs) and the Peristephanon or De coronis (the crowns of the martyrs), the apologetic-satirical invective (as opposed to the political invectives of his contemporary Claudian) and by the two books Contra Symmachum, a reelaboration of the two letters of St. *Ambrose against the reconstruction of the altar for the statue of victory in the Roman curia written in 384 (Epist. 10,72; 73). This reelaboration is similar to that of the anonymous work Carmen contra paganos and the not-as-aggressive Carmen ad quendam senatorem, likewise anonymous (perhaps against *Praetextatus). Lastly, his lyric poetry includes the epigram, until that time represented by *Damasus's metric titles written for the sepulchers of Roman martyrs, from the cycle of the Dittochaeon (double staff) or the Tituli historiarum, a collection of biblical titles for wall paintings, most likely fictitious, with scenes of the two testaments, as we also find in the less artificial form in the Tituli of *Elpidius Rusticus. Despite its classical character, every work of Prudentius is a creation sui generis both formally and linguistically, a peculiar feature of both the constant intrusive application of the Roman poetic tradition and the frequent references to contemporaneous *pagan works.

In comparison to Prudentius's formal richness, the voluminous work of his younger contemporary *Paulinus of Nola from Aquitaine seems monotonous. And yet the lengthy Carmina Natalicia written in hexameters on the occasion of the anniversary of the death of the local Saint *Felix of Nola evidences great skill, esp. with respect to the Christianization of the poetic subject—a Christianization of the secular poetic *panegyric of the Claudian type, both for poems and other meters, such as the ones that are found inserted primarily in the prosaic letters, in which the future bishop of Nola treats the pagan poems of his teacher *Auxonius. This also holds for the sole nuptial Christian poem (for *Julian of Eclanum and Titia): if Paulinus composed it in Sapphic strophes in contrast to the Late Antique tradition, he does so because Sappho was considered the archetype of this lyric subgenre.

In the Roman-Gallic world of the 5th c., in the context of the question of theodicy that had become a pressing question because of the barbarian invasions, the didactic poem in hexameters De divina providentia was born. It was probably a work written by *Prosper of Aquitaine, the author of the thematically similar poem Carmen ad uxorem. The same historical-theological background shows in a satirical eclogue, set between the monastic and the outside world, titled Sancti Paulini Epigramma. Its author, however, remains unknown. In view of moral faults identified in these two poems as the cause of the devastation, *Orientius, bishop of the city of Auch, composed his didactic poem with vivid satire, the Commonitorium, in elegiac distychs. The difficult circumstances of that era were also the reason why *Paulinus of Pella, grandson of Auxonius, already advanced in age, composed a personal poem of thanksgiving (Eucharistikos) to God in somewhat crude hexameters (otherwise damaged in the textual tradition) that included references to Virgil's Aeneid and St. Augustine's Confessions.

Prosper dedicated his didactic poem bearing the ambiguous title Carmen de ingratis (which means either "the ungrateful" or "those who reject grace") and his didactic epigrams to the then-current controversy with the *Semi-Pelagian heretics in Gaul. A few decades after Prosper, but still in the context of that era, an anonymous author in Vandal *Africa (probably also before *Verecundus of Iunca's poem De satisfactione paenitentiae) wrote the didactic poem De resurrectione mortuorum. It was erroneously attributed to Tertullian, making reference to the approaching end of the world, partially written in hexameters ending in rhyme. Tertullian was also considered the author of a didactic poem titled Carmen adversus Marcionitas, because of his treatise against *Marcion. But the explanation for the false attribution of patristic poems to Tertullian, *Hilary and Marius Victorinus probably lies in the fact that such works, initially rejected by the church, after a period of anonymity were attributed to famous writers of prose by St. Jerome to make them more acceptable.

*Venantius Fortunatus lived between Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages. He was born near Treviso and worked in Merovingian Gaul (ca. 530–591). His various poems reflect a high level of quality; linguistically, they already showed traces of an advanced historical development, even if Venantius is located within the poetic tradition of Late Antiquity. The historical development can be traced through figurative poems in the style of *Optatianus Porfyrius as well as through references to Late Antique patristic poetry such as in the Vita Sancti Martini in relation to Paulinus of Périgueux, through a secular poem Mosella with references to the poem of the same name by Auxonius, and lastly in relation to Prudentius (Cath. 9,82) in his trochaic hymn to the *cross, which would later become the liturgical text Pange lingua (Carm. 2,2).

With this composition dedicated to the cross for a specific occasion, i.e., the solemn transfer of a relic of the cross to *Poitiers (ca. 570), we have touched upon the vast field of liturgical poetry, the nonclassical origins of which we have already spoken. To combat the heretics, presumably the origin of Christian poetry (here in the concrete sense against Arianism), *Hilary of Poitiers (4th c.) used community singing in order to confirm the community in the faith, inspired by his experience during exile in the East. What has come down to us of his hymns reveals a mixture of lyric-classical forms and pure theology; that mixture renders those poems poorly suited to accomplish their desired objective. The three anti-Arian prosaic hymns, originally written, however, without any reference to community singing, exhibit an extremely anticlassical form, but are written nonetheless with a mastery of the art, partially with refrain, which Marius Victorinus joined to his theological treatises on the same issue. Only Ambrose's hymns were widely received because of their outward simplicity, written in strophes of four iambic dimeters as small works of art to combat the Arians. In fact, Ambrosian-style hymns became the dominant liturgical form even in the Early Middle Ages, as in the case of Flavius de Chalon-sur-Saône. Already toward the end of the 5th c., one finds some iambic dimeters in rhythmic verses.

Such a circumstance facilitated the victory of the exclusively rhythmic syllabic hymnody among the Irish, who had just entered the Latin world at the end of this century. The most famous collection of spiritual poetry of the Early Middle Ages, the antiphon of Bangor (today at Milan, Bibl. Ambros. C V inf., ed. E. Franceschini, Padua 1941), contains insular and continental texts, demonstrating the cultural interchange between the two historically diverse settings. One of the most successful Irish hymns, the Altus Prosator by Columba of Hy (i.e., Columba of Iona, d. 597), is an abecedarian in pairs, consisting of Ambrosian syllabic strophes. The Loricae (weaponry songs) warranted a special position in the spiritual lyric, such as that of the Irish Laidcenn (Lathcen), in which God is invoked for the protection of the individual parts of the body through researched glossary terms, in part Greek and Hebrew (a sign of the so-called Latin Hisperic). The Irish hymn notably influenced the first Anglo-Saxon poem; Aldelmo of Malmesbury (639–709) and various brief poems of his circle would be unthinkable without it. But rhythmic poetry also prevailed at the center of the declining Western Roman Empire. In *Spain it appeared at the end of the 7th c.—despite the criticism of the Archbishop *Julian of Toledo concerning rhythmic poetry—with the Abbot *Valerius of Bierzo and his Epitameron of long rhythmic verses (probably a composite of "hexameron" and "epigram") with moralistic content. In Gaul—acc. to the account given by *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 6,46)—the Merovingian King *Chilperic composed two metrical books imitating the style of Sedulius. A hymn on St. Medardus in rhythmic verses (from 15 to 17 syllables) has survived. Lastly, in Italy the so-called Lombardic rhythms of the 7th c. (among which we mention the poetry of a certain Stephen on the Synod of Pavia [698] in a heavily popularized Latin) present some salient examples of the radical change in language and versification; a development that would be modified only with the so-called Carolingian renewal.

J. Kroll, Die christliche Hymnodik bis zu Klemens von Alexandria: Verzeichnis der Vorlesungen der Akademie zu Braunsberg (1921/22) 86-88; F.J.E. Raby, A History of Christian Latin Poetry, Oxford 1927; K. Thraede, Untersuchungen zum Ursprung und zur Geschichte der christlich-lateinischen Poesie, I: JbAC 4 (1961) 108-127; II: ibid. 5 (1962) 125-157; III: ibid. 6 (1963) 101-111; O. Reverdin (ed.), Christianisme et formes littéraires de l'antiquité tardive en Occident, Geneva 1976; H.G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im Byzantinischen Reich, Munich [2]1977, 262-266; 425-430; 472ff.; H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner, Bd. 2, Munich 1978, 98-107; 109-111; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'occident chrétien, Paris 1981; J. Fontaine, Étude sur la poésie latine tardive d'Ausone à Prudence, Paris 1987; S. Costanza (ed.), La poesia tardoantica. Tra retorica, teologia e politica, Messina 1984; Herzog 5, 219-224; P. Karavites, Gregory Nazianzinos and Byzantine Hymnography: Journal of Hellenic Studies 113 (1993) 81-98; K. Smolak, La poesia cristiana latina tra il quarto e il quinto secolo: Salesianum 62 (2000) 19-39; F. Stella, Poesia e teologia. L'occidente latino tra il IV e l'VIII secolo, Milan 2001; M. Salvatore (ed.), La poesia tardoantica e medievale 1, Alessandria 2001; A. Taranga (ed.), La poesia tardoantica e medievale 2, Alessandria 2004. See the critical editions with commentary and translation of the Greek and Latin poetry in the collection Poeti cristiani (ed. R. Palla, Pisa 1995).

Literary genres and authors (editions and commentaries excluded): W. Schmid, Tityrus Christianus: Rheinisches Museum 96 (1953) 101-165; A. Salvatore, Studi Prudenziani, Naples 1958; K. Thraede, Studien zu Sprache und Stil des Prudentius, Göttingen 1965; R. Herzog, Die allegorische Dichtkunst des Prudentius, Munich 1966; Id., Die Bibelepik der lateinischen Spätantike, Munich 1975; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975; J.-L. Charlet, Création poétique dans le Cathemerinon de Prudence, Paris 1982; K. Smolak, Beiträge zur Erklärung der Metabole des Nonnos: JÖByz 34 (1984) 1-14; M. Roberts, Biblical Epic and Rhetorical Paraphrase, London 1985; M. Herren, The Hisperica Famina II. Related Poems, Toronto 1987; P. Angelucci, La tecnica poetica di Aratore, Rome 1990; W. George, Venantius Fortunatus, A Latin Poet in Merovingian Gaul, Oxford 1992; J. Koder, Mit der Seele Augen sah ich deines Lichtes Zeichen, Herr. Romanos Melodos, Vienna 1996; M. Roberts, Poetry and the Cult of the Martyrs, Ann Arbor, MI 1996; A. Arweiler, Die Imitation antiker und spätantiker Literatur in der Dichtung De spiritalis historiae gestis des Alcimus Avitus, Berlin 1999; F. Stella, Poesia dell'alto medioevo europeo. Manoscritti, lingua e musica dei ritmi latini, Florence 2000; Ch. Gnilka, Prudentiana I-III, Munich-Leipzig 2001–2003; F. Stella (ed.), La scrittura infinita. Bibbia e poesia in età medievale e umanistica, Florence 2001; K. Smolak, Maro mutatus in melius? in O. Panagl - R. Wodak (eds.), Text und Kontext, Würzburg 2004, 51-66.

K. Smolak

POETRY, SYRIAC. In *Syriac literature, poetry occupies a preeminent place. It did not assume lyric or epic forms, but rather used literary genres suitable for religious instruction or sacred worship. As a result, Syriac poetry was primarily ecclesiastical. Syriac meter followed the isometric principle (an equal number of syllables for every verse) and not the accentuation or the quality of the vowels as in Greek and Latin poetry. The parallelism in the metric phrases is frequent as in Hebrew biblical poetry. One also finds the use of the acrostic alphabet as in the Psalms and Lamentations of Jeremiah and acrostics based on the name of the author, e.g., APRM (Ephrem).

The first known Syriac poet was *Bardesanes of *Edessa. According to *Ephrem the Syrian, he wrote the madrashe filled with melodies and also psalms (150) in metric form (Contra haereses 53,5) to spread his religious ideas. Ephrem himself at times cited his own verses. Two ancient isosyllabics (distychs of six syllables) are included in the *Acts of Thomas (3rd

c.). The composition of the madrashe is also associated with the name of *Mani. Fragments of ancient distychs of seven syllables have been preserved in the letter of Mara bar Serapione (3rd c.) to his son and in the writings of Isaac of Antioch. Whether to consider the Odes of Solomon Syriac poetry is still a heavily debated question. If the text's original language was Syriac, then the poetic form of the Odes is very unique.

The great teacher of Syriac poetry was Ephrem. The most noteworthy collections of Syriac poetry are the works of this 4th-c. Syrian deacon. The variety of poetic forms—more than 60—used by Ephrem with great ease presupposed a long antecedent tradition. Ephrem took to the pen to compose didactic poems and exhortations against heresies. He wrote poems on the sound, orthodox faith and for the church feasts. The popularity of his writings gave rise to many imitators in the following centuries. Ephrem's influence on the origins and development of Byzantine hymnography, e.g., on *Romanus Melodus, is still subject to debate. Other poets of the first period of Syriac literature are *Cyrillona, *Balai, Isaac of Antioch, *Narsai and *Jacob of Sarug.

There are two chief literary genres of Syriac poetry: memre and madrashe. Memre were poetic "speech," didactic or narrative. The verses were isosyllabic without divisions in the stanzas. Memre often took the character of the homily and verses or a poetic exposition of the sacred *Scriptures. Other memre looked more like a treatise. The memre were used esp. for church feasts and commemorations of martyrs and saints. They are found in books for the celebration of the divine office or in collections intended for the edification of the faithful—*laypeople, monks and clerics. The madrasha or "instruction," however, is a poetic song of a determined number of stanzas in isosyllabic verses with a set response (ʿ*onyata*) after each stanza. The structure of the strophes can be very simple or quite complex. The madrashe were certainly sung and accompanied with the title of the melody (qala, i.e., the first words of the song that functioned as the model). According to a Syriac biography, Ephrem established choirs of the so-called daughters of the covenant who, after having learned his hymns by heart, sung them in choir in alternation in the liturgical offices. Another reason for the song of the "instructions" was to enable the spreading of the true faith in a popular way. Only a dozen or so cycles of hymns are preserved from Ephrem, constituting from 4 to 87 songs each with a rich variety of structures. The "hymns" in the strict sense of the term are a subgroup of madrashe. Another variety of the genre is the soghitha or "song." The soghyatha often had brief stanzas of four verses in the form of a dialogue or disputation. Many soghyatha display the characteristics of a drama and were popular among the ancient Syrians. Ephrem preferred heptasyllabic meter (7 [3+4] + 7). Balai, however, developed the pentasyllabic meter (5 [2+3] + 5). Jacob of Sarug used dodecasyllabic meter (12 [4+4+4]). Narsai composed poems with 7 or 12 syllables.

Liturgical poetry in Syriac included some particular forms: a turgama is an expository hymn before the reading of the epistle or the gospel; a *ba*ʿ*awatha* is a brief song of supplication; a teshbohta is a song of praise; and qale, which are "melody," i.e., responsories.

Rhymed verses appear in Syriac poetry during the Islamic period in imitation of Arabic poetry and came into general use from the 9th c. onward, e.g., with Anthony the Orator (fl. 825).

Anonymous, Syriac Metrical Literature: Journal of Sacred Literature 4/8 (1853) 389-397; H. Grimme, Der Strophenbau in den Gedichten Ephraems des Syrers, Fribourg (Suisse) 1893; A. Baumstark, Syrische und hellenistische Dichtung: Gottesminne 3 (1906) 570-593; R. Duval, Anciennes littératures chrétiennes 2: La littérature syriaque, Paris [3]1907; A. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur, Bonn 1922; G. Hölscher, Syrische Verskunst, Leipzig 1932; J.-B. Chabot, Littérature syriaque, Paris 1934; S.P. Brock, Dialogue Hymns of the Syriac Churches: Sobornost 5/2 (1983) 35-45; Id., Syriac and Greek Hymnography: Problems of Origin, SP 16/2, Berlin 1985, 77-87; H.J.W. Drijvers, Solomon as Teacher: Early Syriac Didactic Poetry, in IV Symposium syriacum 1984 (OCA 229), Rome 1987, 123-134; M. Breydy, Une nouvelle méthode pour constater l'originalité des hymnes syriaques, in Studia semitica nec non iranica, Wiesbaden 1989, 33-51; M. Lattke, Sind Ephraems Madrashe Hymnen?: Oriens christianus 73 (1989) 38-43; S.P. Brock, Syriac Dispute Poems: The Various Types, in Dispute Poems and Dialogues in the Ancient and Medieval Near East (Orientalia Lovanensia Analecta 42), Leuven 1991, 109-119; R. Murray, Aramaic and Syriac Dispute-poems and Their Connection, Studia Aramaica, Oxford-New York 1995, 157-187; K. McVey, Were the Earliest Madrashe Songs or Recitations? in After Bardaisan, Leuven 1999, 185-199; S.P. Brock, The Dialogue Poem: From Sumer to Syriac: Journal of the Canadian Society for Syriac Studies 1 (2001) 1-10.

E. Carr

POITIERS. The ancient Limonum (Lemonum) Pictonum, then Pictavis, during the time of Augustus, the city belonged to the province of Aquitaine and, after *Diocletian, to Aquitania Secunda. It was one of the major cities of Roman *Gaul, having an amphitheater, from the Julio-Claudian period, that contained 40,000 seats, which was the largest. It was destroyed at the end of the 3rd c., as archaeologists have ascertained from a specific layer containing signs of fire (caused by the Bagaudi? Germans?). It was reconstructed on a smaller scale, but with more pomp in a short time, and girded with the strongest system of fortification in Gaul. Even all the temples were rebuilt, which proves that the city was entirely *pagan. Its territory corresponded to the three districts of *Vienne, Vandée and Deux-Sèvres.

In the 4th c., Christianity laid deep roots and developed at Poitiers. Its first known bishop was *Hilary, the great opponent of *Arianism. The first episcopal church dates to this period (under the modern cathedral), the baptistery and the domus ecclesiae (i.e., home of the bishop); the churches of St. Martin, St. Hilaire-entre-deux-Églises, St. Hilaire-de-la-Celle (above the house of Hilary), St. Savin (above the home of Savin?) and perhaps St. *Paul (the future priory) date back to the 4th or 5th c. Outside the city, on the ruins of the temple, was constructed Notre-Dame-la-Grande, while St. Hilaire-le-Grand was built on the funerary cella of the wife of the daughter of Hilary. The 5th-c. history for Poitiers, however, remains unknown; nevertheless, one can conclude that by that time *paganism had disappeared. The following names of bishops have survived from this period: *Hilary (356–13 January 367/68), Adelphus and Elaphus.

The Battle of Vouillé (507) forced Poitiers to surrender to *Clovis. Under his successors, the leadership of the city changed 20 times in the 6th c., though in the 7th c. there was a period of peace, preserving its municipal institutions. The 8th c. was marked by fighting between the dukes of Aquitaine Hunaud and Gaiffier against the *Franks' Charles Martel and Pepin the Short, with the Arabic interlude in 732. This period was marked primarily by the construction of the Abbey of the Holy Cross through the work of Queen *Radegund, who there housed 200 monks, while, on the side, the Abbey of St. Mary was also built for the monks. The new churches of St. Luke (hospital and oratory) and St. *Leodegarius were constructed at Poitiers.

Outside the city, where the bishop had been buried in 368, St. Hilary's developed and became the episcopal necropolis (tomb of *Venantius Fortunatus, Theomastus bishop of Mainz [!]), and St. Salvatore (tomb of St. *Porcarius), and the oratories of Elidius and Leonius, Martin and Gelasius were also built . To the E of the city, the following churches were built: St. Hilaire-de-la-Celle, St. Pierre-le-Puellier, Notre-Dame-l'Ancienne; to the W, Notre-Dame-la-Grande, St. Michele, St. Radegund (enlarged in the 8th c.).

From this period we know of Bishop Pientius, who helped St. Radegund with the construction of the abbey in ca. 544; Pascentius, to whom Venantius Fortunatus dedicated the Life of St. *Hilary (BHL 3885-3887), Maroveus, a contemporary of Gregory of *Tours (Hist. Franc. 7,24; 9,33,39-41,43; 10,15-16; Virt. S. Mart. 2,44; Gl. Conf. 104); Plato, the archdeacon of Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 5,49; Virt. S. Mart. 4,32); Venantius Fortunatus (Baudonivia, Vit. S. Radeg. 2, prol.; Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. 2,13); Caregisilus; Ennoald (614); John (627); Diddus, uncle of St. *Leodegar of Autun (628/629–669/670); Ansoald (676–696/697); Eparchius (794); Maximinus.

Duchesne, Fastes 2, 75-87; DACL 14, 1252-1340; M. Vieillard Troiekouroff, Les monuments religieux de Poitiers d'après Grégoire de Tours, in Études mérovingiennes, Poitiers 1952, 285-292; Id., Les monuments religieux de la Gaule d'après les oeuvres de Grégoire de Tours, Paris 1976, 218-230; D. Claude, Topographie und Verfassung der Städte Bourges und Poitiers bis in das 11. Jh., Lübeck-Hamburg 1960; Province ecclésiastique de Bordeaux, ed. L. Martin et al., Paris 1998, 65-92; B. Beaujard, *Le culte des saints en Gaule. Les premiers temps: d'Hilaire de Poitiers à la fin du VI*e siècle, Paris 2000.

V. Saxer

POLEMIUS SILVIUS. Historian of *Gaul from the mid-5th c., whose writings have all been lost with the exception of a work titled Laterculus, compiled in the year 448–449. This was a monthly calendar in which were inserted the names of emperors and consuls (Nomina omnium principum Romanorum); provinces (Nomina provinciarum); animals (Nomina cunctorum spirantium atque quadrupedum, Voces variae animantium); an *Easter *computus and, in the appendix, the monuments of *Rome (Quae sint Romae), where he mentions the *thermal baths of Caracalla as one of the seven wonders of Rome, famous for the abundant decoration and works of art that adorn them; a universal history (Breviarium temporum); and weights and measures (Nomina ponderum vel mensurarum). The calendar has information pertaining primarily to Christianity, joined to supplementary information on topics of popular culture, gathered under the appropriate titles. The compilation has an explicit date: Postumio et Zenone viris clarissimis consulibus, i.e., 448; this work was dedicated to Domino beatissimo Eucherio episcopo, i.e., *Eucherius of Lyons. The author is to be identified with Silvius, a friend of *Hilary of Arles, during whose life (ch. 11) he is listed among the eminent figures—eiusdem temporis qui suis scriptis meriti summi claruere. A brief bit of information on him, registered for the year 438, is also in the Chronica Gallica a. 452, concerning the circumstances in which he composed his book: Silvius turbatae admodum mentis post militiae in palatio exacta munera aliqua de religione conscribit.

CPL 2256; PL 13, 676; T. Mommsen, Chronica minora, I, 518-551; ed. of the treatise Quae sint Romae, in R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, I, Rome 1940, 294-301, 308-310; information in Schanz IV/2, 130; PWK 21, 1960–1963.

V. Loi - B. Amata

POLEMON the Apollinarist. Leader of the most extreme group of the disciples of *Apollinaris. *Theodoret (Haer. fab. comp. IV, 8) informs us about the divisions among Apollinaris's disciples, and in ch. 9 he speaks of the "Polemonians." It is not clear when this occurred; Polemon, however, emerged as the head of the opposition against the "great church": one of his famous fragments cited many times by later sources (see Lietzmann, frag. 174, pp. 274-275) contains many harsh expressions against the "novelties" of the Cappadocians and the "smoke" of the Italians (see also a fragment from his treatise Antirrheticus: Lietzmann, frag. 173, p. 274). Polemon vociferously guarded against the danger of "divisions" in Christ, which would have led one to think of two wills in the incarnate Logos (see Lietzmann, frag. 175, p. 275). His position was shared by *Eunomius of Berea in *Thrace and by *Julian the Apollinarian to whom Apollinaris himself dedicated a treatise (Lietzmann, frags. 150-152), responding specifically to the problem of the two wills in Christ. Two fragments remain from Polemon's letter to Julian the Apollinarian (i.e., Lietzmann, frags. 176-177, p. 276). *Timothy (Apollinarist), bishop of Berytus and the disciple of Polemon, separated himself from this group. In 381, he signed the canons of the Council of *Constantinople, which condemned Apollinarianism among other heresies (can. I). At that time, Polemon probably crafted a document against Timothy; the most famous fragment of this text has survived (Lietzmann, frag. 174).

CPG 3710-3713 Suppl. 205; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea and seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 40-42, 153; frags., pp. 273-276; DCB 4, 422.

E. Cavalcanti

POLITICS. The following observations do not intend to be anything more than a very brief introduction to the relationship between the various Christian communities and the political establishment and the reflection that thereby followed. Reference, therefore, will not be made to the history of doctrine but rather to the history of Christian political thought in the sense assigned to these terms by J. Touchard (see Histoire des idées politiques). Ancient Christian literature, in fact, did not contain treatises on political theory similar to those that the Greek world had known, but rather presented experiences and new problems that caused Christians to take temporary and contingent positions. The first and primary concern was religious (this was generally revealed by the biblical text, esp. by the NT and its interpretation): it is within this context that one must understand the political statements the bishops directed toward the leaders of the city (civitas) or toward the faithful, just as one should understand the testimony offered by the *martyrs in the first centuries. That understanding, however, does not diminish but rather establishes and explains the political relevance of the early Christian communities who lived and worked in different social situations.

For a long time, *Rome overcame the idea and reality of the city-states born in the Greek world and united peoples and nations of various languages and traditions under the same political structure. To maintain unity, Rome had elaborated a series of rules for common life and had attributed a legal status to the inhabitants of the Roman oikoumenē. Christians generally recognized all this as a positive situation that allowed the gospel to be proclaimed with greater ease to the nations (not all, however, shared the same view: alongside the "providential" line, there was in fact a perspective that tended to perceive the empire negatively, which it considered the personification of evil).

But beyond this attitude toward the Roman Empire, Christians took various stances with respect to the political establishment. It was said that their attention was essentially focused on the religious factor that was manifested in the revelation that they believed God had delivered to humanity: they found points of unity, on the one hand, by recognizing God as the Lord of history and Jesus Christ both human and divine, and, on the other, by considering humanity as creatures of God, in his image and a manifestation of his love. This was a God who respects human freedom, who calls human beings to love every other person and with that establishes a specific scale of values for the things of this world, including duties to be performed as well as rights to be exercised.

If this christological and anthropological basis was common to almost all Christians, the positions they took toward the established political powers were much more diverse. *Paul (cf. Rom 13:1ff.) justifies the obligation of obeying them because such powers were willed by God inasmuch as they do good; the Pauline position was reiterated until the end of apostolic times and then in the most difficult of times, even when the church was persecuted. The words of 1 Peter (2:13ff.) are not far from this line of thought, finding their validity, however, on the level of love toward God and others. *John's position, which rejects the tacit agreement between the political establishment and the wicked "world," is different; even more clear and negative is the position found in the book of Revelation. Historically, the first option prevailed in the early Christian communities. There emerged an attitude of complete loyalty of Christians toward the Roman Empire, which was more and more stated and proven with specific arguments: in fact, because God was considered the foundation and source of every good, some Christians concluded that imperial power descended from him, whose exercise is necessary after *Adam's *sin or, as certain writers say (see, e.g., Iren., Haer. 5,24,1ff.), after Cain killed his brother, as soon as the fear of God vanished from the hearts of men.

Christianity, therefore, pointed people toward the simultaneous path of obedience to God and to their public leaders, provided that the latter did not attribute to themselves or the institutions they represented absolute prerogatives or did not make idolatrous claims, not recognizing that the justification for their existence came from above. One finds herein the originality of Christian political thought. From the time of Jesus' teaching (cf. Mt 22:15), one traces a distinction between "politics" and "religion," a distinction of great importance when viewed in a context in which history, tradition and common outlook took for granted the tight inextricable bond between the one element and the other and that precisely on this type of bond they constructed the city (civitas). In this manner, there was born a conception of the republic (res publica) in line with what we in modern terms call the "state"—considered legitimate in its order, but lacking religious value properly speaking, an idea that is different not only from the sacred character of the ancient city, but also from the theocratic ideal of that brand of *Judaism that identified the messianic kingdom with earthly political systems.

Further reflection on the problem of the nature of politics was made possible—actually, in a certain sense required—by recognizing God, one and three, as the Lord of everyone and everything and by believing that he has revealed to humanity a message of salvation containing certain imperative norms that each person must observe whatever social position that person may hold: whence arises the understanding of personal autonomy, claimed even in facing the empire. Freedom of *conscience was discovered, and the idea of individual freedom was gradually transformed. During the earliest centuries, these ideas became incarnate esp. in the behavior and the words of the martyrs.

Thus, Christian thought clarified the question of the relationship between politics and ethics and, at the same time, it seemed to be well aware that as difficult as it was to maintain the right balance between the two spheres, so too was it hard to preserve, in concrete historical situations, the reciprocal autonomy between church and state: "Their mutual relationship has its roots in the personal unity of the Creator and Redeemer, but it should not become confused resulting in the dominance of the state over the Church (*caesaropapism) or the Church over the state (papal theocracy)" (H. Rahner, Church and State in Early Christianity, San Francisco 1992, xiii).

R.W.-A.J. Carlyle, A History of Mediaeval Political Theory in the West, I, Edinburgh-London [2]1927 (It. tr. Bari 1967); G. Combès, La doctrine politique de Saint Augustin, Paris 1927; J. Touchard, Histoire des idées politiques, Paris 1959 (It. tr. Milan 1961); H. Rahner, Kirche und Staat im frühen Christentum. Dokumente aus acht Jahrhunderten und ihre Deutung, Munich [2]1961 (Eng. tr. San Francisco 1992); Il pensiero politico cristiano, ed. G. Barbero, 2 vols., Turin 1962–1965; J. Speigl, Der römische Staat und die Christen. Kirche und Staat von Domitian bis Commodus, Amsterdam 1970; A. Wlosok, Rom und die Christen. Zur Auseinandersetzung zwischen Christentum und römische Staat, Stuttgart 1970; L. Schottroff, Mein Reich ist nicht von dieser Welt. Der johannische Messianismus, in Religionstheorie und politische Theologie, ed. J. Taubes, Munich 1984, 97-107; F. Bolgiani, Cristianesimo e potere. Spunti di riflessione per i secoli II-IV, in Cristianesimo e potere, ed. P. Prodi e L. Sartori, Bologna 1986, 83-100; L'Impero romano-cristiano. Problemi politici, religiosi, culturali, ed. M. Sordi, Milan 1991; E. dal Covolo, Chiesa società politica. Aree di laicità nel cristianesimo delle origini, Rome 1994, 85-127; L. Padovese, Il problema della politica nelle prime comunità cristiane, Casale Monf. 1998; P. Siniscalco, Gli imperatori romani e il cristianesimo nel IV secolo, in J. Gaudemet - P. Siniscalco - G.L. Falchi, Legislazione imperiale e religione nel V secolo, Rome 2000, 67-120; Id., Il cammino di Cristo nell'Impero romano, Rome-Bari [7]2007.

P. Siniscalco

POLLENTIUS (beginning of the 5th c.). Friend of *Augustine, who introduces us to him through his work De coniugiis adulterinis (PL 40, 451-486). Augustine's first treatise in this work covers the first five centuries and is exclusively dedicated to *divorce and remarriage. Augustine called Pollentius a "brother," and Pollentius in turn addressed Augustine as "father." We do not know whether he was a deacon, priest or bishop; nevertheless, he was not a *layperson, whom Augustine would have called "son." Pollentius sent Augustine a letter in which he spoke of his marital problems, asking him for his advice.

There arose, therefore, a discussion between the two and, as a result, Augustine wrote this treatise titled De coniugiis adulterinis, between 419 and 420, and referred Pollentius to the explanation he had given in the work De Serm. in Monte I, 14,39, with respect to the exegesis of 1 Cor 7 (the Pauline privilege, *adultery and *matrimony) and Mt 5:31-32; 19:9 (marriage in the OT and the NT). Augustine later recognized the difficulties of this controversial discussion (see Retract. II, 57).

NBA 7/1, 223-227; H. Crouzel, L'Église primitive face au divorce, Paris 1970, 337-353; PCBE 1, 878-880.

E. Romero Pose

POLYCARP (d. 167). Bishop of *Smyrna, Polycarp died a *martyr's death on 23 February 167. *Irenaeus, who was a native of Smyrna, states that he met him as a child and heard him speak of his acquaintance with "John," whom he identified as the *apostle. In all likelihood, he was probably referring to "*John the presbyter" whom *Papias explicitly distinguished from the apostle John (cf. Eus., HE 3,39,4). We have a *letter by *Ignatius of *Antioch to Polycarp and, a little bit later, a letter of Polycarp to the Christians of Philippi. Around the year 160, Polycarp went to *Rome to talk with Pope *Anicetus (155–166) "on the issue concerning *Easter" (Eus., HE 4,14,1). The church of Rome always celebrated the feast on *Sunday, although the churches of *Asia Minor celebrated it "according to an ancient custom," i.e., the 14th of Nisan, acc. to the Jewish calendar, on whatever day of the *week it fell. The bishop of Smyrna and the bishop of Rome remained firm in their respective positions but did so "in *peace." In 167 (a date supplied by Eus., Chron., ed. Helm, GCS 47, p. 205, and HE 4,14,10), there was a *persecution at Smyrna. Polycarp, who had gone into hiding outside the city, was betrayed by a young slave and arrested. He died at the stake 23 February, which was, acc. to the account of his martyrdom, "the day of the great *Sabbath," i.e., Sunday (for the meaning of this expression, see Epiph., Pan. Expos. fidei 24). He was 86 years old.

The Letter to the Philippians has been partially preserved in Greek and completely preserved in a Latin translation. The hypothesis suggesting that the actual text was the result of a fusion of two early letters does not seem to be well founded. We see from this letter that certain members of the Philippian church had written to Polycarp to complain about a certain Valens who "was ordained a presbyter" (probably bishop) for their community and whom they accused of having perpetrated injustices for love of money. They also asked Polycarp to send them a copy of the letters of Ignatius in his possession. In response, Polycarp insisted on the need of keeping oneself free from every type of covetousness, but also asked them not to treat Valens and his wife as enemies. Along with his letter, he added some of the extant authentic letters of Ignatius.

The Martyrdom of Polycarp. Composed shortly after the death of the bishop of Smyrna in the form of a letter sent to the church of Philomelium, the Martyrdom of Polycarp was the first work entirely dedicated to describing the suffering of a martyr and, moreover, the first to use the title "martyr" to refer to a Christian who had died for the faith. It underwent the influence of similar Jewish texts (II and IV Macc) and in turn influenced the development of this literary genre among Christians. There also exists a biography on Polycarp written around the mid 3rd c., which sheds light on the liturgical life of the Christian community of Smyrna in the religious context of the 3rd c.

Altaner 52-54; Quasten 1, 202-208; BBKL 8, 809-815 (bibl.). Editions: SC 10, Paris 1969, ^{4}1969; F.X. Funk - K. Bihlmeyer - W. Schneemelcher, Tübingen 1970, 114-120; J.A. Fischer, Darmstadt ^{8}1981, 227-265, with Germ. trans; J.B. Bauer, Die Polykarpbriefe, Göttingen 1995; Eng. tr.: W.R. Schoedel, The Apostolic Fathers, Camden, NJ 1967; It. tr.: A. Quacquarelli, I Padri Apostolici, Rome 1976, 151-172; C. Burini, Lettera ai Filippesi, Martirio, Bologna 1999. Studies: Th. Baumeister, Die Anfänge der Theologie des Martyriums, Münster 1980, 289-306; P. Brind'Amour, La date du martyre de Polycarpe (le 23 fév. 167): AB 98 (1980) 456-62; V. Saxer, L'authenticité du Martyre de Polycarpe. Bilan de 25 ans de critique: MEFRA 94 (1982) 979-1001; B. Dehandschutter, Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians. An Early Example of "Reception," in The New Testament in Early Christianity, ed. J.-M. Sevrin, Leuven 1989, 275-291; S. Cacitti, Grande Sabato. Il contesto pasquale quartodecimano nella formazione della teologia del martirio, Milan 1994; G. Buschmann, Das Martyrium des Polykarp, Göttingen 1998; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Life of Polycarp. An Anonymous Vita from Third-Century Smyrna, Sydney 2002; P. Hartog, Polycarp and the New Testament. The Occasion, Rhetoric, Theme and Unity of the Epistle to the Philippians and Its Allusions to New Testament Literature, Tübingen 2002; R. Burnet, Épîtres et lettres I^{er}-II^{e} siècle, De Paul de Tarse à Polycarpe de Smyrne, Paris 2003.

P. Nautin

POLYCHRONIUS of Apamea. Bishop of the famous Syrian city and brother of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, an important exegete in the Antiochene school. He wrote *commentaries on *Job, *Daniel, Ezekiel and also perhaps on Jeremiah, which were inserted, in a form altered in various ways, as fragments in the catenae.

His exegesis focuses primarily on the historical and chronological points of the text, as was the case for other Antiochene exegetes.

CPG 2, 3878-3880; A. Mai, Scriptorurn veterum nova collectio, 12, Rome 1825, 105-160 (commentary on Daniel); A. Mai, Nova Patrum bibliotheca, VII 2, Rome 1854, 92-127 (commentary on Ezekiel); PG 64, 739-1038 (the controversial commentary on Jeremiah); RE[3] 15, 528; PWK 21, 1598; O. Bardenhewer, Polychronius, Bruder Theodors von Mopsuestia und Bischof von Apamea, Freiburg i. Br. 1879; M. Faulhaber, Die Propheten-Catenen nach römischen Handschriften, Freiburg i. Br. 1899 (with mention of unpublished material); L. Dieu, Le commentaire sur Jérémie: RHE 14 (1913) 685-701; A. Vaccari, Un commento da Giobbe, Rome 1915; U. Bertini, La Catena greca in Giobbe: Biblica 4 (1923) 129-142.

J. Irmscher

POLYCRATES of Ephesus. Bishop of the city around the end of the 2nd c. Of his literary works, there remains a letter he wrote to Pope *Victor during the dispute on *Easter (Eus., HE 5, 25). During that period, in fact, synods were held in which many bishops professed themselves to be contrary to the quartodeciman practice and supporters of the *Sunday observance of Easter. Polycrates, although admonished by Victor, participated in a synod in Asia Minor, where all of the participants claimed to be followers of the quartodeciman tradition. In a letter, he also provides us some personal information: "I too, the most humble of all of you, observe the tradition of my relatives, some of whom were also my predecessors: seven of my relatives, in fact, were bishops; I am the eighth. They have always celebrated Easter when the Jewish people abstain from leavened bread. I, my brothers, have lived 65 years in the Lord; I have been in contact with brothers from the whole world; I have read the entirety of the *Scriptures, and I did not allow myself to be intimidated by bullies, because men greater than I have said that one must 'obey God rather than men' (Acts 5:29)" (Eus., HE 5, 24,6-7).

J.A. Fischer, Die Synoden im Osterfeststreit des 2. Jh.: AHC 8 (1976) 15-39; A. Strobel, Ursprung und Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Berlin 1977; K. Gerlach, The Antenicene Pascha, Leuven 1998.

A. Di Berardino

POLYEUCTUS, martyr (3rd c.). A soldier stationed at Melitene (today Malatya), in *Armenia Minor, belonging to the same legion (Legio XII Fulminata) of the *forty martyrs of Sebaste from the time of Licinius, who was beheaded under the emperor *Decius (249–251) or the emperor *Valerian (254–260). The mention of two emperors in the account of the *martyrdom (passio) makes it difficult to assign a precise date. According to the passio (BHG 1566-68), which seems to be a reworking of the homily delivered on the anniversary of his death, two military friends—Nearcus, a Christian, and Polyeuctus, a *pagan—when informed of the obligation of sacrificing to the gods, reacted in different ways. Nearcus becomes perplexed, while his pagan friend converts after receiving a vision in the night, and rejects the imperial edict on the obligation to sacrifice. Arrested, Polyeuctus reacts by destroying pagan statues; he is led to decapitation, and resists the pleas of his wife Paulina and his father-in-law Felix. The martyrologies place his commemoration on various dates: 7 January (Mart. di Nicomedia); 9 January (Byzantine church); 13 February (Roman Mart.); 14 February. A church was constructed on his tomb (AASS Feb. 2, 650). His cult spread into *Egypt, *Syria, Greece and also the West. In *Constantinople, Anicia Juliana, a descendant of Emperor *Theodosius, ordered the construction of a towering basilica between 524 and 527, near the aqueduct of the emperor *Valens. This new church had to replace another constructed by the empress *Eudoxia. The remains were rediscovered in 1960, to the W of Fatih park. A long epigram that praises the work of Anicia Juliana and describes the building has allowed scholars to identify it; two pillars have been preserved, which were taken to Venice and placed near the basilica of S. Marco. Likewise, at *Ravenna, a church was built dedicated to the martyr. Pierre Corneille made him out to be a hero in one of his tragedies, titled Polieucte, consisting of five acts, which was adopted in the work by Charles Gounod.

BHG 2, 215; BHL 2, 1002; AASS Feb. 2, 650-655; BS 10, 96-99; BBKL 14, 1372; LTK[3] 8, 399; Cath 11, 599; B. Aubé, Polieucte dans l'histoire, Paris 1982; R.M. Harrison, Scavi della chiesa di S. Polieucto a Istanbul: Corsi cultura ravennate 26 (1979) 157-162; Id., La scultura marmorea della chiesa di S. Polieucto a Istanbul, ibid., 163-170; C. Strube, Polyeuktoskirche und Hagia Sophia. Umbildung und Auflösung antiker Formen, Entstehung des Kämpferkapitells, Munich 1984; G. Fawden, Constantine, Silvester and the Church of St. Polyeuctus in Constantinople: Journal of Roman Arch 7 (1994) 274-284; C.I. Condor, The Epigram in the Church of Hagios Polyeuktos in Constantinople and Its Byzantine Response: Byzantion 69 (1999) 479-527; S. Patitucci d'Alifera Patitario, Architettura e potere a Costantinopoli nel VI secolo da San Polieucto a Santa Sofia. Le origini di un nuovo linguaggio, in Atti del IX Simposio di Efeso 2002, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 2003, 247-292; A.M.V. Pizzone, Da Melitene a Costantinopoli. S. Polieucto nella politica dinastica di Giuliana Anicia; Alcune osservazioni in margine ad A.P. I 10: Maia 55 (2003) 107-132.

A. Di Berardino

POMPA DIABOLI. The pomp (Gr. πομπή—solemn procession parade), with which the cult for the dead was primarily expressed in the *pagan world, was understood early on by Christians as a diabolic manifestation, a pompa diaboli to be precise, which in the baptismal rite the *catechumen was invited to renounce with formulas of this sort: renuntio diabolo et pompae et angelis eius ("I renounce the devil, his pomp and his angels"—Tertull., Coron. 3,2; Spect. 4,1.2.3; Anim. 35,3). In fact, such a renunciation referred primarily to the circus in which the pomp preceded and inaugurated the ludi circenses (circus games) with the procession of carts grouped acc. to types that conducted the magistrates, divine images and pictures of the ancestors. But in this regard, they naturally tended to condemn an entire culture that stretched its roots back to a remote period, and in the first centuries after Christ when it must have been well rooted, such condemnation could not have been otherwise because during the Roman Empire, the circus represented one of the privileged places for acquiring popular consent and within that space the leader already presented himself as an exhibition to the populace's transfixed gaze.

Nonetheless, to understand fully the reasons behind the renunciation of the pompa diaboli contained in the same baptismal rite it is helpful to examine *Tertullian's De spectaculis, which presented itself as a long prayer and provided the longest Late Antique treatment of the question. Working within that context, Tertullian adopted various forms of argument against the pagan shows, which raised great interest even among Christians. In particular, moreover, the ostentation was considered deplorable both from a religious and an ethical point of view, because it was a form of idolatry that led the passions to gain the upper hand. According to Tertullian, in fact, that apparatus, from the moment that it continued to maintain a connection to the superstitiones from which it derived its origin (Spect. 7), was designated as pompa diaboli and allowed the furor to possess everything and everyone (Spect. 16). Therefore, the De spectaculis, which then enjoyed enormous success in Christian literature of the 4th and 5th c., encouraged one to avoid all the ceremonies of the circus as the devil's true and proper deviations from God's creation, and to progressively conform oneself acc. to the divine model (Spect. 28-30).

Tertullian, De spectaculis, ed. M. Turcan, SC 332, Paris 1986; Id., De corona e De anima, ed. A. Gerlo, CCL 2, Turnhout 1954; H. Rahner, Pompa diaboli: ZKTh 55 (1931) 256-279; J.H. Waszink, Pompa diaboli: VChr 1 (1947) 13-41; H. Jürgens, Pompa diaboli, in Die lateinische Kirchenväter und das antike Theater, Stuttgart 1972 (Tübingen Beiträge zur Altertumswissenschaft 1); J.-R. Annot, Les danseurs de la pompa du cirque. Témoignages textuels et iconographiques: REL 70 (1992) 56-68; S. Rebenich, Insania circi. Eine Tertullianreminiscenz bei Hieronymus und Augustin: Latomus 53 (1994) 155-158; J. Köhler, Pompai. Untersuchungen zur hellenistischen Festkultur, Bern 1996; A. Saggioro, Dalla pompa diaboli allo spiritale theatrum. Cultura classica e cristianesimo nella polemica dei Padri della Chiesa contro gli spettacoli. Il terzo secolo, Palermo, Università di Palermo 1999 (= Mythos. Rivista di Storia delle Religioni 8 [1996]).

P. Marone

POMPONIA GRAECINA (1st c.). A Roman noblewoman, wife of Aulus Plautius, who lived during the reign of *Nero (54-68). According to the testimony of *Tacitus, charges were brought against her: et Pomponia Graecina insignis femina, A. Plautio nupta ac superstitionis externae rea, mariti iudicio permissa (Ann. 13,32). Her husband examined her conduct and the rumors that circulated about her in the presence of her relatives; he declared her innocent. Tacitus adds that Pomponia lived for forty years in continual sadness, not wearing luxurious garments on account of the death of her relative Julia, the daughter of Drusus, at the instigation of Messalina. A Roman tradition regards her as having been a Christian, but Tacitus's words cannot serve as a proof of Pomponia's adherence to Christianity. Many scholars think that the "foreign superstition" at one point referred to *Judaism and at another to Christianity. It could also be the case that the Roman woman was a follower of one of the many Eastern religions heavily criticized at that time, or that she suffered from mental illness that could manifest itself in bizarre behavior. Interest in this woman reemerged with de Rossi's discoveries in the catacombs of St. Callistus, identifying her with Lucina.

G.B. de Rossi, Roma sotterranea cristiana, Rome 1864–1865, I 306-351; II 360-364; DACL 2, 2847-48; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1964, 68-74; cf. G. Pascoli, Pomponia Graecina, intr., tr., exegetical notes and appendix by A. Traina, Bologna 1967, [4]1993.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

POMPONIUS. *Isidore of Seville informs us (Etymol. 1,39,26: PL 82, 121) that a certain Pomponius, concerning whom no other information exists, using Virgil's writings, composed a small poem in honor of Christ. Preserved from his writings is a poetic dialogue between the Christian Tityrus and the *pagan Melibeus (Tityre, tu patulae recubans sub tegmine fagi), to which the title is given Versus ad gratiam Domini). Isidore read a codex similar to Cod. Pal. 1753, where one finds a small poem and the cen-tos of *Proba. Melibeus asks Tityrus the reason for his joy; he answers that by singing these things, he unites himself to the creation that sings to God; he then teaches him about Christianity.

CPL 1481; Schaller n. 16294; Schenkel, CSEL 16, 1 (1888) 609-615; PLS 1, 773-779; F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia latina, 1,2, Leipzig 1906 (repr. Amsterdam 1972), n. 719, 189-193; M.L. Ricci, Note al centone "Versus ad gratiam Domini" attribuito a Pomponio (719a Riese): Ann. Fac. Mag. Bari anni acc.1974–1976 = 14 (1977) 105-121; J.-L. Vidal, La technique de composition du Centon virgilien "Versus ad gratiam Domini siue Tityrus" (Anth. Lat. 791a Riese): REA 29 (1983) 233-256; R. Lamacchia, Centoni, in Enciclopedia Virgiliana, I, Rome 1984, 733-737, esp. p. 736.

A. Di Berardino

PONTIANUS, bishop (6th c.). African bishop of an unknown see (perhaps to be identified with the Pontianus or Potentianus, bishop of Thenae in *Byzacena, to whom *Fulgentius of Ruspe appeared in a dream to notify him of his decision for his own successor; see *Ferrandus, Vita S. Fulgentii 29), author of a *letter that can be dated to around 544–545, addressed to *Justinian, in favor of the authors included in the condemnation of the *Three Chapters, because, inasmuch as they had already passed away, they were not subject to condemnation. One should not exclude the possibility that Pontianus was the same person as Ponticanus, the Catholic bishop of a particular see in Byzacena, who took part at the Synod of Iunca in 523 (Concilia Africae: CCL 149, 277-278). The theory that the first 12 chapters of *Isidore of Seville's De viris illustribus were taken from a similar work of Pontianus seems to lack foundation. Isidore's work was written to continue *Gennadius's work titled De viris illustribus.

CPL 864; PL 67, 995-998; F. Schütte, Studien über den Schriftstellerkatalog (de viris ill.) des hl. Isidor von Sevilla (Kirchengeschichtliche Abhandlungen, 1), Breslau 1902, 102; Schanz IV, 2, 583-584; Moricca 3, 2, 1479-1480; PCBE 1, 883-884; A. Placanica, Teologia polemica e storiografia ecclesiastica nella controversia dei Tre Capitoli, in A. Quacquarelli (ed.), Res Christiana. Temi interdisciplinari di patristica, Rome 1999, 129-254.

F. Scorza Barcellona

PONTIANUS (Pontian), pope (ca. 230–235). A Roman who succeeded Pope *Urban I ca. 230. During the *persecution of *Maximinus Thrax in 235, he was deported along with his presbyter (?) *Hippolytus to *Sardinia and condemned to forced labor; this led him to resign from his office on 28 September (Cron. del 354: MGH Chron. min. I,75) during exile. *Anterus succeeded him and reigned for only a month. Pontianus died on the island. His body was brought back to *Rome by Pope *Fabian, who buried him in the cemetery of *Callistus. His epitaph, written in Greek, was found in 1909 (Diehl 953).

LP I, XCIV-XCV; 145-146; III, 74; DTC 12, 2553-2554; BS 10, 1013-1015; EPapi 1, 261-263.

A. Di Berardino

PONTICIANUS (4th c.). An African, a member of the imperial administration first at *Trier, then at *Milan, and a devout Christian. In 386, he visited *Augustine and *Alypius. Being aware that the two were reading the apostle *Paul's epistles, he told them about the story of *Anthony the hermit, some of the Egyptian monks and two imperial functionaries at *Trier who had abandoned everything to become monks. The visit and Ponticianus's story provided the decisive push for Alypius's and Augustine's conversions (Aug., Confess. 8,6-7).

DCB 4, 439; PLRE 1, 715; PCBE 1, 884; A. Caprioli, La conversione. Un ritorno ad Agostino, Milan 1987.

A. Di Berardino

PONTIFEX MAXIMUS. The origin of the term pontifex maximus has been lost in the sands of time, although the most ancient election of a pontifex maximus, for which we have information (Livy, 25,5,2), goes back to the 3rd c. BC. The pontifex maximus was the head of the collegium pontificum (15 members, also called flamines) and the Roman religion; he set the calendar, protected the sacred books and appointed the other flamines and the sacred vestal virgins (7). Each flamen was designated to serve for the cult of a particular god, the three major priests for the three major divinities (Jupiter [flamen dialis], Mars and Quirinus). From Augustus onward the title pontifex maximus belonged to the emperor, who also regulated the official cult (the sacra publica). From Nerva onward, the dignity of the pontifex maximus was included among the attributes of the princeps, without the electoral procedure. Even *Constantine and his sons preserved the title. In 379, *Theodosius was the first emperor not to assume the title (19 January); the emperor *Gratian renounced it and its functions (during the years 376–383); the date is still subject to much debate. Because *Ausonius in 379 still referred to Gratian with the title pontifex (Gratiarum actio 32 and 45), Paschoud believes that this had a Christian meaning and no longer a *pagan one (Cinq études sur Zosime, Paris 1975, 71ff.).

Although the pagan title with its functions would no longer be appropriated by the emperors, some Christian emperors still bore the title pontifex (DACL 1424-1426).

From Christian antiquity until today the title pontifex or rather pontifex maximus has been applied primarily to *Jesus Christ. The title pontifex remained, however, as an attribute of religious authority, and starting from the end of the 4th c. it was used to refer to a bishop. From that period, the term pontifex and its synonym became common among Christians, as *Jerome notes: pontifex et episcopus, quem oportet esse sine crimine, "the pontifex and bishop, whom it befits to be without fault" (PL 22, 611). Jerome made ample use of the title (PL 22, 553; 594; 663; 665, etc.), but it was used esp. by the popes (see Leo I). The title summus Pontifex, starting with Walafrid Strabo (d. 849), began to be restricted to the pope: summus pontifex, in sede Romana vicem beati Petri gerens, totius Ecclesiae apice sublimatur (PL 114, 963) and esp. with Pope Leo IV (844–855). The application of the title pontifex maximus, however, after *Tertullian, was used only for *Athanasius by *Rufinus of Aquileia (PL 21, 536D); it was carefully avoided during Christian antiquity, perhaps because of the heavy pagan connotations; such a title was given to the popes only from the mid-15th c., esp. in epigraphy after the rediscovery of the classical world.

RAC 16, 6-58; G. Wissowa, Religion und Kultus der Römer, Munich [2]1912, 501-523; A. Bernareggi, Costantino imperatore e pontefice massimo: Scuola Cattolica 41 (1913) 237-253; K. Latte, Römische Religionsgeschichte, Munich 1960, 195-200, 400-407; K. Ziegler, KLP 4, 1046-1048; P. Stockmeier, Die Übernahme des Pontifex-Titels im spätantiken Christentum, in Konzil und Papst, Fest. für H. Tuechle, Munich 1975, 75-84; A. Cameron, Gratian's Repudiation of the Pontifical Robe: JRS 58 (1968) 96-102; L. Schumacher, Die vier hohen römischen Priesterkollegien unter den Flaviern, den Antoninen und den Severern (69–235 n. Chr.): ANRW 16,1 (1978) 737-768; I. Kajanto, Pontifex Maximus as Title of the Pope: Arctos 15 (1981) 37-52; R. Seguin, Remarques sur les origines des pontifes romains. Pontifex maximus et Rex sacrorum, in Hommages à Henri Le Bonniec. Res sacrae, publ. par D. Porte et J.-P. Néraudau, Brussels 1988, 405-418; R.M. Errington, Church and State in the First Years of Theodosius I: Chiron 27 (1997) 21-72; R. Stepper, Untersuchungen zum römischen Kaiser als Priester, Stuttgart 2003.

B. Aland - A. Di Berardino

PONTIUS, deacon. Deacon of *Carthage. Later centuries only knew him as the biographer of *Cyprian (Jerome, Vir. ill. 68), whom he accompanied into exile in 257 at Curubis (Korfa, Tunisia); he was an eyewitness to his execution on 14 Sept. 258. With firsthand knowledge of the acta proconsularia, he composed Cyprian's Vita in a *panegyric style, shortly after the death of his teacher. Nevertheless, the work contains some valuable information on Cyprian's *conversion, literary work and his attitude during the plague (252–254). The *martyrdom of Cyprian imitated the passion of Christ. Pontius witnessed the initial cult of Cyprian's relics ex contactu (Vita Cypr. 16,6). Ado later inserted Pontius into his *martyrology for 8 March.

LTK[2] 8, 616; Monceaux 2, 179-197; A. Harnack, Das Leben Cyprians von Pontius, TU 39/3; Vita di Cipriano, Vita di Ambrogio, Vita di Agostino, intr. Ch. Mohrmann, critical text and comm., ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen, trans. L. Canali and C. Carena, Fond. L. Valla, Milan [3]1989; S. Deleani, Le récit de la mort de Cyprien dans la Vita Cypriani. Structure et signification, in La narrativa cristiana antica. Codici narrativi, strutture formali, schemi retorici, XXIII incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 5-7 maggio 1994 (SEA 50), Rome 1995, 465-477; H. Montgomery, Pontius' Vita Cypriani and the Making of a Saint: Symbolae Osloenses 71 (1996) 195-215; V. Saxer, La Vita Cypriani du diacre Pontius, "Première biographie chrétienne," in Orbis Romanus Christianusque ab Diocletiani aetate usque ad Heraclium. Travaux sur l'Antiquité tardive rassemblés autour des recherches de N. Duval, Paris 1995, 237-251.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PONTUS. Pontus was the area of *Asia Minor on the coast of the Black Sea, bordering on the E with Colchis and *Armenia, to the W with Paphlagonia and SW with *Galatia, and to the SE with Cappadocia. It is dominated by mountains and valleys with the rivers Halys, Iris (Yeşil) and Lycus (Kelkit Çayi). This is a general geographic indication, because from the political and administrative point of view its borders varied acc. to the decisions of political leaders and the times. In fact, the Roman province called Bithynia et Pontus, organized by Pompey and over which *Pliny the Younger was governor (111–113), included Paphlagonia and a small part of Pontus, the most Hellenized part on the coast, the cities of Sinope, homeland of *Marcion, and Amisus. During the course of the 1st c., upon the request of Corbulon, during the years 63/64, the kingdom of Polemon II of Pontus (Pontus Polemoniacus) was annexed to the Roman province of Galatia, but subdivided into two districts: Pontus Galaticus (metropolis *Amasea, 2nd c. AD) and the Pontus Polemoniacus (metropolis *Neocaesarea) (Rémy, 101ff.). The latter included the mountainous region of Pontus, the Lycus Valley, the coast to the E of the free city of Amisus up to Colchis. The two territories, although subjected to the legate of Cappadocia, formed distinct districts and, for strategic and military reasons, they came to be part of the province of Cappadocia (AD 110) during the time of *Trajan. The recent discovery of two inscriptions demonstrates that under *Alexander Severus the province of Pontus was established, but scholars do not know its precise borders (Rémy, 101ff.). Consequently, *Gregory Thaumaturgus worked in the district of Pontus Polemoniacus in the province of Cappadocia. Subsequently, with *Diocletian's reorganization, it would acquire another provincial structure.

Even a well-known city like *Neocaesarea (today Niksar) immediately underwent changes of name acc. to the times. Its ancient name was "Cabeira," which was probably the city that through Pompey's influence became Diospolis, which was also called *Sebaste. During the time of *Nero, the city was annexed to the Roman province of Galatia and acquired the name Neocaesarea, to indicate a new establishment; during the time of the emperor *Hadrian, the city was also called Hadriana (see Barrington, Atlas). It became a metropolis, the first of the district of Pontus Polemoniacus, previously called Pontus Mediterraneus. During the time of *Trajan, the district was detached from Galatia and united to Cappadocia. With Diocletian's reform, it became a province with the name Pontus Polemoniacus, and Neocaesarea, its capital. The city was located to the W slopes of the Paryadres Mountains, towering over the Lycus Valley, a tributary to the Iris River, ca. 50 km (= 31 mi) from Comana Pontica and ca. 100 km (= 62 mi) from the coast. Neocaesarea, which boasted that it had an emperor as its founder, was a fully flourishing city during the 3rd c., as attested by the coins that portray its buildings and its symbols used for the games in honor of the local divinities.

So the title "Pontus" does not have a univocal meaning, but it gradually acquired various meanings acc. to the political and administrative context and ordinary use. In these Roman provinces, urbanization increased, inasmuch as the population lived primarily in the villages, even with the foundation of new cities and the creation of Roman colonies. Moreover, the Romans favored the spread of Greek language and culture, esp. in the cities and among the learned classes, because local Anatolian dialects spoken there would last a long time in certain areas.

Christianity, at least in the coastal cities, was already widespread in the beginning of the 2nd c., as evidenced by 1 Peter, *Pliny the Younger, who mentioned that Christianity was widespread even in the villages, the hatred expressed by Alexander Abonuteichus (2nd c.) toward Christians, who must have been numerous in that area, and *Marcion, son of the bishop of Sinope. The Canonical Epistle of *Gregory Thaumaturgus provides a lengthy treatment, suggesting that the Christians were numerous; even the legend acc. to which upon the death of Gregory the *pagans had practically disappeared from the area must have had some historical foundation. Even his brother *Athenodorus, *Eusebius of Caesarea noted, became bishop. The presence of large landholdings in Pontus is significant, keeping in mind the psychology and practice that, if the master of the house converted, his "entire house" became Christian. In *evangelization, the local dialects posed the greatest challenge, one that could be overcome only if the Christian clergy could speak the language. The ecclesiastical organization was urban, but the bishop had to send emissaries into the countryside to examine offending Christians (see Greg. Thaum., Canonical Epistle). Gregory greatly contributed to the Christianization of the region.

The *Sassanids of *Shapur I in 256 plundered Cappadocia and Armenia, conquering Satala and its territory, perhaps because the Roman forces were preoccupied by the ineffective defense of Trapezus (modern-day Trabzon). They again occupied Cappadocia and Caesarea in 259/260.

The *Goths and the unknown Boradi (or Voradi, Boranoi) tried to carry out raids many times in Pontus; one such raid covered the entire N area of Asia Minor, from E to W. The Goths devastated certain provinces (Zosimus 1, 31-36); they were not innovators who had come with the idea of staying, but came with the intention of looting and carrying off prisoners, many of whom were the Christians of Cappadocia and *Phrygia. The ancestors of *Wulfila, the evangelist of the Goths, were among those deported from Cappadocia, from a village near the city of Parnassus, just as those Christians under the jurisdiction of Bishop Selenas of Phrygia. The churches of Cappadocia and, we suppose, even the other communities of Asia Minor, devoted themselves to the captives' redemption, but many remained among the Goths and established some Christian communities. *Philostorgius wrote that the Goths (Scythians), upon invading Asia, Galatia and Cappadocia, in addition to spoils, carried with themselves many prisoners, among whom were members of the clergy. Good Christians converted many barbarians. For a few decades, the entire region had to undergo the deportations caused by the invaders and the armies. Manzoni in his novel I Promessi Sposi reminds us of the damage they caused to the local population. *Basil of Caesarea in 371 mentioned in a letter to Pope *Damasus that his predecessor *Dionysius (259–268) had sent monetary assistance for the redemption of the prisoners taken by the Goths, and there existed a written and oral record of that assistance (see Basil, Ep. 70). For the bishops of Pontus, see Fedalto 1, 20ff.

M. Salamon, The Chronology of Gothic Incursions into Asia Minor in the IIIrd Century AD: Eos 49 (1971) 109-139; E. Olshausen, Pontus und Rom (63 v. Chr.–64 n. Chr.): ANRW, Principat 7, 2, 903-912; R.D. Sullivan, Dynasts in Pontus: ibid., 913-930; B. Rémy, L'évolution administrative de l'Anatolie aux trois premiers siècles de notre ère, Lyon 1986; S. Mitchel, Anatolia, Land, Men, and Gods in Asia Minor, II, The Rise of the Church, Oxford 1993; D. D. Braund, Georgia in Antiquity. A History of Colchis and Transcaucasian Iberia, Oxford 1994.

A. Di Berardino

POOR – POVERTY. The subject of the poor/poverty in the writings of the *Fathers has its roots in the *Bible, where it occupies a considerable amount of space: one merely has to think of the rich vocabulary used in the OT to speak about the subject. Facing the fundamental demands of existence, the biblical point of view is the most realistic possible: there is no praise for poverty per se; biblical legislation does not make allowance for pauperism, namely, the kind of absolute poverty that would lead to a state of dependence, thus reflecting the life of slavery in Egypt from which Israel was delivered. When considered in this light, the model of the Exodus is significant: during their pilgrimage in the desert, it was impossible to divide the people into social classes because virtually everyone was poor and equal. The Mosaic legislation pertaining to the subject of poverty is composed of various layers and perhaps in some points is an ideal rather than an effective norm (e.g., the redemption of slaves at the end of seven years and the institution of the jubilee year: Ex 21:1-11; Lev 25:3-9; Dt 15:1-18). Some texts introduced the original initiatives of Israel: Lev 19:9; 25:3-6, 35; Ex 22:24-26; Ruth 2:1-3. On the basis of such norms, there is an idea of true equality and not simply an affirmation of a principle. If the temporal blessings are a concrete sign of Israel's faithfulness to God, poverty is seen as a curse that strikes the unfaithful or the lazy. Experience, however, shows that poverty was not always a punishment, but it was often accompanied by virtue: esp. in the *Psalms, the poor were likened to the righteous. On the one hand, one finds many texts that show how wisdom should bring about a "happy medium" (Pr 30:8-9), and on the other hand, texts that tell a different story: many of the poor are such because they are victims of human injustice.

There is certainly a change of perspective with the passage from nomadic life to the invasion of Canaan, with the consequent division of land and the beginning of those social inequalities that became more emphasized during the period of the monarchy. It was in this period that the activity of the prophets in defense of the poor became intense (Amos 4:1; 5:11-12; Is 3:14-15; 10:1-2; Jer 21:11-12), a defense God begins to identify as his own (Is 11:4; 14:30-32; Amos 2:6-7; Bar 2:18). Such an identification changes the concept of poverty so that it is no longer merely economic and sociological, but spiritual (Zeph 2:3): the mediator of salvation is no longer the sovereign but the Servant of Yahweh, one of the "poor of Yahweh" who stands as a messianic figure.

The theme of the "poor of Yahweh"—a technical expression found only after the exile in the Wisdom literature (the identification of these "poor" with a socially organized group has been much discussed)—touches upon a collection of concepts and entities: poverty, political power, the land, ungodliness, righteousness, all of which belong to the specific history of Israel, and this history would become a model for the Christian communities of the first centuries.

In the NT and the Christian tradition, we discover in the figure of the "servant of Yahweh" the announcement of the Redeemer and the suffering Christ. With regard to the theme of poverty, the NT texts present a twofold evaluation: not only is it not a simple evil (cf. the theology of the Beatitudes), but it can become a sign of eschatological fullness. A page from Matthew's gospel (25:31-46) on the final judgment supplies the reason for the privileged position that the poor person acquires in the kingdom: the poor person is a universal sign of Christ's presence among people. The *Jewish Christian community of *Jerusalem (Acts 2:44-45; 4:32-37) demands an equality that excludes misery, recalling the equality that Jewish legislation had already set forth as the ideal; but the commonality of goods, in contradistinction to what occurred among the Essenes, was a free choice for poverty (see P. Brezzi and M. Del Verme) that, being essentially a lack of guarantees, recalled that liberty from the law proclaimed by the apostle *Paul. The commonality of goods is not merely a sign of a reciprocal acceptance between the faithful, but expresses, inasmuch as it is a manifestation of poverty, that every Christian is, like Christ, a "servant of Yahweh." In the NT, therefore, the discussion of poverty begins from the poverty of Christ (Mt 8:20; Lk 2:7, 12, 16, 24; 2 Cor 8:9), from his support for the poor (Lk 4:16; 7:22), to the point of requesting poverty of those who wish to follow (Mt 19:16ff.; Mk 1:16-20; Lk 9:3; 10:4), not imposing on all, however, the same renunciation of goods even if he taught all to be free with respect to money, to give mutual assistance in time of need and the necessity of working to make a living for oneself (2 Th 3:10).

In the Christianity of the first centuries, the theme of the poor/poverty developed different emphases acc. to geographic and cultural contexts. Against the *Encratite and dualistic tendencies of *Platonism and *Manicheism, which perceived an irresolvable rift between the material and spiritual world and concluded by condemning any contact with earthly goods to the point of prohibiting work (see the heresy of the apotactites or the apostolici*: Epiph., Haer. 61), the Christians proposed a fundamental continuity between the two worlds on the basis of faith in the one Creator-God. The Didache (IV, 8) emphasized the obligation to share one's goods, the fruit of labor; *Aristides (Apol. 15,7) and *Tertullian (Apol. 39,10) maintained that such a division was a specific obligation of Christians. For *Clement of Alexandria, the commonality of goods between people is commanded (Quis dives salv. 13). He indicated that poverty, acc. to the gospel, for the one who is renouncing his goods, is not an end in itself, but is ordered to the kingdom. With this perspective in mind, it is not permissible to judge the authenticity of someone's state of poverty; rather, it is necessary to give to each one who asks, giving without discrimination, inasmuch as each person has dignity (Quis div. salv. 33). For *Minucius Felix, poverty is not a disgrace (Oct. 36); Christ is present in the poor and the needy (Tertull., Adv. Marc. IV, 14,9; Cypr. De op. et elem. 15; Greg. Naz., De paup. amand. 36; Aug., Serm. 86). Pastorally concerned about the presence of the poor in the Christian community, *Cyprian emphasized the need for almsgiving (De op. et elem. 5) to reestablish a situation of equality between the rich and the poor.

For *Basil of Caesarea, the social condition of the poor was not desired by God, but is the product of human sin (Hom. VI, 7; Greg. Naz. Or. 14,25) from which, in the assistance for the poor, one wipes away original sin (Basil, Hom. VIII, 7). The extra resources of the rich belong to the poor (Id., Hom. VI, 7), but even among the poor themselves it is possible to establish some amount of generosity (ibid., Hom. VIII, 6). Not all the poor are blessed because poverty is not, per se, a positive reality: poverty without freedom does not give life (Clem. Alex., Quis div. salv. 11). Those poor are blessed who have become such through the imitation of Christ (Ambr., Exp. Ev. sec. Luc. V, 53; John Chrys., In Matt. hom. 90,4); they are poor because they do not have sins, they do not have vices, they have nothing that has to do with the prince of this world (Ambr., Exp. Ev. sec. Luc. V, 53). In contradistinction to understanding poverty only in a spiritual sense, *Gregory of Nyssa presented another view. He did not believe that there had to be a distinction between actual poverty and spiritual poverty because, for the Christian, there is only one true poverty, which is the fruit of the Holy Spirit, and it does not permit one to retain earthly riches (PG 44, 1208).

The poor are seen as teachers of life in enduring pain: for this reason they find entrance into the churches in order to be examples and to remind everyone of the need for mercy (John Chrys., In 1 Thess. hom. 11,4). They are free to speak: for this reason the disciples sent by Jesus Christ were poor (ibid., In Hebr. hom. 18,2); they are true patrons before God (*Hermas, Sim. 2; *Paulinus of Nola, Epist. 13,11; *Fulgentius of Ruspe, Serm. 1,7-8). Augustine warned the poor to be careful not to fall into greed (Serm. 85), because the true poor person is the one who not only does not possess, but does not want to possess (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 103, ser. 3,16; John Chrys., In Hebr. hom. 11,3). Poverty is the mother of all the virtues (*Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Prov. Div. 6), but not the kind that is the product of squandering and laziness (John Chrys., In 1 Cor hom. 34,6). The complementarity between the rich and the poor was characterized by Hermas in his allegory of the vines and the elm tree (Sim. 2). A certain complementarity is demonstrated also by *John Chrysostom in the image of the two cities, namely, that of the rich and the poor (In 1 Cor. hom. 34,5), where the term poor makes reference to the one who lives to work tirelessly.

In patristic writings the following motifs are constant: a negative evaluation of poverty not freely chosen for the sequela Christi; the exhortation to the Christian communities to share, to give generously to create concrete structures (gathering centers, storehouses for those in need and centers of voluntary work) able to remedy situations of need. In the ancient church, the social problem was not the primary object of teaching; everything was oriented to evangelizing the poor, i.e., inasmuch as it is precisely the reception of the message that, acc. to the Fathers, involves the recognition of the common origins of all people and the goodness of material things, from this recognition emerges the obligation of the rich person to share even to the point of changing the conditions of the poor.

A. Causse, Les pauvres d'Israël, Paris 1922; DBS 7, 387-406; G. Barbieri, Le dottrine economiche nel pensiero cristiano. Grande Antologia Filos., Milan 1954, V, 1089-1174; P. Christophe, Les dévoirs moraux des riches. L'usage du droit de propriété dans l'Écriture et la Tradition patristique, Paris 1964; L. Orabona, Cristianesimo e proprietà. Saggio sulle fonti antiche, Rome 1964; P. Brezzi, Fonti e studi di storia della Chiesa, Milan 1972; S. Zincone, Ricchezza e povertà nelle omelie di Giovanni Crisostomo, L'Aquila 1973; P. Vismara Chiappa, Il tema della povertà nella predicazione di sant'Agostino, Milan 1975; various articles in Augustinianum 17 (1977); M. Del Verme, Comunione e condivisione dei beni, Brescia 1977; V. Grossi, La chiesa precostantiniana di fronte alla povertà, in L'annuncio del regno ai poveri, Turin 1978, 69-101; L.Wm. Countryman, The Rich Christian in the Church of the Early Empire. Contradictions and Accommodations, New York-Toronto 1980; G. Visonà, Povertà, sequela, carità. Orientamenti dei primi due secoli, in var. aus., Per forumen acus. Il cristianesimo antico di fronte alla pericope del giovane ricco, Milan 1986; E. Patlagean, Povertà ed emarginazione a Bisanzio (IV-VII secolo), Bari 1986; J. Roug, Aspects de pauvreté et de ses remèdes aux IV^e-V^e siècles: AARC 8 (1990) 227-248; M.G. Mara, Proposte relative alla giustizia sociale. Ricchezza e povertà nel cristianesimo antico: Seminarium 30/3 (1990) 547-566; Id., Ricchezza e povertà nel cristianesimo primitivo, Rome [2]1991; G. Filoramo - S. Roda, Cristianesimo e società antica, Bari 1992; E.W. Stegemann - W. Stegemann, Storia sociale del cristianesimo primitivo, Bologna 1998, 383-392; B. Sesboüé, Riches et pauvres. Présentation de textes de Basile de Césarée et de Jean Chrysostome: Médiasèvres. Patristique 122 (2002).

M.G. Mara

POPE. The name "papa," from the Greek word πάππα(ς) (= father), almost up to the 9th c., but esp. in the 3rd-5th c. was given to abbots and bishops as an expression of loving respect. Pope was at times given to simple priests (as is still done today in the East). In Egypt, the πάππας par excellence was the bishop of *Alexandria. As a title for the bishop of *Rome, pope is found for the first time in an inscription from the end of the 3rd c. During the 4th c., the title was applied to the bishop of Rome above all in letters sent from the East to Rome, but also in Western documents such as the letter of the bishops gathered at *Arles who greeted *Sylvester as the most glorious pope (gloriossimus papa; Pietri 1609). Toward the end of the century it tended to become a proper title (see Ambrose, Ep. 42; Synod of *Toledo [400]: Mansi III, 1006-7; Vincent of Lérins, Comm. 32-33). Nevertheless, during the 4th c., the title was still often accompanied by certain qualifying terms such as papa Urbis aeterna, papa Urbis Romae. In official documents of the 6th c., with very rare exceptions, this term became the distinct title for the bishop of Rome (see the Lib. pontif., from the life of *Agapitus I [535–536] onward).

EC 9, 752-753; B. Labanca, Del nome di "papa" nelle Chiese cristiane di Oriente e Occidente, in Actes du XII^e Congrès des Orientalistes, III/2, Rome 1899, 47-101 (repr. Rome 1978); Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, 1609-1612 (bibl.); M. Guerra Gómez, Los nombres del Papa, Burgos 1982; G. Schwaiger, TRE 25 (1995) 647; K. Schatz, LTK[3] 7, 1327-28.

B. Studer

PORCARIUS of Lérins, martyr. The Vita of Porcarius (not to be confused with the Porcarius of *Lérins from the 5th c.) belongs to the hagiographic cycle of Lérins (11th/12th c.). During the time of Charles Martel (ca. 732), *Saracens destroyed Provence: after being warned by a dream, Porcarius, *abbot of Lérins, took measures to secure the church's treasure, relics of the saints and all the children. Ten days later, the Saracens arrived and slaughtered the Abbot Porcarius and 500 monks. Eleutherus alone was able to escape. He buried the dead and 20 years later reconstructed the *monastery. At Lérins, a chapel supposedly from the 10th c. marks the spot commonly believed to be the site of the massacre. The feast day falls on August 12th.

BHL 6899-6902; BS 10, 1035-1036; LCI 8, 221.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PORPHYRY of Antioch (d. 413). Upon the death of *Flavian (404), Porphyry was elected patriarch (Socrates, HE 7,9), an event that was presented in different ways by the two primary sources: *Palladius's *Dialogue on the Life of St. John Chrysostom and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Ecclesiastical History. According to Palladius (Dial. 16,31-63), Porphyry was the enemy of *John Chrysostom; he described Porphyry as a ruthless and dissolute man, a political opportunist and a persecutor of *Constantius, a friend of Chrysostom, and the deacon of Flavian. Porphyry was the people's preferred candidate for the See of *Antioch. He was consecrated with a hasty rite of ordination while the games were being held at Daphne on the outskirts of the city, which had been emptied due to the event. *Severian of Gabala was his supporter on this occasion. A revolt took place, which was suppressed by the military commander Valentinus. The Emperor *Arcadius intervened to support Porphyry and forced all the opposition to enter into communion with him (CTh 16,4,6 for 8 November 404). Nevertheless, Pope *Innocent and *Theophilus of *Alexandria did not recognize him. Theodoret presented him, however, as a man who "left many signs of his gentleness and prudence" (HE 5, 37); for this reason "his memory is holy" (Ep. 83). A fragment of Theophilus's letter sent to Porphyry has survived, informing him about the convocation of a council against the new followers of *Paul of Samosata.

DCB 4, 453-454.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PORPHYRY of Gaza, bishop (ca. 347–420). His life (CPG 6722) was written by the deacon *Mark, his faithful disciple. The publication of this document (ed. H. Grégoire and M.A. Kugener) gave rise to conflicting positions on its historical value. Nevertheless, it seems that it won acceptance for its statements concerning the succession and chronology of the events it narrated. Porphyry was born into a rich family around 347 at *Thessalonica. When 30 years old, he abandoned the world to devote himself to God. He first traveled to *Egypt, where he lived the life of a monk for five years in the Desert of *Scetis, then he went to *Palestine and spent five years in a grotto located on the bank of the Jordan River. His excessive austerity greatly deteriorated his health. Nevertheless, he wanted to visit the holy sites of *Jerusalem, and it was there that Mark, a professional scribe, became acquainted with him and gradually bonded with him: he did not leave Porphyry until the latter died. Porphyry, who in the meantime had given away all his possessions to the poor, settled in the holy city as a shoemaker to provide for himself and his basic needs. The fame of his holiness even reached the notice of Bishop *John II of Jerusalem, who ordained him a priest and commissioned him to guard the relics of the Holy Cross. It was the year 392 and Porphyry was now 45 years old. Just three years later (i.e., 395), upon the death of *Aeneas bishop of *Gaza, *John the archbishop of Caesarea, exercising his function as metropolitan, nominated Porphyry as Aeneas's successor. His governance as bishop was difficult at first, esp. because of the *pagans' hostile resistance. Porphyry had to ask for the emperor's support on at least two occasions: the first time he requested the intervention of *John Chrysostom; the second, he went to the imperial city (402). Porphyry's episcopate lasted 25 years; he died on 26 February 420. The Byzantine synaxaria dated his memoria on this date, and Caesar Baronius introduced it into the Roman martyrology.

BS 10, 1039-1043; H. Grégoire - M.-A. Kugener, Marc le diacre. Vie de Porphyre évêque de Gaza. Texte établi, traduit et commenté, Paris 1930. P. Peeters, La Vie géorgienne de saint Porphyre de Gaza: AB 59 (1941) 65-216; J.W. Childers, The Georgian Life of Porphyry of Gaza, SP 35, Leuven 2001, 374-384.

J.-M. Sauget

PORPHYRY of Philippi. Bishop who participated at the Council of *Serdica of 343 (CSEL 65, 133) on the side of the Western bishops who were against the Arianizing Eusebians and in favor of *Athanasius. In 1975, at the Roman colony *Philippi, a discovery was made of a floor mosaic with an inscription stating: "Bishop Porphyry made the mosaic of the basilica of Paul, in Christ." Nothing else is known of him.

P. Lemerle, Philippes et la Macédoine orientale à l'époque chrétienne et byzantine, Paris 1945, 270; V. Abrahamsen, Bishop Porphyrios and the City of Philippi in the Early Fourth Century: VChr 43 (1989) 80-85.

A. Di Berardino

PORPHYRY of Tyre (232/233–305?), philosopher. From Phoenicia, Malchus (= Basileus), called Porphyry, was one of the most prestigious representatives of the *Neoplatonist tradition. During his youth, he was accustomed to visit *Origen, probably at the school of *Caesarea (cf. Eus., HE 6, 19,1-8), but it seems that he cut all ties with Christians following some altercation (cf. Socrates, HE 3, 23,38; Teosofia II, 25, ed. Beatrice, 35-36). A disciple of *Longinus at *Athens and *Plotinus at *Rome (263–268), he went to Sicily to overcome a severe case of depression that led him to the point of suicide. During his trip to Sicily he was able to reach *Carthage and there composed, among other things, his long treatise against the Christians. After Plotinus died in Campania in 270, Porphyry returned to Rome—we do not know when—to lead the school. Married shortly thereafter to a rich Jewish widow named "Marcella," the recipient of one of his famous letters, Porphyry moved to *Nicomedia to the court of *Diocletian to work as an advisor shortly before the great *persecution of Christianity in 303. After this date, no trace of Porphyry appears in the historical record. For more than two centuries, his influence, which does not exclude critical reactions, was enormous on Neoplatonist philosophers, esp. Latin (one thinks, e.g., of *Iamblichus, Cornelius Labeon, *Firmicus Maternus, *Julian the Apostate, *Marius Victorinus, *Macrobius, *Martianus Capella and *Boethius). Very clear traces of his work can be found in the works of Christian authors who addressed his claims in a more or less extensive and direct manner to defend Christianity and the *Bible from his attacks (a long series that includes *Arnobius of Sicca, *Lactantius, *Methodius of Olympus, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Apollinaris of Laodicea, *Didymus the Blind, *Macarius Magnes, *Jerome, *Philostorgius, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and *Cyril of Alexandria). But there were also any number of Christian authors who, though aware of the danger of his writings, did not hesitate to reuse his work and his thoughts with a Christian interpretation within permissible parameters (another long series of names including *Calcidius, *Ambrose, *Synesius, *Augustine, *Aeneas of Gaza, the anonymous Syrian author of the Theosophy, *John Philoponus and *Nemesius of Emesa).

A brillian polymath, author of numerous historical, philological, philosophical and religious works, Porphyry is quite interesting, therefore, in addition to the history of ancient and medieval philosophy, even for the history of ancient Christianity from various points of view. From here onward, I shall note the most important conclusions reached by scholars thus far and several points of discussion still subject to debate—in the awareness that the patristic sources can offer a greater understanding of his person and work than has been thought possible until now; vice versa, the study of his writings can help in resolving various enigmas of patristic literature.

1. In recent decades, it has become ever more clear that the viri novi against whom Arnobius argued in the Adv. nationes II, 15 are none other than Porphyry himself and his Neoplatonist followers. Overcoming earlier weak and confused hypotheses (Carcopino, Festugière), the following scholars have moved in this direction, esp. Courcelle, Fortin, Beatrice and recently Simmons.

2. The self-definition of antistes philosophiae used by the mysterious anti-Christian philosopher described by Lactantius in Div. Instit. V, 2,2-11 seems to have referred to Porphyry. Chadwick's keen intuition concerning Porphyry's activity at the court of Nicomedia was accepted and later developed by Wilken, Beatrice and Digeser.

3. Of particular importance is a testimony that Porphyry had Origen of Alexandria and his intellectual portrait in mind in a controversial fragment of the third book of his anti-Christian treatise cited by Eusebius, HE 6,19,1-8. This text had been used for a long time by Valesius (17th c.), to maintain that one must distinguish this Origen, undoubtedly Christian, from another person bearing the same name to whom some Neoplatonist sources refer (Porphyry, *Hierocles and Proclus), commonly referred to as "Origen the pagan" or "*Origen the Neoplatonist." One must note that the theory of two Origens is a prime, but disquieting, example of academic conformism and bibliographic laziness that transformed a hypothesis initially poorly concocted into a veritable historiographical dogma. From the systematic analysis of the entire documentation available, one finds, however, that the existence of a second pagan Origen seems rather shallow. Such a hypothesis derives in substance from the unjustifiable prejudice of the impossibility of a double career for a single person who, however, as a matter of common knowledge, was able to attend with the same self-confidence and authoritativeness episcopal councils, imperial courts and the most prestigious philosophical schools of his period (see my contributions to the following volumes: Origeniana Quinta, Sexta and Septima. One finds nothing new or useful on this matter in the pages of the following works: R. Goulet, Études sur les Vies de philosophes de l'Antiquité Tardive, Paris 2001, 391-393, and M.J. Edwards, Origen Against Plato, Aldershot 2002, 53-55, although the contributions of the following scholars seem to promise interesting developments: W. Bienert, R. Somos, W. Kinzig and Th. Böhm).

4. Another field of research particularly rich with litiges (an expression of P. Courcelle) pertains to the identification of the libri platonicorum read by Augustine at *Milan (Conf. VII, 9). These works certainly contain some (not many) passages from Plotinus which, acc. to Augustine, were the sole, true source of his intellectual conversion (De beata vita I, 4), but the fact that they also included Porphyry's works was gradually recognized thanks only to the pioneering studies of W. Theiler, J.J. O'Meara and P. Courcelle.

In my opinion, the libri platonicorum should be identified with Porphyry's work titled Philosophy from Oracles, a work well known to Augustine in *Marius Victorinus's Latin translation (see the clear allusion already at the beginning of the C. Acad. I, 1,1; and Civ. Dei XIX, 23). This must have contained, among others things, various extracts of comments on some of *Plotinus's Enneads (see my study on this topic in VChr 43 [1989] 248-281), and could offer Augustine plenty of material on philosophical and religious meditation on various topics such as the oracles and theurgy, nature and the purification of the *soul, the liberal arts, trinitarian theology and providence. Augustine's silence about the author of these works can be easily explained if one concedes that the Philosophy from Oracles, in turn, was none other than Porphyry's anti-Christian treatise (see under no. 7).

5. A still more complicated problem, if that were possible, arises from a treatise that goes under the current title Kata Christianōn (Contra Christianos). In the past few decades, scholars have begun to rethink the underpinnings of the idea that this is a second work written by Porphyry against the Christians, thereby leading them to different conclusions. The edition of fragments published by Harnack (Berlin 1916; integrated with other fragments in 1921) has been subjected many times, and rightly so, to severe criticisms, but despite some new discoveries, it has not been truly rejected and, in the absence of something better, it still remains a valuable instrument for study. Unfortunately, even recent studies such as those by Hoffmann (1994) and Linguiti (CPF I, 1, Florence 1999, 623-633) not only do not offer any innovative contributions, but persist in setting forth, without adequate justification, interpretations that have already been rejected. The situation has already been made more complicated by the fact that in various English works (among others, e.g., Wilken, Droge, Simmons, Digeser, Cook and Kofsky), scholars have gone forward affirming the idea—in my opinion, void of any foundation in the primary sources—that Porphyry wrote not one, but two works against the Christians, i.e., first the Philosophy from Oracles (in three books, acc. to Wolff's reconstruction) and then the Kata Christianōn in 15 books (in realty, this is an old hypothesis already suggested in the 19th c. by various scholars such as Kellner, Seitz and Kleffner). The undeniable fact remains that no primary source attests to the existence of a work titled Against the Christians; however, the anti-Christian character of the Philosophy from Oracles always emerges more clearly with the progress of studies. In addition to the structure of the work, its dating remains uncertain and vacillates, acc. to some scholars (Croke), between 270/271 and the beginning of the 4th c., acc. to others (Barnes).

6. What are the prospects for future work in Porphyryian studies? It must be admitted that Porphyrian philology is not flourishing. Despite the notable efforts of various philologists (e.g., Nauck, Bidez, Westerink, Sodano, Hadot, Lamberz and Bouffartigue), we are certainly far from possessing safe and trustworthy critical editions of Porphyry's works. For the Philosophy from Oracles, one must still consult the incomplete and arbitrary edition of G. Wolff (1856). The attribution of the anonymous Commentary on the Parmenides of the Turin *palimpsest is still debated by scholars (see my review of Baltes, 2002 in IJCT 11 [2004/5] 473-478), and the same holds for the so-called Theology of Aristotle. The Philosophy from Oracles and the De abstinentia were differentiated into two treatises by Eusebius, but Theodoret of Cyrrhus believed them to be the same work. One could go on and on. In the end, even the Teubner edition by A. Smith (1993), despite its breadth and its definite usefulness, is nothing more than a collection of fragments structured acc. to entirely arbitrary and artificial criteria (and at times incomplete: where does one find, for instance, reference to Macarius Magnes's Apokritikos III, 42, in which the anonymous pagan interlocutor explicitly referred to the Philosophy from Oracles? For other proposals on integrating all these sources, see O. Ballériaux).

The situation certainly depends in large measure on the shipwreck in which Porphyry's literary production has been submerged and the insurmountable, objective confusion of the information supplied by Stobaeus and *Sudas. But one should also not underestimate the fact, disturbing in itself, that scholars of Porphyry—with appropriate exceptions made—demonstrate all too often a shallow familiarity, when it is not an outright ignorance, of the complex problems equally posed by the literary tradition (nature and dating of the Byzantine MSS, interventions of copyists, titles of works, developments of the text and selection of materials) and by the indirect tradition (techniques of citation, interpretation of the allusions, evaluation and comparison of patristic and philosophical sources, the anthologies and the Late Antique and Byzantine lexica, etc.) of the philosopher's works. Most recently, following the example of many others, Goulet offers an example of this approach (see Goulet, Études, 395-397); although A.J. Carriker has recently provided a positive sign at least with regard to the evaluation of the Eusebian sources.

In a rather negative backdrop as this one, there has not been lacking, however, several foundational contributions that one will have to keep in mind for every future development in this field. J.J. O'Meara (1959) forwarded important arguments to maintain that Augustine's expression de regressu animae does not translate the title of one of Porphyry's lost works, but rather indicates the contents of the Philosophy from Oracles or one of its sections. H. Dörrie (1959) and J. Pépin (1964) have identified Porphyry's Symmikta zetemata as the source of Augustine's De immortalitate animae. T.D. Barnes (1973) has called attention to the fact that Macarius Magnes's Apokritikos are not citations properly speaking of Porphyry's anti-Christian treatise, thus threatening the very basis of Harnack's edition. Lastly, B. Croke (1983) demonstrated that the so-called Chronology attributed to Porphyry in actuality never existed, and that the materials previously referring to it (see Jacoby's FHG) must, however, be reduced in all likelihood to the History of Philosophy and the 12th book of the anti-Christian treatise. On the basis of these advances, at present few and partial, but nonetheless important, it will be possible to begin the journey again on the right path.

7. For my part, in recent years I have repeatedly advanced several arguments identifying the anti-Christian treatise with the Philosophy from Oracles (see esp. my essays in the following works: Mélanges J. Pépin, Paris 1992, Miscellanea B. Studer, Rome 1993, and the Miscellanea U. Bianchi, Rome 1994: see esp. the discussion and bibl. contained therein). Such an identification implies the recognition that Porphyry's anti-Christian polemic did not develop into a specific treatise, but constituted an integral part of a large esoteric work whose sole objective, primarily philosophical-religious, consisted in the exhortation to "theosophy," namely, that form of wisdom capable of leading those initiated to the salvation of the soul. This proposal demands that it be concretely demonstrated in a new and truly critical edition of the Philosophy from Oracles that redefines ex novo its structure, contents and viewpoint in light of a global rethinking of the transmission of the text in relation to the philosopher's other works known to us so far: indeed a difficult and long undertaking, but not impossible.

The most recent edition to which scholars make reference is A. Smith, Porphyrii Philosophi Fragmenta, Stutgardiae et Lipsiae 1993. Various contributions to the study of Porphyry are found in ANRW II, 36, 2 (1987). Updates: T.D. Barnes, Scholarship or Propaganda? Porphyry "Against the Christians" and Its Historical Setting: BICS 39 (1994) 53-65; R.J. Hoffmann, Porphyry's Against the Christians. The Literary Remains, Amherst, NY 1994; M.B. Simmons, Arnobius of Sicca. Religious Conflict and Competition in the Age of Diocletian, Oxford 1995; O. Ballériaux, Porphyre et Aristote. Quelques fragments à ajouter aux 'Porphyrii philosophi Fragmenta' d'Andrew Smith, in A. Motte - J. Denooz (eds.), Aristotelica Secunda. Mélanges offerts à Christian Rutten, Liège 1996, 221-231; M. Tardieu, Recherches sur la formation de l'Apocalypse de Zostrien et les sources de Marius Victorinus, in P. Hadot, 'Porphyre et Victorinus'. Questions et hypothèses (Res Orientales 9), Bures-sur-Yvette 1996; S. Ackermann, Christliche Apologetik und heidnische Philosophie im Streit um das Alte Testament (SBB 36), Stuttgart 1997; P.F. Beatrice, Porphyrius: TRE 27 (1997) 54-59 (bibl.); M.B. Simmons, The Function of Oracles in the Pagan-Christian Conflict during the Age of Diocletian. The Case of Arnobius and Porphyry, in E.A. Livingstone (ed.), SP 31, 1997, 349-356; A. Smith, Porphyry and Pagan Religious Practice, in J.J. Cleary (ed.), The Perennial Tradition of Neoplatonism, Leuven 1997, 29-35; J. Carlier, L'après-mort selon Porphyre, in A. Charles-Saget (ed.), Retour, repentir et constitution de soi, Paris 1998, 133-160; W. Kinzig, War der Neuplatoniker Porphyrios ursprünglich Christ? in M. Baumbach - H. Köhler - A.M. Ritter (ed.), Mousopolos Stephanos. Festschrift für H. Görgemanns, Heidelberg 1998, 320-332; P.F. Beatrice, Ein Origeneszitat im Timaioskommentar des Calcidius, in W.A. Bienert - U. Kühneweg (ed.), Origeniana Septima. Origenes in den Auseinandersetzungen des 4. Jahrhunderts (BETL 137), Leuven 1999, 75-90; F. Van Fleteren, Porphyry, in A.D. Fitzgerald (ed.), Augustine Through the Ages. An Encyclopedia, Grand Rapids-Cambridge 1999, 661-663; R. Lamberton, Sweet Honey in the Rock. Pleasure, Embodiment and Metaphor in Late Antique Platonism, in J.A. Porter (ed.), Constructions of the Classical Body, Michigan 1999, 314-326; C. Van Liefferinge, La Théurgie. Des 'Oracles Chaldaïques' à Proclus (Kernos-Supplément 9), Liège 1999; J.G. Cook, The Interpretation of the New Testament in Greco-Roman Paganism (STAC 3), Tübingen 2000; E. DePalma Digeser, The Making of a Christian Empire. Lactantius and Rome, Ithaca-London 2000; K. Corrigan, Platonism and Gnosticism. The Anonymous Commentary on the Parmenides: Middle or Neoplatonic? in J.D. Turner - R. Majercik (eds.), Gnosticism and Later Platonism. Themes, Figures, and Texts (SBL Symposium series 12), Atlanta 2000, 141-177; P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia. An Attempt at Reconstruction (VChrS 56), Leiden-Boston-Köln 2001; G. Clark, Fattening the Soul. Christian Asceticism and Porphyry on Abstinence, in M.F. Wiles - E.J. Yarnold (eds.), SP 35, 2001, 41-51; M.B. Simmons, Eusebius' Panegyric at the Dedication of the Church at Tyre A.D. 315. Anti-Porphyrian Themes in Christian Rhetoric of the Later Roman Empire, in M.F. Wiles - E.J. Yarnold (eds.), SP 37, 2001, 597-607; S. Toulouse, Que le vrai sacrifice est celui d'un coeur pur. À propos d'un oracle 'porphyrien' (?) dans le 'Liber XXI sententiarum' édité parmi les oeuvres d'Augustin: RecAug 32 (2001) 169-223; P. Adamson, The Arabic Plotinus. A Philosophical Study of the 'Theology of Aristotle,' London 2002; M. Baltes, Marius Victorinus. Zur Philosophie in seinen theologischen Schriften (BzA 174), Munich-Leipzig 2002; Th. Böhm, Origenes – Theologe und (Neu-) Platoniker? Oder: Wem soll man mißtrauen – Eusebius oder Porphyrius?: Adamantius 8 (2002) 7-23; E. DePalma Digeser, Porphyry, Julian, or Hierokles? The Anonymous Hellene in Makarios Magnês' Apokritikos: JTS 53 (2002) 466-502; A. Kofsky, Eusebius of Caesarea Against Paganism, Boston-Leiden 2002; M. Zambon, Porphyre et le Moyen-Platonisme, Paris 2002; A.J. Carriker, The Library of Eusebius of Caesarea (VChrS 67), Leiden-Boston-Köln 2003; var. aus., Porfirio de Tiro contra los cristianos, Cádiz 2006. For further updates to the bibl., see P.F. Beatrice, The Oriental Religions and Porphyry's Universal Way for the Soul's Deliverance, in Les religions orientales dans le monde grec et romain, Brussels-Rome 2009.

P.F. BEATRICE

PORTER. See *DOORKEEPER

PORTRAIT. In this entry, the term portrait refers to the reproduction of the image of an individual taken from the actual person, an individual who is seen in contingent reality. The true portrait occurs when one adds the search for the psychological characteristics to the imitation of the physical resemblance; in this manner, from the facial portrait, which alone is realistic, one passes to that more complete physiognomical portrait. When it is not possible to take a living person as a model, the reconstructed portrait seeks to conform itself to one's imagination of the subject's characteristics, on the basis of elements taken from literary sources or the tradition. It follows, however, that one can thus create images that are different from the actual individual. In ancient Christian art, the portraits of Christ displayed in different ways are of this type; the iconography of Sts. *Peter and *Paul were established only from the 4th c. Moreover, the portraits of many martyrs, saints and biblical persons as well as that of the apostolic college, whose components often show similar or stereotypical characteristics among them, are reconstructed. The phenomenon is certainly connected to the perdurance, in the early centuries, of the iconoclast tradition of the Jewish heritage, which did not allow that given physical peculiarities of persons be captured in art. When such a demand was perceived, after a long interval of time, these elements had by then been lost and, therefore, they had to take recourse to reconstructed portraits.

The Egyptian portraits, in large part coming from El-Fayum (dated from the 1st-4th c. AD), which were painted on small wooden tablets that covered the faces of mummies, though important in the history of Roman portraits, did not in a single instance leave traces of Christianity, and one can only keep these in mind, therefore, due to their general stylistic comparisons with some portraits of deceased people from cemeterial *paintings, esp. Roman. Such paintings, characterized by a certain generality, but with noteworthy essentials of the features, one can identify esp. in the figures of the orantes, often by marked contours and large eyes, as in the examples contained in the complex of S. Callistus (Wp 88), Domitilla (Wp 138,2) or the cemetery of the Jordani (Wp 120,2). It is likely the case that the portraits painted onto the sepulchral walls of *Rome and, in large number, the Museo Paleocristiano of *Aquileia are of the poor, depicted in the posture of orantes. Portraits presumably of deceased people, moreover, can be detected in scenes pertaining to life or business professions (as in the hypogeum of Trebius Justus at Rome), as well as in those of the symbolic type (e.g., St. Petronilla's introduction of Veneranda into *paradise, in the catacomb of Domitilla: Wp 213).

Among the later paintings, dating to the 6th c., is that of the Turtura from the Roman catacomb of Commodilla which, due to its expressive intensity and the essential simplifications of its features, recalls the empress *Theodora from the mosaic of S. Vitale at *Ravenna.

On the *mosaics, in addition to those African funerary mosaics esp. from *Taburka (at the Bardo Museum), one should recall the 14 busts of benefactors (male and female) on the floor from the S Theodorian hall at Aquileia, which dates to the second decade of the 4th c. In these busts, esp. in the faces characterized by pronounced lines, in women's hairstyling and in the clothing, it is possible to recognize characteristics from the period when the expressionism of the tetrarchy transitioned to that of the Constantinian age. One can also identify other portraits in the figures of commissioners and proponents of the clergy (esp. with a square halo, which distinguishes them as saints from those who are still living), which generally appear on mosaic apse compositions: thus in certain Roman basilicas, in the basilica of Euphrasia of *Parentium, in St. Demetrius's at *Thessalonica or in S. Vitale at Ravenna, in which the imperial *iconography, which had a long *tradition, was reused but in ways that could be considered in many respects new, and on the mosaic panels of *Justinian and Theodora, numerous portraits can be identified even on the gold-glass, following a widespread practice esp. in the 4th c. Imperial portraits (or of other dignitaries) are then found, in the late imperial age, on the ivory *diptychs.

The tradition of Roman portraiture is connected to the imagines clipeatae of the sarcophagi, which at times, however, only have outlined faces. This phenomenon probably owes to the lack of time for finishing touches; some scholars have thought, however, that this owed to the heirs' neglectfulness, possibly to the lack of application of a stucco mask with the features of the deceased person, or rather to the superstitious fear of the portrait's commissioners. There is the intriguing case, e.g., of the so-called sarcophagus of the two brothers found in the Museo Pio Cristiano (Ws 91 = Rep. 45), in which two male figures, who are similar, have taken the place of two spouses for whom the busts were prepared. At other times, the deceased are portrayed as standing, with a scroll in hand, with parapetasma in the background.

With regard to the portraits of the *popes, there is much dispute whether one can already recognize some of them on 4th-c. gold-glass. In painting, the most ancient examples are the portraits of a series of pontiffs on the walls of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome, which are not entirely preserved. Originally they would have been circular portraits with the popes from *Innocent I to *Leo the Great, which, however, underwent notable modifications and touchups during the Medieval and Baroque periods. Recent studies have established the importance of a series of papal portraits of the basilica of S. Paolo fuori le mura, which, before the fire of 1823, was composed of 78 busts represented on a shield-formed surface (all copied in 1634). Today this series of portraits is the only one at least partially preserved, although similar pictorial sequences have been completely lost, which were originally housed also at the Vatican and the Lateran Basilica.

DACL 14, 1, 1543-1573; EC 10, 1008-1009; EAA 6, 695-738; LCI 3, 446-455; H.P. L'Orange, Studien zur Geschichte des spätantiken Porträts, Oslo 1933; J. Bolten, Die "imago clipeata." Ein Beitrag zur Portrait- und Typengeschichte, Paderborn 1937; G.B. Ladner, I ritratti dei papi nell'antichità e nel Medioevo, I, Vatican City 1941; G. Bovini, I sarcofagi paleocristiani, Vatican City 1949; C. Casalone, Note sulle pitture dell'ipogeo di Trebio Giusto a Roma: CArch 11 (1962) 53-64; A. Grabar, Le portrait en iconographie paléochrétienne: RSR 36 (1962) 87-109; P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma, Bologna 1966; K. Parlasca, Mumienportraits und verwandte Denkmäler, Wiesbaden 1966; F. Zanchi Roppo, Vetri paleocristiani a figure d'oro conservati in Italia, Bologna 1969; B. Forlati Tamaro, Epigrafi cristiane sepol- crali con graffiti di Aquileia: Archeologia Classica 25-26 (1973–1974) 280-296; G.C. Menis, I ritratti nei mosaici pavimentali di Aquileia: AAAd 8 (1975) 73-92; M. Andaloro, Pittura romana e pittura a Roma da Leone Magno a Giovanni VII, in Committenti e produzione artistico-letteraria nell'alto medioevo occidentale, II, Settimane di Studio del Centro italiano di Studi sull'alto Medioevo 39, Spoleto 1992, 569-579; A.M. Ramieri, Ritratti femminili nella catacomba di Priscilla: RivAC 69 (1993) 47-61; F. Bisconti, La pittura paleocristiana, in A. Donati (ed.), "Romana Pictura." La pittura romana dalle origini all'età bizantina, Milan 1998, 33-56; M. Andaloro, Effigi di Pietro e Siricio, in Pietro e Paolo. La storia, il culto, la memoria nei primi secoli, Milan 2000, 230-231, nn. 104-105; M. Giannitrapani, s.v. Ritratto: TIP, 270-274.

D. Mazzoleni

PORTUGAL. See *SPAIN and PORTUGAL

POSIDONIUS (d. after 430). A deacon of *Alexandria, who on behalf of *Cyril of Alexandria bore news to Pope *Celestine (ACO 1, 1, 5, p. 10) concerning the case of *Nestorius of Constantinople. He took with him a piece of paper containing instructions (ACO 1, 1, 7, p. 171-172), i.e., an outline containing a more detailed oral explanation of Nestorius's case to give to the pope and influential individuals at *Rome. When he was to return to Alexandria, Pope Celestine gave him a letter (dated 10 August 430) for Cyril, accompanied with a verdict against Nestorius, and a letter for Nestorius as well, whom Cyril was asked to bring into agreement with the verdict. In addition, the pope gave Posidonius letters for various Eastern recipients, thereby informing them of the decisions of the Holy Roman See: a letter to the presbyters, deacons, clerics and the people of *Constantinople, accompanied by a copy of the judgment and the same letter as well as more copies to be delivered to *John of Antioch, *Juvenal of Jerusalem, *Rufus of Thessalonica and *Flavian of Philippi.

E. Amann, L'affaire de Nestorius vue de: RSR 24 (1950) 28-52, 235-265; L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il Concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, 156-157, 168-171; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana, Rome 1976, 1347-1397.

M. Palmieri

POSSESSOR. Catholic African bishop of *Mauritania in 484 (Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Africae 40: CSEL 7, 133). He went to *Constantinople, where he promoted the doctrinal visions of the Council of *Chalcedon (451), he contributed to the healing of the *Acacian schism (Hormisdas, Ep. 131, in Collectio Avellana, CSEL 35/2, 552-553) and, as one sees from the letter that he sent to Pope *Hormisdas in 520 (Relatio Possessoris episcopi afri, ibid., 697-700), he was called upon by the Scythian monks with regard to the orthodoxy of the doctrine of *free will and *grace that *Faustus of Riez had proposed in his treatise De gratia (CSEL 21, 3-98).

CPL 1620, 1622, 1683; CPG 9192; Relatio Possessoris episcopi afri, in Collectio Avellana, CSEL 35/2, 697-700; F. Di Capua, Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei Papi e nei documenti della Cancelleria Romana dal IV al XIV secolo, III, Rome 1946, 191-204; PCBE I, 889; M. Simonetti, Il "De gratia" di Fausto di Riez: SSR 1 (1977) 125-145; A. Quacquarelli, Papa Ormisda al vescovo Possessore, VetChr 30 (1993) 5-15.

P. Marone

POSSIDIUS (d. after 437). The Vita Augustini, *Augustine's corpus of letters and *Prosper's Chronicon are among the primary sources for knowledge of Possidius's life. From 391 onward, he lived in the monastic community directed by Augustine at *Hippo; shortly after 397, Possidius became bishop of Calama in *Numidia. In such a role, he participated in the anti-*Donatist councils of *Carthage of 403 and 407; he exerted a noteworthy role in the Conference of Carthage (411) and took part in the anti-*Pelagian councils of Milevis (416) and Carthage (419). He completed two official missions in *Italy (in 409 and 410) to the emperor's court to request the reintroduction of laws against *pagans and *heretics. Once Calama had been abandoned, having been invaded by the *Vandals in 428, Possidius fled to Hippo with other bishops, where he remained alongside Augustine until the city was taken. He aided Augustine during his last illness. Upon returning to Calama, he was expelled by the *Arian leader *Genseric. After this date, we no longer have information on him.

Between 432 (the death of *Boniface) and 437 (the exile of *Catholic bishops), Possidius composed the Vita Augustini, to which he adjoined a complete list of his writings (Indiculum: CPL 359), for fear that during the violence of the invasions the bishop and his works would spin into oblivion. The Vita is inserted into the template of the ancient Suetonius-style biographical tradition. The material after the prologue is not divided into four parts (Weiskotten, Diesner), but three (Pellegrino): (1) the Vita, i.e., the chronological account of the events and actions accomplished by Augustine beginning from his conversion (2–18). In fact, to not compete with the Confessions, he devotes only one chapter to his life before his conversion; (2) the mores (customs, behavior and habits), understood as an exposition of the hero's conduct in daily, public and private life (19–27,5); (3) the final events, sickness and death (27,6–31). In this final section (30), Possidius published Augustine's letter to Bishop Honoratus on the clergy's behavior during an enemy's invasion. Augustine's biography is, within the limits of this literary genre, substantially authentic and objective: the biographer used his knowledge of Augustine's deeds and works, from which he often drew images and expressions. It was, as previously stated, a Suetonius-style biography, but with typical features of Christian hagiography. In the prologue, in fact, Possidius emphasized his personal experience with Augustine as the guarantee of his biography's authenticity. In contrast to *Paulinus of Milan, Possidius faithfully followed the chronological succession of events (the inaccuracies are few); he also knew how to appreciate even the literary activity of his subject; he provided little space for the spectacular and demonic elements (he recalls only two miraculous events) and in the presentation of the vita and the mores he reduces the apologetic objective to a minimum. The Indiculum, an integral part of the Vita Augustini, which is an appendix to the work (Vita Aug. 18,9), was considered by some scholars to be a work compiled in haste by Possidius on account of the suppression of certain details and the preservation of these works into such divisions as libri, epistulae and tractatus within ten sections. Others, however, have considered it to be a catalog of works that once existed in the library of Hippo (see Retract. 2,41), copied and reproduced, or rather it could be Possidius's personal list of Augustine's works.

CPL 358-359; PL 32, 33-66; H.T. Weiskotten, Sancti Augustini Vita scripta a Possidio episcopo. Edited with Revised Text, Introduction, Notes and an English Version, Princeton, NJ 1919; M. Pellegrino, Possidio. Vita di S. Agostino, intr., testo critico, versione e note, Alba 1955; Vita di Cipriano. Vita di Ambrogio. Vita di Agostino (Intr. Ch. Mohrmann. Testo critico e commento ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen. Trans. L. Canali e C. Carena, Milan 1975. It. tr. M. Simonetti, Rome 1977).

Studies: A. Harnack, Das Leben Augustins von Possidius, Berlin 1930 (intr. and tr.; Sp. tr.: Revista de Occidente 9 [1931] 52-100); H.J. Diesner, Possidius und Augustinus, SP VI, Berlin 1962, 350-365; PCBE 1, 890-896; A.A.R. Bastiaensen, The Inaccuracies in the Vita Augustini of Possidius: SP 16 (1985) 480-486; R. Grégoire, Sulla tipologia agiografica della "Vita Augustini" di Possidio: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 21-26; DSp 12 (1986) 1997-2008; T.G. Kardong, Monastic Issues in Possidius' "Life of Augustine": The American Benedictine Review 38 (1987) 159-177; A. Mutzenbecher, Bemerkungen zum "Indiculum" de Possidius. Eine Rezension: REAug 33 (1987) 128-131; E. Zocca, La figura del santo vescovo in Africa da Ponzio a Possidio, in Vescovi e pastori in epoca teodosiana, Rome 1997, 487-491; G. Madec, Possidius de Calama et les listes des oeuvres d'Augustin, in Titres et articulations du texte dans les oeuvres antiques, Paris 1997, 427-445; F. Dolbeau, La survie des oeuvres d'Augustin. Remarques sur l'Indiculum attribué à Possidius et sur la bibliothèque d'Anségise, in Du copiste au collectionneur. Mélanges en l'honneur d'André Vernet, ed. D. Nebbiai-Dalla Guarda - J.-F. Genest, Tournhout 1998, 3-22; S. Dagemark, Prayer as a Hagiographic Motif in Vita Martini and Vita Augustini, in La preghiera nel tardo antico, dalle origini ad Agostino, Rome 1999, 361-388; S. Dagemark, Conversion in Augustine's Confessions and Monastic Separation from the World in Possidius' Biography, in Le Confessioni di Agostino (402–2002). Bilancio e prospettive, Rome 2003, 289-328; E. Elm, Die Macht der Weisheit. Das Bild des Bischofs in der Vita Augustini des Possidius und anderen spätantiken und frühmittelalterlichen Bischofsviten, Leiden 2003.

A.V. Nazzaro

POTAMIANA and BASILIDES, martyrs. *Eusebius (HE 6, 5,1-6) summarizes, in a form already contaminated by legend, the story of Potamiana, a young *martyr of *Alexandria: while on her way to be tortured, she was able to convert a soldier named Basilides, who escorted her and who was already a listener at *Origen's lectures. The persecutors placed boiling pitch on her and her mother and burned them both. A few days later, Basilides professed himself a Christian. He in turn was arrested. He saw Potamiana in a dream placing the crown of martyrdom on his head; he was baptized in prison and the following day beheaded. In the Mart. hier., the three martyrs are commemorated on 28 June, and in the Mart. rom. 30 June.

Vies des SS. 6, 517; LTK[2] 8, 645; DHGE 6, 1175-1176; BS 2, 902-906.

V. Saxer

POTAMION (Potamon) of Heraclea (4th c.). Bishop of Heracleopolis Parva in the E delta of the Nile on the road that leads to Pelusium. Potamion was imprisoned during the *persecution of *Maximinus Daia; the persecutors gouged out one of his eyes. He was one of the participants at the Council of *Nicaea (325). Potamion took a clear stance in favor of *Athanasius ten years later at the Synod of *Tyre (335), presided over by *Flaccillus of Antioch: Potamion defended the orthodox positions and called into question *Eusebius of Caesarea's conduct during the persecution of Maximinus. Eusebius had escaped under suspicious circumstances, without incurring any wounds. Potamion was persecuted by *Gregory the Cappadocian, the intruder bishop of *Alexandria (339/340), meeting his death from his injuries. The Mart. rom. remembers him as a bishop on 18 May, killed during the *Arian controversy during the time of the emperor *Constantius II. The information found in the Mart. hier. on Potamion's martyrdom is unreliable; while it holds that the *martyrdom occurred 18 May, it places it during the persecutions against the Christians, and Potamion is identified only as a presbyter.

EC 9, 1848; BS 10, 1060; Athanasius, Hist. Arian. 73; Id., Ap. ad Const. 28; Epiphanius, Panarion 68; ASS, Mai IV, Paris 1866, 165ff.; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996 (see index).

M. Perraymond

POTAMIUS of Lisbon (d. before 383/384). Potamius was the first bishop of Lisbon for whom we have historical information. According to the claims of the Libellus Precum he supported the orthodox faith in the first phase of his career, but later he went over to the *Arians in order to obtain a landholding from the pro-Arian emperor *Constantius II (see Faust. and Marc., Lib. Precum IX, 32: CCL 69, 368). His apostasy was denounced by Hosius of Cordoba before the Iberian church, but this gesture did not please Constantius. The emperor punished Hosius by exiling him early in the year 356. On the basis of this information we can infer that Potamius went over to Arianism around 356 and had been appointed bishop of Lisbon before this date, i.e., before the moment that Hosius, in his denunciation, addressed him as "bishop."

In 357, Potamius, already effectively a member of the Arian party, intervened in the case of Pope *Liberius, seeking to push this pope, who had begun a tepid pro-Arian political approach, to openly embrace Arianism (see Hil. Poit., Coll. Ant. Par., B, III, 2: CSEL 65, 155-156). In August of 357, as attested by *Hilary of Poitiers (see Hil. Poit., De Syn. 3,11: PL 10, 482-487; Lib. contra Const. 23,26: PL 10, 599-601), Potamius took part in a group of bishops present at the Council of *Sirmium and probably contributed to the elaboration of the Formula of Sirmium, if one cannot rule out with certainty the possibility that he participated in its actual composition. *Phoebadius of Agen also attests to the presence of Potamius (see Phoeb., C. Arr. 3,5: CCL 64, 25-27), and explicitly cites a very brief fragment of one of his letters, which is all that remains of this author's literary production during his Arian phase. For the period after the Council of Sirmium, historical information on Potamius becomes very sparse. We know that *Athanasius wrote him a letter, which was cited by Alcuin (see Alcuin, C. Her. Fel. 61: PL 101, 113), in which he sought to oppose the pro-Arian positions. After the Council of *Rimini of 359, Potamius returned to orthodoxy, as was unmistakably demonstrated by his two anti-Arian doctrinal works on the total and absolute unity of the *Trinity, which were both written during this period: Epistula ad Athanasium and the De Substantia. The date of his death is unknown. We can only establish 383-384 as the terminus ante quem, which is supported by the date of the publication of his Libellus Precum, which describes the death of the bishop of Lisbon in a legendary and historically untenable manner.

In the Epistula ad Athanasium and the De Substantia, which constitutes an expansion and further exploration of the positions expressed in the Epistula, Potamius strained to describe in a clear and concrete way the nature and essence of the Trinity, in order to refute all the absurdities and ambiguities expressed by the Arians in their formulas. Although his trinitarian conception tends to be restricted to the *Father and the Son, Potamius often tries to provide an organic position to the *Holy Spirit, and presents the Trinity not only as a total union of substance, but also as a sort of divine organism that functions in absolute harmony of intent, will and action. In order to give concreteness to his ideas and his descriptions of the Trinity, in the De Substantia, Potamius made continual comparisons to the machines used in weaving and the various organs of the human body. He wanted to affirm that a concrete representation of the functioning of the trinitarian unity is clearly visible in textile machines, which function with parts and complementary movements, and also in the organs of the human body, which function on the basis of the same principles. These rather original ideas are expressed with an absolutely unique style in the panorama of 4th-c. Latin. Alongside the countless technical terms drawn from the language of textile production and human anatomy, Potamius made extensive use of the words and poetic constructions and philosophical language of the imperial period (esp. Senecan), creating an abrupt linguistic blend that is tight, baroque and expressionist.

Alongside the doctrinal works, two homilies of Potamius have been handed down: the De Lazaro and the De Martyrio Esaiae, whose dating cannot be established with certainty. In my opinion, however, it is possible that both of these works date to the period of Potamius's return to orthodoxy, from the moment that their argument can be interpreted symbolically: In the De Lazaro, the corrupt body can represent the corruption of Arianism that has invaded the body of the church, while the *resurrection of the body becomes the liberation from the death and the corruption of Arianism. In the De Martyrio Esaiae, in which carnivores search to cut the prophet's body in half, one can detect a symbolic representation of the Arians' attempt to divide the body of the orthodox church. Even in these two works, Potamius's style constantly seeks the most clashing baroque facts and indulges in the most ghastly and disturbing details with a very original and puzzling linguistic blend that unites elements of Augustan and Neronian poetry (esp. Virgil, Seneca and Lucan), cues taken from Latin romance (esp. Apuleius), and typical terms of technical, scientific and philosophical language.

Editions and translations: A. Wilmart, La lettre de Potamius à Saint Athnase: RB 30 (1913) 280-283; Id., Le "De Lazaro" de Potamius: JTS 19 (1918) 298-304; A.C. Vega, Opuscula Omnia Potamii episcopi Olisiponensis, Escorial 1934; M. Conti, Potamii Episcopi Olisponensis Opera Omnia, Corpus Christianorum 69A, 55-274, Turnhout 1999 (critical ed. with Eng. tr.). Studies: A. Montes Moreira, Potamius de Lisbonne et la controverse arienne, Louvain 1969; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana e l'inizio della riflessione teologica in Spagna, in Hispania Romana, Colloquio Italo-Spagnolo, anno 371 (Quaderno 200, Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei), Rome 1974; A. Montes Moreira, Le retour de Potamius de Lisbonne à l'orthodoxie nicéenne: Didaskalia 5 (1975) 303-354; M. Conti, The Life and Works of Potamius of Lisbon, Instr.Patr. 32, Turnhout 1998; V.Y. Urkiola, Potamio de Lisboa, Vitoria 1999; P.G. Alves de Sousa, Patrologia Galaico-Lusitana, Lisboa 2001, 15-21.

M. Conti

POTHINUS of Lyons. One of the *martyrs of *Lyons of 177, he was the bishop of the city and was more than 90 years old. His advanced age did not prevent him, however, from being handed over to the tribunal and thrown into prison, and perhaps mistreated by the enthralled crowd: "If his body deteriorated because of his age and sickness, his *soul was preserved intact because Christ triumphed through him." He died in prison two days later (Eus., HE 5,1,29-31). He and his companions who suffered martyrdom were inserted into the Mart. hier. for 2 June.

DACL 10, 72-121; Vies des SS. 6, 26-40; LTK² 8, 648; BS 8, 61-65.

V. Saxer

PRAEDESTINATUS. Using this title, P.J. Sirmond published in 1643 an anonymous work in the MSS that scholars have attributed to various authors from *Arnobius the Younger to *Primasius of Hadrumetum or to someone from the circle of *Julian of Eclanum. The work contains three books. In the first, the author presents a catalog of *heresies, following *Augustine's De Haer., but adding interesting bits of information on the Tertullianists at *Rome, *Nestorians and predestinationists, to assure its orthodoxy against the potential attacks of the latter. The second, however, is made up of a sermon attributed to Augustine, but composed by the same author with very radical formulas on *predestination, so that it might be easily demolished. The third and last book refutes, phrase-by-phrase, such a theory of predestination, not without condemning by means of Julian's *anathemas the *Pelagian doctrine itself. The work, which dates to the years 432/440, must be definitively attributed to Arnobius, who sought a via media between radical *Pelagianism and Augustine's predestinationism (Gori).

Editions: CPL 243; PL 53, 587-672. Studies: H. von Schubert, Der sogenannte "Praedestinatus," TU 24, 4, Leipzig 1903; M. Abel, Le "Praedestinatus" et le pélagianisme: RTAM 35 (1968) 5-25; C. Kannengiesser, LTK³ 8, 482-483; F. Gori, Il Praedestinatus di Arnobio il Giovane. L'eresiologia contro l'agostinismo, SEA 65, Rome 1999.

B. Studer

PRAETEXTATUS, Vettius Agorius, consul (d. 385). He was born probably at *Rome (Symm., Rel. 11); the precise date, however, still needs to be determined: 310, if he is to be identified with the hierophant who participated at the inaugural ceremonies at *Constantinople in 330, on which event we have information from John of Lydia (De mens. IV, 2); otherwise around 320. A complete picture of his distinguished cursus honorum is supplied by an inscription (CIL VI, 1779 = ILS 1259), although other information, even though incomplete, can be derived from two other inscriptions (CIL VI, 1777 = ILS 1258 and CIL VI, 1778): after having served respectively as a quaestor, praetor, governor of Tuscany and Umbria and consularis of Lusitania, his career came to a halt following a bold move during the time of *Constantius, namely, his decision not to join the Christian religion. With the rise of *Julian to the throne, the situation turned to his favor, and he thus obtained, from 362 to 364, the coveted position of proconsul of *Achaia. During his service as proconsul, he persuaded *Valentinian I not to enact his law against nocturnal *pagan sacrifices, an act attributed to him by the historian *Zosimus (IV, 3.3); approval for his political actions in Greece, moreover, was expressed by the orator Imerius, who addressed a *panegyric to him, which unfortunately has been lost (we have information on this work by *Photius, Bibl. 165,108B4). In 367, he became praefectus urbi until 368: during his term he had to intervene to resolve the conflict between the two candidates aspiring to the office of bishop of *Rome—*Damasus and *Ursinus (Amm., XXVII, 9,9). During his prefecture, he undertook a policy regarding building projects that was aimed at restoring many pagan buildings to their ancient splendor: he ordered the demolition of the Maeniana, a type of external gallery that had arisen in the piazzas around the forum, as well as the private homes that had been constructed upon temples; he thus restored the temple of the Dei consentes in the forum (CIL VI, 102 = ILS 4003). When in 384 the pagan party experienced a moment of good fortune with the Roman prefecture of *Symmachus, Praetextatus also received the important duty of prefect to the praetorium and the appointment to the consulate for the year 385, the year in which he died.

His funeral service, acc. to *Jerome's testimony (Ep. 23), was an event in which the population of the city of Rome flocked en masse: after his death, his wife, Aconia Fabia Paulina, whom he married in 344 (Jer., Ep. 39,3 and epigraphs), dedicated all her energies to keeping the memory of her husband alive, and she was able to obtain official recognition for him through the erection of a statue in his honor. Although his son was able to bring about the construction of the statue on the Aventine Hill, the process of erecting a statue in his honor through the initiative of the state was much more difficult (CIL VI, 1777): the prefect of the city, Symmachus, a great friend of Praetextatus during his life, sent a statement (no. 12) to *Theodosius, *Valentinian II and *Arcadius in the name of the senate in order to obtain this recognition, but the Milanese court sought further documentation, accompanied by an action that appeared to be particularly offensive to the memory of Praetextatus and the pride of Symmachus. The latter responded with a subsequent statement (no. 21), recalling that the requested documentation was already at the court and attached several of Praetextatus's speeches, which demonstrated his complete loyalty to the emperors. Finally, Praetextatus obtained a statue in his memory; a fragment of its base has survived in the forum (CIL VI, 1779[a]). Before this recognition by the state, this illustrious person had nonetheless obtained another, perhaps even superior, recognition from the vestal virgins who, upon the request of Paulina, dedicated a statue to Praetextatus with the approval of the pontiffs, an exception made for very few people, among whom was Symmachus, who witnessed a similar procedure that was unheard of in the pagan tradition. It was an act of recognition by the pagan religion toward a man who had shown himself a passionate defender of paganism and was famous for his various priestly offices (CIL VI, 1779 = ILS 1259): augur, pontiff of Vesta and the Sun, consecrated to the cult of Liber and the Eleusinian mysteries, and tauroboliatus.

An open question remains concerning Ruggini's suggestion that Praetextatus should be identified with the senator who was the recipient of the poem Carmen contra paganos, whom Mazzarino (Antico, tardoantico ed èra costantiniana, Bari 1974, 398ff.) identified as the father of Symmachus, Aviarius, who died in 376, although the more traditional opinion identifies him with Nicomachus Flavian, who served as consul in 394, the year of his death in the war under the rule of the usurper Eugenius. If Ruggini's identification is correct, we would have information about Paulina, the ipsa coniunx who appears at the end of the piece to honor the memory of her husband with great devotion. The most important document for our understanding of Praetextatus and Paulina is contained in the corpus of the inscriptions etched in a funerary memorial found at Rome and today preserved at the Capitoline Museums (CIL VI, 1779). Here the inscription is certainly speaking about Praetextatus and Paulina, but we have difficulty regarding the authorship of the three poems written in iambic trimeters (with the anomaly that leads one to think of some iambic senari) that adorn the back side and the two sides of the memorial. According to Polara, the three poems are all the work of the same author and were all written after the death of Paulina and Praetextatus. Polara, in contradistinction to Ruggini, does not accept Lambrecht's thesis (Op de grens van heidendom en christendom. Het grafscrift van Vettius Agorius Praetextatus en Fabia Aconia Paulina, Brussel, 1955), acc. to which the inscriptions were composed between Praetextatus's death and Paulina's and that these poems or a eulogy as the source for these poems were familiar to Jerome when he wrote his letter on the death of Lea (Ep. 23). Two of the poems are presented as Praetextatus's writings to his wife, the other as written by Paulina to her husband. In the two compositions in which Paulina is remembered (not in the second person) the woman is presented acc. to the typical formula of the good matron but also one who is a woman of faith. Even the third composition, in the second person, addressed by Paulina to her husband, ends, as Polara notes, in praise of a woman. With regard to the relationship to other texts, one should note that the third poem has echoes of Symmachus's statement (no. 12), which establishes its source. It is more difficult, however, to establish a relationship to Jerome's text: certainly Epistula 23 was written before the memorial, the inscription and the three poetic compositions and the compositions seem to be a polemical response to Jerome's representation of an infelix Paulina.

Vettius Agorius Praetextatus, moreover, distinguished himself for his intense activity as a philosopher and a man of letters, as a translator of Greek verse and prose works, as attested by CIL VI, 1779, vv. 8ff.: among the translations, one should probably mention Praetextatus's translation of *Themistius's Commentary on Aristotle's Analytics, acc. to the testimony of *Boethius (De interpret. ed. sec. I, 289). Vettius Agorius Praetextatus was, moreover, the primary interlocutor in *Macrobius's Saturnalia (see Sat. I, 17.1,21.1). We know that he owned a home in Rome on the Esquiline and Aventine Hills (CIL XV, 7563 and CIL VI, 1777), and his figure as the most upright pagan was esp. praised by Ammonius Marcellinus (XXVII, 9.8 and XXII, 7.6).

PWK 22 (1954) 1575-1579; ibid., s.v. Praefectus praetorio, 2391-2502; PLRE I, [2]1975, s.v. Praetextatus 1, 722-724; ibid. s.v. Paulina 4, 675; 7, 1298-1309; G. Polara, Le iscrizioni sul cippo tombale di Vezio Agorio Pretestato: Vichiana 4 (1967) 264-289; J.F. Merriman, Aristocratic and Imperial Patronage of the Decorative Arts in Rome and Constantinople, A.D. 337–395, Diss., University of Illinois, 1975; L. Cracco Ruggini, Il paganesimo romano tra religione e politica (384–394 d. C.). Per una reinterpretazione del Carmen contra paganos: MAL VIII, 23,1 (1979) 3-141; Id., Vettio Agorio Pretestato e la fondazione di Costantinopoli, in Miscellanea E. Manni, Rome 1979, 575-610; D. Vera, Commento storico alle relationes di Q. Aurelio Simmaco, Pisa 1981; M. Kahlos, Fabia Aconia Paulina and the Death of Praetextatus. Rethoric and Ideals in Late Antiquity (CIL VI, 1779): Arctos 28 (1994) 13-25; Id., The Restoration Policy of Vettius Agorius Praetextatus: Arctos 29 (1995) 39-47; G. Nieddu, Lexicon Topographicum Urbis Romae, vol. II, Rome 1995, s.v. Dei Consentes, Aedes, 9ff.; F. Guidobaldi, ibid., s.v. Domus: Vettius Agorius Praetextatus, 164; M. Kahlos, Saeculum Praetextati, Helsinki 1998; P. Liverani, Vaticano pagano, Vaticano cristiano, in Aurea Roma, ed. S. Ensoli - E. La Rocca, Rome 2000, 295-297; G. Polara, Iscrizioni e propaganda. Il cippo tombale di Pretestato, in Letteratura e propaganda nell'Occidente latino da Augusto ai regni barbarici, ed. F.E. Consolino, Rome 2000, 107-126.

C. Noce

PRAGMATICA SANCTIO. In general, this Latin expression referred to the imperial disposition that allowed a rapid application of the law. The *novella of *Justinian published on 13 August 554 titled the Pragmatica sanctio sub petitione Vigilii was important. It was composed of 27 chapters and was released after the reconquest of *Rome by *Narses, upon the request of Pope *Vigilius. The objective was to regulate the Italian situation after the disastrous and terrible Gothic war. "People were forced to sell their children in order to pay their taxes": without using any exaggeration for rhetoric, Pope *Gregory the Great thus defined the conditions to which the Italian population had been subjected by Byzantine rule. In fact, after the massacres and the devastations caused by the Gothic war, in which the lives of 15-16 million Italians were taken, the emperor of the East, *Justinian, had published the Pragmatic Sanction, a document by which, in addition to defining the relationships of private law that had been subverted by war (validity or invalidity of acts; restoration of usurped properties; acquisitions obtained through violence made invalid; a time of probation after prison; male and female slaves married to free persons required to return to their legitimate slave masters; nuns married during the tyranny restored to their convents [even with force if need be]) and establishing weights, coins and measures, and transforming bishops (the de facto holders of power in the cities) into imperial officers, new taxes and new arbitrary fees were imposed on *Italy. Adhering to the imperial directives, during his ten years of governance in Italy (555–567), Narses systematically intervened in religious questions (not excluding the election of the pope), enacted a very extensive network of tariffs and shackled the peninsula's suffering economy to the minute control of Byzantium's authority.

P. Pescani, Nuovissimo Digesto Italiano, Turin 1976, vol. 13, 353-354; G. Archi, Pragmatica sanctio pro petitione Vigilii, in Scritti di Diritto Romano, Milan 1981, 1971-2110; F. Brandileone, Il diritto bizantino nell'Italia meridionale, Rome 1987; A. Ducellier (ed.), Bisanzio, It. tr. Turin 1988; G. Ostrogorsky, Storia dell'impero bizantino, Turin 1993; A. Carile, Materiali di storia bizantina, Bologna 1994; C. Capizzi, Giustiniano I tra politica e religione, Soveria Mannelli 1994, 236 s.v. Vigilio; O. Mazal, Iustininian I und seine Zeit, Cologne 2001.

A. Di Berardino

PRAILIUS of Jerusalem. Bishop of *Jerusalem from 417 to 422; successor of *John II. Perhaps he was the author of the part of the homily Laudatio s. dei genitricis Mariae (PG 65, 721-733) that discusses *virginity, transmitted under the name of *Proclus of *Constantinople. His life is otherwise unknown.

CPG 5805; R. Laurentin, Bulletin sur la Vierge Marie: RSPh 52 (1968) 545; R. Caro, La homilética Mariana Griega en el Siglo V, 3 vols., Dayton 1971–1973, 308-344.

S. Samulowitz

PRAXEAS (3rd c.). We know this *patripassian *monarchian only from *Tertullian's Adversus Praxean. Tertullian tells us that Praxeas introduced the monarchian *heresy at *Rome, then at Carthage. At Carthage he was accused and was forced to retract and sign a document (libellus) in favor of orthodoxy; he then began, however, to spread the heresy so that Tertullian had to refute him with one of his own works written in 213. Because the Philosoph. and other primary sources do not mention this figure, although they name many other monarchians, and Praxeas can also be taken as a nickname (= lobbyist, crook), scholars have posited that with this nickname Tertullian had targeted one of the monarchians who is otherwise known to us. Some have thought that he may have been *Epigonus, who introduced the monarchian heresy of *Noetus, and even *Callistus, to Rome from Asia Minor. Today, scholars tend to consider Praxeas the proper name of a heretic who is otherwise unknown and distinct from the other monarchians known through other primary sources.

R. Cantalamessa, Prassea e l'eresia monarchiana: Scuola Cattolica 90 (1962) 28-50; BBKL VII, 914-915.

M. Simonetti

PRAXEDIS. Perhaps the foundress of the titular church by the same name in the 5th c. at *Rome. According to 6th-c. legend, she was the sister of St. Pudentiana, who were both virgin daughters of the Senator *Pudens who provided lodging for St. *Paul (2 Tim 4:21), and both were erroneously identified with the women on the apse mosaic of St. Pudentiana. 7th-c. pilgrims visited the tomb of Praxedis on the Via Salaria in the catacombs of *Priscilla (CCL 175, 306). The titular church was remodeled by Pope Pascal I (817–824), a splendid example of the so-called Carolingian Renaissance at Rome. At the tombs of the martyrs transferred by Pascal from the catacombs to the circular crypt of St. Praxedis, G.B. de Rossi received his inspiration to dedicate himself entirely to the study of what would subsequently be called Christian archaeology (commemorative stones).

BHL 6920, 6988-6991; BS 10, 1062-1072; BBKL 7, 915-916; LCI 8, 224; J.P. Kirsch, Die römischen Titelkirchen im Altertum, Paderborn 1918, 52-54; R. Wisskirchen, Das Mosaikprogramm von S. Prassede in Rom, Münster 1990; V. Tiberia, Il mosaico di Santa Pudenziana a Roma, Todi 2003.

S. Heid

PRAYER

I. The first three c. - II. The East: 4th and 5th c. - III. The Latin West and the 4th and 5th c.

I. The first three c. Prayer is an integral part of every religion. It is its heart and soul. Christianity rejected neither the terminology nor the gestures of *pagan prayer, but expressed systematic reservation with regard to everything that it knew about *idolatry. Instead of εὐχή, the common term for prayer in antiquity, Christians, and esp. St. *Paul, preferred the term προσευχή. The Latin gospels usually translated the latter term with the verb orare, to dissociate themselves from the classical meanings.

The *apostle Paul imported into his own experience the same reality that the synoptic gospels taught and that *John the Evangelist mentions when he speaks of worship "in spirit and in truth." Prayer immerses the Christian into the full trinitarian mystery, as the *Lord's Prayer demonstrates. This establishes its roots in the Lord who came, comes and will come, and ends with the contemplation of God's gift, received from Christ in the *Holy Spirit. It therefore has a triple dimension: ecclesial, existential and eschatological (Hamman, Prière, I, 423-434).

The first two centuries of spiritual experience prepared for the golden age of the *Fathers and developed Christian prayer, moving from the gospel, esp. from the *Lord's Prayer. *Jewish Christianity changed the forms and uses of prayer from what was found in *Judaism. Prayer was held three times a day; the form used, however, was the Oratio dominica (Did. 8), which ended with a doxology cherished by contemporary Judaism. The sparse bits of information on prayer in the *Epistle of Barnabas permit one to compose a small moral treatise on prayer, which must be humble, joyous, safe and vigilant. The importance given to eschatology served to orient prayer toward the expectation of the goods promised (Did. 16; Barn. 21,3; Sim. II, 9) and toward the Lord's parousia*, namely, recompense and punishment.

The church born of the mission into the pagan world showed a greater autonomy from the Jewish heritage. *Clement's prayer, which is the first explicit formulation outside the NT, expresses the community's faith. Directed toward the Father, Creator and Father of ages, it praises and gives thanks for the Son, and it gathers the entire church's prayer intentions through the mediation of Christ, our older brother (1 Clem. 59,3-61,3). If *Ignatius did not supply any prayer texts, his letters are still full of allusions to it. He describes the bishop as having a soul continually directed toward God the Father and Jesus Christ, from whom it awaits all good things. Father and Son are united in the same worship and in the same faith. There we find some invocations to Christ that are sighings, the cry of the heart, in which it pours forth its most inner aspiration, without losing sight of the community (Hamman, Prière, II, 97). *Irenaeus, in turn, spontaneously returns to the prayer that flourished during the OT (Haer. III, 6,4; 25,2). Prayer is an existential attitude of the Christian, "every day he worships God, in the temple of God, which is his body, by practicing justice at all times" (Dem. 96). In this temple, the spirit cries Abba, Father and fashions the person in God's likeness (Dem. 6). The painful kenōsis elicits from us a cry of expectation and the awareness of incompleteness.

The Acts of the *Martyrs serve to provide us with the witness of sober and committed prayer. The *confessor of the faith, such as Christ on the *cross and the protomartyr *Stephen, expressed in his prayer the sense of his final liturgy and his entire and complete offering. *Martyrological literature describes with pleasure the long prayers during the martyr's time in prison, in dialogue with Christ even during torture. Christ accompanied and strengthened the martyr, who was visibly transformed by his presence. This allowed him to better understand the ecclesial dimension of his prayer and confession (Martyrdom of Polycarp 8; Martyrdom of Fructuosus 3). The soul of the martyrs' prayer, simultaneously individual and ecclesial, was the Holy Spirit: the Spirit prayed in each one of the martyrs as in all Christians, esp. at the hour in which they confessed the faith before the world. The Spirit guided the martyr, as does the *Eucharist, to his τελείωσις, acc. to an expression of *Clement of Alexandria, i.e., to his completion and perfection.

Even the *apocryphal texts in turn present a little studied aspect of ancient prayer. They are full of prayers and hymns, even if they appear interpolated. They are prayers at times somewhat disordered, in which their lyricism inspires a religious fervor that corresponds to popular tastes, full of poignancy and poetry, from which they arose (Hamman, Prière, II, 176). The prayers of the apocryphal texts present a rather uncertain theology, if not altogether *gnostic. Usually directed toward Christ, they are continually addressed to the Kyrios (Lord) in glory, which manifests his presence and power, and allows one to discover the cosmic dimension of salvation. They allow one to become aware of the cosmic significance of faith. It is a Christocentric, Easter, cosmic and eschatological prayer.

In the 3rd c., the first treatises on prayer arose that focused on the Lord's Prayer. These treatises thus placed the "Our Father" at the center of daily liturgical prayer. It was solemnly entrusted (traditio) to the *catechumen as the expression of new birth. It was by then the norm of Christian prayer. All the early treatises on prayer comment on the "Our Father" (*Tertullian, *Cyprian and *Origen), as if every teaching necessarily had its point of support therein.

Tertullian emphasized above all the absolute novelty of Christian prayer. Christ is the "spirit who overcomes, the Word who teaches, the reason that gives life" (De or. 1). Understood well, the "Our Father" is "the compendium of the entire gospel" (ibid.). Tertullian united to prayer the acts that accompanied it (genuflection, prostration), but also *fasts and *hospitality (De or. 25). Prayer is the offering of the new covenant that makes us "perfect worshipers and true priests" (De or. 28). His *commentary emphasizes the eschatological aspect: prayer must hasten the kingdom of God (De or. 5; 29).

Cyprian's small treatise possesses neither the ascetical character nor the expressive radiance of Tertullian's; instead, it is more pastoral because he was more concerned about seeing the faithful pray with a positive effect. For this reason, he was interested esp. in the ecclesial dimension of prayer suggested by the plural form used in the "Our Father." We also find a missionary preoccupation in Cyprian's text, which was rather rare in the first centuries. Daily prayer stimulates perseverance and prepares one for martyrdom (De or. dom. 18).

If Clement of Alexandria did not supply us a commentary on the "Our Father," the seventh book of the Stromata made up for it by offering us "the first Christian theological exposition on prayer" (E. von der Goltz). Two prayers are found in the Pedagogue (III, 12,101; cf. I, 6,42,1-2): they are directed toward Jesus Christ, but associated with the Father and the Holy Spirit. The seventh book of the Stromata describes prayer as "the soul's intimate and silent communication with *God" (Pourrat, Spiritualité, 113). Spiritual progress is above all progress in prayer because it completes the perfect gnostic and leads him to the mystical summit (Strom. VII, 49,6), a doctrine that would exert a long influence on Origen, *Cassian and *Diadocus.

Origen's treatise On Prayer, rightly called by Quasten "a true gem," in addition to being a substantial and profound textual commentary on the "Our Father," provides a *theology of prayer. This type of prayer must be biblical, ascetical and eschatological. Prayer marks the journey of God's people and its steps: a return to the divine likeness, the elimination of the sensible through *purification, the reawakening of the spiritual senses until one reaches perfect union. The Father is the destination of all prayer, the Holy Spirit is its soul (De or. 2). One notes the pedagogical character with which Origen described preparation, the inception and the conditions for every prayer (De or. 31-32; 9).

We find, moreover, numerous pieces of information on the practices of prayer in various treatises. The Didache* had already mentioned the ternary system of daily prayer. Prayers in the morning and evening have a more solemn character and are often connected to an *assembly (Tertull., De or. 9; Trad. Ap. 41). Christians maintained the disposition of prayer before meals. Prayers should be offered at the right time, but this should not make one forget that "the entire life of Christianity is a long celebration"

(Clem. Alex., Strom. VII, 7,35,6).

*Polycarp prayed while standing, facing the *East (Martyrdom of Poly. 5,1), as John did, in the apocryphal acts, both in the expectation of the Kyrios and in the direction of *paradise (Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and Origen attest to the same custom). The Acts of Hipparchus added that John painted a *cross on the E wall of his home, where he prayed seven times a day.

Christians pray standing in memory of the one who rose again, on their knees or even prostrate in order to worship God or to confess their *sins. Christians pray with arms stretched out like Christ on the cross, and with open hands just as the orantes (V. Saxer, Augustinianum 20 [1980] 335-365).

Christian prayer is never detached from everyday existence, but is extended in concrete situations "of charity without limits": *agape, hospitality, redistribution of goods are the manifestations of a brotherhood discovered in Christ and lived in the church. Origen repeated Clement's maxim drawn from sacred *Scripture: "the prayer accepted by God is a good work" (Ped. III, 69,3).

Rooted in the biblical *revelation and in Christ, Christian prayer is at the same time a giving of thanks and awaiting, *recapitulation and *eschatology.

E.F. von der Goltz, Das Gebet in der ältesten Christenheit, Leipzig 1901; G. Békés, De continua oratione Clementis Alexandrini doctrina, Rome 1942; P. Pourrat, La spiritualité chrétienne, 4 vols., Paris 1947–1951; A.G. Hamman, La prière, I: Le Nouveau Testament, Tournai 1959; II: Les trois premiers siècles, Tournai 1963; in It.: La preghiera, Rome 1967 = vol. II; F.J. Dölger, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Kreuzzeichens: JbAC 1 (1958) 5-19; 2 (1959) 15-29; 4 (1961) 5-17; Id., Gebet: RAC 8, 1134-1258; var. aus., La preghiera, Rome-Milan 1966, 3 vols.; C.H. Bernard, La preghiera cristiana, Rome 1976; V. Saxer (ed.), Ecclesia Orans, Mèlanges . . . A.G. Hamman: Augustinianum 20/1-2 (1980); A.G. Hamman, La prière chrétienne et la prière païenne, forme et différences: ANRW 23/2, 1190-1247; C. Cristiano, La preghiera nei Padri, Rome 1981; V. Grossi, Tertulliano-Cipriano-Agostino, il Padre Nostro, Rome 1983; A.G. Hamman, La prière dans l'église ancienne, Berne 1989 (It. tr. Turin 1994); A. Méhat, Sur deux définitions de la prière, in Origeniana sexta. Actes du Colloquium origenianum sextum, Louvain 1995, 115-120; K. Ruh, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, Munich 1993 (It. tr. Storia della mistica occidentale, Milan 1995 [vol. I patristica]; B. McGinn, Storia della mistica cristiana in Occidente, 1: Le origini (IV secolo), GenoA 1997; F. Cocchini (ed.), Il dono e la sua ombra. Ricerche sul "Peri euches" di Origene, I Convegno del gruppo italiano di ricerca su "Origene e la tradizione alessandrina," Rome 1997; var. aus., La preghiera nel tardo antico. Dalle origini ad Agostino, XXVII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, SEA 66, Rome 1999; S. Pricoco - M. Simonetti, La preghiera dei cristiani, Milan 2000; L.F. Pizzolato - M. Rizzi (ed.), Origene maestro di vita spirituale, Studia patristica Mediolanensia 22, Milan 2001.

A. Hamman

II. The East: 4th and 5th c. Starting from the 4th-5th c., spiritual writing in the East became increasingly monastic. It was in the monastic context that works of teaching and nearly exhaustive treatises on the topic of prayer flourished (see T. Špidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien, 409ff.).

1. Definitions and divisions. For the monks, prayer was knowledge par excellence, knowledge that was acquired in the very act of praying itself: knowledge of *faith, *life acc. to faith and salvation. Therefore, the various definitions of prayer proposed by the Fathers certainly do not pretend to be such in the strict sense of the term, but hinge on one aspect or another of that vital act that is prayer. As a human conversation with God, prayer is above all "a request from God for appropriate things" (Basil, Hom. in mart. Julittam 3: PG 31, 244 A). Already the ancients spoke of the "the spirit's elevation toward God" (the definition adopted by *Evagrius [De orat. 35: PG 79, 1173]). Inasmuch as it is an elevation to God the *Father, this assent is not a simple "vision" in the Platonic sense, but instead becomes "the spirit's dialogue with God" (De orat. 3: PG 79, 1168). *John of Damascus (De fide orth. 3,24: PG 94, 1089 C) unites the two aspects of the formula then adopted by many others: "prayer is the spirit's elevation toward God and also a request from God for appropriate things." To avoid the danger of Platonic intellectualism, it was necessary to provide new meanings, to adapt the term nous, an instrument of this sense, or to substitute it with "heart," to refer to the totality of the person brought to life by the Spirit.

To refer to the progress of prayer a list was made of steps that were explained by classical authors who spoke of *contemplation and *mysticism. The traditional order of these steps generally repeats the trichotomous structure of the human composite: thus prayer of the *body or oral prayer becomes distinct from prayer of the mind or interior prayer and likewise from spiritual prayer that takes place in the depth of the human spirit.

When commenting on the four types of prayer present in the writings of St. *Paul (1 Tim 2:1): δέησις, προσευχή, ἔντευξις and εὐχαριστία, the Fathers followed the explanation offered by *Origen (De orat. 14: PG 11, 460; Cassian, Collat. 9,9: PL 49, 780).

2. Petitionary Prayer. In opposition to the aristocraticism of some people, the Fathers defended petitionary prayer for "all the needs" of the faithful, even if it was a more certain sign of a higher level of perfection to ask for heavenly needs instead of earthly and temporal ones (Evagr., De orat. 37-38: PG 79, 1176).

In response to the question why our prayers are not always heard, the Fathers often answered that this occurs because we are sinners and we often pray too little (John Chrys., In dimissionem Chananaeae 10: PG 52, 457). For this reason, in the penitential tradition of the Eastern monks, a request was often repeated with insistence for the remission of sins: Kyrie eleison.

3. Continual Prayer. In full harmony with all the spiritual teachers of the East, *Maximus the Confessor wrote that "holy Scripture does not command anything impossible" when it orders: Pray without ceasing (1 Th 5:17) (Liber asc. 25: PG 90, 929 D, 932 A). The *Messalians took the commandment literally: to pray is the same as saying prayers, rejecting every secular work and above all manual *labor. In opposition to similar utopias, Augustine wrote the work De opere monachorum (PL 40, 547-582).

The *acoemetes believed it was possible to implement continual prayer by working together, obliging the community in turn, through the succession of offices of various groups of monks. The classical solution is in the writings of Origen: "the saint's entire life is like one long prayer; what we call prayer is nothing more than a part of that lifelong prayer" (De orat. 12: PG 11, 452). This would become Augustine's teaching (De haeres. 57: PL 42, 40) and that of *Aphraates (Demonstr. IV, 14-17). Although the monks always tried to increase their practice of prayer, their objective can be summarized in *Cassian's expression: orationis status (Collat. 10,14: SC 54, p. 95), a habitual disposition of the heart, a katastasis, a state of life.

4. The victory over iconoclasm. The fight for *images unleashed in the Byzantine Empire was a grave crisis that, with many vicissitudes, occupied part of the 8th and 9th c. The importance of the anti-iconoclastic reaction can only be understood by relating it to a long series of christological controversies. An idea dear to the Greek Fathers was that in Christ and through him the sanctification of the *world reached its apex and that the unity of the entire universe was achieved. The Byzantine East placed the image of the *Pantocrator at the center of the dome, where it appears as the central motif of all *iconography and simultaneously the axis of the cosmos. The objective of the iconography is therefore to witness to God's presence in the visible world. "At one time, God, the Incorporeal and the Invisible, was never depicted. But now that he has been manifested in the *flesh and has dwelt among men, I represent the 'visibility' of God: I do not worship matter, but the Creator of matter" (John Dam., Imag. I, 16: PG 94, 1245 A).

5. Liturgical prayer. In the writings of the Greek Fathers, one finds beautiful statements on the ecclesial character of public prayer. The victory over iconoclasm was also the victory of the monks. The "Studite reform" had its qualifying points in the development of the *liturgy and in the stabilizing of the rites. From the beginning of the 4th c., more precisely from the time when the church was accepted and favored by the imperial power, the freedom to improvise was reduced. Texts and rites were slowly fixed, parallel to the passing of the oral liturgy of the numerous communities to the written liturgy. In the writings of the Fathers, there are five groups of writings on the theme of liturgical prayer: mystagogical *catecheses; explanatory treatises (directed to the faithful, clerics or monks—these increased esp. after the decrease of the institution of the catechumenate); the *homilies delivered during liturgical feasts; the "Easter letters"; works of a more general theological character. The Fathers saw in the liturgy an authoritative argument, a "locus theologicus" ante litteram. The most famous example is found in the writings of *Prosper of Aquitaine, who, between 435 and 442, in his Indiculus de gratia Dei (8: PL 51, 209 F) set forth the classic formula: legem credendi statuat lex supplicandi. Later, among the monks, liturgical contemplation came to the patristic notion of theology as wisdom and gnosis of life.

*6. Hesychasm. In modern parlance, when one speaks of hesychasm one usually thinks of a certain method of prayer codified in the monastic context of Mount Athos. In reality, hesychasm, in its early meaning, was a system of *spirituality so old that it coincided with the origins of Eastern *monasticism.

Tranquility, ἡσυχία, being free of worries, ἀμεριμνία, the guardian of the heart, the spirit, vigilance, προσοχή, constitute the apex of prayer and derive from it. "The attentive practice of the hesychia of the heart will veil a frenetic abyss, and the ear of hesychia will hear marvelous things about God" (Hesychius of Batos, Cent. II, 30: PG 93, 1521 A). In the history of this movement, we can distinguish five phases: (1) the hesychasm of the desert Fathers: the insistence on solitude; (2) Sinaites (*John Climachus, *Hesychius and Philotheus the Sinaite): the spiritual combat recalls the nepsis, the sobriety, which helps one to drive out demonic suggestions; (3) Simeon the New Theologian (949-1022): the direct experience of the Spirit; (4) the Hesychasm of Mount Athos in the 2nd half of the 13th c. and during the 14th: the "method" of prayer and the Palamite controversies; (5) the era of the Philokalia, at the end of the 18th c.: the return to patristic sources.

The Philokalia (first published in Greek in Venice 1782) is a collection of the most significant texts on the subject of prayer in the tradition of the Fathers of the Christian East (Eng. tr., 4 of 5 vols., K. Ware - G.E.H. Palmer - P. Sherrard, London 1982–).

DSp 1, 169-175; 7, 381-399; 1224-1239 (bibl.); DIP 3, 1306-1313; I. Hausherr, Penthos. La doctrine de la componction dans l'Orient chrétien, OCA 132, Rome 1944; Id., Comment priaient les Pères: Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 32 (1956) 38-58, 284-296; Id., Les leçons d'un contemplatif. Le Traité de l'Oraison d'Évagre le Pontique, Paris 1960; Id., Noms du Christ et voies d'oraison, OCA 157, Rome 1960; Id., La prière perpétuelle du chrétien. Laïcat et Sainteté, II, Rome 1965, 111-166, repr. in Hésychasme et prière, OCA 176, Rome 1966, 255-306; J.-M. Sauget, Bibliographie des Liturgies orientales (1900–1960), Rome 1962; F. Vandenbroucke, Théologie de la Liturgie: Cath 7, 882-889; W. Gessel, Die Theologie des Gebetes nach "De oratione" von Origenes, Munich-Paderborn-Vienna 1975; C. von Schönborn, L'icône du Christ. Fondements théologiques élaborés entre le I[er] et le II[e] Concile de Nicée (325–787), Fribourg 1976; T. Špidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient Chrétien. Manuel systématique, OCA 206, Rome 1978, 293ff., 382ff. (bibl.) (It. tr. Manuale fondamentale di spiritualità, Casale Monf. 1993); A.G. Hamman, La prière dans l'église ancienne, Berne 1989 (It. tr. Turin 1994); K. Ruh, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, Munich 1993 (It. tr. Storia della mistica occidentale, Milan 1995 [I: patristica]); La preghiera nel tardo antico. Dalle origini ad Agostino, XXVII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, SEA 66, Rome 1999; B. McGinn, Storia della mistica cristiana in Occidente, vol. 1: Le origini (I-V secolo), Genoa1997; S. Pricoco - M. Simonetti, La preghiera dei cristiani, Milan 2000.

T. Špidlík

III. The Latin West and the 4th and 5th c. The Latin Fathers of the golden age all commented on the book of *Psalms: "vox Christi ad Patrem" (Ambr., Ps. 61). So too *Hilary, *Ambrose, *Jerome and *Augustine. It is from these enarrationes that we must analyze their teaching on Christian prayer. In all of these, prayer is rooted in *Scripture. *Origen heavily influenced the majority of these Western authors. One can detect it esp. in the writings of Hilary, Ambrose and Jerome. In Hilary's Tractatus in Psalmos, which are not just a commentary on the Psalter but are tracings of a spiritual journey to God, Christian prayer is not just a formula, but a stimulus for life; not so much oratio verborum as much as affectus cordis (In Ps. 60,2). It is in the first place an attitude of faith (ibid.) and a movement of the heart (Op. Hist. fr. VIII). It demands the interior assent of Christian action (In Ps. 63,5-6). The treatise On the Trinity begins and finishes with a prayer (I, 38; VI, 19,21; XII, 52-57). This facet of the work demonstrates, better than long explanations, that prayer leads to faith (I, 37-38). God is a mystery whom one must receive in prayer and with prayer. For finding God, silent adoration is better than speculation (De Trin. I, 6; II, 7; X, 50,54,55; XI, 9,23,47).

Ambrose is perhaps the Latin author who was most influenced by Origen. He was particularly sensitive in his devotion to Christ. A preacher of Scripture, Ambrose naturally drew on Origen's works, esp. in his long *commentary on Psalm 118, and esp. in 22:27-34. As in the case of his teacher, he willingly directed his *preaching to explicit prayer (De fide I, 20; V, 19; Spir. s. II, prol. 8; I, 14; De paen. II, 67 and 73; Or. in Valent. 80; Or. in Theodos. 36). He preferred worshiping and praising God, like the seraphim, rather than discussing his nature (De fide II, 106; Spir. s. III, 21). In his works, he continually directed spontaneous prayers toward Christ (De fide I, 137; Spir. s. prol. 13; cf. Baus, Das Gebet beim hl. Ambrosius, Trier 1952). The dogmatic expositions conclude with a profession of faith, a profession in oratio and adoratio (Dassman, 91). As in the case of Origen, he expressed his devotion to Christ in affective prayer (Baus, RQA 44-46).

Jerome equally depended on Origen in his prayer to Christ. He invoked Christ as well as the *Holy Spirit primarily when he commented upon Scripture (Vita Hilar. 1)—see, e.g., In Os. comm. prol.; In Hierem. comm. 4.6, praef.; De Vir. ill. praef. It is not possible to receive God's Word without the Domino revelante (Ep. 65,22,4), nunc adiuvante, imo inspirante nobis Christo (In Is. comm. 8, in fine). In this prayer to Christ, Jerome depended not only on Origen, but also on the piety and hagiographical literature on the martyrs (Baus, Das Gebet zu Christus beim hl. Hieronymus [1951] 187-188).

Augustine, in his *catechesis, preaching and literary correspondence left a special place for prayer, esp. the "Our Father," which he calls a sacramentum (Serm. 228,3) and which he ceaselessly explained (cf. A. Hamman, Le Pater expliqué par les Pères, Paris 1952, 154-169). In his Enarrationes on the Psalms, he views the Psalter as tracing the Christian's path toward God. One also sees this path in his commentary on 1 John. This aspect is esp. obvious in the Enarr. in Ps. 41, in the psalms that recall the heavenly *Jerusalem (Enarr. in Ps. 61; 85; 86; 98), and in the gradual Psalms (Enarr. in Ps. 124; 125; 136; 147; 149). In the Psalms, Augustine perceived prayer and the mystery of Christ and the church, the head and the body. Christ's prayer is ours; ours becomes that of Christ: "Our prayers are therefore directed toward him, through him and in him" (In Ps. 85,1). And he concludes: "there is therefore just one man who lasts until the end of time and it is always his members that cry forth" (ibid., 4). The Enarrationes prolong the prayer of the Confessions and show us Augustine's spiritual and mystical experience, a man of prayer, which he had already explained in the treatise De quant. an. 33,73-76. Augustine summarized his thought on this matter in his Letter 130 to *Proba. In the *Sermon on the Mount, he places the petitions of the "Our Father" in relation to the *Beatitudes and the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which unfold the path to God.

With regard to those who came after Augustine, prayer can be found in their preaching, esp. in explanations of the "Our Father," primarily in the sermons of *Peter Chrysologus (Serm. 67-72, c. 39; 43), in *John Cassian (Coll. IX and X) and in Martin of Tours, for whom prayer is rooted in lectio divina (Vita Mart. 26,2-4). The monastic *rules, notably *The Rule of St. Benedict, insist on continual prayer (Aug., Ep. 211,7; Cass., Coll. IX, 3,6,7; X, 14).

Ch. Morel, La vie de prière de st. Augustin d'après sa correspondance: Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 23 (1947) 222-258; A. de Bovis, Le Christ et la prière: Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 25 (1949) 180-193; K. Baus, Das Gebet zu Christus, beim hl. Hieronymus: TZ 60 (1951) 178-188; J. Delamare, La Prière à l'école de saint Augustin: Vie spirituelle 86 (1952) 477-493; K. Baus, Die Stellung Christi im Gebet des hl. Augustinus: TZ 63 (1954) 321-339; Id., Das Nachwirken des Origenes in der Christusfrömmigkeit des hl. Ambrosius: RQA 49 (1954) 21-55; A.M. Besnard, Les grandes lois de la prière. Saint Augustin, maître de prière: Vie spirituelle 101 (1959) 237-280; T.A. Hand, St. Augustine on Prayer, Dublin 1964; M. Abad, La oración misionera y sus fuentes según San Augustín, Madrid 1964; E. Dassmann, Die Frömmigkeit des Kirchenvaters Ambrosius von Mailand. Quellen und Entfaltung, Münster 1965; G. García Montana, La eficacia de la oración según la doctrina de San Augustín, Madrid 1966; E. von Severus, Gebet: RAC 8, 1242-1247; A.G. Hamman, Saint Augustin prie les Psaumes, Paris 1981; V. Grossi, Tertulliano-Cipriano-Agostino, il Padre Nostro, Rome 1983; N. Cipriani, La pedagogia della preghiera in S. Agostino, Palermo 1984; M. Pellegrino, La preghiera dei Salmi in S. Agostino, Magnano 1984; C. Vagaggini - G. Penco, La preghiera nella Bibbia e nella tradizione patristica e monastica, Cinisello Balsamo 1988 ([1]1964); D. Gorce, La "lectio divina" nell'ambiente ascetico di S. Girolamo, Bologna 1990 (orig. ed. 1925); M.G. Jackson, The Lord's Prayer in St. Augustine: SP 27 (1993) 311-321; A. Trapè, Sant'Agostino uomo e maestro di preghiera, Rome 1995; K. Ruh, Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik, Munich 1993 (It. tr. Storia della mistica occidentale, Milan 1995 [I: patristica]); M. Belda, La preghiera continua secondo S. Agostino: Annales theologici 10/2 (1996) 349-379; B. McGinn, Storia della mistica cristiana in Occidente, 1: Le origini (I-V secolo), Genoa1997; var. aus., La preghiera nel tardo antico. Dalle origini ad Agostino, XXVII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, SEA 66, Rome 1999; M.M. Campelo, San Augustín y el Padrenuestro: Augustinus 45 (2000) 35-89; S. Pricoco - M. Simonetti, La preghiera dei cristiani, Milan 2000.

A. Hamman

PREACHING

I. Definition - II. The lexicon: Preaching as proclamation, explanation, exhortation - III. Object - IV. History - V. Forms - VI. Dynamics - VII. Trends in recent studies.

I. Definition. By the term preaching, we mean the oral transmission of the gospel message (kerygma), performed within certain parameters of space (the context of worship in a building) and time (the liturgical celebration) by an authorized representative. Formulated thus, this definition holds starting from the mid-2nd c., when *Justin Martyr discussed a sufficiently uniform phenomenon that he could describe it as such to observers who were unfamiliar with the customs of Christians (see below IV.1).

II. The lexicon: Preaching as proclamation, explanation, exhortation. In the Vulgate, the Latin term praedico usually translates the Greek New Testament's word κηρύσσω, which specifically means to "notify, publicly announce in advance," as does a herald (κῆρυξ). Although the announcement contains in itself the invitation to believe, the content of the proclamation, and the exhortation to change one's behavior as a result, it is a passive act, which does not involve any intervention by the one who fulfills it, inasmuch as that person is simply a speaker in the name of a higher authority whose orders must be obeyed (Friedrich TDNT 3, 687-688). But the herald of the NT has a direct responsibility in the spreading of the message of which he is the relator, and the measure in which he undertakes to demonstrate its truth. Such a demonstration is completed through the explanation of the message: its spokesperson thus becomes its interpreter who teaches the audience how to understand the message in such a way as to be able to adjust to it. Jesus was first mindful of the legacy he wanted to leave behind (Mt 4:23; 9:35: docens [διδάσκων] et praedicans [=κηρύσσων] evangelium regni), inviting the public to believe (Mt 4:17; Jeremias 1972). His apostles did the same following his commandment (Mk 16:15, 20; Acts 8:4-5; Dodd 1936; Wrege, in Klimkeit et al. 1997; Ghidelli, in Sodi-Triacca 2002) as did *Paul (Acts 9:20; Mounce 1999; Heriban, in Sodi-Triacca 2002). Since the NT, preaching was therefore at the same time the (oral) message of an event, an explanation of the proclaimed event and the exhortation to live accordingly.

This triple meaning is reflected in the lexicon used in ancient times to describe the act of preaching (Bardy 1946; Mohrmann, in Id. 1961, II; Olivar 1991, 487-514). In addition to the term κήρυγμα (verb κηρύσσω), which continued to mark the aspect of public proclamation, the Greek terms διδασκαλία and διδαχή (from the verb διδάσκω; the verb μανθάνω from Mt 28:19-20 had no continuation) and the Latin terms tractatus (verb tractare) and—more rarely—expositio and enarratio emphasize the aspect of teaching, i.e., explanation, which is more appropriately κατήχησις (Lat. cathechesis*) when it corresponds to the preliminary instruction held in preparation for *baptism. The terms ἐπιτίμησις, παραίνεσις, πρό(σ)κλησις, παράκλησις, (Lat. admonitio, commonitio, exhortatio, consolatio, increpatio, castigatio) constitute, however, other similar inflections of the exhortatory meaning of preaching. There then exists a series of generic terms that allude to the rhetorical form in which preaching was manifested (e.g., λόγος, διάλεξις, ὁμιλία; Lat. declamatio, disputatio, homilia, sermo), some of which tended to acquire a technical character (esp. ὁμιλία, soon supplanted by λόγος; homilia and sermo recall the original colloquial rather than formal nature of preaching). The Latin term praedico, from which the verbs and corresponding substantives of the chief modern Western languages derived, gained the upper hand over the others only in the Early Middle Ages. In scientific literature, the term homily was often used in reference to sermons in which exegetical interest prevailed, while the term sermon was used in reference to sermons on a theme. Here we shall use both terms as synonyms for preaching.

III. Object. In the NT the objective event of the message is substantiated by the messianic promises in Jesus, a sign of the approaching end of times and the kingdom of God (Mt 10:7). That Jesus was the Messiah expected by Israel is what Jesus himself preached, applying to his person the passage from Is 61:1-4, read in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4:16-21). The *apostles and *Paul did the same (Acts 9:20; 10:42-43). The difference is naturally in perspective: Jesus read the Hebrew *Scriptures in relation to himself, the *apostles read in relation to Jesus. With their work, preaching became, therefore, a discourse on Jesus—on Jesus the Messiah, but also on his life and teachings, that which makes apostolic preaching simultaneously a theological discourse (christological) and an exhortation to a precise code of conduct: what befits the members of the community of the faithful who had become such through the right of passage in baptism (Mt 28:19-20). During the time of the apostles, this speech was based on the oral testimony of the one who delivered it (Acts 4:20), then put in writing (Jn 20:30; 21:24-25), and eventually transmitted to and reproduced by third-party recipients (Lk 1:1-4). After the apostolic and postapostolic age (when the disciples of the apostles were working and still able to report firsthand information on Jesus, as, e.g., *Polycarp did in Eus., HE 5,20,6), this slowly tended to become, more properly speaking, a discourse on Jesus revealed from documents that collected the memories considered most reliable concerning the Teacher, and which progressively and unharmoniously—and in competition with alternative traditions—came together in the course of the 2nd c. in the NT canon. From that point onward, preaching consisted of exegesis of these documents, in the light of which, from that point on, the Hebrew Scriptures were also understood.

We do not know exactly when sermons began to treat contemporary issues, however, but it seems to have happened rather early. Already, Jesus made known his judgment on various issues of this sort (e.g., Mt 22:17-18, on the theme of political Messianism), although it is difficult to believe that burning questions such as the coexistence of Jewish and Gentile Christians were not dealt with in the context of preaching (e.g., 1 Cor 8–11). In any case, the issues tied to the public and private life of Christians (which a text such as 1 Corinthians treats extensively) in time became increasingly present in homilies—*Origen's homilies show this well, even though they are primarily exegetical in character—and acquired an important role after the Constantinian conversion.

IV. History. 1. The first three c. From the beginning, Christian preaching looked very much like that practiced in the *synagogue during Jesus' time, which provided for the public reading and explanation of a passage from the Torah and the prophets (e.g., in Klimkeit et al. 1997; Old 1998, I, 94-105; 113-180; Carucci, in Sodi-Triacca 2002) on specific days of the week (certainly the *sabbath, perhaps also Monday and Thursday) and on the occasion of the feasts. Jesus himself read and explained the passage of Is 61:1-4, in the synagogue of Nazareth (on the sabbath) (see above III). The apostles and Paul intended to maintain the same practice (Acts 15:21), even if, from the formal point of view, their preaching openly reflected the influence of argumentative techniques of the rhetorical and philosophical schools, and in particular diatribe (Bultmann 1984; Marrou 1957; Stewart-Sykes 2001, 39-79). At this level, preaching in certain places and set times was not strictly binding—Jesus taught in the *temple and in the synagogues (Jn 18:20), but not exclusively, nor preferably, nor did he only do it at preset times; the apostles also worked in this way (Acts 5:20 vs. Acts 10:1ff.), as did Paul (Acts 17:17 vs. Acts 17:19). Nevertheless, the synagogue's practice seems to have conditioned the spatial and temporal coordinates of Christian preaching that eventually developed in specific times and places. This happened as early as the mid-2nd c.: "And on the day called Sunday [Day of the Sun], all who live in cities or in the country gather together to one place, and the memories of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read, as long as time permits; then, when the reader has ceased, the president verbally instructs, and exhorts to the imitation of these good things. Then we all rise together and pray" (Justin, 1 Apol. 67,3-5).

On the basis of this passage from the Prima Apologia of Justin, written at Rome around AD 150, preaching was held in the ekklēsia—a term indicating the assembly of the faithful as well as the place in which they gathered. The gatherings (συνέλευσις) were periodic (they took place weekly: on the "Day of the Sun" = *Sunday) and scheduled the reading of the "New Testament" passage ("the memories of the apostles") and/or a prophetic passage ("the writings of the prophets," an expression, however, that could refer to the entire OT). A speech (λόγος) followed this reading, delivered by the one who presided over the assembly (προεστώς), and consisting of an explanation of the text just read (νουθεσία) and an exhortatio (πρόκλησις), which was held after the community prayer (Cattaneo 1997, 314-318; Old 1998, I, 265-269). The analogies with the worship service in the synagogue are obvious, but on the other hand, the differences are also obvious. The most important difference is that Christian preaching took place in the context of worship: a celebration of the eucharistic *liturgy, which is the very reason why the ekklēsia was gathered (1 Apol., 65,2-5; 67,5). Despite the lack of sources, it is very likely that such a differentiation dates back to the apostolic age. In Acts 20:7-12, in fact, we see Paul meeting on Sunday ("the first day of the week"), along with the faithful of Troas, in a private home "to break bread," and to deliver a speech that lasted till sunrise—even if this speech did not also make room for a preliminary reading of the sacred text.

We are unable to determine if and to what extent Justin's description reflects a widespread and common practice. The fact that it is found in an apologetic document, crafted in order to give Christianity a homogenous image for the benefit of skeptic observers, can lead one to suspect that it is a simplification. Nevertheless, one such text is the so-called Second Letter of ps.-*Clement of Rome (see Eus., HE 3,38,4) which should be placed in the context of *Syria or *Egypt (less likely is *Rome or *Corinth) sometime before or after AD 150, if, as it appears, it was originally a homily. It provides a specific comparison to Justin's description because the author addresses an audience of "brothers and sisters" using an exhortation (ἔντευξις) that takes as its cue the exegesis of a scriptural passage read shortly before, which in this case seems to be Is 54–66 (Baasland 1993; Stewart-Sykes 2001, 174-186; Bergamelli, in Sodi-Triacca 2002). Moreover, nearly 40 years after Justin, *Tertullian provided a similar picture of *Carthage (Old 1998, I, 269-273): in 197 (Apol. 39,3-4) and then again in 210—in reference, here, to the procedure in use in the *Montanist church (Anim. 9,4). Starting from this point, preaching assumed a specific meaning in the worship service: it consisted in the oral transmission of the kerygma through preaching, namely through the homily.

Justin and Tertullian's testimony are of utmost importance for us not only because they illuminate the nature and dynamics of the preaching cultivated in a very ancient period, but also because they allow us to understand the cultural meaning of that preaching. In fact, their testimony represents a truly defining moment in which the followers of the new faith reaffirmed their own adherence to it (Tertull., Apol. 39,1.3). The regularity of the gatherings, moreover, assures us of a continuity of relation between the preacher and the audience of the faithful, which is very exceptional when compared to other events of the spoken word in the ancient world—with the exception of the preaching in the synagogue—a continuity that with time would become a formidable instrument of cohesion for the community conquered for Christianity. The Emperor *Julian (361–363) would show that he was quite aware of this fact, when, in his attempt to build a "*pagan church" to oppose the Christian one, acc. to his detractors, he specifically wanted to make sure that his "clergy"—hierarchically sitting on raised "platforms" (see below VI.5.b)—regularly held "readings and explanations of Hellenic teachings" (Greg. Naz., Or. 4,111; Soz., HE 5,16,2-4).

Julian's plan used as a model a reality that, over the course of two centuries, had evolved enormously to the point of becoming widespread. In effect, already from the time of Justin's Apologia to 50 years after Tertullian's Apologeticum, preaching decisively intensified its rhythms over a two-century time span. During *Cyprian's time, e.g., the church lector read "the precepts and the gospel of the Lord" on a daily (cotidie) basis, i.e., "everyday" (Ep. 39,4,1). We do not know if there was a sermon after this daily reading: Cyprian himself, when a *presbyter, did not preach on a daily basis but "often" (Pont., V. Cypr. 3,5: sermo usitatus), although Origen, when a presbyter in *Caesarea Palestine (ca. 231–251) during the decade 238–248, preached "almost every day" (Pamph., Apol. pro Orig. 9,6-7: paene cotidie). That notwithstanding, it is evident that, at least in certain churches, preaching was no longer limited to the Sunday sermon, as was the case during Justin's time. Origen's material has allowed scholars to determine that during this period sermons were delivered not only with the celebration of the *Eucharist (Friday and Sunday), but also without the eucharistic celebration (on other days of the week in the morning, before work activities) (Grappone 2001b).

The quantitative effects of this acceleration were impressive as early as the 3rd c. Unfortunately, none of Cyprian's sermons have survived—even if, as in the case of Ambrose later, it seems that many of the bishop of Carthage's treatises were originally homilies. From Origen, however, there remain at least 262 homilies (considering the 59 Homilies on the Psalms, whose authorship is contested by scholars), 21 of which are in the original Greek text and the rest in Latin translation. With these sermons, the Alexandrian nearly monopolized the homiletical scene of the first three centuries: but Origen's extant sermons are just a little more than the 500 sermons known to Jerome (Ep. 33,4), which in turn only reflect in part the prodigious effort of this preacher in his almost 20 years of activity (Monaci Castagno 1988; Old 1998, I, 306-352; Monaci Castagno, in Sodi-Triacca 2002). In the following century, such figures were destined to grow even more, in proportion to the subsequent intensification of the frequency in preaching (see below VI. 3).

Among the results of such zeal, one in particular deserves to be mentioned: the fact that the preacher became the voice most heard in the public arena, much more so than any other of the public figures obliged to speak in the city. Not soon after the new faith obtained the recognition of religio licita, preaching transformed into an extraordinary means for influencing public opinion and, with that, became an exceptional political weapon which no one—as Julian understood so well—could afford to ignore (see, e.g., Bas., Hex. 7,6,65-68: Basil's audience was encouraged to discuss at dinner the topics treated by the bishop in two [!] homilies delivered during the course of the day: and also Caes. Arles., Serm. 74,4; 198,5). Preaching had even greater influence when—directly or through translators—it took place in local dialects, rather than only in the learned languages of the empire, thus reaching an even wider audience, as occurred in *Egypt, *Syria and Palestine from the early years of the 4th c. (see Passio S. Procopii Lectoris, 2, in AASS 8 Julii, II, 556 D; Egeria, Itin. 47,3-4; Theodoret, HE 5,30; Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 123, 8,12-13; Olivar 1991, 890-901).

Origen's abundant homiletic production provides us a photograph of Christian preaching more than that given by Justin's brief description for the preceding century. The succession of liturgical acts in which the preacher's discourse was placed is the same that was observed in the church of Rome in 150: following the reading of a biblical passage (probably just one) by a reader (so too in Cyprian's Carthage: see above) an explanation of the reading itself was given by a preacher surrounded by other members of the clergy, in turn followed by a community prayer (with hands lifted) of the standing faithful. There existed, however, an order of biblical readings—even if scholars still discuss which exactly—that consisted of a complete reading or extensive excerpts of scriptural books toward which the preaching was directed (Grappone 2001a; see later Bas., Hom. 3,1; 6,1: PG 31, 200 B; 261 B; Const. App. 2,57,5-8).

The homilies of Origen were primarily exegetical. Therefore they fully reflect the original meaning of preaching. The same was the case for his contemporary *Hippolytus (Old 1998, I, 273-277; Stewart-Sykes 2001, 249-257). This characteristic is probably explained in light of the fact that the efforts of the church of the first three centuries were directed precisely toward reaching a satisfactory formulation of the message of which it considered itself the guardian, esp. in the face of the objections by Jews and pagans, and in an atmosphere of strong competition ad intra for the primacy of this formulation. Origen also began, however, to discuss questions of social and institutional interest (Fatti 2004a), conferring on his own preaching a public function that would find its fullest expression beginning with the Constantinian century.

2. The 4th-c. turn. *Constantine signifies the transformation of Christianity into a religion of the emperor, an event destined to radically change Western history and with it the fate of preaching. Above all, quantitatively speaking, the Constantinian turn in fact led to the increasing spread of Christianity into society, both horizontally and vertically. There was also a proportional increase in the number of churches where the liturgy was celebrated and sermons were delivered. More churches or, better yet, more places of worship—alongside the traditional ones—led to an increase at least of the sanctuaries of the *martyrs, the martyria. These were more suited for the liturgical office and, therefore, required more preachers. The quantitative increase of preaching, however, was owed also to the increased social visibility of those who were in charge of it, and were, in the first place, *bishops. After Constantine, the Christian bishop—definitively recognized as the chief authority of the church and, with that, the official interlocutor of the state—became a public figure, held as having the prerogative to speak up not only in homilies but every time his new responsibilities required it. The multiplication of instances in which he was called upon to speak made him a more sought after and sophisticated preacher: rather than only the head of a religious community, he was now the spokesperson of the city, deeply immersed in the life of the empire.

Such a change inevitably weighed upon the contents and the quality of preaching. Although it continued to preserve its specificity in the measure to which it remained tied to the liturgy, the evolution of the preacher's role diversified his interests, forcing him to focus not only on the Word read in the church, but also on current events. Preaching now increasingly discussed social or political problems more or less urgent. What comes to mind, in the first case, are the homilies devoted to the great questions of collective interest such as the good use of riches (Mara 1980) or particular events such as natural disasters (famines, earthquakes, epidemics etc.: e.g., Severus of Antioch, Hom. 19). Second, there were the sermons held on the occasion of the events tied to public life such as the very famous series Homilies on the Statues delivered by *John Chrysostom at *Antioch after the famous incident of 387 (CPG Suppl. 4330). Moreover, thematic sermons increased, which, together with traditional exegetical homilies, ended up in the first homilies crafted for supplying the preacher a range of arguments to address (see below IV. 3). The same traditional exegetical sermon, moreover, changed in significance. From the moment in which the one who was responsible to preach was no longer simply the guide of a "sect" (Acts 24:14), but a representative of the emperor's religion, his words always had political weight, even when they pertained to topics restricted to doctrine. The doctrinal controversies were certainly not novelties of the 4th c. They were born from disagreements on the interpretation of Jesus' message that dated back to the apostolic age. But after Constantine, they were no longer in-house debates (ad intra). Constantine wanted to have at his service a united church, capable of satisfying the religious and ideological needs of an empire with one leader (see *church and empire). In fact, these debates transformed the doctrinal conflict into a political conflict. The fact that the *Arian crisis, which marked the entire 4th c., began from the preaching of a dissident presbyter, is a sign that the new meaning acquired by this activity was no longer merely speculative.

The preachers, who had by that time become public figures, moreover, were immersed in a web of social and political relationships that now conditioned them more deeply than in the past. Preaching became an excellent instrument for solidifying bonds between churches and also for breaking them. There was also the custom of inviting speakers of proven ability—usually on special occasions: liturgical feasts or events governed by a specific ritual, such as the feasts of the martyrs—preachers different from those who served the local community that provided the invitation. In reality, it was an ancient practice, because Origen had already been called outside Caesarea to preach (e.g., Eus., HE 6,27); by the 4th c. it ceased to be exceptional and became customary. Such a custom represented an opportunity for voices different from that of the local bishop, or one of his trusted preachers, to make their own point of view known. We must imagine that, as in the case of Origen, such an opportunity was usually taken advantage of by all the parties involved. Invited in 361 to Constantinople by Eudoxius of *Antioch, on the occasion of the *Epiphany, the *Anomoian leader *Eunomius of Cyzicus, in fact, launched into an audacious, *subordinationist interpretation of the account of the birth of Jesus, capitalizing on the political-doctrinal front in which he battled, even against Eudoxius, the bishop of the capital (Philost., HE 6,2). Nearly a century and a half later, *Severus of Antioch, a guest at Cyrrhus during his second year as bishop (Nov. 513–514), took the opportunity to thank the Bishop *Sergius, thus enforcing the perfect cooperation between the two *cathedra (Hom. 58: PO 8, 214-215 [100-101]). At times, however, giving the floor to a guest preacher could turn out to be counterproductive, exposing oneself to unforeseen attacks damaging the hosting see: one thinks of the case of *Epiphanius of Salamis, imprudently invited for the *Easter of 393 by *John of Jerusalem, who was awarded the accusation of *Origenism by Epiphanius (Jerome, C. Io. Hier. 11,1-5).

The new, complex gamut of meanings acquired by preaching explains the qualitative transformation that now went against it. Precisely because they were public figures, preachers were now exposed to a much wider audience that was more attentive and demanding than in the past. By this point, it was not enough that the sermon explain and exhort, it also had to be pleasing and at times displeasing. And this was a time in which the public "did not look for priests, but orators" (Greg. Naz., Or. 42,24,24-25), namely, teachers who knew how to speak to win public opinion and obtain its support. Having arrived in Milan—in time to deliver in the presence of the emperor *Valentinian II, the *panegyric for the consulate of the magister militum Bautus, 1 January 385—the young African orator *Augustine understood what his path would be by listening to Bishop *Ambrose preach; the suavitas of his sermo prevailed over the funny and captivating tones of *Faustus the *Manichean (Conf. 5,13,23).

Once he became the bishop of the city of *Hippo, he remained deeply convinced of the importance of knowing how to preach well—even if afterward, for reasons of clarity, he decided to preach in a colloquial style, aware of the need for adjusting to the level of the very diverse audience that attended his sermons (Enarr. in Ps. 119, 2,29 [CCSL 40, 1778]: Sic loquimur, ut capere possitis ["we speak in such a way so that you can understand"]): when the audience objected that Scripture discouraged the use of many words (misunderstanding the sense of multiloquim in Prov 10:19), he responded that the need for the audience to understand did not prevent one from expressing oneself ex multa eloquentia (C. Cresc. 1,1,2: PL 43, 447), and gave concrete demonstration of that by ably handling the ornamenta of the arts and willingly having recourse to the rhythmic clausulae (Aug., De doctr. christ. 4,20,41; Brennan 1947; Mohrmann 1961, I; Oberhelman 1991; Mühlenberg, in Mühlenberg - van Oort 1994; and moreover Memoli 1969; Massa 1991; Romano 2005). To act otherwise would have left a bad impression on the increasingly competent listeners present in the audience, risking compromising the success of the sermon. When using everyday language (pedestri sermone), *Cesarius of Arles therefore felt the need to excuse himself before an audience he knew full well was not lacking eruditae aures (Caes. Arles, Serm. 86,1: CCSL 103, 353; Bona 2000). *Avitus of Vienne, on one occasion during a sermon misspoke; he had to explain himself to an orator (rhetor) who did not appreciate the défaillance (Av. Vienn., Ep. 57 [51], MGH AA 6,2, 85-87). Naturally, it was not merely a purely formal question. Together with the pleasure of exposition, the interests of socially elevated and intellectually refined urban classes came into play; only the circumspect sermon was able to placate their cultural demands, thus guaranteeing for the church their attention and consent. It is, therefore, not without reason that a man of Ambrose's caliber did not tire in reiterating the importance for good exercise of pastoral activity in the exercise of quality preaching (Lizzi 1989, 42-53; Savon 1999).

From the moment that people could hear examples of rhetorical skill, the church became a place of entertainment, in competition with the other equally attractive locations such as the hippodrome, the circus, the civic festivals or the theater (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 80, 23 [CCSL 39, 1135]; Pasquato 1976). The circumstances for which such attractions were heavily criticized by particularly learned preachers such as *John Chrysostom established the fact that there were those who were aware of being able to offer an equally pleasing spectacle (see, e.g., Chrys., Pan. Juln. 4: PG 50, 673, 43-45: "What is more pleasing than the spiritual theater?" This was a point well understood by ps.-Mart. Ant., Pan. 4,20-24; 31,12-13 Wallraff). The same awareness lies at the heart of the controversy against the customs of the "outside" rhetoricians, whom the Christian preachers willingly humored, esp. when they challenged them with the kinds of speeches that were similar to those in use in the pagan city—e.g., the encomia (this was the case with, to give just a few famous names, the Cappadocians, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Severus of Antioch, but also *Quodvultdeus and *Zeno of Verona). Without considering that such a controversy was explained at times more in light of specific concerns than general convictions (Fatti 2004b), it does not at all exclude the idea of the pleasure gained from hearing Christian preaching, which was delivered in such a way as to never lose sight of public tastes (the preacher's predilection for applause provides an eloquent demonstration: see below VI.6.c).

To be able to satisfy similar tastes, the right tools were needed. The new preachers therefore went to the schools of *rhetoric. From the mid-3rd c., the increase of professions to the new faith and the attention paid to its heralds (see, e.g., Orig., Hom. Num. 13,7; Hom. Jer. 4,3) yielded significant results. Before entering the church, Cyprian obtained an excellent formation in the studia and the bonae artes that guaranteed him that eloquentiae larga fecunditas ("broad fecundity of eloquence") for which he was forever famous (Pont., V. Cypr. 1,1; 2,2). For his part, the bishop of Antioch *Paul of Samosata preferred to consider himself a sophist more than a bishop: the success he won in the "ecclesiastical assemblies" was enormous, and it took a presbyter, an orator by profession named *Malchion, who was eventually able to expel him from the church at an episcopal synod (Eus., HE 7,29,2; 32,9; Navascués 2004).

Starting from the 4th c., men such as Paul of Samosata or his opposition were no longer an exception to the rule. The new preachers—at the very least, those who were able (see Rapp 2005, 173-183)—went to study in the prestigious universities of the Mediterranean world such as *Athens, *Alexandria, Beirut, Rome and *Bordeaux. Before speaking from the church's cathedra, many had already done so from the one in the school, having previously worked as university teachers (one thinks of *Gregory of Nazianzus and Augustine), without the passage from the old to the new activity involving very deep rifts. Sometimes the very young students who attended the didaskaleia of *Caesarea would go to the homilies of Basil, and free from the weight of the teachers, would take advantage of the opportunity to make noise, but also to listen to a quality performance (Bas., Hom. 8,3: PG 31, 309 C). In congratulating one of his promising students—*Amphilochius appointed bishop of Iconium in 373/374—the demanding professor of rhetoric *Libanius was convinced that the election would allow the young man to unleash all his oratorical ability with which he had been gifted (Lib., Ep. 1543 Foerster); however, with regard to his best student, *John Chrysostom, Libanius admitted, on his deathbed, that he would have been his most worthy successor had not the Christians stolen him (Soz., HE 8,2,2.5). After Constantine, a quality education guaranteed success in a career that was becoming more coveted and pursued in an atmosphere of growing competition. The great doctrinal controversies, beginning with the *Arian crisis, always wounded the church deeply; there was also an increasing number of struggles for power in the church. Winning and maintaining an episcopal cathedra certainly continued to depend on one's competence in using *Scripture which was the basis on which, as in the past, debates were held; but it also depended on how much one was able to please public opinion both at the local and international level. Rival preachers, skilled in speaking, gave the apostle Paul a hard time when they reproached him for his simplicity of language and his meager ability in persuasion (1 Cor 2:1-5; 2 Cor 11:5-6; Litfin 1994). Later on, Paul of Samosata came to the point of making jokes about the pure and simple "interpreters of the word," vaunting his own ability to excite the crowd over their own which he considered a disgrace (Eus., HE 7,30,9). A century later, the danger of being caught up by the success of competitors—who hurried into church "to flatter the audience, thinking not about the cure of the *soul, but only the beauty of words" (ps.-Athan., Sem. 4: PG 28, 149 A 8-10), and to thus appear to procure the public's approval—had by then become frequent enough that preachers who wanted to avert such danger were counseled to find time for adequate preparation.

The suspicion with which certain people still looked upon eloquence revealed that there was increasing risk in this area. In the years of his debut as presbyter at *Caesarea Cappadocia, *Basil knew that among his listeners envious detractors from those "exegetes of the sacred words" were hiding who, like Basil, drew admiration "because of the wisdom and power of their speeches" (Hom. 11,1.5: PG 31, 373 A; 384 A). Such detractors were not just anyone; they were competing sacred orators. Gregory of Nazianzus's irritation with the rhetorical skill (Orr. 27,2,14: τεχνύδριον; 29,21,18; 31,18,18: τεχνολογία) of *Eunomius—who, in order to shock, did not hesitate to call into question the perpetual virginity of *Mary (Philost., HE 6,2)—well expresses the never assuaged fears of a successful preacher threatened by a formidable rival, who, also after having been declared outside the law by the emperor *Theodosius (CTh 16,5,6, of January 381), still knew how to draw the leader's curiosity (Soz., HE 7,6,3; Philost., HE 9,8). The same can be said for the concerns harbored 50 years earlier by the deacon *Ephrem with regard to the presbyter Paulinus, a teacher who taught off-the-cuff and therefore one who had a great hold on the attention of his audience (Genn., Vir. 3). This context of competition also explains the elaboration of a deontology of the preacher, which took into consideration the need for preaching without troubling oneself too much, but also without ignoring entirely the need for pleasing one's hearers (thus already in one of the first "treatises on preaching" listed by Olivar, in Sodi-Triacca 2002, 1221: Augustine's De doctrina christiana, V, of 426).

3. 5th-6th c. In the 5th and 6th c., the quality of preaching did not seriously reflect the political and social changes that, esp. in the West, were of interest to the empire. To the contrary, one perceives a refinement of aesthetic sensibility that was manifested, among other things, with the spreading of a taste for the dramatization of biblical scenes. This occurred in the East where, however, one must keep in mind the predilection, esp. in *Syriac, for rhetoric as a song, for which already during the time of Ephrem the memre and the madrashe were often structured in the same way as true and proper musical pieces, accompanied by instruments such as the harp, and willingly contained the orator's apostrophes to God and scriptural charactes, as well as true and genuine prosopopeias (see Old 1998, II, 249-268); this also occurred in the West (e.g., *Peter Chrysologus; see ibid., 416-424). Far from being an indicator of a lack of originality of thought and therefore a corruption, it is obvious that such an aestheticizing tendency reflected the ever-increasing sophisticated cultural demands on both the preachers and their audience (Kecskeméti 1994; Allen, in Allen - Cunningham 1998). The cases of poor preaching that were recorded at that time, esp. in the West (*Martin of Braga; see Naldini 1991), should not be generalized, but treated rather as local phenomena in space and time. Very talented homilists such as *Sidonius Apollinaris or *Avitus of Vienne remind one of this fact.

On the other hand, it is true that one notices the clear awareness of the existence of a high profile tradition that one is advised to take into account. The example of *Abraham of Ephesus clearly provides a demonstration of this when, in his Homily on the Annunciation 1 (PO 16, 442 [18]) by his own admission, he made use of ancient preachers who, as far as he knew, had treated the same idea before he had: Athanasius, Basil, Gregory (of Nazianzus?), John (Chrysostom), Cyril (of Alexandria) and *Proclus (of Constantinople). The collections of sermons from these homilists, who for the West date back to the beginning of the 5th c. and for the East at least to the 7th c. (Barré - Grégoire 1969), reflect the definitive acquisition of this awareness. Created to supply a range of topics to be treated for various times of the liturgical year, they included the feasts of the saints and the usual celebrations such as episcopal consecrations, funerals, commemorations of the founders of monastic communities, etc. A particularly illuminating example is supplied by the so-called Eusebius Gallicanus collection (Triacca, in Sodi-Triacca 2002)—these sermons make up for the lack of adequate preparation by the preachers, providing them with ideas and arguments—where these were texts that were not just meant to be read or repeated (these are the sermons that *Caesarius of Arles distributed to bishops and presbyters "in France, *Gaul, *Italy and *Spain" [V. Caes., I, 55 Bona] to be used esp. by the parrochiae, namely the countryside churches [Caes. Arles, Serm. 2]. The practice of reciting speeches given by others was already approved by *Augustine [De doctr. christ. 4,29,62]). In the meantime, however, they attest the crystallizing of a tradition in which there was an expectation of preparation, and to do anything less was unacceptable (see Caes. Arles, Serm. 1,15; V. Caes. I, 54).

V. Forms. As shown above, starting from the mid-2nd c., when Justin spoke of it, preaching occurred during the *liturgy: it was therefore a liturgical act (Leclercq 1946; Thümmel, in Mühlenberg 1994). Proceeding from this observation, we distinguish sermons either on the basis of the circumstance in which they were delivered or on the basis of their content.

On the basis of circumstance, there exist Sunday, weekly, festal and *panegyric sermons. The Sunday sermons (at least from mid-2nd c.) and weekly sermons (at least in the mid-3rd c.) were sermons delivered during the liturgies held on these days and, in general, they consisted of an explanation of scriptural passages read during the course of these events (see above IV.1). The festal sermons were delivered on the occasion of major feasts of the liturgical year, first and foremost Easter, which is the first and most important Christian feast (the most ancient Paschal homilies are the Peri Pascha by *Melito of Sardis and the In Sanctum Pascha by ps.-*Hippolytus, to be dated—at least the first—in a *quartodeciman context of Asia Minor from the 2nd half of the 2nd c.: Schröter 1997; Stewart-Sykes 1998; 2001, 221-232; Visonà, in Sodi-Triacca 2002). The panegyric sermons, however, were delivered during the minor feasts of the liturgical year, in which, following a specific calendar that could vary from church to church (van de Paverd 1970; Saxer 1980; Old 1998, II, 95-105) there was a commemoration of a saint, martyr or a significant deceased person—usually a bishop—or the consecration of a priest or bishop, or the anniversary of such an event. In these cases, the sermon tended to privilege the topic that provided the reason for the festive occasion and often assumed formal traits of the *panegyric speech from the non-Christian tradition.

On the basis of content, there were gospel, *catechetical, *mystagogical, *exegetical, thematic and event-based sermons. The gospel sermons were precisely those that transmitted the gospel message, with the specific objective of winning over non-believers (Moreno 1986, 2058 [par. 3]). In effect, almost all the sermons were gospel-oriented, inasmuch as every sermon tended to reinforce the chief contents of the faith, irrespective of whether the recipient belonged or did not belong to the Christian community. When such content was presented within the framework of the preparatory instruction delivered to *catechumens aspiring to *baptism—in the 4th c., baptism was usually conferred during the Easter vigil—scholars generally speak of them as catechetical sermons, normally given during Lent; they became mystagogical sermons if they were directed toward neophytes as their objective was to deepen the understanding of the mysteries that were to be received usually during the week following Easter. The opportunity finally presents itself to mention the most well-known sermons, which are also the most ancient (but *Tertullian's De baptismo echoes the catechetical preaching of the church of Carthage of the 2nd-3rd c.): the 19 catechetical homilies (18 preceded by a general instruction) of *Cyril of Jerusalem, held in 348, and the 8 Mystagogical Homilies of the same Cyril or his successor *John of Jerusalem (Old 1998, II, 3-32). The others are by John Chrysostom, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, Ambrose, Augustine, although Cyril's collection of homilies finds its Western counterpart in *Gaudentius of Brescia's Tractatus, originally composed for catechumens and then gathered into a corpus (Tract., praef.). Because the proclamation of the kerygma (gospel) was based on the reading and the explanation of sacred texts, all sermons naturally tended to acquire an exegetical character. We, however, shall define exegetical sermons, properly speaking, as those in which such a characteristic dominates over every other interest. In the same way, we will call thematic sermons those in which the exegesis of the text read in the church became a pretext to discuss ethical or contemporary topics. One particular case of thematic preaching treats recent events that had immediate repercussions on the life of the community (a political event, natural disaster and the like). In this case, we shall speak of event-based sermons.

VI. Dynamics. 1. The locations of preaching. It has been said that in the *Judaism of the NT period, preaching usually took place in the synagogue (see above IV.1). Jesus, the apostles and Paul held to this custom. Nevertheless, they did not lose an opportunity to preach elsewhere: in private homes (Acts 10:6, 22ff.; Rom 16: 3, 5)—or in specific places within homes (Acts 20:7-9)—and even in public. Little by little, private homes seem to have become the privileged place for apostolic preaching as a result of the mother religion's becoming rigid toward the new "sect" that had emerged from within it: these were the first Christian homes, namely, the first locales of the communities won over to the gospel message which, from the apostles onward, Christians used for their preaching (Stewart-Sykes 2001, 91-140). It was possibly the case that a home of this type was the gathering place for the Christian assembly described by *Justin Martyr (see above IV.1; and also Stewart-Sykes 2001, 241-244). It was still a mobile location because Justin himself (Acta Iustini 3), though indicating his own home as the place of gathering for the Christians of Rome, affirmed that they met "wherever any person was able or desired to meet." In any case, we must imagine locations already suitable for the needs of the ritual that was already on the way to definition, because the location reserved for the assembly described in 1 Apol.—in which the sermon was held—is clearly distinct from that one intended for baptism, acc. to a layout one finds, e.g., in the house-church of *Dura Europos, from the beginning of the 3rd c. (Serra 2006). The domus ecclesiae at Dura demonstrates, on the other hand, that at this time that there already existed established locations for worship (for a similar situation at Alexandria, see Martin 2006, 51-52).

Alongside the house-church, from the 3rd c. onward, however, independent architectural spaces begin to emerge. Spaces of this type were either "large buildings" devoted to Christian worship, that the philosopher *Porphyry noticed with disappointment, emerging from the heart of the city (Adv. chr. fr. 76), or the "large and full" churches of which *Eusebius speaks (HE 8,1,1-5), referring to the 50-year period preceding the *Diocletian *persecution (Krautheimer 1986, 9ff.). Similar large spaces are perhaps indicated where Origen preached, who, in order to address a large and restless crowd (Hom. Ex. 13,2), had to deliver his sermon in a location sufficiently large to host it. Although the custom of preaching in private homes did not completely vanish (see C. Gangr. can. 6; Possid., V. Aug. 7,1), from this point onward, the sermon was delivered primarily in church buildings—beginning with Constantine, certainly autonomous and monumental—in the context of the liturgy.

Particular sectors of the church building—if not, properly speaking, architectural structures independent from one another—were reserved for sermons held on special occasions. In the 4th c., the catechumens received instruction in the vestibule of the baptistery (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 19,2: τὸν προαύλιον τοῦ βαπτιστηρίου οἴκον), e.g., which was perceived to be a separate place (Testini 1980, 619-638).

After Constantine, a martyrion dedicated to the memory of the martyr was added to the church and baptistery. The fruit of a cult that dates back at least to the 2nd half of the 2nd c., and whose origin from the mid-3rd c. included a eucharistic liturgy (Cypr., Ep. 12,2,1), in the 4th c. it was the usual place for the homily which, under the form of a panegyric, was held on the occasion of the feast commemorating the martyr (Testini 1980, 129-139; 607-612). At times insufficient to hold the audience (Greg. Nyss., Mart. Ia [Gregorii Nysseni opera 10,1,137] and Mart. Ib [ibid. 145-146]), it could not be its own autonomous structure but was part of a more developed architectural complex such as the martyrion that was included in the *Basileiad, the hospital city established by *Basil at Caesarea around the year 370 (Bas., Ep. 176,20-21; Greg. Nyss., Laus Bas. (21) [ibid. 127]).

Sermons housed outside the ordinary places of worship, e.g., in the open, were contested as inefficacious. In the 4th c., they were the result of emerging situations, e.g., *schisms that divided individual churches (as in the case of Basil, Ep. 240,18-21). Conversely, the titles and at times the content of many sermons of John Chrysostom, Augustine, Severus of Antioch, *Hesychius of Jerusalem, *Leo the Great and others supply us with extremely useful pieces of information in determining the Christian topography of some of the chief cities of the empire by specifying the church or the martyrion where they were delivered (Allen - Mayer 1997; Mayer 2005, 315-473).

2. The occasions. 2.a. The time of preaching. Because the sermon is a liturgical act, there was preaching every time there was a liturgy (see above V; and moreover Olivar 1991, 641-645). The chief liturgy was held on Sunday. This was the proper occasion of preaching from the time of Justin and Tertullian (see above IV. 1). Origen preached on Sunday. The sermons attended by *Egeria, at Jerusalem, took place on Sunday. John Chrysostom, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, but also *Maximus of Turin, Leo the Great and Caesarius of Arles would preach on Sunday.

Similarly, the great feasts of the liturgical year were also important events; the greater part of them at the end of the 4th c. found a definite place on the calendar (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 80, 23, notes that they must meet at a specific time; while the Armenian Lectionary of Jerusalem [Renoux 1969–1971], that reflected the customs of the local church for the years 417–439, reports the object of each feast, precisely indicating the place, date and, at times, the hours of the liturgical station: the homilies of the contemporary Hesychius are easily inserted onto this calendar [Aubineau 1978–1980; Old 1998, II, 125-166]). It even actually seems that these times progressively acquired such a relevance as to be reserved for the bishop: Leo the Great, e.g.—the first pope whose sermons have survived—preached on the solemnities but not on the ordinary Sundays; this is why his contemporary *Sozomen (HE 7,19,5) was able to believe that the Roman pope did not preach at all. The bishops to whom Caesarius sent that encyclical letter on preaching, which is Sermon 1, did the same, preaching solum in maioribus festivitatibus (Caes. Arles, Serm. 1,10,3 [SC 175]). We know that the most well known of these feast days was already Easter, around which other heavily liturgical moments clustered: *Lent was filled with the instruction of the *catechumens, culminating in the Sunday of the Octave (cf. Cyr. H., Procatech. 11: "Do not think that these homilies are like the usual ones"); the week of Easter was filled with instruction for *neophytes, culminating in the Sunday of the Octave; *Pentecost (concerning which, see Schröter 1996) was observed in defined areas (Syria, Asia Minor, Constantinople, Cyprus, N *Italy), and within a circumscribed period (5th-7th c.) (Drobner 1993). The importance connected to such movements is proved by the fact that during these times preachers came to preach every day, even two times a day (see below VI.3), and the one who usually preached was the bishop. Gregory senior, father of Gregory of Nazianzus, on one occasion wanted to celebrate the Paschal mystery in person at all costs, though being gravely ill; and the Sunday of the Octave, "the first Sunday after that of the resurrection," having recovered, he presided again at the solemn liturgy with the entire clergy (Greg. Naz., Or. 18,29: PG 35, 1020-1021).

In addition to Sunday and the feasts, starting around the mid-3rd c., homilies were also delivered during the course of the week (see above IV.1). Origen, who acc. to *Pamphilus preached almost daily (paene cotidie), acc. to *Socrates (HE 5,22,45-46) preached specifically every Wednesday and Friday. Jerome and Leo the Great likewise preached Wednesday and Friday—unless they were preaching for the annual collection of 10 November (which could equally fall on Friday, Tuesday or Saturday: see Montanari 1999), and they also preached on important occasions. *John Chrysostom also preached on Monday; Severus of Antioch preached on Saturday (but also on other days, "if there is the commemoration of some saint": Bas., Ep. 93, on which see Voicu 1995; see Const. App. 8,33,2); Augustine preached on Saturday and also Thursday. *Gregory the Great's Homilies on Ezekiel were preached on weekdays.

With regard to the panegyrics, see the discussion above in section V.

2.b. The hour of preaching. The homily was usually given in the morning, but also in the evening—in this case, without the eucharistic celebration—on weekdays, before and after work. During Lent, Basil preached two times a day: morning and evening (Hom. 14 13,1: PG 31, 444 D-445 A; and also Hex. 2,1,1; 8,76; 3,1,17-21; 10,22-25; 7,6,62-63.67-68; 8,2,31-33; 8,30; 9,1,1). "Morning" can also refer to the first sign of the dawn (Chrys., Hom. in Jo. 31,5: PG 59, 182, 21); "evening," shortly before dinnertime (Bas., Hex. 7,6,65-68; 9,6,101-103; Chrys., Hom. in Gen. 8,2: PG 54, 619, 21) or nightfall (Chrys., El. et vid. 1: PG 51, 337, 26). It could also happen, however, that sermons were held even well into the night: usually, during solemnities, as occurred with Hesychius of Jerusalem for an Easter vigil for the early years of the 5th c. (Hesych. H., Serm. 3,1,3; Aubineau 1978–1980, 83-86). At times, there were exceptional circumstances, as was the case for Chrysostom, called upon to preach at midnight upon receiving news of the unexpected visit of the empress *Eudoxia (Chrys., Hom. div. 2, tit. [PG 63, 467, 35-36]).

3. Frequency. Sunday sermons, on a weekly pattern, date back at least to the mid-2nd c. (see above IV.1). One hundred years later, with Origen, sermons were delivered during the week (see above IV.1; VI.2.a). In the 4th c., daily preaching was affirmed in an almost definitive manner—at least during Lent, often during Easter time and around the great feasts such as Christmas and *Epiphany (Olivar 1991, 651-662).

The following church fathers preached on a daily basis: *Eusebius of Emesa, *Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, John Chrysostom, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Maximus of Turin and Caesarius of Arles (who would preach even while he slept [V. Caes. II, 5-6], and whose incessabilis voice was silenced only by death [ibid. II, 32, with Bona 1999]): one gathers this was the case esp. from the internal chronological data within the homilies, where one frequently finds rather eloquent adverbs such as "daily," or rather "yesterday," "today" and "tomorrow" (or similar expressions), indicating the relationship that bound the present sermon to the one proceeding or following. One already finds mention of daily sermons in Origen (Hom. Num. 13,1: Hesterno die dixeramus). They come back in the sermons of Basil of Caesarea (Hom. 7,1: PG 31, 277 C 12: πρώην; Hex. 3,1,5.14.16: χθές . . . σήμερον). Augustine esp. used them quite frequently (Serm. 58,5: quotidie; 73,1: hesterno die et hodie; Enarr. in Ps. 32, 2,29: hodie . . . crastino die.

It is, however, true that such expressions are not always completely accurate. Especially when they referred to the past ("yesterday"), it happens that they could refer in a vague way to a recent time, near without necessarily being the previous day. In one particular instance, e.g., *John Chrysostom intended to use the term (Hom. in Matt. 52,3: PG 58, 522, 33-34.36: λόγον . . . ὃν πρὸ τριῶν ἡμερῶν) in the sense of "three days ago." At other times, it is possible that they were emphatic expressions: "daily" does not necessarily have to mean "everyday" but "frequently," "with regularity," as in the sermons of Augustine, Serm. 58,5: quotidie . . . in dominica oratione. Nevertheless, we have certain examples of sermons held on successive days: such is the case with Augustine's Sermons 111, 23, 53 and 277, delivered at Carthage on January 19, 20, 21 and 22, the year of which we are uncertain (De Bruyne 1931); or some of the Homilies on the Hexameron by Basil of Caesarea, preached, as it seems, from 12-16 February 377 or 378 (Naldini 1990, xvi-xvii); *Gregory of Nyssa's Homilies, one on Christmas, one on St. *Stephen and one on St. *Peter, were delivered on December 25, 26 and 27 of 386 (Bernardi 1968, 290-293). If one adds to these examples precise markers with respect to sermons delivered on consecutive days (Bas., Hom. in Ps. 14/2, 1: PG 29, 264 C-265 A; Chrys., David I, 1: PG 54, 676-677, 4), we can conclude that from the beginning of the 4th c., the use of the daily homily, even though not necessarily universal, was extremely widespread.

The frequency of preaching, in any case, was much more elevated than in the past. On particular liturgical solemnities, sermons were delivered at least one or more times a day. According to the testimony of Egeria, at Jerusalem, during Lent, sermons were held every day (Itin. 46,2). But Basil of Caesarea, for the same feast, preached twice a day, morning and evening (see above VI.2.b). Augustine also preached two times a day (Enarr. in Ps. 88, 2,1); for Easter he even pushed himself to speak three or four times (Lambot 1956). Minor liturgical settings such as funerals (Greg. Nyss., Melet. [Gregorii Nysseni opera 9, 449]) or commemorations of martyrs (Chrys., Pan. Bab. 2: SC 362, 296, 5-7), but likewise ordinary liturgies (see below VI.5.a.), could moreover give place to a series of sermons held by various speakers who spoke in succession. Not one of these examples, however, can be generalized: during holy week, Theodore of Mopsuestia, in fact, preached only on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday (Janeras 1969); although *Proclus of Constantinople preached on Thursday and Holy Friday, the vigil and the Sunday of Easter, and the Sunday of the Octave (Janeras 1980; see Barkhuizen, in Allen - Cunningham 1998).

4. Duration. Very often preachers advised others and themselves to be brief, not to bore the audience, to make the sermon more concise so that it would stick in the memory of the one who heard it (Or., Hom. Gen. 2,6; Hom. Num. 11,8,4; Bas., Hom. in Ps. 1, 6: PG 29, 228 A-B). At times, they were diligent in putting these principles into practice for the reasons adopted or because restricted by factors beyond their control such as other institutional obligations (Bas., Hom. in Ps. 114, 1: PG 29, 481 A-C), or rather—e.g., on the solemnities of the solemn feasts—the length of the ceremony. In general, however, sermons lasted a long time (Olivar 1966; Olivar 1991, 686-721). Evidence of this are the frequent allusions, in authors such as Chrysostom or Augustine, to the preacher's exhaustion (Aug., In Io. tract. 19,20,7-8 [CCSL 36, 202]: iam fatigatus loqui non possum ["now tired, I cannot speak"]; and also Bas., Hex. 7,6,10-12), but esp. to the audience's exhaustion (Chrys., Hom. in Gal. 2:11, 10: PG 51, 380, 3), who had come to expect the preacher's brevity (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 60, 1), and who the needed, therefore, the assurance of the homily's imminent end (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 76, 22,4 [CCSL 39, 1065]: post ipsos duos versus finis erit ["after these two verses, it will be over"]).

Preachers, however, did not stick to one specific rule, but acted acc. to circumstance. They perceived that time limits needed to be respected, evidenced by the fact that they would stop their sermon (Bas., Hom. in Ps. 14/2, 1: PG 29, 264C-265A; Hex. 7,6,10-12). They needed something, however, to remind them. Thus, because Ambrose realized that it was late, he wanted small night birds to come into the church (Ambr., Hex. 5,24,84). At times, it was enough that the audience became restless, perhaps because they had to go do work (Bas., Hex. 3,1,17-21; 10,22-25), or rather because their mealtime was soon approaching (Sev. Ant., Hom. 48. PO 35, 333, 28-337, 5). If, however, that time was still afar off (Aug., Serm. 128,4.6), or perhaps they were preaching during days of fasting (Bas., Hex. 8,8,29-33), the preacher reasserted his boldness and reserved the right to go on longer. The calculations on the sermon's duration, based on the texts that have survived and the allusions of their authors, confirm that the general tendency of most preachers was going in the direction of longer sermons. Eusebius of Emesa (Serm. 21,20 ed. Buytaert) spoke of the brief space of an hour (brevi spatio horae); but when it was time for a speaker of Ambrose's or Augustine's caliber to preach, this could mean that the audience would have to sit for a homily that could last for up to two or more hours.

5. The preacher. 5.a. Identity. In the ancient church, the preacher was a person authorized to preach from the institution that considered itself a dispenser of Jesus' task of preaching. Jesus himself satisfied such a condition (see above IV.1), although his preaching ended soon by the decision of the synagogue. Similarly, the apostles acted in the same way, who, though acting on the basis of their mission from Jesus (Mk 3:14), at the beginning were perfectly integrated into the institutional mechanisms of the Jewish world (Acts 13:14-15). It was precisely the apostles, after all, who arrogated the duty of preaching to themselves and to those to whom they transmitted the mandate that they had received, implicitly establishing that preaching must be a controlled activity, which requires the consent of those who represent the constituted authority to exercise it.

Naturally, that did not stop the fact that there continued to be individuals who asserted that same privilege without apostolic authority. Paul was also necessarily of this type of authorization (Acts 9,26-28); it seems that at least the prophets could preach, still very present in the Christianity of the first two centuries (Cattaneo 1997, 69-78). These individuals, nevertheless, were increasingly marginalized, and the role of the preacher became an exclusive prerogative of the church. It is very indicative that even in the Montanist context described by Tertullian, prophecy was rigorously held as distinct from preaching (Anim. 9,4-5; see Stewart-Sykes 2001, 260-265). Already 50 years before Tertullian, moreover, during the time of Justin Martyr, the preacher was "the one who is in charge of the community" (see above IV.1). Whoever this statement is speaking of, whether a president charged with directing the assembly or already the bishop who was the head of the ekklēsia (Cattaneo 1997, 315-315), it is obvious that the preacher was an institutionally integrated orator. One century later, his role was definitively established in this manner. Now, preaching was a duty, binding by law, of the bishop—as in the time of Cyprian, when the episcopi tractantes were a common reality (Ep. 58,4,1; see Iren., Haer. 3,3,1)—or rather a presbyter authorized by the bishop, as had occurred with Cyprian himself before he sat on the episcopal cathedra or with Origen at Caesarea Palestine and elsewhere. During this period, when a stranger to the institution exercised the preaching ministry, it would cause heated reactions and demanded an explanation. The letter written in this respect by *Alexander of Jerusalem and *Theoctistus of Caesarea to *Demetrius of Alexandria, who accused him of having made Origen preach in their church although he had not yet received priestly orders, demonstrates that the custom of allowing *laypeople to preach (λαικοὺς ὁμιλεῖν) had become an exception, despite the fact that some bishops continued to consider it a permissible practice (Eus., HE 6,19,16-18).

In the 4th c., the practice of allowing presbyters to preach as substitutes for and (usually) in the presence of the bishop was typical, esp. in the East—while in the West it took time to gain approval. There in the East, through the initiative of the presider himself, Basil preached at Caesarea, Cappadocia; John Chrysostom, at Antioch; *Atticus, at Constantinople; Hesychius, at Jerusalem. Augustine also did it at Hippo, but on the personal initiative of Bishop Valerius, who, to silence the criticisms of his African colleagues, had to explain what was perceived to be an innovation by saying that in orientalibus ecclesiis id ex more fieri (Possid., V. Aug. 5,3-4). It was not necessarily the case that such a practice implied that the titulary bishop of the cathedra relinquished his duty altogether (Mayer 2001a). Often, in fact, the bishop preached in the same circumstance in which his commissioned presbyters did. Even during the normal liturgies, the bishop and his presbyters could work together, preaching in succession: usually the bishop preached after they did, as occurred in Jerusalem when Egeria visited (Itin. 25,1) or in the Antioch of John Chrysostom (Chrys., Philogon. 3 [PG 48, 752, 47-50]; see also Const. ap.

2,57,9); at times, however, the bishop preached first, as was the case for Augustine (Serm. 20, at the end [CCSL 41, 261]). At other times, he reserved for himself the most important occasions: Cyprian, who preached already as a presbyter, when bishop, was said to have instructed people only on Sunday (Pont., V. Cypr. 14,5: exhortationibus dominicis), although we have seen how Leo the Great saved himself for the liturgical solemnities (see above VI.2.a).

The opportunity given to presbyters to preach represented, in any case, an opportunity for them to acquire public notoriety and constituted, therefore, a serious risk for a bishop when that occurred at his expense. Therefore, after the serious controversy with Arius, *Alexander of Alexandria took away that opportunity from his priests for good, reserving for himself the ministry in which until that time they had participated (Socr., HE 5,22,58; Soz., HE 7,19,5; see Soz., HE 1,15,12). It seems, however, that Basil, in 363–364, was removed from Caesarea because the success of his preaching displaced Bishop *Eusebius (Bernardi 1968, 58-59; 188 n.5, on the basis of Hom. 11,1.5, cited above IV.2). In the light of such events it is not surprising that a heavily centralized church such as that of Rome—in which even Origen had heard Hippolytus preach (Hier., Vir. 61,2)—was very reluctant, esp. after *Constantine, to delegate the ministry of preaching to others except the pope. Between the 380s and 90s, Pope *Siricius perhaps alluded to presbyter preachers (if letter Ep. 10,5 [PL 13, 1184 B-1185 A] is the pope's: ausus est episcopus vel presbyter . . . praedicare). The presbyter preachers, perhaps during the time of Leo the Great, exercised their prerogative (see Monachino 1947, 349-350; 372-374). In 431 *Celestine I, however, rebuked the bishop of *Arles for having allowed some priests to preach who took the opportunity to propose some embarrassing doctrinal positions (Ep. 21,2: PL 50, 528 D; but Caesarius of Arles would legitimize the initiative of his predecessor at the Council of *Vaison (529): see Hfl-Lecl II/2, 1112); although Gregory the Great records that the monk Equitius was at first denounced by a nobleman of Norcia because he preached without having received priestly orders or licentia from the Roman pontiff, and then was directly questioned by the clergy of Rome and the pontiff himself for abusing the papal office (Greg. Gt., Dial. I, 4,8.11). This tendency was not in opposition to the popes' custom, in the 4th c., of preferring to preach on feast days (see above VI.2.a). It is in fact possible that, as occurred elsewhere, while giving Sunday or weekly sermons himself, at Rome he also restricted presbyters to reciting a written text, on the basis of which he showed that the presbyter had no authority on his own (it is precisely on these conditions that Caesarius himself allowed the presbyters to preach a sermon [and some deacons]—Serm. 1,15; V. Caes. I, 54). This sight of priests being forced to remain silent when bishops were present (praesentibus episcopis) deeply wounded Jerome's volatile character, but in the eyes of a Westerner, Jerome's (Ep. 52,7) was an isolated voice.

As mentioned, in Augustine of Hippo, the practice of allowing presbyters to preach was recent, and was only permitted within precise conditions: Bishop Valerius had introduced it because, being of Greek origin and therefore less able to communicate minus Latina lingua et litteris instructus (Possid., V. Aug. 5,2), he needed someone who knew how to speak to the faithful with the necessary linguistic competence. Having succeeded Valerius, Augustine decided, in any case, to adopt and use this practice in turn (Ep. 52,7), certainly after careful consideration of the risks and advantages. Even he, as had already occurred long ago to his Eastern colleagues, evidently had to realize that giving space to a loyal preacher befitted the prestige of the cathedra much more than not doing so. Already *Paul of Samosata, famous for his oratorical verve, trusted his presbyters to preach, counting on the fact that they would praise him in their homilies (Eus., HE 7,30,10). This was more or less what the priest *Heraclius of Hippo had done, who when preaching before Augustine (quod ante facere non solebat) did not find a better way to fulfill the delicate commission than to transform the sermon into a praise of his bishop (Verbraken 1961; see Chrys., Ordin. 150-295).

It was rarer, however, for deacons to preach. The case of the martyr *Vincent (d. 304), who preached upon the request of Valerius of Saragossa (Moral 1969, 1149), seemed to recur 40 years later at Antioch, where, upon the order of Bishop Leontius (344–357), the teacher of *Eunomius, *Aetius (Philost., HE 3,17), exercised this office for a brief time. *Philostorgius asserted that Aetius was entrusted with "teaching in church the doctrines of the church" (διδάσκειν ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας . . . δόγματα), an expression that seems to allude to official preaching (Vaggione 2000, 26-27). It is not a given, however, that one can often find a similar practice in other parts of the church. Much later, as the century progressed, even the deacon Gregory the Great preached, but he did so only in the private sector, for the Latin community of Constantinople, where he lived for seven years as an *apocrisarius of Pope *Pelagius II. Having in turn become pope, when he had to entrust to others the duty of reading in his place some of his homilies, it is significant to note that he did not entrust the duty to a deacon, but to a notarius (Greg. Gt., In LX Evang. hom., praef.). The practice of having deacons read the sanctorum patrum homiliae was permitted by the Council of Vaison (can. 2), but only in exceptional circumstances (e.g., sickness of the commissioned presbyter; see V. Caes. I, 54). The example of Deogratias, to whom Augustine dedicated in 399 the treatise De catechizandis rudibus, seems to confirm that the preaching of deacons was reserved, preferably, to set occasions—in this case, the catechetical instruction for those aspiring to baptism. The sermons of Ephrem (whose writings, acc. to Jerome, Vir. 115, were recited, in certain churches, in the manner of sermons) probably must be considered as a unique phenomenon, to be understood within a particular geographical setting.

Whether bishop, commissioned presbyter, deacon or layman, the preacher, nonetheless, perceived himself to serve in the role of a mediator, i.e., one who does not speak on his own authority but in the name of God (Iren., Haer. 1,10,2; Aug., In Ioh. tract. 12,5), and for the express purpose of moral and spiritual edification of the listeners. During the sermon, the faith in the presence of the angels, who suggest the word to bring forth to the one who preaches (Paul. Mil., V. Ambr. 17; Berrouard 1963), was scrupulously supported by the church, which was a solemn confirmation of the correctness of such a perception (Brottier, in Klimkeit et al. 1997, 246-247); although to Basil, Hom. in ps. 28, 7: PG 29, 301 B-C, the certainty of that angelic presence primarily served to scare a rather undisciplined audience, to whom he stated that the "holy angels take note of all the words" that are uttered during the synaxis, including vain words uttered therein.

5.b. The place and posture of preaching. The preacher—certainly from the beginning of the mid-3rd c.—spoke from the episcopal seat (καθέδρα; θρόνος; cathedra, thronus; see Stommel 1958), which, established in the presbytery, was encircled by seats of presbyters (subsellia) and was separated from a space reserved for the public through steps (gradus). Origen already had preached from the cathedra (Hom. Ezech. 5,4; Nautin 1976, 109-110), as had, later, Augustine (Serm. 146,1: sublimi sede) and Severus of Antioch—whose homilies not by chance bear the name Cathedral (ἐπιθρόνιοι).

The cathedra, which was mobile and could be moved from church to church acc. to the needs of the sermon (Aeth., Itin. 46,1), rested on a platform (βῆμα; tribunal), and was placed on a raised structure situated in the exedra or the apse (ἀψίς; absida)—in the elevated semicircular space situated usually in the back of the basilica. When he was a presbyter at Antioch (Stat. 19,1: PG 49, 189, 11) and then bishop of Constantinople (Hom. in Rom. 12: 20: PG 51, 173, 3), John Chrysostom usually preached on the bēma, which was also the place from which the reader read the Scriptures (Soz., HE 8,5,2). *Cyprian called it a pulpitum (Ep. 39,4,1), and said that it was a locus alterior from which the praecepta et evangelium domini were read. It is superior locus that Augustine opposes to the inferior locus where the listeners gather (Serm. 101,4): from up there Gregory of Nyssa could see the people as though from a lookout post (Bapt. Chr.: PG 46, 577 A 12-13), and the one who wanted to meet the listeners must "come down from the exedra" (Paul. Med., V. Ambr. 23,2: Cui descendenti de exhedra).

The structure of the exedra assured the voice a certain resonance, not always sufficient, however, to permit it to be heard by the entire assembly (Aug., Serm. 47,30). For this reason, it seems that in certain churches—rather late—the use of the ambo was also widespread (ἄμβω; ambo), the most famous example of which was that of the church of the Hagia Sophia at Constantinople, described in 563 by *Paul Silentiarius (Fobelli 2005), but whose distinction with respect to the bēma (a term used to refer to it at that time) is not always clear. As it seems, it was positioned closer to the public than usual. It is not certain, however, that a position of this type corresponded to the "platform" (βῆμα) and the "exalted throne" (θρόνος ὑψηλός) that Paul of Samosata had constructed (Eus., HE 7,30,9): interpreting Eusebius, *Rufinus was in fact thinking of the traditional tribunal and thronus only much higher than normal.

Likewise, we do not know with certainty whether by the term cathedra one must always understand the episcopal see: when, e.g., it was not the bishop who spoke, but his presbyter or a guest preacher, it is not clear if he was allowed to sit on the seat temporarily (as Origen seems to have done [Comm. in Matt. 10-17, 15,26] and *Diodorus of Tarsus [Chrys., Diod. 1]) or rather—something that certain people considered more likely—if he preached from a distinct position, from a different thronus (Mayer 2005, 328-331).

On this thronos, however, preaching was usually done while seated. Already the ancient *Polycarp gave his sermons to the faithful while seated (Eus., HE 5,20,6); *Gregory of Nyssa at a much later time observed the crowd that gathered in church while seated (Bapt. Chr.: PG 46, 577 A 12-13). At Jerusalem, the bishop sedet et praedicat (Egeria, Itin. 46,4), and Ambrose did the same in Milan, where he sat in cathedra in tribunali (Paul. Med., V. Ambr. 48,1). This was, moreover, the posture of the school teacher didaskalos—who when sitting affirmed his authority over his students (see the legendary, but exemplary, episode of Arensius the Great, the teacher of *Arcadius and *Honorius, in Georg. Mon., Chron. 4,198,6-7 [de Boor, pp. 571,6–572,10] = BHG 167z; Mazzarino 1974)—and the preachers were teachers (e.g., Bas., Ep. 243,2,32-33; Greg. Naz., Or. 5,35,25-26). There was, however, no obligation to do so. Augustine (Serm. 95,2) and John Chrysostom (Socr., HE 6,5,5: καθεσθεὶς ἐπὶ τοῦ ἄμβωνος) mostly preached seated; at times, however, they preferred to do so standing (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 96, 10; Chrys., Hom. in Matt. 32,6).

5. The techniques. The preacher used different techniques (Olivar 1973; 1991, 589-633). They might improvise, as did Origen (Engastr. 1,1,3)—who, on the other hand, certainly had the Scriptures at hand (Hom. in Num. 12,2; Nautin 1976, 112-123; Olivar 1991, 634-640)—not unlike Basil (Hom. in Ps. 61, 1; 115,2: PG 29, 469 B; PG 30, 105 B) and later Sidonius (Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. 2,22). Or they might use a prepared piece that they would repeat by memory (cf. Genn., Vir. 58) or that would be read after having been put in writing through dictation (this was the practice of Leo the Great acc. to the judgment of P. Batifol 1926, 279; *Fulgentius of Ruspe in Ferrand., V. Fulg. 16,83: dictabat; Sev. Ant., Hom. 37: PO 36, 485, 32; *Philoxenus of Mabbug, acc. to Lemoire 1956, 12-13).

When they were not already written by the author, often the sermons were recorded by stenographers (Olivar 1991, 902-922; cf. Wilkenhauser 1907; Teitler 1985), something that happened at least in Origen's time when some of his extant homilies were authorized by him to be recorded by stenographers (Eus., HE 6,36,1). Stenographers helped *Basil of Caesarea, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, *Gaudentius of Brescia, Zeno of Verona, *Peter Chrysologus and Gregory the Great. At times, as in the case of Gregory's Homilies on Ezekiel and some of the Homilies on the Gospels, the sermons were in part dictated before their delivery. Both methods allowed the preacher to use a written text to which he made reference as a source for inspiration. He could also return to the same text when he was in a similar circumstance (this is what, e.g., Severus of Antioch did, who often reread the very same sermons before different communities: e.g., Hom. 41 [PO 36, 15]). Or he could also decide to reelaborate the text in view of publication—a method that stands at the origins of true and proper collections of an author (such as those of the same Severus, Gaudentius of Brescia, Leo the Great, Avitus of Vienne or Caesarius of Arles), or other collections produced by third parties (such as those of Peter Chrysologus).

The stenographic recording of the homilies, however, also served to make the sermon an evidentiary document, something to bring forward in the case of doctrinal or political disputes, either in favor of or against the preacher. At times, unauthorized stenographers were present during the presentation of sermons; they were there with the objective of establishing an evidentiary written record that was made available for those who had commissioned them ("visible and hidden hands" [γραφίδες φανεραί τεκαὶ λανθάνουσαι], took note of *Gregory of Nazianzus's homilies at *Constantinople: Or. 42,26,29; cf. Possid. v. Aug. 7,3; 18,9). To use official stenographers, however, could then allow the preacher to protect himself from improper uses of his own homiletic activity, allowing him to put an official stamp on authentic editions (Dagemark 2004, 701-708). Such a practice, in any case, has become extremely important for us today. It is in fact thanks to these that we possess a large number of transcribed homilies as they were delivered; they clearly reveal such aspects as idiomatic expressions which were often attested in the great homiletic collections (particularly instructive in this regard are the collections of Chrysostom and Augustine). They are extremely significant because they place us in contact with the actual event, revealing a number of exceptional historical details.

5.d. The exhaustion of preaching. Preaching was a psychological and physical commitment. When Ambrose would speak in public he would blush; this is why, when he had the choice, he preferred to allow his voice to be heard by writing (Ambr., Virgin. II, 1,1). The bishop of Constantinople John Chrysostom admitted that he was constantly experimenting with emotion at the moment of preaching, even when he preached before friends: he had that same mindset even when he faced a hostile crowd (Chrys., Hom. in Ac. 4,3: PG 60, 46, 18-20)! To maintain one's composure when confronting an audience, one therefore needed a good dose of self-esteem such as that shown by Severus of Antioch (Hom. 63: PO 8, 286). Otherwise, one could try the method of captatio benevolentiae, admitting with a certain self-deprecation one's own insufficiency and appealing to the audience's understanding and affection, as Severus did again (Hom. 121 [PO 29, 95]; see Olivar 1999). Even so, preaching was still tiresome; it required certain physical requirements and a particular type of training.

A capable voice, of course, was the first indispensable requirement. Aware of its importance in a society in which communication was preeminently oral, the schools taught the necessary techniques of actuating and moderating the voice along the lines of a song in such a way as to transmit specific types of emotions (Rousselle 1983). Any lack of performance in this regard was noted. A passionate listener of Ambrose's speeches such as Augustine never forgot that the voice of the bishop of Milan "easily became weak" (Conf. 6,3,3: facillime obtrundebatur; cf. Ambr., Sacram. 1,24 [CSEL 73, 25]: fragilitas nostrae vocis). The same thing happened to Basil of Caesarea (Hom. in Ps. 1, 6: PG 29, 228 A 14-B 1), who was never a great speaker (Greg. Naz., Or. 43,17). Large and noisy crowds seriously worsened matters, even discouraging willing orators (Bas., Hom. 3,1: PG 31, 197 D-200 A; Adkin 1985). When the preacher did not improvise or read, there was also need for a good memory in addition to a good voice. An ability vigorously encouraged by the Greco-Roman educational system, the memory was considered a prerequisite, if not indispensable; it was certainly very important for a man of the church (Harris 1991, 36-39; 337-338). Augustine found that reciting sermons by memory was terribly boring (De doctr. christ. 4,10,25). The true problem, however, was that to commit to memory entire sermons was a great burden for many bishops. Rather than burdening themselves, many bishops therefore preferred to admit their flaws and save their energy (see Caes. Arles, Serm. 1,20,1-2 [SC 175]: Memoria mihi deest, cf. ibid. 15,2: laboriosum est praedicare).

But to preach did not mean merely to speak and remember. Every oratorical exhibition certainly also involved an adequate use of the body, whose movements accompanied words; these movements likewise transmitted emotions and increased the drama, to the audience's great pleasure. Paul of Samosata was already aware of this. When standing before his detractors, he won enormous approval among his own faithful by smacking his hand on his thigh and stomping his feet on the platform (Eus., HE 7,29,9, to be compared with Quint., Inst. 11,3,123; Philostr., VS 1,21,5). And he did all that despite the polemics of his opponents, who pointed fingers against such theatrical and affected poses connected to the exercise of rhetorical songs. Effemminate sunt eorum magistrorum et animae et voluntates, qui semper sonantia, semper canora componunt ("both the souls and the wills of those teachers who always compose sounds and melodies are effeminate"), observed the irritated Origen (Hom. in Ezech. 3,3). One hundred and fifty years later, an orator of the caliber of Gregory of Nazianzus had to face the same criticisms (Or. 42,12,4-6).

The use of the voice, the mind and body carried with it an enormous physical effort. John Chrysostom openly admitted that he got tired when preaching (Eleem.: PG 52, 271), and Basil did the same (Hex. 7,6,10-12), as well as Quodvultdeus (Adv. Haer. 8,3: CCSL 60, 301: Quid adhuc dicam fatigatus fatigatis?) and Augustine (Serm. 348,3.4). Augustine even perspired—and not just metaphorically speaking—from the work of expounding difficult scriptural passages (Serm. 183,13: PL 38, 993: sudor hic meus). Therefore, when the preacher was not in shape—because he was sick, as in the case of John Chrysostom (Stat. 19,1: PG 49, 187, 49-50), or weakened, as Peter Chrysologus (Serm. 74,1)—it was much better to stop preaching and not preach or to end sooner rather than later. To take on the task without the requisite energy exposed the preacher's image to serious risks. The pulpit, in which he spoke, "in order to help himself feel better," gave him a visibility that could backfire on him: Quamquam enim propter commoditatem depromendae vocis altiore loco stare videamur, tamen ipso altiore loco vos iudicatis, et nos iudicamur (Aug., Serm. 23,1: CCL 41, 309).

6. The public. 6.a. Identity. The ancient Christian preacher's audience was mixed, as evidenced from the official records: adults, children and even very noisy individuals would attend (Bas., Hom. 8,3: PG 31, 309 C-312 A; Hex. 4,7,29-30); the audience was also mixed acc. to the following categories: social (see above IV.1 vs. Bas., Hex. 3,1,17-19: present at the sermon were "workers of the mechanical arts who had just earned their food with a day's work"; Mayer, in Allen - Cunningham 1998), cultural (see above 4.IV.1 vs. Aug., Serm. 51,9,14: some people did not know how to read) and, esp., gender. Both men and women were present at the sermon in the assemblies during the time of Justin and, a century later, in those which acclaimed Paul of Samosata (Eus., HE 7,30,9). If at times one has the impression that the audience in which the homilist is interested was primarily male (e.g., John Chrys., Stat. 6,7; Sev. Ant., Hom. 37: PO 36, 479, 24-481, 13), one should not think that this was the norm (Mayer 1999 vs. MacMullen 1989). Precisely the presence of women among the audience—even more, high-ranking women—helps explain the importance that was given, esp. in the 4th c., to the themes of *virginity and the behavior and treatment of the body; all of this was within the context of the larger question of renouncing one's conjugal rights and of devoting oneself to the church—which in turn was connected with familial and patrimonial issues (Brown 1992; Elm 1996). It was precisely the proximity in the church of the two sexes that permitted men to take liberties that in other public places, e.g., such as the piazza, they did not dare to exercise. Thus, to prevent them from unwanted contact with women, there arose the custom in certain churches of installing dividing "tables" (σανίδες), whose purpose was to keep men and women apart. These types of tables were used in Antioch at the time of John Chrysostom—but acc. to the elders of the city, it was a recent innovation (Chrys., Hom. in Matt. 73,3).

6.b. Where and in what position the audience listened. The audience gathered in the space of the basilica below the exedra and, like a class of students in view of the master (see above VI. 5. B.), usually listened to the preacher while standing. Basil's audience stood (Hom. in Ps. 28, 3: PG 29, 288 B: πολλοὶ γὰρ ἑστᾶσιν; Hom in Ps. 29, 3: PG 29, 312 C), so too Chrysostom's (De futuris deliciis 1: PG 51, 347), Augustine's (Serm. 355,2) and Caesarius of Arles's (Serm. 73,4). Nevertheless, even in this case it was not an obligation. At times, the public sat and even lay on the floor. Christians at the assemblies during the time of Justin Martyr stood at the moment of reciting the prayer that followed the sermon (1 Apol. 67,5). So too, later, did the hearers of Origen (Hom. in Num. 11,9,3; Hom. in Lc. 36,2), of Paul of Samosata (Eus., HE 7,29,9), and a century later—despite the contradiction—those of Basil (Hex. 7,6,64). In Jerusalem, during the instruction of the catechumens that lasted three hours, the relatives of those to be baptized were allowed to remain sitting (Egeria, Itin. 46,1), a custom encouraged by Augustine to avoid the possibility that one who "first listened willingly, exhausted either by hearing or standing, no longer praises, but yawns and appears unwilling, wanting to leave" (qui primo libenter audiebat, vel audiendo vel stando fatigatus, non iam laudans, sed oscitans labia diducat, et se abire velle etiam invitus ostendat (Cathech. rud. 13,19: CCSL 46, 142, 28-30). Even Caesarius of Arles, who preferred that his faithful remain standing during the sermon, permitted them at times to sit when their feet hurt or when they were sick and suffering from some illness (Serm. 78,1); but he in no way allowed anyone to lie on the floor—as it seems, Jesus' audience already did, if need be (Mk 8:6). The author of the Apostolic Constitutions* (2,57,10-13) actually knew a specific church in which the seats were assigned (a practice overseen by a deacon) on the basis of age, sex and civil (or ecclesiastical) status of the faithful, and they remained standing only if they could not do otherwise. It is likely that important figures of the political world such as the emperor, members of the court, imperial administrators or noteworthy local figures were able to sit when they attended the sermon, occupying the seats of honor placed in a suitable spot (Dölger 1929, 61-63). The same can be said for the visiting ecclesiastical authorities, who, probably, found some spot in the presbytery.

6.c. Participation: Frequency and manner. It seems that to participate for the entirety of the liturgical office, or at all the services that took place during the course of the year, evidenced a deeper engagement of the faithful since the early days, in which the new faith was taking its first steps. Already the epistle to the Hebrews (10:25) in fact combats the habit of forsaking the assembling before its conclusion. During the time of Origen, there were those who left even before the end of the biblical readings (Hom. in Ex. 12,2); others, however, came only for feast days (Hom. in Gen. 11,1). But even a century later, Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus were obliged to acknowledge that at times there were very few people in attendance at their sermons (Bas., Hom. 8,3: PG 31, 309 C; Greg. Naz., Or. 3,1), although again Basil and John Chrysostom would rebuke those who were eager to leave the church, "as if it were a prison" (Bas., ibid.; cf. Chrys., Coemet.: PG 49, 397, 33-398), or those who left immediately after the homily (Chrys., Incomprehens. 3,480-482). Exasperated by his flock's behavior, Chrysostom came to the point of dedicating an entire sermon "to those who have not come to the synaxis" (Hom. in Rom. 12: 20). Again during the time of Augustine (Serm. 302,22), Leo the Great (Serm. 84,1), Severus of Antioch (Hom. 76: PO 12, 135-136) and Gregory the Great (Hom. in Ev. 14,6), the problem of many who left the liturgy continued to be an extremely relevant issue.

There were various reasons for this absence: personal factors such as boredom or exhaustion (see below) or daily tasks (Or., Hom. in Gen. 10,1); or other external factors such as heat (Aug., Serm. 303,1), cold (Aug., In Ioh. tract. 6,1), rain (Chrys., Hom. div. 1,1 [PG 63, 461]) or distance from the service (Ps. Chrys., Petr. et El. 1). In light of the other distractions, moreover, the church had to continually compete for the audience's attention (see above IV.2).

No less numerous, however, are the testimonies concerning crowded services, although, given the small average size of the churches in antiquity, it is difficult to determine what exactly is meant by a large assembly. Many of these testimonies, in effect, referred to liturgies held on the martyria for the panegyrics of the martyr, which were usually modest buildings (e.g., Greg. Nyss., Xl mart. Ia [Gregorii Nysseni opera 10, 1, 137]). Other testimonies, however, seemed to allude simply to the density of the crowd of the faithful who were surrounding the preacher to hear better (Greg. Nyss., Bapt. Chr.: PG 46, 577 A 5-8). Nevertheless, when Gregory of Na-zianzus (Or. 42,26,29-30) or John Chrysostom described full assemblies crowding the churches of the caliber such as those of Constantinople, it is not fitting, perhaps, to relativize too much the significance of their claims, although certainly not devoid of rhetorical exaggeration. Special occasions could effectively call a rather significant crowd. In addition to the great feasts of the liturgical year (Chrys., Hom. in Gen. I, 1: Lent; Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 30, 2,2: Easter; Serm. 196,4: Christmas; Greg. the Great., Hom. in Ev. 19,5: the Sunday of 70) and the Sundays—free from the duty of work (Chrys., Poenit. 3,1)—even special events of great curiosity (one thinks, e.g., of the events of the mighty Eutropius who fled into the large church of Constantinople [Chrys., Eutrop. 3], or the contested election of Severus of Antioch [Hom. 1,1: PO 38, 254]). At times, then, the popularity of an exceptional preacher alone was enough to arouse the interests of people: people from the countryside who only spoke Syriac also came to hear Chrysostom (Chrys., Huit catéchèses baptismales 8,1-6: SC 50bis). In these types of circumstances, the large crowd could cause much discomfort, which certainly did not help one to concentrate. It could also happen, e.g., that someone stepped on the foot of their neighbor (Aug., Serm. 24,2 Guelferb.). If it was hot and everyone was crammed in, some people would perspire heavily (Chrys., Hom. in Rom. 12: 20, 2). And at times it would even happen that a baby suffocated to death (Haidacher 1907, 143-145).

From the 3rd c., the audience attended the sermon with either utmost liveliness and involvement, or annoyance and disinterest (Olivar 1983; Olivar 1991, 761-814; Brottier, in Klimkeit et al. 1997, 246). Sometimes people came late (Caes. Arles, Serm. 76,3); greeted each other, exchanged smiles and even shook hands (Bas., Hom. in Ps. 28, 7: PG 29, 304 A); some people chattered in church and were distracted (Or., Hom. in Gen. 10,1); some people laughed and made hand gestures (Const. App. 2,57,13); others made noise, which annoyed the preacher (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 50, 1); some church members rocked back-and-forth as if seized with giddiness; some yawned, others continually paced back and forth (Bas., Hom. 8,2: PG 31, 309 C). Some were impatient for the entirety of the sermon (Chrys., Hom. in Gen. 6,2) and became tired for having to stand (Aug., Serm. 355,2: PL 39, 1569: ego sedens loquor, vos stando laboratis); certain members fell asleep, esp. after having eaten (Chrys., Stat. 10,1; cf. Acts 20:9). At times the crowd became tumultuous, forcing the preacher to stop the sermon (Sev. Ant., Hom. 1,1: PO 38, 254); some people left the church grumbling (Eus. Em., Hom. 20,38); although some only came to look at beautiful women—as did Augustine when a young man (Conf. 3,3,5)—and beautiful boys, or even to prostitute themselves or to steal (Bas., Hom. in Ps. 29, 4: PG 29, 312 C; Chrys., Incomprehens. 4,6).

At other times, however, the audience took part in the sermon (and the readings that preceded it) with great enthusiasm. The audience interrupted the speaker to ask some questions; it read along with him scriptural passages that he mentioned in his sermon; the audience reminded him with cues things that he had forgotten to mention (Bas., Hex. 4,2,6-12; 8,2,24-26); they let him understand by the nod of their head that they had understood his point (Aug., De doctr. christ. 4,10,25); they came away with personal considerations, outbursts (of pain, sorrow and commotion: e.g., when they heard about the sufferings of Jesus [Egeria, Itin. 24,10], the story of Job [Chrys., Laz. 5,4]), or others with cries, laments and gasps (esp. on the occasion of someone's death) or even with gestures more or less warding off evil (spitting and snubbing their nose when they heard the story of Lazarus and the rich man: Aug., Serm. 102,3,4). Some brought accusations against the preacher or appealed to third parties. In sophisticated cities such as Constantinople, it even happened that the crowd would mock the preacher, e.g., if it heard him mispronounce the Greek language. John Chrysostom, whom Libanius greatly admired, did not have this defect; the Cappadocian Father Gregory of Nazianzus, however, did (Bernardi 1968, 193), as did *Severian of Gabala (Socr., HE 6,11,3; Soz., HE 8,10,1) and the Armenian Atticus of Constantinople.

When the audience did not like the preacher, they did not hesitate to let him know (Chrys., Hom. in Matt. 32,6). But when they were happy with him, they held him dear (Chrys., Hom. in Gen. 2,1), asking for homilies he promised and requesting that he would repeat homilies delivered elsewhere (Sev. Ant., Hom. 108: PO 25, 193), or protesting when he had himself replaced by someone else (Chrys., Hom. div. 9,1). The noisiest sign of their approval of his oratorical performance was their applause that usually resounded in the ancient church as a stamp of the preacher's skill (Norden 1986, 559-563; Olivar 1991, 834-867). At times, they even used claques specifically charged with applauding him: this happened in the case of Paul of Samosata, whose fans were accustomed to jump up and down to cheer for him, "as occurred in the theater" (Eus., HE 7,30,9).

Eusebius's institutional comparison with the practice of the theater is not without reason. As happened there, also in the church, applause was often the voice of special interest groups, cunningly maneuvered, who aimed to condition political developments (Browning 1952), relying on a means of expression that willingly attributed to itself a spiritual meaning—analogous to that of a group's ovations that accompanied an ecclesiastical nominee. Jerome bitterly criticized this type of manifestation (Comm. in Eccles. 9,17), representing the interpretation of intelligent people. But Gregory of Nazianzus, whom Jerome prided himself on having often heard at Constantinople (Hier., Vir. 117), devoted himself to willingly inciting such ovations (Greg. Naz., Or. 36,4; Hier., Ep. 52,8), and Gregory's rival Eunomius portrayed himself no differently (Greg. Naz., Or. 27,1). The ovations pleased Basil of Caesarea (Hom. 11,5: PG 31, 384 B), and even Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. 141,8) and Fulgentius of Ruspe (Ferrand., V. Fulgent. 27). John Chrysostom knew well that, in certain cases, the ovations only expressed enthusiasm for the conclusion of a particularly well thought out sermon (Bapt. 4), but he himself did nothing to stop them. Even when criticizing such a custom, on one occasion, he did it in such a way as to earn himself thundering applause (Hom. in Ac. 30,3-4).

VII. Trends in recent studies. Regardless of how much of this corresponds to only a small part of the growing number of sermons actually preached, the homiletic heritage left to us from Christian antiquity is a historical source of utmost importance for a number of fields of research. Its contribution to the history of exegesis and doctrine should never be undervalued (one merely has to think of Origen or Augustine); scholars devoted to the spiritual life and ascetical practices derive no less an advantage (Eusebius of Emesa). Likewise these sermons benefit those concerned with the liturgical and sacramental practices of the early church—since proper homiletical material provides key information for understanding the dynamics of the sermon (Mayer 1997). Nevertheless, the most recent studies interest us for other reasons.

We, in fact, should affirm that there has been a growing success in a socio-historical approach to the homilies. Sermons constitute, in effect, alternate windows into the world in which they were delivered and to which they were addressed; they depict the most disparate aspects of life: from the larger political issues down to the most anonymous customs of private life (Leemans et al. 2003). Although this approach rarely produces results from the first three centuries because of the relative dearth of material, such an approach was readily imposed on the great preachers of the 4th-5th c., who offer some of the best evidence for justifying this approach (Drobner 1996; Meredith, in Allen - Cunningham 1998; Mayer 2001b). The homilies of this period, in fact, happily inform us about a very wide gambit of topics: demography and economy, natural catastrophes and disasters, food and the care of individuals; details of dress and popular beliefs; language, instruction and precise sciences, and much more (plenty of material in Madec 1998). They also permit one to analyze politically related events and to reconstruct the webs of social relationships. From these homilies we garner decisive pieces of information pertaining to the circumstances in which they were delivered, information that illuminates otherwise obscure aspects of the ecclesiastical topography of specific cities or regions and clarifies the quality of relationships existing between the various churches. The richness of such data is almost unmanageable: one notes, therefore, the need to use research tools to manage it with greatest possible benefit (Allen - Mayer 1993).

There is no doubt that this is a challenge posed to modern study—a difficult challenge, if one merely considers the amount of material (hidden among the numerous pseudonymous texts, or those that have survived only in Eastern languages) that lies still unexplored. With the exception of several important initiatives (e.g., Cattaneo 1981; Voicu 2004), much of this homiletic material is still awaiting studies that will open them up for a historically conscious use of its contents.

A. Wilkenhauser, Der hl. Johannes Chrysostomus und die Tachigraphie: Archiv für Stenographie 58, 3 (1907) 268-272; S. Haidacher, Drei unedierte Chrsysostomus-Texte einer Baseler Handschrift: ZKTh 31 (1907) 141-171; 349-360; P. Batiffol, Léon I[er]: DTC 9,1 (1926) 218-301; F.J. Dölger, Kaiser Theodosius der Grosse und Bischof Ambrosius von Mailand in einer Auseinandersetzung zwischen Predigt und Messliturgie: AC 1 (1929) 54-65; D. de Bruyne, La chronologie de quelques sermons de saint Augustin: RBen 43 (1931) 185-193; C.H. Dodd, Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments, London 1936; G. Bardy, Tractare, tractatus: RSR 33 (1946) 211-245; J. Leclercq, Le sermon, acte liturgique: La MaisonD 8 (1946) 27-37; M.J. Brennan, A Study of the Clausulae in the Sermons of St. Augustine, Washington 1947; V. Monachino, La cura pastorale a Milano, Cartagine e Roma nel secolo IV, Rome 1947; R. Browning, The Riot of A.D. 387 in Antioch: The Role of the Theatrical Claques in the Later Roman Empire: JTS 42 (1952) 13-20; C. Lambot, Les sermons de saint Augustin pour les fêtes de Pâques. Liturgie et archéologie: RSR 30 (1956) 230-240; E. Lemoire, Philoxène de Mabboug, Homélies (SC 44), Paris 1956; H.-I. Marrou, Diatribe: RAC 3 (1957) 997-1009 (= Id., Patristique et humanisme. Mélanges, Paris 1976, 267-277); E. Stommel, Bischofsstuhl und hoher Thron: JbAC 1 (1958) 52-78; Ch. Mohrmann, Études sur le latin des chrétiens, III, Rome 1961; Id., St. Augustine and the Eloquentia, in Id., Études, I, 351-370; Id., Praedicare-Tractare-Sermo, in Id., Études, II, 63-72; P. Verbraken, Les deux sermons du prêtre Eraclius d'Hyppone: RBen 71 (1961) 3-21; M.-F. Berrouard, S. Augustin et le ministère de la prédication. Les anges qui montent et descendent: RecAug 2 (1963) 447-501; A. Olivar, La duración de la predicación antigua: Liturgica 3 (1966) 143-184; J. Bernardi, La prédication des Pères Cappadociens. Le prédicateur et son auditoire, Montpellier 1968; H. Barré - R. Grégoire, Homéliares (H.B.: I Caractères généraux; II Homéliares latins; R.G.: III Homéliares orientaux): DSp 7 (1969) 597-617; G. Friedrich, κῆρυξ κτλ.: GLNT 5 (1969) 424-482 (orig. ed. 1933; Eng. tr.: TDNT 3:683-718); S. Janeras, En quels jours furent prononcées les homélies catéchétiques de Théodore de Mopsueste? in Mémorial Mgr. Gabriel Khouri-Sarkis (1898–1968), Louvain 1969, 121-133; F.A. Memoli, *Periodare ritmico nell'*Oratio XLIII di Gregorio Nazianzeno, Naples 1969; T. Moral, Vincenzo, diacono di Saragozza: BS 12 (1969) 1149-1155; A. (= Ch.) Renoux, Le codex arménien de Jérusalem 121, I: Introduction aux origines de la liturgie hiérosolymitaine. Lumières nouvelles, Turnhout 1969 (PO 35, 1-215); II: Édition comparée du texte et de deux autres manuscrits. Introduction, textes, traduction et notes, Turnhout 1971 (PO 36, 139-388); F. van de Paverd, Zur Geschichte der Messliturgie in Antiocheia und Konstantinopel gegen Ende des vierten Jh. Analyse der Quellen bei Johannes Chrysostomos (OCA 87), Rome 1970; J. Jeremias, Teologia del Nuovo Testamento. I: La predicazione di Gesù, Brescia 1972; A. Olivar, Preparación e improvisación en la predicación patrística: Kyriakon. Festschr. J. Quasten, Münster i.W. 1973, II, 736-767; S. Mazzarino, Prima cathedra. Docenza universitaria e "trono" episcopale nel II/III secolo, in Id., Antico, tardoantico ed era costantiniana, Bari 1974, I, 151-170; P. Nautin, Origène, Homélies sur Jérémie (SC 232), Paris 1976; O. Pasquato, Gli spettacoli in S. Giovanni Crisostomo. Paganesimo e Cristianesimo ad Antiochia e Costantinopoli nel IV secolo (OCA 201), Rome 1976; M. Aubineau, Les Homélies festales d'Hésychius de Jérusalem (Subsidia Hagiographica 59), I-II, Brussels 1978–1980; V. Recchia, Il "praedicator" nel pensiero e nell'azione di Gregorio Magno: Salesianum 41 (1979) 333-374; S. Janeras, La predicació pasqual i baptismal de Procle de Constantinople: RCT 5 (1980) 131-151; M.G. Mara (ed.), Ricchezza e povertà nel cristianesimo primitivo, Rome 1980; V. Saxer, S. Augustin. L'année liturgique, Paris 1980; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari ^{2}1980; E. Cattaneo, Trois homélies pseudo-chrysostomiennes sur la Pâque comme oeuvre d'Apollinaire de Laodicée. Attribution et étude théologique (Théologie historique 58), Paris 1981; G.A. Kennedy, Greek Rhetoric under Christian Emperors, Princeton, NJ 1983; A. Rousselle, Parole et inspiration. Le travail de la voix dans le monde romain: History and Philosophy of the Life Sciences 5 (1983) 129-157; A. Olivar, Les réactions émotionelles des fidèles pendant la lecture solennelle de l'Écriture dans l'Église des Pères, in "Mens concordet voci." Pour A.G. Martimort, Paris 1983, 452-455; R. Bultmann, Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe, Göttingen 1984 (orig. ed. 1910); N. Adkin, A Problem in the Early Church. Noise During Sermon and Lesson: Mnemosyne, ser. 4, 38 (1985) 161-163; H.C. Teitler, Notarii and Exceptores. An Inquiry into the Role and Significance of Shorthand Writers in the Imperial and Ecclesiastical Bureaucracy of the Roman Empire (from the Early Principate to c. 450 A.D.), Amsterdam 1985; G. Groppo, Storia della predicazione e della catechesi antica e medievale, Rome 1986; R. Krautheimer, Architettura paleocristiana e bizantina, Turin 1986; M.A. Moreno, Prédication: DSp 12, 2 (1986) 2052-2064; H.M. Müller, Homiletik: TRE 15 (1986) 526-532 (565); E. Norden, La prosa d'arte antica. Dal VI secolo a.C. all'età della Rinascenza, 2 vols., Rome 1986 (orig. ed. 1898); A. Monaci Castagno, Origene predicatore e il suo pubblico, Milan 1988; R. Lizzi, Vescovi e strutture ecclesiastiche nella città tardoantica. L'Italia annonaria nel IV-V secolo d. C., Como 1989; R. MacMullen, The Preacher's Audience (AD 350–400): JTS 40 (1989) 503-511; M. Naldini (ed.), Basilio di Cesarea, Sulla Genesi (Omelie sull'Esamerone), Milan 1990; A. Cameron, Christianity and the Rhetoric of Empire. The Development of Christian Discourse, Berkeley-Los Angeles-Oxford 1991; W.H. Harris, Lettura e istruzione nel mondo antico, Rome-Bari 1991 (orig. ed. 1989); E. Massa, Gregorio Magno e l'arte del linguaggio. Alcune osservazioni, in Gregorio Magno e il suo tempo. XIX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana in collaborazione con l'École Française de Rome, Rome, 9-12 maggio 1990 (SEA 33), Rome 1991, II, 59-104; M. Naldini (ed.), Martino di Braga, Contro le superstizioni: catechesi al popolo (De correctione rusticorum), Florence 1991; S.M. Oberhelman, Rhetoric and Homilies in Fourth-Century Christian Literature. Prose Rhythm, Oratorical Style, and Preaching in the Works of Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine, Atlanta 1991; A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua (Biblioteca Herder, Sección de teología y filosofía, 189), Barcelona 1991; M. Peinado, La predicación del evangelio en los Padres de la Iglesia, Barcelona 1991; M. Sachot, Homilie: RAC 16 (1991–1992) 121-175; M. Banniard, Viva voce. Communication écrite et orale du IV^{e} au IX^{e} siècle en Occident latin, Paris 1992; P. Brown, Il corpo e la società. Uomini, donne e astinenza sessuale nel primo cristianesimo, Turin 1992 (orig. ed. 1988); P. Allen, Homilies as a Source for Social History: SP 24 (1993) 1-5; P. Allen - W. Mayer, Computer and Homily. Accessing the Everyday Life of Early Christians: VChr 47 (1993) 260-280; E. Baasland, Der 2. Klemensbrief und frühchristliche Rhetorik. "Die erste christliche Predigt" im Lichte der neueren Forschung: ANRW II, 27, 1 (1993) 78-157; H. Drobner, Die Festenpredigten der Mesopentecoste in der Alten Kirche, in V. Grossi (ed.), Ricerche patristiche in onore di Dom Basil Studer OSB = Augustinianum 33 (1993) 137-170; J. Kecskeméti, Personnages tragiques et personnages comiques dans les homélies dramatisées des prédicateurs grecs: Euphrosyne 22 (1994) 45-61; A.D. Litfin, St. Paul's Theology of Proclamation. 1 Cor 1–4 and Graeco-Roman Rhetoric, Cambridge 1994; E. Mühlenberg - J. van Oort (ed.), Predigt in der Alten Kirche, Kampen 1994; E. Mühlenberg, Augustins Predigen, in ibid., 9-24; W. Stoellger, Johannes Chrysostomus bei der Predigtarbeit. Bemerkungen zu Hom. 2 in Matt., in ibid., 82-114; H.G. Thümmel, Materialien zum liturgischen Ort der Predigt in der Alten Kirche, in ibid., 115-122; F.J. Tovar Paz, Tractatus, Sermones atque Homiliae. El cultivo del genero literario del discurso homilético en la Hispania tardoantigua y visigoda, Cáceres 1994; S. Elm, 'Virgins of God.' The Making of Ascetism in Late Antiquity, Oxford ^{2}1996; H. Drobner, Archaeologia Patristica. Die Schriften der Kirchenväter als Quellen der Archäologie und Kulturgeschichte. Gregor von Nyssa, Homiliae in Ecclesiasten (Sussidi allo studio delle antichità cristiane 10), Vatican City 1996; F. Dünzl, Homilie. I. Alte Kirche: LTK^{3} 5, 248-249; H. Schröter, Pfingstpredigt: TRE 26 (1996) 391-394; S. Voicu, Cesaria, Basilio (Ep. 93/94) e Severo, in M. Simonetti - P. Siniscalco (ed.), Studi sul cristianesimo antico e moderno in onore di Maria Grazia Mara = Augustinianum 35 (1996), II, 697-703; P. Allen - W. Mayer, Traditions of Constantinopolitan Preaching. Towards a New Assessment of Where Chrysostom Preached What: ByzF 24 (1997) 93-114; E. Cattaneo, I ministeri nella chiesa antica. Testi patristici dei primi tre secoli (Letture Cristiane del Primo Millennio 25), Milan 1997; B. Judic, Grégoire le Grand, un maître de la parole, in R.M. Dessì - M. Lauwers (eds.), La parole du prédicateur. V^{e}-XV^{e} siècle (Collection du Centre d'Études Médiévales de Nice 1), Nice 1997, 49-107; H.-J. Klimkeit - E.S. Gerstenberger - B. Ego - H.-Th. Wrege - L. Brottier, Predigt: TRE 27 (1997) 225-248; W. Mayer, The Dynamics of Liturgical Space. Aspects of the Interaction Between John Chrysostom and His Audiences: EphLit 111 (1997) 104-115; H. Schröter, Osterpredigt: TRE 27 (1997) 530-533; P. Allen - M. Cunningham (eds.), Preacher and Audience. Studies in Early Christian and Byzantine Homiletics (A New History of the Sermon 1), Leiden-

Boston-Köln 1998; P. Allen, The Sixth-Century Greek Homily. A Re-Assessment, in ibid., 201-225; J.H. Barkhuizen, Proclus of Constantinople. A Popular Preacher in Fifth-Century Constantinople, in ibid., 179-200; W. Mayer, John Chrysostom. Extraordinary Preacher, Ordinary Audience, in ibid., 105-137; A. Meredith, The Three Cappadocians on Beneficence. A Key to Their Audience, in ibid., 89-104; G. Madec (ed.), Augustin prédicateur (395–411). Actes du Colloque International de Chantilly (5-7 septembre 1996) (Collection des Études Augustiniennes, Série Antiquité 159), Paris 1998; J.-P. Bouhot, Augustin prédicateur d'après le De doctrina christiana, in ibid., 49-61; H.O. Old, The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church, 2 vols., Grand Rapids, MI-Cambridge 1998; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, Milan [3]1998, III, 268-277; Ph. Rousseau, The Preacher's Audience. A More Optimistic View, in T. Hillard - R.A. Kearsley - C.E.V. Nixon - A. Nobbs (eds.), Ancient History in a Modern University, Grand Rapids, MI-Cambridge 1998, 391-400; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Lamb's High Feast. Melito, Peri Pascha and the Quartodeciman Paschal Liturgy at Sardis, Leiden 1998; B. Studer, Schola Christiana, Paderborn 1998; E. Bona, Et tamen cessavit illa incessabilis vox. L'ininterrotta predicazione di Cesario nei due libri della Vita Caesarii Arelatensis: QDipFLTCl (1999) 465-490; W. Mayer, Female Participation and the Late Fourth-Century Preacher's Audience: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 139-147; E. Montanari, Introduzione, in E. Montanari - M. Pratesi - S. Puccini (ed.), Leone Magno. I sermoni quaresimali e sulle collette, Florence 1999, 9-42; R.H. Mounce, Preaching, Kerygma, in G.F. Hawthorne - R.P. Martin - D. G. Reid (ed.), Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, Downers Grove, IL 1993, 735-737; A. Olivar, Sévère d'Antioche prédicateur: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 74 (1999) 54-60; H. Savon, Ambroise prédicateur: ibid. 33-45; R. Zerfass - A. Weiser - A. Merkt, Predigt, in LTK[3] 8, 525-528; E. Bona, Cesario d'Arles. Predicare la parola, Magnano (BI) 2000; R.P. Vaggione, Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution, Oxford 2000; A. Grappone, Annotazioni sulla cronologia delle omelie di Origene: Augustinianum 41, 1 (2001a) 27-58; Id., Annotazioni sul contesto liturgico delle omelie di Origene: Augustinianum 41, 2 (2001b) 329-362; W. Mayer, At Constantinople, How Often Did John Chrysostom Preach? Addressing Assumptions About the Workload of a Bishop: SE 40 (2001a) 83-105; Id., The Homily as Historical Document. Some Problems in Relation to John Chrysostom: Lutheran Theological Journal 35 (2001b) 17-22; S.E. Porter (ed.), Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 BC–AD 400, Boston-Leiden 2001; W. Kinzig, The Greek Christian Writers, in ibid., 633-670; Ph.E. Satterthwaite, The Latin Church Fathers, in ibid., 671-694; A. Stewart-Sykes, From Prophecy to Preaching. A Search for Origins of Christian Homily, Leiden 2001; M. Sodi - A.M. Triacca (ed.), Dizionario di Omiletica, Leumann (TO)-Gorle (BG) 2002 (rist. dell'ed. 1998); F. Bergamelli, Pseudo-Clemente. Seconda lettera, in ibid., 1275-1277; B. Carucci, Liturgia sinagogale, in ibid., 859-862; C. Ghidelli, Predicazione. Nella Chiesa apostolica, in ibid., 1211-1216; J. Heriban, Paolo di Tarso, in ibid., 1064-1069; A. Monaci Castagno, Origene, in ibid., 1050-1053; A. Olivar, Predicazione. Nella Chiesa antica, in ibid., 1216-1222; A.M. Triacca, Eusebio Gallicano, in ibid., 519-523; G. Visonà, Omelie pasquali patristiche, in ibid., 1023-1030; J. Leemans - W. Mayer - P. Allen - B. Dehandschutter, 'Let us die that we may live'. Greek Homilies on Christian Martyrs from Asia Minor, Palestine and Syria (c. AD 350–AD 450), London-New York 2003; R. Stuhlman, Weinachtspredigt: TRE 35 (2003) 468-471; P. De Navascués, Pablo de Samosata y sus adversarios. Estudio histórico-teológico del cristianismo antioqueno en el s. III (SEA 87), Rome 2004; F. Fatti, Omelia XI: Le primizie. Questioni di deontologia sacerdotale, in M. Maritano - E. dal Covolo (ed.), Omelie sui Numeri. Lettura origeniana (Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 186), Rome 2004, 35-81; Id., "In ossequio alle leggi dell'encomio." Retorica e ideologia in Gregorio Nazianzeno, in Comunicazione e ricezione del documento cristiano in epoca tardoantica. Atti del XXXII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome, 8-10 maggio 2003 (SEA 90), Rome 2004, 613-658; S. Dagemark, Augustine's Sermons. Circulation and Authenticity Evidenced by Examples of Preaching and Response, in ibid., 693-743; S.J. Voicu, "Furono chiamati giovanniti . . ." Un'ipotesi sulla nascita del corpus pseudocrisostomico, in B. Janssens - B. Roosen - P. Van Deun (eds.), Philomathestatos. Studies in Greek Patristic and Byzantine Texts Presented to Jacques Noret for His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, Leuven-Paris-Dudley, MA 2004, 701-712; M.L. Fobelli, Un tempio per Giustiniano. Santa Sofia di Costantinopoli e la Descrizione di Paolo Silenziario, Rome 2005; W. Mayer, The Homilies of St John Chrysostom—Provenance. Reshaping the Foundations (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 273), Rome 2005; C. Rapp, Holy Bishops in Late Antiquity. The Nature of Christian Leadership in an Age of Transition, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 2005; R. Romano, Il ritmo prosastico nelle Omelie per Eutropio di Giovanni Crisostomo, in Giovanni Crisostomo. Oriente e Occidente tra IV e V secolo. XXXIII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome, 6-8 maggio 2004 (SEA 93), Rome 2005, 305-314; A. Martin, Alexandrie. L'investissement chrétien de la ville, in J.-O. Boudon - F. Thélamon (éds.), Les chrétiens dans la ville. Actes du Colloque: "Les chrétiens dans la ville," Rouen, 5-6 janvier 2000, Mont-Saint-Aignan 2006, 47-63; D. E. Serra, The Baptistery at Dura-Europos. The Wall Painting in the Context of Syrian Baptismal Theology: Ephemerides Liturgicae 120 (2006) 67-78.

F. Fatti

PREDESTINATION. In the opinion of many, the doctrine of predestination is inextricably tied to the name of St. *Augustine. It is, therefore, helpful to recall that the Augustine was not the first or the only among the ancient *fathers of the church to discuss this theological teaching. He only developed—even though in an entirely original way—a discussion that had already begun before him. St. *Jerome provided information on the origin of the issue of predestination when he explained the words of the apostle *Paul: qui me segregavit ex utero matris meae (Gal 1:15-16). Jerome placed this alongside the statement in Mal 1:1-2, originally cited in Rom 9:10-13, on the twins Jacob and Esau, observing that precisely on these and similar scriptural texts, the *gnostics had established their doctrine of the various types of people predestined to good or evil (In Ep. ad Gal. I, 1: PL 26, 350). Jerome simply referred to ideas taken directly from *Origen. In fact, even the Alexandrian teacher in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, after having cited the words of the apostle Paul: segregatus in Evangelium (Rom 1:1), and those very similar passages such as Gal 1:15-16, observed that the gnostics had appealed to these texts to support the idea that "there are men saved on account of their natural constitution and some, using these words, have tried to deny the freedom of the will" (Philocalia 25,1: SC 226, 212).

The most complete treatment of the topic was given by Origen in his explanation of Rom 8:28-29, where he observed that "the principle of calling and justification is not predestination. If it were this principle, those who maintain the absurd doctrine of nature would be in possession of the most persuasive arguments. But before predestination there was foreknowledge: those whom he foreknew, he says, he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his son. Therefore, God having set his gaze beforehand on the chain of future events and having known the inclination (hormē) of the freedom of certain men toward godliness—as well as the momentum toward godliness that follows the inclination because he also knew that these men would give themselves totally to a virtuous life—he knew them beforehand, he, the one who knows the present and the future. And those whom he thus knew in this way beforehand, he predestined to be conformed to the image of his son" (ibid. 25,2: SC 226, 216). At this point, Origen noticed: "One must not therefore think that the foreknowledge of God is the cause of future events." To the contrary, it is because future events must come about in conformity to the will of man who acts, which God foreknew, the one who knows all things before they occur (Dan 13:42). With respect to the other verse: now we know that for those who love God all things work together for good, to those who were called according to his purpose (Scimus autem quoniam diligentibus Deum omnia cooperantur in bonum, iis qui secundum propositum vocati sunt sancti), Origen observed that the same words "clearly show that the cause of the design and the divine foreknowledge depends on our freedom" (ibid. 25,3: SC 226, 224). The apostle, prechosen and predestined by God, does not therefore immediately have a necessity to be righteous because God saw beforehand that he would be righteous: "he was chosen to the gospel not because his nature presented something exceptional or superior—because of his constitution—to the natures of those who were not made thus, but thanks to their actions (praxeis) which were first known and then realized, each one according to the Apostle's preparation and free choice" (ibid. 25,4: SC 226, 230). In Book VII of the same commentary, Origen distinguished foreknowledge acc. to basic human understanding which is simple intellectual foresight, and foreknowledge acc. to *Scripture, which implies love, but reaffirms that the "cause of our salvation or perdition is not found in God's foreknowledge," but in the decision and the free choices of the person, which, foreseen by God, determine one's election. Foreknowledge and predestination, therefore, have the same object and the same scope (In Ep. ad Rom. VII, 8: PG 14, 1126B-C), and in no case does foreknowledge annul freedom and human responsibility.

As one can see, Origen was concerned with defending against the gnostics, on the one hand, the goodness and righteousness of God, and on the other, the freedom and moral responsibility of the person. To reconcile the two different demands, he leaned toward the principle that God chooses, predestines and calls only those whom he foresaw would have a well-disposed will to be conformed to the image of his Son. With respect to glorification and every other grace, such as the apostle Paul's apostolate, God predestined and calls the one whom he foresaw would merit with good works a superior grace.

Origen's doctrine was received in the East and also in the West, where one can perceive the same personal emphasis in the writings of an anonymous author named *Ambrosiaster and in the writings of *Hilary. Ambrosiaster explained Rom 8:28-29 in such a way as to make God's call depend upon faith acc. to the foreknowledge of a good disposition to believe: those called secundum propositum are those quos credentes praesciit deus futuros sibi idoneos, ut, antequam crederent, scirentur, while those chosen and predestined ad praemia capessenda are those whom God praescivit futuros sibi devotos, not with a temporal righteousness, as occurred in the case of *Judas, but with a persevering righteousness (In Rom. 8,28-29: CSEL 81/1, 290-291). It was precisely for this reason that he heavily emphasized that *faith was a meritorious human work: credere autem et non credere voluntatis est . . . et ideo ad meritum proficit (ibid. 129-130).

For his part, Hilary excluded above all that divine election could be the product of an indiscriminate judgment, sed ex meriti electu facta discretio est (In Ps. 64,5: CSEL 22, 236). While considering perseverance in faith as the gift of God, he was convinced that to begin a good work depended on the human will because human will hoc proprium ex se debet, ut velit . . . meritum . . . adipiscendae consummationis est ex initio voluntatis (In Ps. 118, Nun, 20: CSEL 22, 486). The priority of the human will with respect to God's grace is again clearly affirmed elsewhere: imbecilla enim est per se aliquid obtinendi humana infirmitas, et hoc tantum naturae suae officium est, ut adgregare se in familia dei et velit et coeperit. Divinae vero misericordiae est, ut volentes adiuvet, incipientes confirmet, adeuntes recipiat: ex nobis autem initium est, ut ille perficiat ["human weakness is very weak for obtaining something on its own, and this alone is the duty of its nature, namely, that it both desire and begin to betake itself into the family of God. Now, it is a characteristic of divine mercy to help those who are willing, confirm those beginning and receive those along the way: for the beginning is from us so that he may bring it to completion"] (In Ps. 118, Ain, 10: CSEL 22, 501). The two authors, therefore, echo Origen in making divine election depend on justification and the glory of the foreknowledge of man's good disposition, embodied in faith and good will; but they emphasize the autonomy of the act of faith or good will because they think that divine election cannot be an indiscriminate act but must be based on individual merit.

Now, it was therefore precisely to these authors that Augustine drew near during the period of his service as a presbyter. Invited to explain Romans 8:28: Quoniam quos ante praescivit, et praedestinavit conformes imaginis Filii sui ("because those whom he foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his son"), he wrote: "not all those who have been called have in fact been called according to the design: this design, in fact, belongs to foreknowledge and predestination and God has not predestined anyone unless he knew that they would believe and follow his call, i.e., those whom he also calls the 'elect'" (Exp. quar. prop. ex Ep. Rom. 47 [55]: CSEL 84,30). Then explaining Romans 9:11-13 on the outcome of Jacob and Esau to those who had been disturbed by this Pauline text because it appeared to them to deny free will, he responds by appealing to the foreknowledge with which God knew, before they had been born, what type each one of the two was bound to be. But because this response can seem contrary to the apostle, who excludes that election is acc. to works (ex operibus), he specifies that the object of election in foreknowledge was not works of faith, because "if one does not believe in him and does not persist in the will of receiving, he does not receive God's gift, i.e., the Holy Spirit." Just like Hilary, the presbyter Augustine emphasized that electio presupposed merits, "because in things that are absolutely equal, one cannot speak of election" and, as did Ambrosiaster, repeated that believing is an autonomous work of the person: quod ergo credimus, nostrum est ("the fact that we believe is our doing") (Augustine, ibid. 52 (60): CSEL 84, 35). Faith and a good will are both considered the direct object of election in foreknowledge: Non ergo elegit Deus bene operantes, sed credentes potius, ut ipse illos faciat bene operari. Nostrum enim est credere et velle, illius autem dare credentibus et volentibus facultatem bene operandi per Spiritum Sanctum ("God, therefore, did not choose the ones who do good works, but rather those who believe so that he may cause them to do good works. For it is our duty to believe and to will, but it is his duty to give believers and those who desire it the ability to do good works through the Holy Spirit") (Augustine, ibid. 53 [61]: CSEL 84, 36). As one can tell, with regard to the theme of predestination, Augustine simply reused a reflection already employed by others and in their own terms. Therefore, one cannot impute to Augustine alone the accusation of being detached from St. Paul's understanding of this theological question, as many theologians and recent exegetes are accustomed to reiterate, because he accepted an individualistic perspective of predestination. Augustine's reflection on grace and predestination, as in the case of the other doctrinal points, must be read and evaluated keeping in mind the historical and cultural context in which it was developed.

In light of this basic methodological principle, the theological change found in his Ad Simpl. I, 2 seems to be less scandalous than one may think. In the famous quaestio, in fact, the Bishop of Hippo without a doubt completed a great step forward in theology, starting from Scripture's teachings, and in particular that of the apostle, that had been overlooked by earlier theologians, i.e., the absolute gratuity and freedom of God's action with regard to human salvation. Though confirming the necessity of voluntary human cooperation, beginning with the Ad Simpl. I, 2, St. Augustine recognized the necessity of grace already from the initium fidei, which he had earlier assigned to human will, in such a way that truly, as the apostle says, "let him who glories, glory in the Lord" (2 Cor 10:17—Ad Simpl. I, 2,21). Earlier, like *Hilary, he had maintained that electio, in order to be just, demands a certain difference of merit between the one who is elected and the one who is not (ibid. I, 2,4). Now, however, he came to see electio to justification as a mysterious act of God's mercy: facing St. Paul's conversion, who, "unforeseeably from an amazing persecutor of the gospel, was made its more amazing preacher," he confessed that he could not find an explanation at the human level (ibid. I, 2,22).

The recognition of the full gratuity of election and call to justification, however, raised the problem of the nonelect. He operated under the presupposition that all people are sinners because of original *sin (ibid. I, 2,16), because from the one mass of those condemned, God "requires the debt from whom he wants and remits from whom he wants? . . . Why to this one yes and to the other no?" The answer given at the beginning of his episcopal ministry would remain the same for the remainder of his life: "if you do not pay the debt owed, you have someone to thank; if you pay the debt, you have no reason to complain" (ibid. I, 2,22). God certainly does nothing so that the sinner becomes more evil, but neither does he give something to make the sinner better (ibid. I, 2,15); God "does not force anyone to sin, he only refrains from granting his mercy and justification to some sinners" (ibid. I, 2,16). Therefore, the idea of a predestination to evil is entirely excluded. Nevertheless, the conclusion that God's mercy is only extended to some and not to all sinners was too harsh and, in fact, the magisterium of the Catholic Church has never appropriated it, in contrast to Augustine's doctrine of the gratuity of election and the necessity of *grace.

Why did Augustine reach such a harsh affirmation? Without a doubt, as he himself says, he defended the gratuity of grace with an insurmountable bulwark (munitione) (Dono pers. 21,54). The deepest reason, however, must be identified in the common conviction of earlier theologians that election or predestination does not extend to all persons, but only to some. The framing of the discussion in this manner among the Fathers was caused first by the gnostic teaching of various categories of people naturally destined to salvation or perdition, and subsequently the doctrine of the necessity of baptism and the church for salvation (extra Ecclesiam nulla salus*). Such a disposition in Augustine can already be seen at the beginning of his famous change (cf. Ad Simpl. I, 2,2.17.22) and increasingly appears more clearly every time he explicitly mentions the fate of infants who die without *baptism (Ep. 149,2,17 and 22; C. Iul. 4,8,43; Opus imp. 4,125; Praed. sanct. 12,23ff.). In fact, with regard to the hypothesis that the children who die without baptism are excluded from eternal salvation, it becomes clear that some children are elect and others not. At that time in the West, this idea was held by all, with the exception of the *Pelagians; for this reason even the provincial monks were obliged to have recourse to the theory of future contingents.

In the last years of his life, however, accused of fatalism by the Pelagians and the monks of *Hadrumetum and heavily criticized by those from *Marseille, Augustine composed various works (De gratia et libero arbitrio, De correptione et gratia, De praedestinatione sanctorum, De dono perseverantiae) in which one reads important qualifications on predestination. Defining predestination as the "foreknowledge and preparation of God's gifts, with which all those who are delivered are truly delivered," he emphasized that the object of predestination is the works of God and no longer the sins of men. God knows and desires from eternity all that he himself will do in time in order to deliver all individual human beings from evil or to punish them because of their sin. Sins, however, are not the object of predestination, but rather are only the object of divine foreknowledge. One concludes that predestination "is such that it cannot exist without foreknowledge, although foreknowledge can exist without predestination. Through predestination, in fact, God knew beforehand the things that he would do. But he has the power to know beforehand even those things that he himself does not do such as every type of sin" (Praed. sanct. 10,19).

These are clear explanations that are unfortunately ignored by those who continue to attribute to Augustine the idea of a double predestination to good and evil in the manner of John Calvin. This idea does not at all coincide with that likewise equally unacceptable idea of abandonment to perdition or the denial of mercy to the nonelect, that Calvin continued to repeat to the very end. The idea that the predestination of the individual faithful should be seen in light of the results of Jesus Christ's own predestination was an authentically Pauline idea: "there is in fact no more glorious example of predestination than the mediator himself. If any believer wants to understand it, the believer should look at Christ and find oneself in him" (Dono pers. 24,67); "as that One alone was therefore predestined to be our head, we too have been predestined to be his members" (Praed. sanct. 15,31). Lastly, one should recall that *Prosper of Aquitaine, who, defending the Augustinian doctrine against the accusation of the provincial monks in his work De vocatione omnium gentium, knew how to proclaim the universality of God's salvific will with greater clarity than his teacher Augustine.

H.-D. Simonin, Prédestination: DTC 12, 2815-2896; O. Rottmanner, Der Augustinismus. Eine dogmengeschichtliche Studie, Munich 1892; J. Chéné, La théologie de saint Augustin, Grâce et prédestination, Le Puy-Lyon 1961; V. Boublík, La predestinazione; S. Paolo e S. Agostino, Rome 1961; A. Trapè, A proposito di predestinazione. S. Agostino e i suoi critici moderni: Divinitas 7 (1963) 243-284; R. Bernard, La prédestination du Christ total selon saint Augustin: RecAug 3 (1965) 1-58; MySal IV/2, 776-800 (It. tr. IX, 229-272); D. Marafioti, Il problema dell'"initium fidei" in sant'Agostino fino al 397: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 541-565; Id., Alle origini del teorema della predestinazione (Simpl I,2,13-22), in SEA 25, Rome 1987, II, 257-277; G. Lettieri, L'altro Agostino, Ermeneutica e retorica della grazia dalla crisi alla metamorfosi del De doctrina christiana, Rome 2001; P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo, London 1967, 398-407; J.M. Rist, Augustine on Free Will and Predestination: JTS 20 (1969), 420-447; J.P. Burns, The Development of Augustine's Doctrine of Operative Grace, Paris, 1980.

S. Folgado Flórez - N. Cipriani

PRESANCTIFIED. Presanctified refers to the consecrated species in a eucharistic celebration that is then used in another liturgical act, whether private or public. Initially, both species were preserved, later only the bread (Procedunt [diaconi] cum corpore et sanguine Domini quod ante diem remansit—Sacram. Gelas. 418). This practice originated as a service only for the sick who did not participate in the Sunday celebration, then it was used for other individual faithful, and finally, for everyone in a particular liturgical celebration, expressed differently in the various liturgical traditions. The spread of the practice of the so-called missa praesanctificatorum celebration is still practiced in the Latin liturgy on Good Friday, while in the *Byzantine churches it is common throughout *Lent, except on Saturday and Sunday. In the *Syriac liturgy, in order to designate the liturgy of the presanctified, the name ordo uel anaphora consignationis is used, derived from the blessing of the chalice by the celebrant with a previously consecrated particle of the host. The liturgy of the presanctified, believed by ancient authors to be of apostolic origins, and by others attributed without basis to *Gregory the Great, is confirmed only from the 7th c., but it could reasonably be older. For Andrieu it is a Byzantine creation; for Thibaut it is of Jerusalem or Syrian origin, based on a testimony of the Nomocanon of Bar Hebraeus attributed to Severus of Antioch. Certain references to the Mass of the presanctified are found in the Chronicon paschale (the notice for the year 617), while the established normative text is canon 52 of the Council *in Trullo II. The common use of the ancient church was, in general, decidedly aliturgicial for the Lenten weekdays and esp. Good Friday, days of a penitential and fasting character. The renewal of the celebration after None (the 9th hour, mid-afternoon prayer) or at the daily time of Vespers, in fact, declines due to the difficulty the elderly had in breaking their fast, even if only to receive Communion. In the West, such a use continued until the 8th c., in the Mozarabic and *Ambrosian liturgies until modern times. The Ordo of Einsiedeln affirms that at Rome from the 8th c. it was possible to communicate in the tituli (M. Andrieu, III, 272), and at the end of the century the Mass of the presanctified was even introduced into the papal liturgy. In the East, at the same time, the liturgy of the presanctified was affirmed and described by Theodore the Studite (see Epist. Lib. II, 219,4; Explicatio divinae liturgiae praesanctificatorum, PG 99, 1687-1690).

H. Leclercq, Messe des présanctifiés, DACL, 11, 770-771; I. Ziadé, Présanctifiés (messe des) DTC, 13, 77-111; H.W. Codrington, The Syrian Liturgies of the Presanctified: JTS 4 (1903) 69-82; JTS 5 (1904) 369-377; 537-545; Id., Liturgia praesanctificatorum syriaca sancti Joannis Chrysostomi: Studi e ricerche intorno a S. Giovanni Cristostomo, ed. by the Committee for the 15th Centenary of His Death, Rome 1908, 719-729; Id., Studies of the Syrian Liturgies, London 1952; J.B Thibaut, Monuments de la notion ecphonétique et hagiopolite de l'Église grecque, St. Petersburg 1917; M. Andrieu, Immixtio et consecratio. La consécration par contact dans les documents liturgiques du moyen âge, Paris 1924; Id., Les ordines Romani du haut moyen âge, III, Louvain 1961; L. Duchesne, Origines du culte chrétien, Paris 1925, 74.262-263; M. Righetti, Storia della Liturgia, Milan 1950, I, 109; Id., Storia della Liturgia, Milan 1955, II, 162.166; S. Janeras, La partie vespérale de la Liturgie Byzantine des Présanctifiés, OCP 30 (1964) 193-222; Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Aeclesiae ordinis anni circuli, ed. L.C. Mohlberg - L. Einzenhöfer, Rome 1981; M. Arranz, La liturgie des Présanctifiés de l'ancien Euchologe byzantin, OCP 47 (1981) 332-388; S. Alexopoulos, The Presanctified Liturgy in the Byzantine Rite, Louvain 2009.

R. Ronzani

PRESBYTERS. The term presbyter—a comparative adjective from the noun presbys, which refers to the oldest person; a mature person, who over time has shown wisdom in dealing with persons and things—occurs 12 times in the NT. It originally meant "elder," but immediately in the first Christian community, it became a technical term referring not to one's age but to an individual who was responsible for leading and therefore one who possessed wisdom and authority. In the Jewish tradition, the elders were those who had an authority at the local level; in the period of the Maccabees, it referred to those who ruled in the cities and villages, esp. *Jerusalem. They were men of the law (1 Macc 7:33; 11:23; 12:6 and 35; 14:20; 2 Macc 1:10; 4:44; 11:27; 13:13). During the Second Temple period, the Jewish communities had a college of presbyters, a gerousia (in Jerusalem it was called the Sanhedrin, made up of 70 individuals and the High Priest), in service to the communities. In the Diaspora, the number of members of the college of elders varied acc. to the size of the community: 70 at *Alexandria, 35 in Cyrenaica, etc.

In the first Christian community, those who had authority were the "apostles and elders [presbyters]"; in Jerusalem the presbyters participated actively in the administration of the community (Acts 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4) and were connected to *James (Acts 21:18). *Paul and *Barnabas during their first trip appointed some presbyters: "And when they had appointed elders [presbyters] for them in every church, with prayer and fasting they committed them to the Lord in whom they believed" (Acts 14:23). At Miletus, Paul "sent to *Ephesus to call the presbyters of the church" (Acts 20:17), who were subsequently called "bishops" (20:28). The presbyters were important and specific figures in the Pastoral Epistles: "the laying on of hands by the college of presbyters [elders]" (1 Tim 4:14). They held the presidency (1 Tim 5:17; cf. 1 Pet 5:5); presbyters were established in every city (Tit 1:5). The Pastoral Epistles specify the qualities that the primary leaders, the bishops and the deacons, must have (1 Tim 3:2-12); those same qualities were required of the presbyters (Tit 1:5-9). In this letter, two terms are used: episkopos and presbyteros; in Latin they were only transliterated and were interchangeable. The epistle of *James exhorts that during every illness one should call the presbyters of the church presbyteri ecclesiae (5:14).

*Clement of Rome wrote that the *apostles had appointed presbyters in every city where they had preached: "after having tested them in the spirit" (1 Clem. 42,4-5), they received the episkopē (44,1; 44,3 and 5). From the apostolic nomination of the presbyters, presbyters were elected by the communities: the apostles "established those whom we mentioned earlier and then gave them the order that upon their death other men would succeed them in the ministry. Those who were appointed by them or other famous men with the agreement of the whole community . . . should not be replaced" (1 Clem 44,2-3). The Didache* names bishops and deacons as those the community must choose who are "worthy of the Lord and who are kind and not given to money" (15,1). Presenting himself as the leader, *Polycarp wrote to the Philippians along with the presbyters (1,1) and also mentioned the deacons (5,2) and the presbyters (6,1); he criticized the Presbyter valens of Philippi who abused his position (11,1).

With *Ignatius of Antioch there appears a clear distinction of the triad: bishops, presbyters, deacons, always listed in this order or vice versa (deacons, presbyters and bishops). The bishop is surrounded by his presbytery: in Christian texts there is no mention of a gerousia (council), perhaps to emphasize individual rather than collective responsibilities. Nevertheless, even in the later language of the Fathers, the term presbyter continued to have a nontechnical meaning, i.e., it was used to refer to an elderly and wise person. Moreover, at times, other terms were also used: pastor, those who rule. Consequently, in the most ancient Christian texts the term presbyter had a plurality of meanings: an elderly man, a wise and venerable man; it could be applied to an apostle, be a synonym for "bishop," a member of the bishop's council, the witness of the Christian tradition, etc. It is not easy to determine the precise meaning in a given text because the nontechnical use persisted. *Irenaeus spoke of successio presbyterorum (Adv. Haer. 3,2,2) and a successio episcoporum for the Roman church, and it seems clear that the two terms were interchangeable for him; later authors were aware that "elder" was one of the term's older meanings (John Chrysostom, Hom. 1,1 in Phil). In the 3rd c., the Latin translation of *Firmilian's letter to *Cyprian also used nontechnical terminology: maiores natu for presbyter (PL 3, 1209A) and seniores et praepositi for presbyters and bishops (PL 3, 1206; cf. *Tertullian, De pudic. 14,16: praesidens). With the passing of time, the technical meaning was imposed more frequently to refer to a precise office in the Christian community, distinct from that of the bishop and deacons. Their obligations and rights were specified both in relation to bishops and deacons. For these aspects, see *bishop, *celibacy of the clergy, *clergy, *laying-on of hands, *ministries, *preaching and *presbyters, apostolic.

GLNT 11, 81-172 (= TDNT 6, 651-683); LTK³ 8, 558-568; var. aus., Il ministero e i ministeri secondo il Nuovo Testamento, ed. J. Delorme, Rome 1977; J.T. Burtchaell, From Synagogue to Church. Public Services and Offices in the Earliest Christian Communities, Cambridge 1992; A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité. Pouvoir d'innover et retour à l'ordre dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1992; S. Felici (ed.), Sacerdozio battesimale e formazione teologica, Rome 1992; E. Dassmann, Ämter und Dienste in den frühchristlichen Gemeinden, Bonn 1994; R.A. Campbell, The Elders. Seniority Within Earliest Christianity, Edinburgh 1994; J. Ysebaert, Die Amtsterminologie im Neuen Testament und in der Alten Kirche, Breda 1994; U. Falesiedi, Le diaconie. Servizi assistenziali nella chiesa antica, Rome 1995; E. Wipszycka, Études sur le christianisme dans l'Égypte de l'antiquité tardive, Rome 1996; E. Cattaneo, I ministeri nella Chiesa antica. Testi patristici dei primi secoli, Milan 1997; A. Hoffmann, Kirchliche Strukturen und Römisches Recht bei Cyprian von Karthago, Paderborn 2000; R. Godding, Prêtres en Gaule mérovingienne, Brussels 2001; L. Padovese, I sacerdoti dei primi secoli. Testimonianze dei Padri sui ministeri ordinati, Casale Monf. ²2002.

A. Di Berardino

PRESBYTERS, APOSTOLIC. The presence of *presbyters, i.e., elders, is well attested already from the beginning in the early *Jerusalem community, alongside the college of apostles (cf. Acts 11:30; 15:2-23; 16:4; 21:18). In the area of *Paul's mission, presbyters appeared, however, as successors appointed as the collaborators of the apostles with subordinate functions to the "overseers" of the communities (Acts 14:23). At Miletus, Paul called together the presbyters of the church of *Ephesus (Acts 20:17). In 1 Tim (4:14; 5:17, 19) and Tit (1:5), he ordered that presbyters be appointed in every city. At least two times, the elders also received the title "bishops" (Acts 20:28 and Tit 1:7). Likewise at *Corinth, at the end of the 1st c., the community was led by presbyter-bishops (1 Clem. 1,3; 42,4; 44,1-5; 47,6; 54,2; 57,1). The presbyters preached and exhorted, acc. to the anonymous homilist of 2 Clem. 15,2; 17,3; 19,1; they prayed over the sick and anointed them with oil in the name of the Lord acc. to Jas 5:14. The author of 1 Peter referred to himself as a sympresbyteros in relation to the recipients of his letter in *Asia Minor (5:1) and exhorted the young men to be subject to the presbyters (5:5). An anonymous figure who referred to himself as the "presbyter," without any other qualification, is the author of 1 Jn and 3 Jn.

*Ignatius of Antioch introduced the novelty of a clear distinction between the figure of the monarchical bishop, leader of the community, and the presbyters along with the deacons subordinate to him (e.g., Magn. 6,1; Smyrn. 8,1). But in the terminology of his contemporary *Papias of Hierapolis, the presbyters are still of the "disciples of the Lord"; they belong, i.e., to the apostolic generation of the immediate followers of Jesus. In distinction to *Luke, who differentiated the group of the Twelve *Apostles from the 70/72 disciples and the presbyters of the early community of Jerusalem, for Papias all of them indistinctly constitute the group of the presbyters-disciples. In the famous and controversial introduction to his work titled Explanation of the Sayings of the Lord, Papias states that he personally saw and heard the presbyters, whom he identified simply as "the disciples of Lord," and that he, moreover, also confirmed his teachings by the words of other witnesses, who were likewise followers of the presbyters-disciples (see the citation of the fragment in Eus., HE 3,39,3-4). In particular, we know that Papias was a follower of the presbyter *John. Papias mentioned this individual twice: the first within a group of disciples, *Andrew, *Peter, *Philip, Thomas, *James and *Matthew; the second along with a certain *Aristion, who was likewise a disciple of the Lord. *Irenaeus maintained that, at the school of *John (the apostle and the author of the gospel, the letters and the *Apocalypse), Papias was the companion of *Polycarp of Smyrna (Haer. V, 33,4).

The heavy criticism that *Eusebius (HE 3, 39,2-7; 11-13) leveled against Irenaeus's testimony emanates above all from his complete misunderstanding of the arcane language used by Papias when he identified the presbyters and disciples. For Eusebius, Papias's text would indicate the existence of two distinct Johns, the apostle-evangelist and the presbyter. The explicit antichiliastic debate led Eusebius, following the path of *Dionysius of Alexandria, to attribute to the Presbyter the composition of the Apocalypse (on the distinction of the two Johns and the history of the two tombs at Ephesus, see Dionysius, cited in HE 7, 25,16). Affirming that Papias had never seen or personally heard the apostles, but that he was only a follower of the presbyters Aristion and John, Eusebius primarily intended to discredit his *millennialism. Unfortunately, Eusebius's tendentious interpretation has engendered a large amount of confusion (and it is not the first nor the last time) among scholars, as one can easily verify by reading the dense bibl. on the subject.

The distinction between apostles and presbyters that Eusebius took for granted and that prevented him from fully understanding Papias's testimony was clearly developed for the first time by Irenaeus of Lyons. He defined the "presbyters" as those who have seen and heard the apostles, who were, i.e., "disciples of the apostles," who in turn saw and heard the Lord Jesus, i.e., they were his disciples. This special relationship of discipleship implied that, as apostles, they were "eyewitnesses" of the life and teaching of Jesus; in the same way the presbyters in turn were "eyewitnesses" of the life and teaching of the apostles. Therefore there exists a chain of succession that, starting from Jesus, saw the apostles placed on the second rung and the presbyters on the third. In the course of his work, Irenaeus made frequent reference to the authority and teaching received by one or more presbyters. By thus placing himself at the fourth, and last, place in the chain of transmission of the truth, Irenaeus offered his readers the guarantee of the apostolic authenticity of his teaching in contrast to the wild dreams and lies of the *gnostic heretics.

Irenaeus almost never names these presbyters, and this silence has inevitably given rise to various speculations on their number and identity. In any case, it seems that they were representatives of the ecclesiastical and theological tradition of Asia Minor who seem to have been in close contact with the apostle John, who lived until the end of the *Trajan era, and that they did not combat the disciples of *Valentinus, whose doctrine they still did not know (IV, praef. 2). These precious bits of chronological information cannot but lead us to the end of the 1st c.–1st half of the 2nd c. The presbyters were guardians and guarantors of the correct faith and interpretation of the *Scriptures, the apostolic tradition and the legitimate episcopal succession (IV, 26,2-5; V, 20,1-2). The arguments by which Irenaeus appealed to the tradition of the presbyters are the most diverse. They contain, e.g., a tight argument on the chronology of the life of Jesus (Haer. II, 22,5); they confirm that Enoch and *Elijah were transported into *paradise (V, 5,1); and they explain various other complex questions esp. regarding eschatology (V, 30,1; 33,3; 36,1-3). The presbyters, disciples of the apostles, are also present in the Epid. 3 and 61 inasmuch as they are the sole and authentic guarantors of the demonstration of the apostolic preaching.

But to one of these presbyters Irenaeus felt himself esp. tied: he referred to him as "the best among us" (I, praef. 2; I, 13,3; III, 17,4), "divine" and "saintly" (I, 15,6). It is most likely the case that it is the same earlier theologian to whom Irenaeus appealed in III, 23,3; IV, 4,2; IV, 41,2 and V, 17,4. Above all, a long section of book IV, 27,1–32,1 reports the teachings of an anonymous "presbyter," a disciple of the apostles, whom Irenaeus maintains he personally heard (Latin translation of IV, 27,1 presents the presbyter as a disciple of the disciples of the apostles, but is clearly imprecise: cf. IV, 32,1 and Beatrice [1990] 181). Already Eusebius had noted the special importance that this "apostolic presbyter" had for Irenaeus, despite the silence on his name (HE 5,8,8). There is no reason to think it refers to Papias of Hierapolis, because it is not a given that Irenaeus was ever a direct "hearer" of this figure.

The identification of this anonymous teacher of Irenaeus with Polycarp of Smyrna, likewise a disciple of John along with Papias, is rendered highly probable by the comparison with the information reported in Adv. Haer. III, 3 and likewise in the Letter to Florinus (cited by Eusebius, HE 5, 20,4-8). In this document, Polycarp, who was accustomed to mention his dealings with John and the other apostles, eyewitnesses of the life of the Lord (V, 20,6), is referred to by Irenaeus as "the blessed and apostolic presbyter" (V, 20,7), an expression very similar to that of "apostolic teacher" used to refer to Polycarp in Mart. Pol. 16,2 (surprisingly Neymeyr [1989] never provides the reference to Polycarp). One must esp. call attention to a parallel that was certainly not by chance, namely, the fact that both the anonymous presbyter-teacher of Irenaeus (Haer. IV, 30,1) and Polycarp (Irenaeus, Ep. Flor. in Eusebius, HE 5, 20,5) preached in the basilikē aulē (Lat. in regali aula). This expression, badly misunderstood by the entirety of the commentators on this passage as "imperial palace" or "royal court" (see, e.g., A. Rousseau, SC 100/2, 773; Maier, 4; Ayán Calvo, 194; Grant, 159; Hartog, 37; Orbe, 415, who think specifically of the "House of Caesar" at Rome mentioned in Phil 4:22), cannot but refer to the "basilica," i.e., the architectural administrative and commercial structure of *Smyrna, where the Christians also used coins bearing the images of Caesar (not the "goods of Caesar," as the Latin expression ex eis quae Caesaris sunt is currently being translated) to conduct their transactions (cf. Beatrice [1990] 183 and 188).

One should mention that for Irenaeus, only the *quartodeciman *Easter observance practiced by the presbyter *Polycarp was of apostolic origin (John the disciple of the Lord and the other apostles with whom he lived). The *Sunday Easter defended by *Anicetus, however, was only a tradition of their predecessor presbyters, i.e., the bishops of the See of Rome: *Sixtus, *Telesphorus, *Hyginus and *Pius. Evidently, from the Asian and Irenaeus's quartodeciman point of view, one could not call them "apostolic" in the proper sense of the term (see Irenaeus, *Letter to Victor, in Eus., HE 5,24,14-17, and on the tendentious confusion of the information provided by Eusebius, see Beatrice [1983] 45-56).

The oral teaching of Irenaeus's presbyter, whether Polycarp or someone else, is rather important because it is the most ancient testimony we possess. It is dated to just a few years after Papias's fragments and the letters of Ignatius on the theological doctrines and the biblical exegesis as they were taking form in the 1st half of the 2nd c. in Asia Minor in the anti-*Marcionite controversy. Among the most interesting things, one should note the archaic doctrine of the descensus ad inferos (Haer. IV, 27,2), the most ancient orthodox interpretation of the Hebrews' plundering of the treasures of the Egyptians acc. to the book of Exodus (Haer. IV, 30,2-3), the political loyalty that is expressed in appreciation for the positive effects of the pax romana (Haer. IV, 30,3), the coexistence of Pauline (Haer. IV, 27,2 and 4) and Johannine terms (the most ancient mention of the book of Revelation known to us is in Haer. IV, 30,4), the bitter polemics against *Judaism (Haer. IV, 28,3 and 29,2), a monarchical Christology that identifies the Word with the *Father (Haer. IV, 31,2). One should not fail to mention that even other chapters of Irenaeus's work, e.g., Haer. III, 18-23 and IV, 37-39, reflect both partially and indirectly the teachings of this presbyter. One could add, lastly, that some textual variants of the NT present in Irenaeus's writings echo precisely this presbyteral teaching (e.g., lectio brevissima of Jn 13:10 in Haer. IV, 22,1 and the "Western" text of Rom 13:1-7 in Haer. IV, 36,6 and V, 24,1: cf. Beatrice [2003]).

The treatment of various theological themes in these sections of Irenaeus's work reveals the striking, not haphazard, affinities existing between the Asian presbyteral tradition of the 1st half of the 2nd c., represented in its highest form by *Polycarp of Smyrna, and the so-called *Letter to Diognetus. The anonymous author describes himself in 11,1 (which in my opinion is not to be attributed to a later addition but constitutes an integral part of the original text): "disciple of the apostles," i.e., "presbyter" in the sense in which the term was used by Irenaeus (e.g., IV, 32,1: senior apostolorum discipulus; V, 33,3: presbyteri . . . qui Ioannem . . . viderunt; V, 36,2: presbyteri apostolo- rum discipuli), and "teacher of the pagans" (see the title "apostolic teacher" referring to Polycarp in Mart. Pol. 16,2, which synthesizes well the double aspect of his personality as a disciple of the apostles and teacher of the pagans). If H.E. Lona's recent commentary An Diognet (KfA 8, Freiburg 2001) had not completely overlooked such substantial affinities, he would have certainly reached very different and better-grounded results concerning the date and spiritual context of the Letter to Diognetus. The undeniable similarities to *Clement of Alexandria's Protrepticus, upon which the author essentially based his argument, unfortunately, do not at all favor the Alexandrian origin of the Letter to Diognetus ca. AD 200, but, to the contrary, can be interpreted most likely in the sense that even the Letter to Diognetus should be considered an expression, esp. qualified, of that Asiatic presbyteral literature from the 2nd c. that Clement knew very well.

In the Strom. I, 1,11,1-3, Clement says that he was very close to the succession of the apostles. In his book On Easter, he gathered the traditions that he had heard from the voice of the ancient presbyters and mentioned, in this context, the names of the two "Asiatic" luminaries such as *Melito and Irenaeus. In the Hypotyposes he commented upon the *Epistle of Barnabas, concerning the Syrian-Asiatic origin of this document (see my article in J.-M. Sevrin [ed.], The New Testament in Early Christianity, Leuven 1989, 231-245). In the same work, Clement, moreover, mentioned the teaching of an anonymous "blessed presbyter" on the Epistle to the Hebrews, and cited a tradition of the ancient presbyters on the order of the gospels (on this matter, see the extensive and developed account offered by Eusebius of Caesarea, HE 6, 13,2.8-9 and 14,1-7). The presbyters were also mentioned in other texts of Clement (Protr. 113,1; Ecl. proph. 11,1; 27,1.4; 50,1; 56,2; Adumbr. I Jo. 1,1). It is difficult to decipher the placement and specific relationship of *Pantaenus within this group of presbyters. In any case, it seems groundless to think (Daniélou) that in all these texts Clement made reference to a tradition of Alexandrian presbyters—given that this tradition, if it ever existed, is enshrouded in complete darkness—and not to the better known tradition of presbyters in Asia Minor. If, on the contrary, one admits that anonymous writings such as the letter of ps.-*Barnabas and the Letter to Diognetus are not documents of Alexandrian Christianity, as is commonly thought, but must be credited to the tradition of apostolic presbyters in Asia Minor, it provides us the opportunity to acquire elements for an evaluation that undoubtedly will shed new light on the sources of Clement of Alexandria's theological formation.

In conclusion, it is helpful to remember that *Origen mentioned the special interpretation that "one of the presbyters" gave to the parable of the Good Samaritan found in *Luke (Hom. Luc. 34,3 on Lk 10:30-35): the man is *Adam; Jerusalem, paradise; Jericho, the world; the thieves, the hostile forces; the priest, the law; the Levite, the prophets; the Samaritan, Christ, etc. Because Irenaeus makes an offhand allusion to this peculiar interpretation (Haer. III, 17,3), it seems plausible to suggest that, once again, we find ourselves before the vestiges of the teaching of an apostolic presbyter from Asia Minor.

J. Daniélou, Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme, Tournai 1958; J. Munck, Presbyters and Disciples of the Lord in Papias. Exegetic Comments on Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, III,39: HTR 52 (1959) 223-243; W.C. Van Unnik, Irenaeus en de Pax Romana: Kerk en Vrede. Feestbundel voor Prof. J. De Graaf, Baarn 1976, 207-222; Id., The Authority of the Presbyters in Irenaeus' Works, in God's Christ and His People. Studies in Honour of N.A. Dahl, Oslo 1977, 248-260; Ph. Bacq, De l'Ancienne à la Nouvelle Alliance selon S. Irénée. Unité du Livre IV de l' 'Adversus haereses,' Paris-Namur 1978; E.G. Jay, From Presbyter-Bishops to Bishops and Presbyters. Christian Ministry in the Second Century: A Survey: Second Century 1 (1981) 125-162; G. Maier, Die Johannesoffenbarung und die Kirche (WUNT 25), Tübingen 1981; U.H.J. Körtner, Papias von Hierapolis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des frühen Christentums (FRLANT 133), Göttingen 1983; P.F. Beatrice, La lavanda dei piedi. Contributo alla storia delle antiche liturgie cristiane (BEL-Subs. 28), Rome 1983, 33-58; U. Neymeyr, Die christlichen Lehrer im zweiten Jahrhundert. Ihre Lehrtätigkeit, ihr Selbstverständnis und ihre Geschichte (VChrS 4), Leiden 1989; P.F. Beatrice, Der Presbyter des Irenäus, Polykarp von Smyrna und der Brief an Diognet, in E. Romero Pose (ed.), Pléroma. Salus Carnis. Homenaje a A. Orbe, Santiago de Compostela 1990, 179-202; J.J. Ayán Calvo, Ignacio de Antioquía. Cartas. Policarpo de Esmirna. Carta. Carta de la Iglesia de Esmirna a la Iglesia de Filomelio (Fuentes Patrísticas 1), Madrid 1991; J. Ysebaert, Die Amtsterminologie im Neuen Testament und in der alten Kirche. Eine lexikographische Untersuchung, Breda 1994; A. Orbe, Teología de San Ireneo, IV: Traducción y Comentario del Libro IV del 'Adversus haereses' (BAC maior 53), Madrid 1996; R.M. Grant, Irenaeus of Lyons, London-New York 1997; U. Neymeyr, Presbyteroi bei Clemens von Alexandrien: SP 31 (1997) 493-496; F.W. Weidmann, Polycarp and John. The Harris Fragments and Their Challenge to the Literary Traditions (CJA 12), Notre Dame, IN 1999; P. Hartog, Polycarp and the New Testament (WUNT II/134), Tübingen 2002; P.F. Beatrice, John 13,1-10 and Romans 13,1-7 in Irenaeus of Lyons. Two Test Cases for New Testament Textual Criticism, in J.K. Elliott - C.B. Amphoux (eds.), The New Testament Text in Early Christianity (Histoire du Texte Biblique 6), Lausanne 2003, 369-386.

P.F. Beatrice

PRESENTATION in the TEMPLE

I. Liturgy - II. Iconography.

I. Liturgy. The first mention of a liturgical commemoration of the Presentation in the temple was given in *Jerusalem by *Egeria's Peregrinatio, where she referred to it with the title of Quadragesima de Epiphania, because it was set not for 2 February, in dependence on Epiphany, the day in which Christmas was celebrated among the Eastern Christians, but for the 14th of the same month. The feast was celebrated cum summa laetitia ac si per Pascha (SC 21, 36, p. 206). Egeria did not mention the candles carried during the procession. It was the Roman matron Ikalia, during the time of the emperor *Marcian (450–457), who received credit of suggesting this type of practice. This solemnity reached *Antioch from Jerusalem before the end of the 5th c. as a Marian feast for 2 February, as attested by *Severus of Antioch (Hom. 14 and 67: PO 38, 2; 8, 2). Subsequently, it received the name hypapantē = occursus (Domini), although an edict of *Justinian prescribed that it be celebrated as a feast even at *Constantinople (Theophanes, Cronographia: PG 108, 487-488). Following the example of the Eastern churches, even Rome accepted a Feast of the Presentation, placing it, however, of course on February 2nd. It was Pope *Sergius I (687–701) who introduced it along with the other three Marian feasts of the Annunciation, Assumption and Nativity (LP 1, p. 376). At Rome, as in the East, the feast of the Presentation was celebrated with great solemnity, even if marked by *penance, with a procession from the church of St. Adriano to the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore, as attested by the 7th-c. Ordo XX (M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani du Haut Moyen Âge, III, Louvain 1951, 235), in which one does not find mention of the rite of the *blessing of the candles, which is only attested toward the end of the 9th or beginning of the 10th c. by some formulas added to the Padua Sacramentary (A. Ebner, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte und Kunstgeschichte des Missale Romanum im Mittelalter, Freiburg i. Br. 1896, 130). In the other churches of the West, the Feast of the Presentation in the Temple was introduced rather late. In *Spain, e.g., one does not find it before the 9th c.

II. *Iconography. The only depiction of the Presentation of the Temple that has come down to us is that of the *mosaic on the righthand side of the triumphal arch of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore at *Rome, completed during the pontificate of Pope *Sixtus III (432–440) (C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, 219, pls. 53-58). The scene occurred solemnly before a portico and concludes at the temple. Escorted by two *angels, *Mary, dressed in royal clothes and holding a statuary pose, comes forward holding the child in her arms. Alongside is *Joseph in the act of pointing them out to the prophetess Anna and the elderly Simeon, who draw near with utmost reverence with hands veiled by the pallium to receive the Child in pallio suo, as specified by ps.-Matthew (XV), who for the remainder adheres to Luke's *canonical narrative. Behind Simeon stands a puzzled group of Jewish priests and, at the bottom, four birds (two white and two dark), whose number recalls the offering made by Mary acc. to ps.-Matthew, who changed this detail of the canonical source.

One Presentation at the Temple was also among the themes depicted in the mosaics of the Toulouse La Daurade (5th-6th c.) of which we have only vague bits of information (H. Woodruff, The Iconography and Date of the Mosaics of La Daurade: The Art Bulletin 13 [1931] 80ff.). The same subject then appeared in the decoration of the church of St. Sergius at *Gaza (1st half of the 6th c.) (Coricio, Laud. Marc. 1,48: ed. Foerster p. 14).

P. Batiffol, Études de liturgie et d'archéologie chrétienne, Paris 1919, 193-21; L. Duchesne, Origines du culte chrétien. Étude sur la liturgie latine avant Charlemagne, Paris [5]1925, 287-288; G. Löw, Purificazione: EC 10, 341-345; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, II, Milan 1955, 90-95; Marienlexikon 2, 142-147; 3, 275-276. On the iconography: C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, 219-220; G.A. Wellen, Theotokos. Eine ikonographische Abhandlung über das Gottesmutterbild in frühchristlicher Zeit, Utrecht-Antwerpen 1961, 60-61; K. Wessel, Darstellung Christi im Tempel: RBK 1, 1134-1135; E. Lucchesi Palli, Darbringung Jesu im Tempel: LCI 1, 473-477; P. Testini, Alle origini dell'iconografia di Giuseppe di Nazaret: RivAC 48 (1972) 334; Marienlexikon 2, 142-147; 3, 275-276.

M. Marinone

PRIESTHOOD of BELIEVERS. The discussion on the priesthood of believers emerged and became a particularly debated question from the Reformation onward. In the context of an unequal church society (the thesis of Robert Bellarmine against the Protestants), the priesthood of believers should be understood, when it is taken into consideration, in clear distinction from the ministerial priesthood of the clergy, and therefore in a restricted sense to the laity. The development of the theology of the laity, which occurred from the end of World War II (1945), to indicate the difference between the priesthood of believers and the ministerial priesthood, led to the formulation of the priesthood essentia et non gradu tantum, offered by Pope Pius XII (Acta Apost. Sedis 46, 1954, 669). The formula, which has been subjected today to linguistic and contextual development (see Rassegna di teologia 1980, 409-412; 1981, 471-473), was adopted in the Second Vatican Council's document Lumen gentium (n. 11) and then explained in the document Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis (n. 3) from 1970. The theological framework of the expression "priesthood of believers" from the Reformation to today has generally reflected a concern, at least in hierarchical churches, of affirming not so much a superiority as a distinction with regard to the ministerial priesthood and that of the faithful; semantically, as soon as one speaks of the ordained ministry, the "priesthood of believers" is distinguished by speaking in terms and categories of "priesthood" and therefore not primarily of official ministry in the church.

Given this premise, which is useful for grasping the different conceptual framework relating to the Christian priesthood today and in Antiquity, we should indicate some hermeneutical keys in this regard. The scriptural texts used in the patristic age for the priesthood of Christians can be grouped into two classes: (1) those tied to human life, lived in the religious line of Jesus, in particular Jn 4:23 ("the true worshipers of the Father"); Rom 15:16 and Phil 2:17 (the apostolic life and the conversion to Jesus Christ as a *liturgy or worship offered to God); Rom 12:1 (the spiritual worship of offering oneself to God as a living sacrifice); (2) the passages of 1 Pet (2:4-10) and Rev (1:6; 5:10 and 20:6) on the Christian people bestowed with a royal priesthood (regale sacerdotium). The first series of texts is generally found in more apologetic contexts, in the discussions with the *Jews and *pagans, on the nature of religious life (in the Christian evaluation, Jewish worship was no longer accepted by God; pagan worship was limited to offerings of things and not of one's holy life). Christian worship is different; it is a new way of understanding religion. It is expressed in the holiness related to God and not mere ritual gestures or cultic offerings bereft of it. Explaining their worship as a new way of understanding the "religious" bond, Christians were referred to as "priests," even as the only true priests in all of humanity. This response also established the watermark of Christian apologetic literature before the attainment of religious freedom (*Galerius 311; *Licinius and *Constantine 313). One of *Tertullian's texts can be taken as the hermeneutical key for similar passages in his writings and those of other authors. "This," he writes in the De oratione (28,1-2), "is the spiritual offering that has abolished all the ancient sacrifices . . . it is written: 'the time will come when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and truth and such worshipers he seeks.' We are the true worshipers and the true priests because, by praying in the spirit, we offer our prayer to God in the spirit, as a sacrifice owed and acceptable to him. He has asked for this offering and directs his good pleasure toward this offering" (see also Min. Fel., Octav. 32; Cypr., Or. dom. 2; Ep. 77,3). In this regard, i.e., in the bond that exists between living and worship, Christians are considered "priests of peace" because they were opposed to the violence of the circus (Tertull., Spect. 16) and war (Orig., C. Celsum 5,33); they spoke of the "priesthood of widowhood" (Tertull., Ad uxorem 1,7) and the *virgin (Ambr., De virginibus 1,2,5-8), and the priesthood of martyrdom as a testimony to Christ (Cypr., Ep. 77,3).

The second series of texts pertaining to the regale sacerdotium presents a double context: a sacramental context, esp. baptismal; and sometimes that of protest against the hierarchical ministry, which seemed to reserve exclusively for itself the title of "priesthood."

The NT expression derives from the Septuagint version of Ex 19:6, regale sacerdotium, which in the original Hebrew has the phrase regnum sacerdotum applied to the entire Jewish nation in the sense that one day it would be "a kingdom of priests." In the NT, those baptized in the name of Christ are referred to as the fulfillment of the ancient promise: Christians are all kings and priests. The sacred, in Antiquity, constituted the place of access for a meeting mediated by a priest, who was precisely the man of separation and mediation with the divine. Christians are identified as the ones who directly approach God without need of further mediation. In this sense, they are priests marked by a regale sacerdotium. The baptismal context esp. emphasized this aspect. This was in fact seen as a "consecration to God" (Just., 1 Apol. 61) that carried within itself the anointing of the Spirit, which anointing, in the line of the anointing of Christ, permitted one to draw near to God as a priest (Tertull., Bapt. 7; Iren., Haer. 4,8,3; 4,18,2; *Ephrem, In festum Epiphaniae, hym. 3; Ambr., Myst. 6,30; In ps. 118, 6,34; Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 26,11; *Leo I, Ser. 4,1). In the semantic context of this meaning, the Alexandrian School developed the concept of the priesthood of the righteous which will reach its perfection after the resurrection. Because the priesthood signifies being close to God, it is tied to the holiness of the subject and will be perfected in the kingdom of heaven (Clem. Alex., Strom. 6,8,107; Orig., In ps. 38; Hom. 1,1; Exhort. ad mart. 30 and 39; In Num. hom. 10,2; Ruf., De ben. patriarch. 2-3; Cyril Alex., De ador. in spir. et verit. 9, etc.). In the same context, *Augustine defined the term "*sacrifice" as "the work that puts us in holy communion with God" (Civ. Dei 10,5).

Naturally, all this emphasized the connection of the priesthood with Christ's priesthood, which in the eucharistic offering, in addition to the holiness of his own life, attained one of its chief actualizations (Iren., Haer. 4,18,1ff.; Cyril Alex., De ador. in spir. et verit. 12 and 16; Ambr., Sacr. 4,1; In ps. 118, prol. 2; In Lc. ev. 8,52; Aug., Serm. 82,5). The application of the concept of sacerdotal dignity to all Christians, in the light of Christ (the anointed one), was also an apologetic response to the pagan mediations with the divinity proposed at the beginning of the mystery religions (although only in Christ is such a mediation possible) and Greek *philosophy, which considered God completely inaccessible (in Christ, however, every person is offered the opportunity to draw near to God). In the context of the priesthood, understood as the possibility of relating to God through the mediation of Jesus Christ, Christian antiquity knew a diversity of ministries that, on the concrete level, reflected the hierarchical structure of the church, esp. the triadic structure of deacon-presbyter-bishop. At the time of Augustine, all Christians were already well structured into three groups: the clergy, the virgins and continentes, and the faithful—a precursor to the later ordo clericalis et laicalis, "clerical and *lay order" from *Gratian's legislation (Decr. IV, q. 1, c. 2).

Although the first Christian generation did not know the distinction between the heads of the communities and the others on account of a different priesthood, the movement was in this direction esp. in the West. With *Clement of Rome (1st c.), in his intervention at the church of *Corinth, which sought to defrock its presbyters, one finds in the juxtaposition between episkopē and the priesthood, a juxtaposition that was foreign to the classic and biblical use of the term. Clement was the first to interpret the ministry of those at the head of the Christian community along the Jewish-sacerdotal lines of the OT (the priesthood of Aaron) (1 Clem. 43-44), even introducing for the first time the distinction between clergy and laity. *Tertullian the *Montanist objected to this position because, for him, the heads of the community are not to be identified with the "spiritual men" (the only ones endowed with true authority) and moreover because, with respect to them, one must start from the general notion of church and not from general sacral distinctions (De exhort. cast. 7; De pudic. 21). Nevertheless, in the De praescriptione (41), a work from his Catholic period, he had stigmatized as heretical the practice of the primacy of spiritual men, a solution that he later proposed as a Montanist.

Various factors contributed to the ever more emphasized distinction between the common and ministerial priesthood and the interpreting of the latter in sacerdotal categories: the application of the Old Testament title of "shepherd" (Ez 34) from Yahweh to Christ and from him to the heads of the community, in the pattern of the Aaronic priesthood (1 Clem. 43-44); the "sacral" character enjoyed by community leaders in ancient society, in particular in the Roman community which was heavily institutionalized (which explains sociologically—after the attainment of the Constantinian peace—the many transformations and identifications with the one who remained at the "head" in Latin Christianity); and even more the equation of the ecclesial ministers with civil dignities, that occurred with *Constantine, which also led to the assimilation of the insignia of court dress into public assemblies, esp. into liturgical ones.

In conclusion, in an investigation on the priesthood of believers and the testimonies of the patristic period (1st-6th c.), the point of departure of a priesthood common to all Christians remains in the line of the religious relationship with Jesus Christ, who, by reaching the goal of the orders (drawing near to God), transcends any order of concrete ministers. However transforming these ministries may be, they do not exceed their functional ministerial character.

B. Botte, Secundi meriti munus: QLP 21 (1936) 84-88; L. Cerfaux, Regale Sacerdotium: RSPh 28 (1939) 5-39; P. Dabin, Le sacerdoce royal des fidèles dans la tradition ancienne et moderne, Paris 1950 (Western authors 71-168; Eastern authors 509-577); J. Lécuyer, Le sacerdoce royal des chrétiens selon saint Hilaire de Poitiers: AnTh (1949) 302-325; Id., Essai sur le sacerdoce des fidèles chez les Pères: La MaisonD 27 (1951) 7-50; G. Folliet, Les trois catègories des chrétiens: AugM II, Paris 1955, 631-644; J. Pintard, Le sacerdoce selon s. Augustin. Le prêtre dans la Cité de Dieu, Paris 1960; L. Ryan, Patristic Teaching on the Priesthood of the Faithful: The Irish Theol. Quarterly 29 (1962) 25-51; R. Jacob, Le martyr, épanouissement du sacerdoce chrétien dans la littérature patristique jusqu'en 238: MSR 24 (1967) 57-83, 153-172; A. Quacquarelli, L'epiteto sacerdote (iereus) ai cristiani in Giustino martire (Dial. 116,3): VetChr 7 (1970) 5-19; G. Otranto, Nonne et laici sumus? (Exh. cast. 7,3): VetChr 8 (1971) 27-47; M. Jourjon, Remarques sur le vocabulaire sacerdotal de la 1 Clementis. Epektasis (Mél. J. Daniélou), Paris 1972, 107-110; M. Bévenot, Tertullian's Thoughts About tbe Christian "Priesthood." Corona Gratiarum (Mél. E. Dekkers), I, Brugge 1975, 125-137.

V. Grossi

PRIMASIUS of Hadrumetum (6th c.). The bishop of *Hadrumetum (*Africa) between 550 and 560, he was one of the few Africans who favored the condemnation of the *Three Chapters. He left us a *Commentary on the Apocalypse; in it he says that he used the writings of *Augustine and *Tyconius. He purged, however, the latter's commentary of its anti-*Catholic aspects. Tyconius's influence is very heavy in the allegorizing interpretation that tends to find in the prophetic text reference to the history of the church not only of the last days, but also from the very beginning, in such a way as to remove the book's eschatological tension. The anti-Roman aspects of John's work are completely removed.

Moricca III, 2, 1485-1487; CPL 873; PL 68, 793-936; A.W. Adams, Commentarius in Apocalypsin: CCL 92 (1985); K.B. Steinhauser, The Apocalypse Commentary of Tyconius. A History of Its Reception and Influence, Frankfurt 1987, 69-88; Patrologia IV, 44-46.

M. Simonetti

PRIMIAN of Carthage. *Donatist bishop of Carthage (ca. 392–412). He was a violent and intransigent man; he represented the perspective of the people of *Carthage and *Numidia. Primian was only recently ordained (recens ordinatus) when he became the primate of the Donatist church (Aug., Serm. 2 in Ps. 36, 20). He was opposed by the Donatist clergy of Carthage under the deacon *Maximian (a descendant of *Donatus of Carthage). The *schism erupted in the Donatist church toward the end of 392, and Primian was condemned for his tyrannical actions, first by a council of 43 bishops gathered at Carthage, then on 24 June 393, by a council of 100 bishops at Cebarsussa, presided over by the Donatist primate of Byzacena, Victorinus of Munatiana (Aug., ibid.; and C. Cresconium II, 6,7). Primian retaliated: on 24 April 394, he was absolved by a council of 310 bishops primarily from Numidia and *Mauritania, gathered at Bagai, in S Numidia. The Maximianists were in turn condemned (C. Cresconium III, 15,18; 16,19; 19,22; 56,62; IV, 4,5; 10,12; 28,35; 31,38; 38,45; 39,46). Between 395 and 397, Primian began a series of legal trials before the proconsul of Africa and the city magistrates of Carthage to obtain possession of the landholdings then held by the Maximianist bishops (C. Cresconium III, 59,65; IV, 47,57). A tenacious supporter of *Optatus of Thamugadi, he participated at the yearly celebrations in commemoration of this individual (Aug., Ep. 108,2,5). In September 403, he disdainfully rejected an invitation from the representatives of the Catholic Church to discuss matters and bring the schism to an end (Aug., Ad Donatistas post Collationem I, 31,53). He then sought to discredit *Augustine by accusing him of crypto-*Manicheism on the basis of his shady past (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 36, Serm. 3). At the conference of Carthage (411), Primian led the Donatist delegation but spoke infrequently. Although he must have been deposed immediately following the proscription of the Donatist church in 412 (CTh 16, 5, 52), nothing more is known about his later life.

Monceaux VI, 157ff. (severe judgment); W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, ch. 15; PCBE, 1, 905-913; P. Langa, Primiano y el concilio de Bagai and El argumento del número en la Conferencia de Cartago, in Notas complementarias, BAC 32, Madrid 1988, 887-888, 924-925.

W.H.C. Frend

PRIMICERIUS. Title (primus in cera, that is to say, on the tabula cerata) given in the Late Roman Empire to individuals who held a wide range of very different obligations and offices such as the primicerius sacri cubiculi, the primicerius notariorum or by other officia in the imperial chancery. In particular, the comites sacrarum largitionum (ministers of imperial finances: the titles in the primary sources present many variants) had a general primicerius for their orders and some particular primicerii for each one of the various scrinia (offices). A similar organization also existed in other officia, for some of which a secundocerius and a tertiocerius are also mentioned (cf. CTh VI, 24,7ff.; CJ I, 27; XII, 7.28; CIL 13, 2385; Cassiod., Var. XI, 25 and 30-32: MGH, Auct. ant. 12,346ff.). The title is also used in the ecclesiastical milieu to refer to various offices: primicerius scholae, primicerius defensorum, etc. *Isidore of Seville described the office of the primicerius of lower ecclesiastical ministers (Ep. 1,3: PL 83, 896). The primicerius notariorum, head of the secretariat, was particularly important in the large churches (cf. Diehl 1287; 3768; Council of *Ephesus: ACO I, I, 2 p. 7; Mansi 7, 377; Nilus, Ep. 2,238: PG 79, 321B; Evagr., HE 11,18: PG 86, 2560A; Anast. Apocr., Acta S. Max. 3: PG 90, 113D; Eugippius, Vita Sev. 46: CSEL 9, 2, p. 66; Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. 2,37). The primicerius of the notarii of the Roman Church fulfilled an important role in the life of the community (cf. PL 68, 55; Roman Council of 649: Mansi 10, 891; Ordo Rom. I, ed. Andrieu II, p. 70; Liber diurnus, passim).

DACL 14, 1171-1181; DAGR 4, 647; EC 10, 20-22; Lampe, s.v.; Niermeyer, 2002, vol. 2, 1105-1106.

M. Forlin Patrucco

PRINCIPIA DIALECTICAE. Placed by the *Maurists among his spurious works, scholars today attribute the Principia dialecticae to *Augustine (H.I. Marrou, 466; J. Pépin, 9). To justify the reattribution of the work to Augustine, they appeal to various internal and external factors of this text. First and foremost, if it is true that in Antiquity grammatici were accustomed to signing their works by inserting their own name within such books, Augustine himself—in whose scholastic curriculum grammatica occupied a large place, remaining among other things a grammaticus in his exegetical method for his whole life (De doctr. Christ. III, 29,40; and passim I-III)—placed his signature on the Principia, in a chapter dedicated to the power of words: "the word incites the meaning not according to itself, but according to what it signifies, . . . as in the case when, the name Augustine is uttered, I alone am the one who is thought by the one to whom I am known" (ch. 7, tr. Bettetini, 199). Moreover, within the document, one finds some illustrations that, with surprising precision, one finds in his subsequent writings (Temetum, as an example of an obscurum, at ch. 8 and in the De Trin. X, 1,2; pone, verb and adverb, as an example of an aequivocum, at ch. 10 and in De mus. I, 1,1), there are also frequent references to the works written before the Principia (M. Bettetini). On the other hand, Augustine himself stated that, during his stay at Cassiciacum, he wrote, with the objective of attaining and helping his companions attain per corporalia ad incorporalia, some "principia" on all five of the artes liberales, i.e., dialectic, *rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic and philosophy—"principia" which then disappeared from his library, but which he was certain were in the good care of someone (Retr. I, 5,6). As a last confirmation, *Possidius listed among the works of the first period of Augustine's literary works five books, understood as liberarum principia, "id est de dialectica, de retorica, de geometria, de aritmetica, de philosophia" (Indicul. 10,5).

From Augustine and Possidius's allusions, which insert the Principia dialecticae (or it would be better to call this treatise the De dialectica, as maintained by the Retr. I, 5,6) within a group with four other treatises all bearing a similar type of name, one could theorize that the term Principia should be understood in the sense of "the first elements of dialectic," rather than "beginnings" of dialectic, because it would hardly be the case that he would write five different "beginnings," left then as such (contra: Bettetini, 14; 175). The five Principia would have then been the notes of Augustine's Milanese lectures on the liberal arts, which were then preserved by one of his student-followers (L.F. Pizzolato, 22).

A work exclusively technical in nature, but of great interest, Augustine therefore treated dialectic, by defining it, acc. to the *Stoic understanding, as the "science of arguing correctly," by means of simple and complex words, or combined among each other, subject to truth or falsehood and therefore affirmed or denied, then developed into propositions (sententiae), from the connection of which one arrives to the conclusion (Principia dialecticae chs. I-II). In the following chapters of the work, Augustine limited himself, however, to explaining only simple words, and nevertheless within the structure emerges a brief treatise on the science of the word, which finds its center in ch. 5, where the word is studied as "a sign of anything that, brought forth from the one who speaks, can be understood by the one who hears." The word then is presented acc. to the arguments of dialectic at various levels: verbum, i.e., the word itself subject to discussion; dicibile ("that which by the word is understood and contained in the mind"); dictio ("the word itself and that which comes into the mind by means of the word"); and res ("the thing itself" signified by the word). Distancing himself from the position of the Stoics, Augustine introduced a change to the term dictio, because, in distinction to what those philosophers thought, dictio is the bearer of meaning, although dictio itself still remains incomplete. In particular, Augustine rejected the theory of a relationship of equivalence between linguistic expression and content, maintained on the analogy between reality and language. Unifying the theory of language with that of signs, in essence, Augustine denied both the relationship of implication between the word and the reality signified by the word (acc. to the Stoics, by the sign, by the sole fact of existing, one could get back to the res) and the relationship of equivalence. Indeed, dictio is given to the union of signifier and signified in the individual word, which thus becomes a sign of something else. In this manner, he diverges from the Stoics even on the necessity of investigating the origin of words, a question that, in ch. VI, proves itself to be entirely useless. What counts, however, is the analysis of the power of the word, which is treated in ch. VII, where Augustine presents the word as a sign, therefore subjected to the very limits that, as a sign, it bears in relation to truth, namely, obscurity (ch. VIII), ambiguity and equivocity (IX-X).

Thanks to the linguistic innovation on dictio, Augustine rediscovered the Platonic opposition between words and things and therefore the mode of understanding the noun as hiding something not immediately perceptible, i.e., the essence of the thing, thanks to the correspondence between language and the structure of reality (Cratilo 424A-425B; 391B-396D; 427D-435D), with the difference that, while for Plato the noun reveals the thing through the iconic relationship that it initiated among these, for Augustine the noun is instead a sign of the thing. By the word's becoming a sign, however, the understanding of words in turn implies the understanding and the existence of the res, of which the words are signs. The Principia dialecti- cae thus constitutes a valid and sufficient introduction to the De Magistro, in which Augustine would treat in more detail the question of the relationship between res and verbum and in general the informative value of language.

At the time of the composition of the Principia dialecticae, Augustine nourished a great trust in dialectic as disciplina disciplinarum (De ord. II, 13,38), capable of leading ratio to truth, because he was convinced that the Word delivered the human intellect to the point that it could by itself arrive at the enjoyment of God, with the help of a good educative plan built on the disciplinae liberarum. Later, in the Confessiones, with a certain detachment, he would speak, however, of these as the "so-called liberal" arts (IV, 1,1). Lastly, in the Civ. Dei , he would decide to simply call them saeculares (VI, 2), inasmuch as only Dei gratia liberates one (Ep. 101,2).

Nevertheless, during his entire theological activity, he never renounced the use of dialectica, considering it, however, a simple instrument for logically deducing the consequences from the given premises, because, among other things, even the *apostles and Jesus himself used it (C. Cresc. I, 12,15-20,25; J. Pépin, 141-148). In 397, moreover, he had fully incorporated it into the plan of studies listed in the De doctrina Christiana (I-III), "a technical manual" of Christian exegesis and education, but also a summa theologica (G. Lettieri, 24-83), then completed between 426–427, by treating it as a human instrument necessary for a correct hermeneutic of the sacred *Scriptures and intrinsically and theologically connecting it to rhetoric (IV) for better persuading others of the truth found in them (L.F. Pizzolato, 29-55).

PL 32, 1409-1420; W. Crecelius, S. Aurelii Augustini de dialectica liber, Eberfeldae 1857; M. Baldassarri, Aurelio Agostino, I principi della dialettica, Como 1985; B. Darrel Jackson, De Dialectica, Dordrecht-Boston 1975; M. Bettetini, Aurelio Agostino. Il maestro e la parola, Milan 1993; H. Ruef, Augustin über Semiotik und Sprache. Sprachtheoretische Analysen zu Augustins Schrift "De Dialectica," mit deutschen Übersetzung, Bern 1981; F. Castañeda (Intr. y estudio complementario), Agustín de Hipona. Principios de Dialéctica. Edición bilingüe, Bogotá 2003. Dialéctica. Edición bilingüe, Bogotá 2003.

Studies: J. Pinborg, Das Sprachdenken der Stoa und Augustin Dialectik: Classica Mediaevalia 23 (1962) 148-177; J. Pépin, Saint Augustin et la dialectique, Villanova 1976; H.I. Marrou, S. Agostino e la fine della cultura antica, Milan 1987 (It. ed.); L.F. Pizzolato, Capitoli di retorica agostiniana, Rome 1994; N. Cipriani, Sulla fonte varroniana delle discipline liberali del De Ordine di s. Agostino: Augustinianum 40 (2000) 203-224; G. Lettieri, L'altro Agostino, Brescia 2001.

V. Lombino

PRISCA, saint. The Gregorian *Sacramentary (and the *martyrologies that depended on it) commemorate the beatae Priscae martyris tuae natalicia (ed. Lietzmann, Münster [3]1967, 19). The itineraries of the 8th c. transmitted the claim that in the cemetery of Priscilla, on the Via Salaria, lay the tomb of Prisca martyr. Even the Roman martyrology records that 18 January was the dies natalis (*birthday) of the martyr Prisca.

Certainly starting from the 5th c., there existed a church of the titulus Priscae. Two inscriptions attest to it (ICUR 2, 5153; 5160); one, preserved in the museum of the basilica of St. *Paul, from the 5th c., commemorates an Adeodatus presb. tit. Priscae; a second, Aurelius tit. Priscae by a cemetery on the Via Appia (Krautheimer, p. 264). The presbyter Dominicus was present at the Roman Council of 499 (MGH, AA 12, 413). A certain Maurus presbyter tituli Sanctae Priscae (MGH, Epist. 1, 367) was present at the synod of 595. Moreover, the title of sancta was given to the foundress Prisca, as had occurred in similar situations. The early Christian church was built on more ancient edifices and on a Mithraeum from ca. 135 and also reused earlier walls, as in the case of the end of the aisle on the righthand side. Pope Hadrian (773–795) reconstructed the roof of the church of beatae Priscae (LP 1, p. 501, cf. 517); in the account for Pope Leo (795–816) given by the Liber pontificalis, mention is made of the basilica beatae Priscae (LP 2, 4), titulus sanctae Priscae (LP 2,24, cf. pp. 42-43) and also of blessed Aquile et Priscae (LP 2,20; so too on an inscription of the 11th-12th c.). Here one sees a process of identification between the foundress of the homonymous church and the wife of Aquila, mentioned by St. Paul: "Greet Prisca and Aquila, my fellow workers in Jesus Christ, who risked their lives for my life, to whom not only I but also all the churches of the Gentiles give thanks" (Rom 16:3; cf. 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Tim 4:19; Acts 18:2, 18). In 1776, the remains of an oratory were found, dating back to the 4th c., near the modern-day church of St. Prisca (Krautheimer, p. 264). The early Christian church was restored from top to bottom by Pope Callistus III (1455).

Lastly, a Passio Sanctae Priscae (from the 7th c.?) has survived. Fanciful and untrustworthy, this account speaks of the martyr (BHL II, 6926) and the place of burial (in ecclesia sanctorum Aquilae et Priscae). This Passio, acc. to Franchi de' Cavalieri, contains traces of heavy dependence on the records of the deeds of Martina (1 January; BHL 5587), and this in turn bears traces of dependence on those of Tatiana (12 January; BHG 1699). Prisca, daughter of a consul, during the time of the emperor *Claudius (41-54), was beheaded on the hundredth mile of the Via Ostiense and was buried by the pope reigning at that time, whose name is left unstated, who had hid himself for fear of *persecution. A church was built on the place of burial, and the faithful prayed there night and day. Pope *Eleutherus (ca. 174–189) (in other versions one finds the name "Eutychian" [278-282]) along with the people brought the relics into the titular church of Aquila and Prisca on the Aventine Hill. The evolution of the legend of Prisca first led to the identification of the foundress of the church with the martyr Prisca, which in turn was confused with the Prisca (*Priscilla) mentioned by St. Paul, and lastly, someone wrote an imaginary passio based on another equally untrustworthy account.

BHL II, 6926; AASS Ianuarii, II, Venice 1734, 183-188; G.B. de Rossi - L. Duchesne, Martyrologium Hieronymianum (AASS Novembris 2, 1), 1894, 47; Martyrologium Romanum, Acta SS, Prop. Dec., ed. H. Delehaye, Brussels 1940, 26; LTK^3 8, 598; EC 10, 36; BS 10, 1112-1113; BBKL 7, 956; G.B. de Rossi, Della casa d'Aquila e Prisca sull'Aventino: Bull. Arch. Cristiana 5 (1887) 44ff.; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, S. Martina: RQA 17 (1903) 222-236, esp. 232-235 (= Scritti agiografici, Vatican City 1962, II, [58-62]); J.P. Kirsch, Die römischen Titelkirchen im Altertum, Paderborn 1918, 101-104; F. Lanzoni, I titoli presbiterali di Roma antica nella storia e nella leggenda: RivAC 2 (1925) 247-250; M.J. Vermaseren - C.C. van Essen, The Excavations in the Mithraeum of the Church of Santa Prisca in Rome, Leiden 1965; R. Krautheimer, Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae, III, Vatican City 1971; E.M. Steinby, Lexikon Topographicum Urbis Romae, IV, Rome 1999, 162-163; A. Lombardi, La Chiesa di Santa Prisca e il suo mitreo, Rome 2000.

A. Di Berardino

PRISCIAN. A (Christian) Latin grammarian. From what little is known of his life, scholars believe that he was born at *Caesarea in Mauritania, but that he lived most of his life at *Byzantium during the reign of the emperor *Anastasius (491–518). In the manner of *Pliny, the author of the *Panegyric to Trajan, Priscian desired to praise the emperor Anastasius's deeds in a *panegyric of a little more than 300 verses, a work lacking any true originality. His translation in verses of the Greek author Dionysius Periegete's geographical poem (Periegesis of the Earth) was also mediocre. But Priscian was primarily tied to his work as a grammarian: he was the author of the Institutio de arte grammatica, a work known and studied throughout the entire Middle Ages. Of its 18 books, the first 16 (Priscianus maior) articulate the principles and rules of Latin grammar; the last two (Priscianus minor), its syntax. Unfortunately, this work came to an abrupt conclusion; it is not known if this was intentional or perhaps caused by the loss of some subsequent book(s). Though recognizing the superiority of the Greeks, Priscian succeeded in offering a rather organic and comprehensive work of the entire traditional art of the Latin language. Moreover, he knew how to adorn the theoretical rules with an abundance of citations from now-lost Latin authors. In particular, in the work De metris fabularum Terentii, he knew how to organize the natural characteristics of the ancient comedians, who had by then been almost forgotten.

CPL 1546-1554. For the Institutiones and other minor works, M. Hertz, in H. Keil, Grammatici Latini, vols. II and III, Leipzig, 1855-1923. For the Carmen in laudem Anastasii imp., see E. Baehrens, Poetae latini minores, V, Leipzig 1883, 264-274. For the Periegesis, P. van de Woestijne, Bruges 1953. Studies: Schanz IV/2, 221-238; PWK 44 (1054) 2328-2346; KLP 4, 1141-1142; G. Mazzini, Il codice vat. 3313 di Prisciano: ALMA 1 (1924) 213-222; 2 (1925) 5-14; M. Passalacqua, I codici di Prisciano, Rome 1978; G. Ballaira, Per il catalogo dei concili di Prisciano, Turin 1982; G. da Cingoli, Quaestiones supra Prisciano Minori, ed. R. Martorelli Vico, Pisa 1985; G. Ballaira, Prisciano e i suoi amici, Turin 1989; Id., Osservazioni sulla Praefatio del De laude Anastasii imperatoris di Prisciano di Cesarea, Turin 1994; Id., Concordantiae in Prisciani Panegyricum, Turin 2000.

L. Dattrino

PRISCILLA. Countless legends arose around Priscilla in ancient and modern times. Hagiographers have made her out to be the mother of the Senator *Pudens, the grandmother of *Praxedis and Pudentiana, and the guest of the apostle *Peter in a villa located on the Via Salaria, under which a homonymous catacomb was later excavated. Then, under the leadership of G.B. de Rossi, archaeologists intervened and placed all these different historical figures, as well as even Aquila and *Prisca or Priscilla (Acts 18:2-4; Rom 16:3; 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Tim 4:19), into the family of the Acilii Glabriones; Orazio Marucchi went so far as to identify the pool of the catacomb in which Peter performed baptisms. All of this is nothing more than another novel that has no more historical value than a hagiographical tale. The only certain information is that the name "Priscilla" appears many times on inscriptions (DACL 6, 1264-1266), and that one must distinguish at least three women who had this name: Vera Priscilla, M. *Acilius Glabrio; Plaria Vera Priscilla, her daughter-in-law; Priscilla, the wife of a certain M. Acilius V; and so on. One can safely conclude that one of the nuclei of the homonymous catacomb undoubtedly owes its existence to them. Priscilla has nothing to do with the titular church of St. *Prisca.

BS 10, 1113-1114; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 66-67; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane, Rome ^{2}1999, 130-137.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PRISCILLIAN – PRISCILLIANISM. Priscillian, a high-ranking and talented *layman, around 370–375 began to preach in *Spain a very rigid ascetical teaching, which enjoyed great success, but drew opposition from bishops *Hydatius of *Mérida and *Ithacius of Ossonuba. In 380, a council gathered at *Saragossa and condemned Priscillian's ideas, but without taking any action against individuals. At that time, bishops *Instantius and Salvian, to increase the authority of Priscillian's preaching, consecrated him bishop of Avila. In the meantime, Hydatius and Ithacius obtained a decree from the emperor *Gratian against the *Manicheans, using terms that would also include the Priscillianists. By that point, Priscillian had extended his preaching activity to S *Gaul, where he was able to win to his group a wealthy woman named Eucrotia. He then crossed over to *Italy to seek *Ambrose and *Damasus's support, all to no success; but he was able to obtain the abrogation of Gratian's decree. After the latter had been killed, Ithacius accused Priscillian, at *Trier, before the usurper *Maximus, who then deferred the case of Priscillian and Instantius to a church council gathered at *Bordeaux (384). Instantius was deposed; Priscillian did not show up but appealed directly to Maximus. Hydatius and Ithacius also went to Trier and were so persuasive before Maximus that they were able to obtain Priscillian's condemnation, despite the opposing efforts of *Martin of Tours. Priscillian and Eucrotia were beheaded on charges of black *magic; Instantius and others were exiled. This was the first time that a *heretic had been condemned to death as such. This execution engendered much displeasure: even *Ambrose, who refused to support Priscillian, vociferously protested his execution. In reaction, Ithacius was deposed; Hydatius resigned by his own choice. After Priscillian had been crowned with the wreath of martyrdom, his movement was active primarily in N Spain for most of the 5th c.

Because multa opuscula written by Priscillian were lost (Jer., Vir. ill. 121), until the end of the 19th century Priscillian's teaching was reconstructed on the basis of the writing of his opponents and the decrees of Spanish councils, who presented it as *gnostic and *Encratite: a distinction between the God of the OT and the NT, the divine nature of the *soul, the unreal humanity of Christ, the condemnation of *marriage, the use of magical and *astrological practices. In 1889, the publication of a corpus of Priscillianist writings contained in a MS from Würzburg misled those who were awaiting a decisive answer on the matter because these documents, with the exception of a few treatises, were entirely orthodox. In effect, it was a dossier of texts collected for apologetic purposes, and it therefore avoided treating the most characteristic themes of the movement. Although for a long time the possibility that such texts were a direct work of Priscillian was rejected, this thesis has now obtained a noteworthy consensus among scholars. The Liber apologeticus and the Liber ad Damasum condemn various *heresies and astrological teachings. The Liber de fide et apocryphis maintains that not all inspired books are contained within the *canon of Scripture, so that one should not indiscriminately reject all the *apocryphal texts only because the heretics have interpolated them with their errors. These books should be read, although with due caution. The divine spirit is not confined only to the canonical books, because where Christ is there is freedom. Eight other treatises are homiletical and liturgical: the *homilies treat episodes of the OT, acc. to the traditional, typological reference to Christ and the church. They were joined to the dossier to refute the accusation of rejecting this part of Holy *Scripture, as did the *gnostics and *Manicheans. Apart from this, Priscillian's Canones epistularum Pauli apostoli have survived to our day, a florelegium of 90 propositions extracted from the Pauline Epistles.

Nothing has remained of the Priscillianist writers mentioned by Jerome (Vir. ill. 122; 123) or others: *Latronianus, *Tiberianus and *Asarbus. G. Morin published, in 1913, an anonymous treatise titled De Trinitate fidei catholicae, perhaps to be attributed to Priscillian himself, almost certainly from a Priscillianist milieu: the document presents an archaizing trinitarian doctrine, leaning toward *monarchianism, confirming an accusation leveled already by *Orosius against the Priscillianists. With respect to the fundamental themes of their preaching, we cannot say more than that it was a rigorous Encratism that used a negative understanding of the material world, with, perhaps, astrological influences.

CPL 785-796; CSEL 18; PLS 2, 1389-1542; Patrologia III, 126-131 (bibl.); BBKL 7, 952-955; A. Orbe, Doctrina trinitaria del anónimo priscilianista De Trinitate fidei catholicae: Gregorianum 49 (1968) 510-562; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila, Oxford 1976; J. Fontaine, Panorama espiritual del Occidente peninsular en los siglos IV y V, in Primera Reunión gallega de estudios clásicos (Pontevedra 2-4 julio 1979), Santiago de Compostela 1981, 185-209; J.M. Blázquez Martínez, Prisciliano introductor del ascetismo en Gallaecia: ibid., 210-236; A.B.J.M. Goosen, Algunas observaciones sobre la pneumatología de Prisciliano: ibid., 237-242; Domínguez del Val, I, 440-581; M. Veronese, Le citazioni del De Trinitate di Ilario nella raccolta attribuita a Prisciliano: VetChr 40 (2003) 133-157.

M. Simonetti

PRISCUS, historian (5th c.). Born at Panium (*Thrace); orator, historian and imperial officer. In 449 he accompanied Count Maximus before *Attila at *Rome in 450 and in 451/452 in *Arabia and *Egypt. According to *Sudas, Priscus published letters and speeches—all lost—and books on history in Greek, many fragments of which have been preserved in later works, primarily in Constantine Porphyrogennetos's De legationibus and in many other authors (*John of Antioch, *Jordanes, *Eustathius of Epiphania, etc.). His writing style is classical, following the example of Thucydides and Herodotus, and it avoids technical Latin terminology. It is not clear whether he was Christian or *pagan. His narratives began perhaps at 425 continuing the work of Olympiodorus (Girotti), or alternatively from 433/434 (Blockey) and extended until 472, with some extensive treatments on the preceding period. Priscus wrote his work during the time of the emperor Zeno (474–491). In many fragments, he speaks primarily of overseas politics—little of internal affairs and military strategy—and the emperors' political actions toward many peoples who invaded the empire, concerning whom he provides precious bits of information, esp. the *Huns. He was very critical toward the political actions taken by the emperor *Theodosius II, whom he presented as weak and a victim of court eunuchs, esp. the detestable Chrisaphius. Reluctant to go to war, Theodosius II bought peace from the Huns by paying increasingly burdensome tributes in attempts to avoid war. The emperor's cowardice was dangerous for the fate of the empire; the political action taken by his successor *Marcian was better. Priscus did not pay much attention to the events that occurred in the West. When he did, he only focused partially on those that occurred in *Italy and *Africa. He praised the general Aetius and heavily criticized his murder by *Valentinian III.

FHG 4, 69-110; 5, 24-26; PLRE II, 906; NP 10, 343; F. Bornmann, Osservazioni sul testo dei frammenti di Prisco: Maia 26 (1974) 111-120; E.V. Maltese, A proposito dell'opera storica di Prisco di Panion: Quaderni di Storia 5 (1979) 297-320; B. Baldwin, Priscus of Panium: Byzantion 50 (1980) 18-61 (= Studies on Late Roman and Byzantine History, Literature and Language, Amsterdam 1984, 255-298); R.C. Blockley, The Fragmentary Classicizing Historians of the Later Roman Empire. Eunapius, Olympiodorus, Priscus and Malchus, Liverpool 1981, I, 48-70; III, 221-400 (with original text and Eng. tr.); G. Zecchini, Aezio. L'ultima difesa dell'Occidente romano, Milan 1983; C. Zuckerman, L'Empire d'Orient et les Huns. Notes sur Priscus: Travaux et Mémoires 12 (1994) 159-182; U. Roberto, Prisco e una fonte romana del V secolo: Romanobarbarica 17 (2000–2002) 117-159; B. Girotti, Per una descrizione dell'opera di Prisco di Panion: Rivista Storica dell'antichità 33 (2003) 243-246.

A. Di Berardino

PRIVATUS. Bishop of Mende (Gabali), martyr. *Gregory of Tours stated that, because he refused to sacrifice to the gods, Privatus was martyred by the Alamanni, led by their King Crocus (4th c.-beginning of the 5th?). A church was built on the site of his tomb. The Mart. hier. places Privatus on August 21. The cult of Privatus was already alive during Gregory's period (Hist. Franc. 1,34; 6,37; 10,29). The relics were transferred to the Abbey of St. Denis in 632, and from there in 777 to the priory of Salonnes (diocese of Metz) at *Cologne (A. Legner, Kölner Heilige und Heiligtümer, Cologne 2003, 24).

BHL 6932-6942; BS 10, 1126-1127; LCI 8, 226; P. Cubizolles, Saint Privat de Mende: Bulletin du Centre d'Études et de Recherches littéraires et scientifiques de Mende 16 (1996) 1-22; 17 (1998) 56-64.

S. Heid

PRIVATUS of Lambaesis (3rd c.). One finds reference to this individual in *Cyprian's epistles (Ep. 36,4; 59,10). From the first letter, published by the clergy of *Rome during the most crucial moment of the *Decian *persecution, one finds that Cyprian had warned the church of Rome of a situation that we know thanks to the second letter: Privatus, bishop of Lambaesis, was deposed "for numerous and serious mistakes, many years ago, by a decision reached by 90 bishops." He returned to plead his case at a council held in spring 251, but his request was rejected. He then went over to a small group in *Carthage that had separated from the official church by ordaining a certain *Fortunatus as bishop, contrary to the rules, in opposition to Cyprian. This letter is from the summer of 252: after this, all trace of Privatus is lost.

Monceaux 2, 5.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PROBA (4th c.). Faltonia Betitia Proba, wife of Clodius Celsinus Adelphius, praefectus urbi in 351 (confused in some MSS with Anicia Faltonia Proba, Olybrius, consul in 370, and wife of Sextus Petronius Probus, consul in 371), she was the author of a historical epos, now lost, on the fight between Magnentius and *Constantius II, which she conceived as a bellum civile in a manner similar to Lucan. She was also the author of Cento Vergilianus de laudibus Christi, composed between 360 and 370. The Cento of 694 hexameters is preceded by a proemium (vv. 1-9)—in which Proba (as she herself is called in v. 12) recalls with regret her earlier poetic works devoted to wars of conquest and bloody conflicts—and by a lengthy invitation to God (vv. 10-55), which marks its similarities to the praefationes of *Juvencus and of *Paulinus of Nola in his Laus sancti Iohannis. After having asked Almighty God and his eternal Sevenfold Spirit for inspiration, Proba states that she has renounced traditional *pagan themes of inuocatio. After having drawn (with *baptism?) the waters of the Castalia fountain and after having had a foretaste (through the participation at the *Eucharist?) of the sweetness of the divine light, she will begin her poem, by declaring that Virgil sang of the most godly gifts of Christ (v. 23 Vergilium cecinisse loquar pia munera Christi). There follows a new request to the Father and the Son to favor the difficult request, guidance for the chief theme of this poem, which creates a seamless inversion with respect to the uselessness of her earlier poetry, and the invitation to the recipients of the poem to pay attention. A few years after Proba's death, an anonymous librarius inserted a dedication of 15 verses before a copy of the Cento commissioned to him by *Arcadius, a dedication that precedes the work in many of the codices. The librarius has no doubts on the fact that the emperor will know how to recognize in Proba's work a Virgil transformed for the better and placed at the service of Jesus Christ: dignare Maronem / mutatum in melius diuino agnoscere sensu ("to deem [Virgilius] Maro worthy, to recognize the one that has been changed for the better through a religious interpretation" vv. 3-4).

Using verses, hemistiches and Virgilian terms (taken primarily from the Aeneid, the Bucolics and the Georgics) the Christian poetess—applying the centonical canons—composed a sacrum carmen (v. 9), in which she sang of the Christian revelation in a series of brief biographical accounts (vv. 1-332) and in paraphrases of the New Testament (vv. 333-694), from the creation to the *Ascension of Jesus Christ; in the epilogue she recommends that Christians and her husband (v. 693: o dulcis coniunx) celebrate this feast, and she hopes that her descendants remain pure in the faith (v. 694).

One should note the erudition with which the centonical poetess was able to describe in Virgil's words the chief events of biblical history: the creation of sea animals acc. to the model of Aeneas's shield; the creation of plants acc. to style of the Bucolics; the serpent of the earthly *paradise acc. to that which killed Lacoön; the ejection from paradise using the words of the Cumaean Sibyl; the flood, the crossing of the Red Sea, the birth and baptism of Christ, during which *John received Jesus, in the words of Anchises; the *Sermon on the Mount that threatened using the punishments from Virgil's hell; the storm on the lake with sea themes from the third and fifth book of the Aeneid, and so forth. Despite *Jerome's severe criticisms on centonical poetry (Epist. 53,7: puerilia sunt haec et circulatorum ludo similia) and those issued by the Decretum Gelasianum* (PL 59, 162) for some heterodox elements present in the poem, esp. on the christological level, Proba's Cento, certainly the most successful and representative poem of its genre, has witnessed an enormous dissemination even to the thresholds of the modern age.

CPL 1480. Editions: PL 19, 805-818; Schenkl, CSEL 16, 1, 511-609; E.A. Clark - D. F. Hatch, The Golden Bough, The Oaken Cross. The Virgilian Cento of Faltonia Betitia Proba, Ann Arbor 1981 (text of Schenkl and Eng. tr., with an interesting treatment of the life and work of Proba and containing a bibl.). Studies: Schanz 4,1, 219-221; M. Manitius, Geschichte der christlich-lateinischen Poesie bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1891, 124-128; F. Ermini, Il Centone di Proba e la poesia centonaria latina, Rome 1909; P. Courcelle, Les exégèses chrétiennes de la quatrième Églogue: REA 59 (1957) 294-319; I. Opelt, Der zürnende Christus im Cento der Proba: JbAC 7 (1964) 106-111; M.R. Cacioli, Adattamenti semantici e sintattici nel centone virgiliano di Proba: SIFC 41 (1969) 188-246; Ch. Witke, Numen Litterarum. The Old and the New in Latin Poetry from Constantine to Gregory the Great, Leiden-Köln 1971, 195-198; M. Bonaria, Appunti per la tradizione virgiliana nel IV secolo, in Vergiliana, Leiden 1971, 35-40; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975, 35-36; 60-63; Patrologia III, 257-258; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 95-110; M. Spinelli, Proba Petronia, in Enciclopedia Virgiliana, IV, Rome 1988, 283-284; A.D.J. Nodes, Doctrine and Exegesis in Biblical Latin Poetry, Leeds 1993, 22-25; 78-82; D. Shanzer, The Date and Identity of the Centonist Proba: RecAug 27 (1994) 75-96; S. Kyriakidis, Proba, Faltonia Betitia: Keos 1 (1994) 185-200; P. Mastandrea, L'epigramma dedicatorio del "Cento Vergilianus" di Proba (AL 719d Riese2). Analisi del testo, ipotesi di datazione e identificazione dell'autore: Boll. Studi Latini 31 (2001) 565-578.

A.V. Nazzaro

PROCESSION. In religious history, the existence of processions (from the Latin term procedere, "to go forward") with a communal and ritual character, accompanied by appropriate songs and *prayers, seems to derive from human psychological and soteriological needs. They are a communal religious rite that, with the articulation into a slow and rhythmic journey in prayers, enacts the joyous or penitential path toward a significant goal. One finds processions in the OT (see La MaisonD 43 [1955] 5-22) and the NT (ibid., 22-28), which supply the theological and normative model for those that followed. The Christian meaning of procession is that of the people on pilgrimage accompanied by God (in the OT sense of the term) or that walk with Christ (toward death and *resurrection).

The primary examples of liturgical processions are those connected to the *eucharistic celebration, i.e., the entrance of the celebrant who advances with the book of the gospels and the offerings (see Euchologium Serapionis 19: A. Hänggi - I. Pahl, Prex eucharistica, Fribourg 1968, 133; Aug., Retractationes 2,11: PL 32, 634; Confess. 5,9,17: PL 59, 55). Holy Week, with the procession of the *palms, provides another prime example, one that flourished at the end of the 4th c. in the church of *Jerusalem (Peregr. Egeriae 31,1-4) before spreading into *Spain (6th c.) and *Gaul (9th c.) (see Férotin, 178-183): the entire crowd accompanied the bishop with palm or olive branches, making the "journey entirely on foot, even if there were women or famous people. In this manner, they accompanied the bishop while responding to the Psalms" (Peregr. Egeriae 31,4). Egeria also mentioned the morning procession of *Epiphany from *Bethlehem to Jerusalem after the night vigil (25,6 and 11).

At *Constantinople, *John Chrysostom opposed the *Arians by instituting large processions. The translationes of the bodies of martyrs was carried out with great solemnity and formidable processions. The stational churches developed from the feasts of the martyrs from the 5th c. onward. The Marian devotions such as those of Christmas, the *Annunciation, the *Purification and the Dormition flourished at *Rome toward the end of the 8th c. and seem to have begun in the Byzantine East. Further examples include the penitential practices, e.g., the major litanies, which began at Rome in the 6th c. and replaced for the *pagan Robigalia, and the minor litanies (Rogations), which began at *Vienna (*Gaul) and in the 5th c. were introduced at Rome at the end of the 8th c., none of which had been entirely penitential in character, as well as the translations of the relics of the saints and the funerary processions.

Monumenta Ecclesiae Liturgica 5, ed M. Férotin, Paris 1904; Les Ordines Romani, II, ed. M. Andrieu, Louvain 1960; DACL 14, 1895-1896; LTK³ 8, 678-681; CE 11, 819-821; RAC 2, 422-429; W. Rötzger, Des Heiligen Augustinus Schriften als liturgiegeschichtliche Quelle, Munich 1930; La MaisonD 43 (1955); M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, I, Milan 1955; F. Van der Meer, Augustine the Bishop, London 1961; A.G. Martimort (ed.), L'église en prière, new ed., Paris 1984, II, 259-269; Processioni, pellegrinaggi, giubilei, in La Chiesa in preghiera (ed. A.G. Martimort), Rome 1966, 680-690; J.F. Baldovin, The Urban Character of Christian Worship in Jerusalem, Rome, and Constantinople from the Fourth to the Tenth Centuries. The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy, Rome 1987; P.F. Beatrice, Modelli di processioni nel cristianesimo antico: Rivista Liturgica 79 (1992) 496-504; D. Sartore, A.M. Triacca, C. Cibien, eds. Liturgia, Milan 2001, 1532-1539 (with bibl.).

P. Fahey

PROCHORUS. One of the seven deacons (Acts 6:5), acc. to the Greek tradition, bishop of Nicomedia and *Bithynia (ps.-Dorotheus, ps.-Epiphanius). According to the Latin tradition, he was a martyr in *Antioch. Traditionally held to be the author of the Acts of John, but the author of these Acts does not know these traditions: he is considered to be one of the 70, a servant of *John and his travel companion. The author of the Acts of John is instead a layman from *Syria or rather *Palestine, probably employed in the administration; the work was composed between the 5th and 6th c. (it is cited by the Chronicon Paschale of 630). The author recounts John's departure from *Jerusalem and arrival at *Ephesus, his miracles and deeds accomplished there, his trip to *Rome (event that occurred at Porta Latina), his exile at Patmos, where he wrote the gospel (against the tradition that placed it at Ephesus; he does not mention the *Apocalypse), and his death. These Acts of John have nothing to do with the primitive Acts and are the author's pure speculation, which demonstrates that he does not know the geography of *Asia Minor. The Acts do not reflect any pragmatic or ascetical tradition. Using incorrect language, the author employs stereotypes and has no understanding of style or *rhetoric. Nevertheless, the work enjoyed great popularity thanks to its sensational content and vivid narration: there exist Latin, Armenian (CCAp 3, 289-407), Arabic, Ethiopian, Georgian and *Paleoslavonic versions.

CANT 218; BHG 916-917b; BHO 458-473; A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 285-291; Lipsius-Bonnet I, 355-408. Edition: T. Zahn, Erlangen 1880 (Hildesheim 1975). Translations: French: M. van Esbroek: Bedi Kertlisa 33 (1975) 73-109 (from the Georgian version); L. Leloir: CCAp 3, 289-408 (from the Armenian version); It.: Erbetta II, 68-110; cf. Moraldi 2, 292-303 (summary); Polish: Starowieyski, Studia Paradyskie 4 (1994) 131-202. E. Junod - J.D. Kaestli: CCAp 2 (1983) 718-749. H.W. Hollander, The Influence of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs in the Early Church. Joseph as Model in Prochorus' Acts of John: OLP 9 (1978) 75-81; C. Nardi, Il racconto del giovane Capo dei Briganti di Clemente Alessandrino negli Atti di Giovanni dallo Pseudo-Procoro: Prometheus 15 (1989) 80-90; A. Stramaglia, Una storia di fantasmi a la "Periegesi" di Pausania (6,6,7-11) e gli "Atti di Giovanni" dello Ps. Procoro (pp. 117-122, Zahn): Orpheus 12 (1991) 549-554.

M. Starowieyski

PROCLUS, Montanist. Proclus (Proculus), a second-generation Montanist, was a literary proponent of *Montanism at *Rome immediately after 200, as was *Tertullian, more or less during the same period, at *Carthage. His works have been lost. The information that we have of these documents derives from a dialogue against Proclus mentioned by *Eusebius

(HE 3,31,4), attributed to Gaius, a learned ecclesiastical writer (not the presbyter), an opponent of the *Apocalypse of John and an author of anti-Montanist writings (Eus., HE 2,25,6; 6,20,3) during the pontificate of the Roman Bishop *Zephyrinus (198–217). Proclus was the head of the Montanist group that took its name from him, distinct from another individual named after Aeschines, a *monarchian modalist (ps.-Tertullian, Adv. omn. Haer. 7,2). From that fact, one can conclude that Proclus, with respect to the Montanism of his time and the common views of the movement (the recognition of Montanus as the *Paraclete), did not profess a *Christology that could be accused of heresy. Proclus wrote against *gnosticism. Tertullian therefore mentioned him (and his writings from the Montanist period) among the most famous ecclesiastical antiheretical writers (*Justin, *Miltiades and *Irenaeus), and attributed great honors to him for the style of his ascetic life and his ability as an author. The identity of Proclus as the "christianus Proclus" mentioned by Tertullian (Ad Scap. 4,5) is taken for granted by scholars today.

P. de Labriolle, La crise montaniste, Paris 1913, 277-280; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, Leipzig [2]1958 (1904), 2,2, 206; Ch. Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy, Cambridge 1996, passim.

B. Aland

PROCLUS LYCIUS DIADOCHUS (d. 484/485). A biography on him was left by a scholar of his writings, Marinus (ed. F. Boissonade, Leipzig 1814). Written in the form of an encomium, this biography takes as its models the *Life of Apollonius of Tiana and *Porphyry's *Life of Plotinus (see R. Beutler, PWK 23/1, 186). Proclus was born in *Byzantium between 409 and 412 to wealthy parents, natives of *Lycia; shortly after his birth they took him back to Lycia. The young boy then began his studies at *Alexandria under the direction of the orator Leo of Isauria. He stayed in the city for several years, studying grammar, Latin, *rhetoric and philosophy (esp. Aristotle's). Not even 20 years old, he transferred to the school of the *Neoplatonists in *Athens, directed at that time by Plutarch of Athens and Syrianus, who had a decisive influence on him. It was these people—and esp. Syrianus—who initiated him into Neoplatonism through the study and exegesis of *Plato and Aristotle's writings. After the brief scholarchate of Domninus of Larissa, who succeeded Syrianus after his death—the precise year is unknown—Proclus, already famous and highly regarded, assumed the leadership of the school, which he maintained until his death (484–485). As a result of political troubles, from which his determined commitment to the restoration of the cult of the pagan divinities was not exempt, his stay at Athens was interrupted for one year, during which time he had to take shelter in Lydia. For more information on his teachings, see the articles on nous and *Neoplatonism; on his influence on ps.-Dionysius, see the articles on *Platonism and the Fathers and ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite.

R. Beutler, PWK 23/1, 186-190; J. Pépin - H.-D. Saffrey (ed.), Proclus, lecteur et interprète des anciens, Paris 1987; M. Lebiez, Éloge d'un philosophe resté païen. Textes présentés, traduits et commentés, Paris 1998.

S. Lilla

PROCLUS of Constantinople (before 390–446). Born probably at *Constantinople before 390, he was a deacon and priest there during the episcopate of *Atticus. He was a passionate claimant to this episcopal see. He became disillusioned in 426 (the election of *Sisinnius), 428 (the election of *Nestorius) and 431 (the election of *Maximian). Upon the death of Maximian (434), he was able to fulfill his lifelong dream by becoming bishop. Previously, Sisinnius had appointed him bishop of Cyzicus, but the people did not accept the appointment. Proclus remained in the capital city, where on 23 December 428, in a homily delivered in the presence of Nestorius, to the consternation of the patriarch, he defended Mary's divine maternity and the title Theotokos.

During his episcopate, which lasted until 446, Proclus worked in various ways to extend the scope of Constantinople's patriarchal authority, from *Cappadocia to Illyricum, and in January 437 he ordered that the relics of *John Chrysostom, who had died in exile, be transferred to the capital. The most important episode of Proclus's episcopate occurred in the aftermath of the Nestorian controversy. Around 435, once the objective of Nestorius's opponents had moved on to the literary works of *Diodore of Tarsus and *Theodore of Mopsuestia, who were considered to be his teachers, the bishops of *Armenia asked for Proclus's opinion on the matter. In his response, Tomus ad Armenios, refuting the most divisive aspects of Theodore's Christology, Proclus emphasized, following the example of *Cyril of Alexandria, the unity of Jesus Christ as human and divine with the formula "God the Word, one of the Trinity, became incarnate." (This form subsequently developed into another, Unus ex Trinitate passus est, which was defended by the Scythian monks in the beginning of the 6th c. and was recognized to be Proclus's.) Proclus claimed that *John of Antioch and other bishops of the Antiochene faction signed the Tomus and condemned the attached series of extracts from the works of Theodore of Mopsuestia, whose name, however, was not mentioned. The refusal of the Antiochenes to condemn passages from Theodore's works, who had already been dead for several decades and had died in *peace with the church, provoked a controversy in which even Cyril took part; but facing the firm resistance of the Antiochenes, Proclus, Cyril and the emperor *Theodosius II refrained from trying to obtain the condemnation of the extracts taken from Theodore's works (ca. 437).

Proclus was a talented preacher, and various authentic speeches of his have survived, some of which exist only in *Syriac translation. They are almost all devoted to anti-Nestorian doctrinal concerns of the christological controversy. The same topic dominates in the extant letters, which have come down to us only in Latin translation, with the exception of the second, the Tomus ad Armenios, the Greek original of which we also possess. Spurious texts transmitted under his name are not lacking, and the fragment of a letter in which Proclus purportedly defined Christ as "one of the Trinity crucified according to the *flesh," in agreement with the *theopaschite formula, should in all likelihood be considered a forgery.

CPG III, 5800-5915; PG 65, 680-850; DTC 13, 662-670; M. Richard, Proclus de Constantinople et le théopaschisme: RHE 38 (1942) 303-331; F.J. Leroy, L'homilétique de Proclus de Constantinople, ST 247, Vatican City 1967; M. Aubineau, Bilan d'une enquête sur les homélies de Proclus de Constantinople: REG 85 (1972) 572-596; BBKL VII, 985-988; N. Constas, Proclus of Constantinople and the Cult of the Virgin in Late Antiquity. Homilies 1-5, Leiden 2003.

M. Simonetti

PROCOPIUS. Historian of *Palestine (ca. 500–after 562). Born in *Caesarea around the year 500, Procopius received a legal education and became the consiliarius of *Belisarius in 527. From 540 onward, he lived primarily at *Constantinople, where he wrote several historical books in which he demonstrated his great sympathy for Belisarius's great desire to restore the ancient boundaries of the empire. His most important work, The Wars, taken precisely from the military campaigns (until 553) by which the Byzantine Empire sought to regain its hegemony in N *Africa, *Italy and the E area of the Mediterranean. The Wars is one of the primary sources for *Evagrius Scholasticus's Ecclesiastical History (6th c.). The Anecdotes, a work composed around 550, contain the scandalous history of the emperor *Justinian and his wife *Theodora and reveal Procopius's hatred for Justinian and his profligate lifestyle. His last work, the Aedificia, however, is a *panegyric on the great architectural works built by the emperor. It contains, among other things, a famous description of the Theodosian church of the Hagia Sophia at Constantinople.

J. Haury - G. Wirth, Procopii Caesariensis opera omnia, Leipzig, 1905–1913 (²1962–1964); O. Veh, Prokopius. Werke: griechisch-deutsch, Munich 1961–1970; O. Veh, Zur Geschichtsschreibung und Weltauffassung des Prokopius, Bayreuth 1951–1953; B. Rubin, Prokopius von Cäsarea, Stuttgart 1954; R. Browning, Justinian and Theodora, London 1971; L.A. Evan, Procopius, New York 1972; A. Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, London 1985; H.G. Beck, Lo storico e la sua vittima. Teodora e Procopio, Bari 1988; A. de Vogüé, Le témoinage de Procope: Collectanea Cisterciensia 55 (1993) 271-286; A. Kaldellis, Procopius of Caesarea, Philadelphia 2004; Procopio di Cesarea, La guerra gotica, ed. D. Comparetti, Milan 2005.

K. den Biesen

PROCOPIUS of Gaza (465–ca. 530). Christian Sophist who lived between the 5th and 6th c. Born in 465 at Gaza, *Palestine, he completed his education in his city of birth and at *Alexandria. He was soon called home to fill the teaching chair, which he held for the remainder of his entire life. As testified by his disciple and successor Choricius in his commemorative speech, Procopius enjoyed great respect on account of his teaching and works, but also for his works' accessibility and simplicity. He possessed such a strong theological training that he was considered and honored as a bishop. Procopius died shortly after 530.

His teaching demonstrated a linguistic training founded on classical writers and a remarkable persona as an orator. The *panegyric for *Anastasius I, delivered during the inauguration of a monument, is a significant example of this. From the numerous rhetorical exercises (ekphraseis), only two have been edited: the description of the artistic clock of the Gaza market (ed. H. Diels, Über die von Prokop beschriebene Kunstuhr von Gaza, Berlin 1917) and that of a series of Late Antique *paintings in Gaza (ed. P. Friedländer, Vatican City 1939). The epistolary correspondence of Procopius, already published during the author's lifetime as an exemplary collection of masterpieces of stylistic, Athenian purity, consists of 163 *letters; even if they are tainted by abstraction, these letters highlight the spiritual bonds between Gaza and the cultural centers of the Mediterranean world.

Procopius, moreover, left a large number of theological writings, which for the most part still await an editor. Undoubtedly, scholars have incorrectly wanted to distinguish Procopius the Sophist from Procopius the theologian. Procopius was the first of a series of authors of biblical catenae*. A follower of Alexandrian *theology, Procopius made extensive use of *Origen's writings and rejected the Antiochene *Theodoret. To his large catena on the Heptateuch and the other historical books of the OT, which *Photius knew in their entirety, he assigned the title Ἐκλογαὶ ἐξηγητικαί; the salient aspects of extracts prepared by Procopius himself survive with the title Ἐπιτομὴ ἐκλογῶν. Two commentaries on the *Song of Songs go under Procopius's name, one of which is authentic, although the other is a fragment of the catena of three Fathers, based on *Nilus, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Maximus the Confessor. There remain, with numerous lacunae, the catena on the *prophet Isaiah and Ecclesiastes. The catena on Proverbs that has come down to us under Procopius's name is spurious. The fragments (edited by A. Mai, Nova Patrum bibliotheca, IV/2, Rome 1847, 155-201 and VII/2, Rome 1854, 1-81) of a genuine work of Procopius lead one to think of a double recension, as in the case of the commentary on the Heptateuch. A controversy with the *Neoplatonist *Proclus, fragments of which remain (A. Mai, Classici auctores e Vaticanis codicibus editi, 4, Rome 1831, 274ff.), and a text of Christian *apologetics developed using the dialectical method have been shown to be genuine by more recent studies that have dispelled earlier doubts. A description of the Hagia Sophia belongs, however, most likely, to *Procopius of Caesarea; a monody on the collapse of the same church caused by an earthquake is probably the work of Michael Psellos. Both documents, in the most ancient editions, are attributed to Procopius.

CPG III, 7430-7448; PG 87, 21-2842 (the spurious works are included); A. Garzya - R.-L. Loenertz, Procopii Gazaei epistolae et declamationes, Ettal 1963; S. Leanza, Procopii Gazaei catena in Ecclesiasten, CCG 4, Turnhout 1978, 1-50; PWK 23, 259-272; EC 10,85; Beck 414-416; M. Minniti Colonna, Prolegomena a una nuova edizione del panegirico per l'imperatore Anastasio di Procopio di Gaza: Byzantion 54 (1984) 89-99; A. Cameron, Procopius and the Sixth Century, Berkeley, CA 1985; A. Chauvot, Procope de Gaze, Priscien de Césarée, Panégyriques de l'empereur Anastase Ier, Bonn 1986; A. Garzya, Per la storia della tradizione delle Epistole di Procopio di Gaza, TU 133, Berlino 1987; F. Petit, Eusèbe d'Emèse et Théodore de Mopsueste. L'apport de Procope de Gaza: Museon 104 (1991) 349-354; A. Labate, Il recupero del commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Dionigi Alessandrino attraverso le catene bizantine: Koinonia 16 (1992) 53-74; C. Pasini, Resti della "Catena sui Proverbi" di Procopio di Gaza in un frammento pergamenaceo nel codice Ambrosiano B 85 sup.: Aevum 74 (2000) 421-29; Christian Gaza in Late Antiquity, ed. B. Bitton-Ashkelony - A. Kofsky, Leiden 2004.

J. Irmscher

PROCOPIUS the Usurper (ca. 326–366). Information about this individual comes to us from *Ammianus Marcellinus, *Zosimus and *Photius. Born in ca. 326 to an important family, Artemisia may have been his wife. The Emperor Anthemius was his descendant. A notarius and tribunus, then a comes (Ammianus 26,6,1), he participated in *Julian's expedition of 363 against the *Sassanids. According to Ammianus, it was said that Julian told him to assume command after his death. However, upon the rise of *Jovian and after taking the emperor's dead body to *Tarsus (Ammianus 25,9,12), he retired to *Caesarea in *Cappadocia (Zosimus 4,4,3). After he was arrested, he was able to escape into Chersonese; then he returned to *Constantinople, where he proclaimed himself emperor in September 365, spreading the news that *Valentinian, who was in *Gaul, was dead. He sought to obtain the support of the legions of Illyricum through money. *Valens set out to combat Procopius, who during the winter of 365/366 consolidated his power. He was defeated in *Phrygia; Procopius was decapitated on 26 May 366 (Consularia Constantinopolitana sub annum 366, ed. Burgess p. 239). One recent scholar has detected a religious motive in Procopius's rebellion, i.e., the continuation of Julian's *pagan program. This hypothesis, however, finds no support in the primary sources.

N.J.E. Austin, A Usurper's Claim to Legitimacy. Procopius in A.D. 365/6: Rivista Storica dell'Antichità 2 (1972) 187-194; PLRE 1, 742-743; R. Burgess, The Chronicle of Hydatius and the Consularia Constantinopolitana, Oxford 1993; N. Lenski, Failure of Empire. Valens and the Roman State in the Fourth Century A.D., Berkeley 2002.

A. Di Berardino

PROCULLIANUS (4th–5th c.). Donatist bishop of *Hippo during the time of the Catholic bishops Valerius and *Augustine. Augustine recognized Procullianus's peaceful demeanor (Ep. 33,1) and willingly and without conditions accepted his invitation to discuss ways to resolve the differences between *Catholics and *Donatists (Ep. 33,4), i.e., as of the year 396. Nonetheless, it does not seem that the two were able to meet. In the meantime, moreover, a Catholic, in dispute with his mother, had joined Procullianus's group, an act that even had civil consequences (Ep. 34). The relationship between the two groups became increasingly tense because other Catholics went over to the Donatist party (Ep. 35,1-2) or Donatists passed over to the Catholic Church (Ep. 78,8) and because of violence carried out on the latter (Ep. 105,2,3). We do not know the year of Procul-lianus's death; however, in 410, we discover that *Macrobius was his successor at Hippo.

DCB 4, 489; PCBE 1, 924-926.

A. Di Berardino

PROCULUS of Marseille, bishop (5th c.). Although not mentioned by name, the last paragraph of Pope *Celestine's letter (PL 50, 435) dated 26 July 428 makes reference to him—a letter that was addressed to the bishops of the provinces of *Vienne and *Narbonne, in which the pope entrusted to the college of bishops of these provinces the duty of listening to the "so-called bishop of the church of Marseille," who had welcomed the killing of Patroclus, bishop of *Arles, who was put to death in 426 by order of the military commander Felix, who had a residence at *Ravenna. Proculus had in fact persecuted Patroclus, who had obtained from Pope *Zosimus the parishes of Ceyreste and Garguier, on the pretext that they had been usurped from Proculus of Marseille; Proculus, upon the death of his old enemy, had received the murderer by showing him his friendship. The bishops of Marseille and Arles were in fact in conflict because they both sought to lay claim to their right of primacy over Provence.

We know of him as well from *Augustine's Ep. 219, which was sent to Proculus and a certain Cillenius, who had condemned Leporius, a monk who had intruded into the African church. From the first years of his trip to Marseille, even *Cassian was confronted by the explosion of the controversy provoked by Leporius in Provence. Leporius, once he had become a monk, began to spread heretical opinions so that the guardians of orthodoxy in *Gaul were quick to offer their assessment against this accused individual who was preaching a heavily suspect theology of creation. They accused him, a bit superficially, of *Pelagianism. Because he was in error, he was expelled by the local bishops and esp. Proculus, bishop of Marseille. In the attempts to bring him to the right path, church authorities called upon Cassian.

Caelestinus, Ep. 4,3,5; 6,9-10 (PL 50, 429-436); Augstine, Ep. 219 (ed. Goldbacher, p. 428); Duchesne, Fastes I, 95-112; Tillemont, 14, 62; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, 2, Paris 1957, 219-226; B. Morel, De invloed van Leporius op Cassianus' weerlegging van het Nestorianisme: Bijdragen 21 (1960) 31-51; J.L. Maier, La date de la rétractation de Leporius et celle du "sermon 396" de saint Augustin: REAug 11 (1965) 39-42; O. Perler, Les voyages de saint Augustin, Paris 1969, 343; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana, École Française de Rome 1976, 1026-1043.

M. Palmieri

PROFUTURUS. In the *lay community of *Hippo, there was a certain Profuturus (Aug., Ep. 158,9: from *Evodius), who must have been the same person described by *Augustine as a frater (brother), and who was commissioned by him to go to *Jerome at *Bethlehem to deliver a letter and some books (Aug., Ep. 28,1,1; 71,1). But at the moment of his departure, Profuturus was appointed bishop (Ep. 71,2; cf. *Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 7,1). His episcopal see could have been *Cirta (= Constantine), because we find a bishop there with his name (cf. Aug., De unico bapt. 16,29), the recipient of a letter from Augustine, who considered him a close friend (Ep. 38).

PCBE 1, 928-929.

A. Di Berardino

PROFUTURUS of Braga. Metropolitan of *Gallaecia in 538, he vigorously opposed *Priscillianists and *Arians. Interested in theological and disciplinary topics, in a letter that has not survived, he asked *Rome questions to obtain guidance on the following: the practice of baptizing with triple immersion, the celebration of *Easter, the *eucharistic celebration and other similar matters. In 538, Pope *Vigilius responded to this letter with a decretal (then included in the Hispana *Canonical Collection) that led to the Suevian *liturgy—from the celebration of the 1st Council of *Braga (561) and before the unification of the liturgy of the Visigothic period (beginning of the 7th c.)—becoming very similar to the Roman tradition.

PL 69, 18ff.; DHEE 5, 2030, Z. García Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España, 11/2, Madrid 1933; J.O. Bragança, A carta do Papa Vigílio ao Arcebispo Profuturo de Braga: Bracara Augusta 21 (1967) 65-91; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispanolusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 356-358.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

PROGRESS

I. The history of salvation - II. "Urgeschichte" and the history of civilization - III. The stability of the state - IV. Eusebius of Caesarea and Constantine - V. Subsequent developments.

According to the scope of this entry, progress is defined as the idea of humanity's constant advancement toward its improvement, without seeking to identify the causes for this progress. With respect to moral progress and the perfection of the human being, see the pertinent entries in this encyclopedia.

I. The history of salvation. At the beginning of the 2nd c., the primary schools of thought within the ancient church interpreted the OT and the NT as two stations along God's journey with his people. This concept finally led to the formation of the Christian idea of a progressive history of salvation, which is not found either in *pagan or Jewish thought. The first author who fully developed this idea was *Irenaeus of Lyons (Haer. IV). In contrast to *Marcion, he insisted on the absolute unity of God. At the same time, however, he also affirmed that this one God had also established a new covenant, that had supplanted the earlier one and that he interpreted as a sign of God's will to gradually lead humankind to final perfection. Irenaeus then used the term "man" (anthrōpos) in the individual and generic sense. Progress, however, could be the progress in the faith of the individual believer or all believers (understood as the chief end of all individual believers). When he used the term "man" as a generic term, Irenaeus applied the metaphor of growth (individual) to history in order to combine together God's unity and his plan of salvation on the one hand and the gradual unveiling of his plan on the other. Subsequent authors (*Clement of Alexandria, *Tertullian and *Origen) elaborated this idea. Tertullian, in the writings from his *Montanist period, also extended the idea of progress to include the history of the church. Although the ultimate act of faith could not be changed, under the guidance of the *Holy Spirit, the church's discipline was gradually changing for the better. Lastly, at the beginning of the 4th c., *Arnobius offered a constant defense of the idea of innovation in the Adversus Nationes (Against the Nations 1,57; 2,66-77). Although many aspects in this concept of the history of salvation were not clear, not only was the end of historical development a restitution of humankind to its original state before the fall (restitutio in integrum) but the final state would be established by a qualitative improvement.

When the idea of progress in the history of salvation was more fully reworked, it included not only the development of religion, but also the emergence of civilization and the concept of the state's stability.

II. "Urgeschichte" and the history of civilization. The biblical account of human origins, as reported in the book of Genesis, was not favorable to a positive interpretation of culture and history from the moment that it included the account of *sin and failure. *Theophilus of Antioch was the first Christian author to change the message of Genesis with the Hellenistic theories on the emergence of culture. Nevertheless, his concept was used only as a proof that has come down to us from the ancient world and therefore still lacked any progressive dynamism. From other documents, e.g., the ps.-Clementine literature, one can see that the progressive vision of culture and history is found only where, for apologetic reasons, the narrative of Genesis is placed in the background, while *pagan traditions come to the fore (Irenaeus; Tertullian, De Pallio; Origen; Arnobius).

III. The stability of the state. Another question that required attention was the relation of the history of salvation to secular history, in particular the problem of the position of the state in God's design. For apologetic reasons, Christians affirmed that there was a providential connection between the reign of *Augustus, who not only considerably enlarged the empire but had brought a legendary state of peace on earth, and the birth of Jesus Christ (*Melito of Sardis, Origen). In his Contra Celsum, *Origen emphasized the fact that Christians did not at all threaten the state but, to the contrary, had contributed to strengthening its stability. The level of morality in the state had grown in proportion to the spread of Christianity in the Roman Empire. Therefore, the idea of progress in salvation was now extended to include the entire world. Origen, however, did not know with certainty whether progressive salvation found its conclusion in this world or whether it transcended it. Arnobius showed a similar optimism with respect to the benefits that the state and society, once converted, would garner from Christianity. According to this vision, the new faith had already promised universal peace, and the Christian empire would, once and for all, abandon weapons.

IV. Eusebius of Caesarea and Constantine. During the first decades of the 4th c., the political situation completely changed following the Constantinian Revolution. Many Christian theologians assigned a new role to the Roman Empire in the history of salvation. In *Eusebius of Caesarea's perspective, the Constantinian monarchy reflected and imitated the divine monarchy. The present era under *Constantine was seen as the result of a development that guided God's forgetful world toward the veneration of the one God of the Christians, who, in turn, guaranteed stability and prosperity. The emperor was seen as God's agent in promoting and ensuring its stability, by uniting the oikoumenē and thus allowing Christianity to spread. Eusebius's theology was not only heavily antiapocalyptic, but his eschatology almost disappeared behind the emphasis on humanity's progress in this world, a progress that will undoubtedly continue in the future, and must perhaps be understood as the gradual realization of the heavenly kingdom. Thus, Eusebius joined together all the propositions that had been formulated in 2nd-c. theology (history of salvation, cultural history and Christianity as political progress), in a complex theology of history. The Christian idea of progress was fully expressed for the first time by Eusebius.

The Eusebian concept of progress, i.e., the alliance of Christianity with the Roman Empire, corresponds to the ancient Roman ideology of pietas not in theoretical reflection but in actual results: the proper veneration of God guaranteed the empire's political stability and social prosperity. And for this reason, without a doubt, the Roman emperors, in general, and Constantine in particular, finally recognized the contribution that Christianity had given to the empire's stability, as soon as it had spread among the majority of the population or at least among the dominant classes. After his victory over Licinius, the Christian element in the writings of Constantine became increasingly predominant. Thus, he began to perceive his ability to unify and bring peace to the empire as a sign of divine *providence, and his military successes paralleled the spread of Christianity. Constantine began to understand the ancient Roman concept of pietas in terms of the Christian history of salvation, which resulted in an absolute monotheism. The applicability of the principle do ut des, which was the basis of pietas, was now made to derive from the progressive development of the Christian history of salvation, and therefore Constantine's kingdom was supported by the new foundation. This concept of the relation between religion and state could no longer tolerate any discord in religious matters or any religious pluralism without immediately endangering the state's stability. Therefore it was not by chance that this parallel between Christian monotheism and the monarchy also, in time, led to more severe suppression of *heresy and *paganism.

The Christian idea of progress, therefore, was vital in understanding the change that had occurred under Constantine. During the 3rd c., the church had developed some theological criteria that were now able to be used as a means for affirming a close connection between *church and state.

V. Subsequent developments. The question of the extent to which the concept of alliance between church and state, as formulated by Eusebius, influenced the relationship between spiritual and secular power in the East is still subject to debate and demands further clarification. In the West, the idea of progress appeared primarily in *Ambrose's controversies (Ep. 18) and *Prudentius's work against *Symmachus (C. Symm.). After the fall of *Rome in 410, *Augustine not only rejected all apocalyptic speculations on the end of the world, but he also warned against the identification of God's *peace (civitas Dei) with earthly peace (civitas terrena, see De civitate Dei). Nevertheless, other authors such as *Orosius continued to spread an optimistic vision of the development of world history.

With the Christian concept of progress, a new parameter in reflection on history was introduced, a parameter that was unknown in this form to Classical Antiquity, and that in various ways influenced the Middle Ages, the Renaissance and the Enlightenment.

K. Thraede, RAC 8, 141-182; R. Koselleck - Ch. Meier, GGB 2, 351-423; W. Kinzig, Novitas Christiana. Die Idee des Fortschritts in der Alten Kirche bis Eusebius, Göttingen 1994 (FKDG 58).

W. Kinzig

PROHAERESIUS (4th c.). According to *Eunapius of Sardis (V. Soph. X, 1,8 = p. 65; X, 8,1-2 = p. 79 Giangrande), he was, "it seems," an Armenian Christian, who studied at *Antioch and *Athens, a disciple of Ulpian of Antioch and the Cappadocian Julian; from 340 he went to Athens to fill the latter's chair. *Constans sent him to *Gaul, where he stayed and received honors, from 342 to 347. During this trip, he went to *Rome, where the senate dedicated a statue to him bearing an inscription for his great gifts in oratory. Among those who heard him were *Basil and *Gregory of Nazianzus; even *Julian the Apostate, during his trip to Athens, greatly admired his eloquence. Following Julian's decree prohibiting Christians from teaching, Prohaeresius, along with the African *Marius Victorinus, was forced to leave the school, despite his good relations with the emperor, who would have wanted to protect him from the effects of this law, as *Jerome says in the Chron. a. 363 (GCS Eusebius Werke VII, 242).

The tenor of this relationship, however, has been reevaluated by recent study on the basis of a reinterpretation of Julian's Ep. 31 to Prohaeresius, in which the emperor seems to invite the reluctant orator to compose a historiographical work intended to illustrate his own ascent to power to the detriment of the Christian Emperor *Constantius. To better understand such an epistolary exchange, it would be necessary to contextualize it within the heated argument between Prohaeresius and his former student *Himerius, who was then in vogue at Julian's court at *Constantinople. If it is true that the majority of modern scholars, following Jerome, are in agreement in considering Prohaeresius a Christian, it is necessary to note, however, that Prohaeresius's

Christian faith has been recently called into question on the basis of a new analysis of the ancient testimonies about him (see R. Goulet, Prohérésius le païen et quelques remarques sur la chronologie d'Eunape de Sardes: AntTard 8 [2000] 209-222): on the basis of this reconstruction, Eunapius seems to adhere to the paganism of his teacher. In this case, his stature should be reconsidered within the political-religious context surrounding the emperor Julian's regime.

PWK 23, 1, 30-32; J. Bidez, La vie de l'empereur Julien, Paris 1930, 55ff. And 113ff.; Fliche-Martin III, 234; PLRE 1, 731; Julian, Briefe, ed. B.K. Weis, Munich 1973–; Th.M. Banchich, JHS 107 (1987) 164-167; A.D. Booth, AHB, 1 (1987), 14ff., Ch.W. Fornara: CQ 39 (1989) 517-523; R.J. Penella, Greek Philosophers and Sophists in the Fourth Century A.D. Studies in Eunapius of Sardis, Liverpool 1990, 94-99; E. Pack, Libanio, Temistio e la reazione giulianea, in Lo spazio letterario della Grecia antica I, 3, Rome 1994, 679-681; U. Criscuolo, Sull'"epitafio" di Gregorio di Nazianzo per il retore Proeresio, in Scritti offerti a F. Corsaro, II, Catania 1994, 189-195; R. Goulet, Prohérésius le païen et quelques remarques sur la chronologie d'Eunape de Sardes: AntTard 8 (2000) 209-222.

C. Noce - M. Perraymond

PROJECTUS, bishop (d. after 431). An Italian bishop of an unknown see and a Roman legate. Nothing permits scholars to identify him with the homonymous bishop of the Forum Cornelii. The Projectus discussed here took part, with Bishop Arcadius and the Roman priest Philip, in the delegation commissioned to represent Pope *Celestine at the Council of *Ephesus, called by *Theodosius II for 7 June 431, to bring an end to the conflicts between *Cyril and *Nestorius. The papal instructions were to bring about the condemnation of Nestorius and to follow Cyril's lead.

The Roman delegation, due to the difficulties of traveling by sea, arrived after the work had started; the three legates were united in the doctrinal and disciplinary positions (see *Philip, presbyter) and also signed the conciliar acts and various documents.

In contrast to the legates Philip and Arcadius, Projectus did not participate in the opposing gathering convoked by Theodosius II in *Constantinople (and gathered at Chalcedon) starting from September 431; after 31 October 431, Projectus, however, was, just as were the envoys of Cyril's party, the recipient of a letter of introduction and greeting sent by Cyril to Constantinople, concerning the election of the new patriarch of the imperial capital, *Maximian. The extant data, however, does not permit us to say whether he at that time had reached Constantinople, as did the other two Roman legates.

There are no reasons for identifying Projectus with the homonymous bishop of an unmentioned see, whose name appears, at the 11th position, in the number of recipients of the Libellus fidei, which recognized the condemnation of Nestorius, who had been sent by Julian of *Serdica to *Rufus of Thessalonica and his synod, before 436.

L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976; PCBE II, 1855-1857.

M. Palmieri

PROLOGUES to the BIBLICAL BOOKS. The *Bible has been transmitted through a continuous release of editions (and translations), at times popular, at times scholarly, but which have left traces of their presence not only in the constitution of the text, but also in the prologues, glosses and more or less extensive marginalia, that offer what seems to be necessary to introduce the text, and at times to refute certain types of interpretations. Prior to the books, lists of numbered Capitula (chapters) can supply an analysis and help to outline the desired passage. In DBS 8 (1969) 688-692, B. Botte offered an excellent summary with a bibl.; in the Bulletin de la Bible latine attached to the Revue Bénédictine, P.M. Bogaert analyzed recent studies (see the indexes for the entry Préfaces et prologues). In effect, the Latin tradition was much richer in this regard. For the Greek MSS, however, see R. Devreesse, Introduction à l'étude des manuscrits grecs, Paris 1954, 102-121 (Origen), 139-141, 159-171, which slipped Botte's notice. It has often been the trend in scholarship to attribute these anonymous texts to famous heretics (or to the controversial literature against them): *Marcion, *monarchianism, *Priscillian and *Pelagius. A more prudent approach is to be reserved in the face these assumption and suggests a somewhat earlier date for the most significant texts.

M.E. Schild, Abendländische Bibelvorreden, Gütersloh 1970; J. Regul, Die antimarcionitischen Evangelienprologe, Freiburg 1969; and the introductions to the volumes of Beuron's Vetus Latina. The majority of Latin texts have now been published with critical editions of the Vulgate. E. Norelli, La tradizione ecclesiastica negli antichi prologhi alle epistole paoline, in La tradizione. Forme e modi, Rome 1990 (SEA 31), 301-324; A. Whealey, Prologues on the Psalms. Origen, Hippolytus, Eusebius: RBen 106 (1996) 234-245; V. Verheyden, The Canon Muratori. A Matter of Dispute, in The Biblical Canons, ed. J.-M. Auwers - H.J. De Jonge, Leuven 2003, 422ff.; Verzeichnis, 695-719; LACL 593-596.

J. Gribomont

PROLOGUS PASCHAE AD VITALEM. A short work (the incipit is as follows: Cum magnanime impulsarer) compiled in 395 almost certainly at *Rome, because it devoted much attention to the Roman church and its martyrs. It is composed of two parts: the first is a brief chronology of biblical and post-biblical events starting from *Adam; it dates the birth of Jesus Christ to the year 4887 (752/753 years after the founding of Rome) and his death to the year 29. It lists seven persecutions: the first under the emperor *Nero (56/57) with the deaths of *Peter and *Paul. The few martyrs named from the various persecutions are from Rome, Capua (*Augustine and *Felicitas), *Carthage (*Cyprian), Solon (*Domnus and Felix). The second part discusses at length the paschal cycle of 84 years: the cycle begun in 299 ends in 382; in 383, a new one begins.

CPL 2292; Chronica Minora, ed. Mommsen, I, 737-738; PLS 3, 427-437 (from Krush's ed.); H. Inglebert, Les romaines chrétiennes face à l'histoire de Rome, Paris 1996, 595-596.

A. Di Berardino

PROPERTY, ECCLESIASTICAL

I. Origins - II. Legal status - III. Administration.

I. Origins. According to the testimonies of the Pauline Epistles and the Acts of the Apostles, the first communities did not possess buildings reserved exclusively for their gatherings. Christians gathered in private homes (Acts 1:14; 12:12; 20:7-12; 1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:5; etc.). It seems that the construction of individual locales reserved for liturgical gatherings began to be taken into consideration only in the 3rd c. (Dura Europos [ca. 232]; cf. Tertull., Adv. Valentin. 3,1; Clem. Alex., Strom. VII, 29,2), when Christian leaders began to think of Christian cemeteries. In fact, before organizing areae properly speaking, Christians buried their dead, as best they could, in Jewish or *pagan places of burial, remaining within the milieu of their family ties, their social relationships and their immediate vicinity. Starting from the 3rd c., however, *Rome had cemeteries administered by the local communities and integrated into their estates. The fact that the first places for gathering and burial belonged to private individuals had considerable advantages: the communities were free from material problems inherent in the possession and management of properties. With the progress of evangelization, however, the usefulness of an ecclesial estate in the proper sense of the term became more evident; on the other hand, the inconveniences attached to private property led the leaders of the churches to find a more secure system with regard to the possession of assets. In fact, precisely at the beginning of the 3rd c., in various places, and in a particular way at Rome, there began to exist a corporate-type property that was ecclesiastical properly speaking (Elenchos IX, 7; Tertull., Scap. 3,1; Historia Augusta, Alex. Sev. 49). The evidence from the 2nd half of the 3rd c. multiplies (the Rescript of *Gallienus: Eus., HE 7, 13; 30,19). In 311, the Edict of *Galerius authorized Christians to reconstruct their gathering places.

II. Legal status. The legal existence of an ecclesiastical estate is therefore attested even before the Constantinian *peace. The Edict of *Milan of 313 spoke openly of titular ecclesiastical property: it was held by the body of Christians, i.e., the various local communities over which their respective leaders presided. Contrary to the theories elaborated in the 19th c. to justify these facts (G.B. de Rossi: collegia tenuiorum; Duchesne: tolerance de facto), modern scholarship has recognized that, from then on, every community could acquire and administer a corporate estate acc. to private law, within the framework of common law (Munier, 274). It is clear that this situation was confirmed after the peace of the church. The legislative texts from Late Antiquity, although they recognized the ecclesiastical property, did not define its nature. It turns out, however, that the estate was that of the local community, under the direction of its bishop; one cannot say that at that time there existed an estate of the church understood in its totality (in the sense of can. 1495, par. 1, of the 1917 code of Canon Law). The idea of a foundation, in the modern sense of the term (an institution, i.e., itself the titular of the estate that causes it to exist), only corresponds to the system that began in the East at the end of the 5th c. It seems that, at that time, the West, where the bishop remained the administrator of the totality of assets (Gelasius, frag. 24: Thiel, 498), was unaware of this system. The tendency toward fragmentation, which was fostered further by various factors—strong growth of the estate; an increasing autonomy of the churches, hospices and monasteries; donations tied to specific conditions of allocation; the laity's claims to preserve some rights over assets that they had given (cf. Gaudemet, 302-306)—eventually prevailed.

III. Administration. Belonging to a local community, the assets were administered by the bishop, its head. The most ancient documents describe this type of management as entirely discretionary: the bishop was responsible only before God. The Didascalia considered it out of place for clerics and *laypeople to seek accountability from their own bishop.

As long as the distribution of resources was limited to the immediate distribution of the daily offerings, this manner of doing things did not run a serious risk of abuse: the bishop could not afford blatant injustice. There was, however, nothing in common between direct, public, patriarchal management described by the apostolic apocryphal texts and what one senses occurred at Rome under Pope *Cornelius (Eus., HE 6, 43), or at *Carthage under *Cyprian. The managerial ability of the Roman church appeared esp. in the organization of funeral services and the management of the catacombs; one can imagine that this management knew how to face the needs of the the poor, the sick and those in distress. Numerous testimonies of the administration of ecclesiastical property can be illustrated during the late Roman Empire: (a) In principle, the bishop continued to enjoy total freedom in this regard. Then suddenly there appeared and was imposed an ever-increasing tendency to associate the local clergy with the bishop's administration (Council of Antioch, can. 25; Apostolic Canons, can. 40; Gelasius, Ep. 17,1). In the East, the institution of treasurers was made obligatory by the Council of *Chalcedon (451); in the West, the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua praised this institution. Pope Gelasius established his direct control over the temporal management of the Italian bishops under his jurisdiction (Gaudemet, 309). (b) On the other hand, the bishop had to respect the allocation of assets desired by the benefactor. If the donation did not include specific conditions, the bishop would have to use the surplus for godly or charity-based ends (the poor, the imprisoned and wayfarers, etc.). From the end of the 5th c., the bishop enjoyed complete freedom in the distribution of the surplus among these various allocations. In *Italy, however, an ever more rigid regulation took hold with popes *Simplicius (Ep. 1: Thiel 176) and Gelasius. The latter actually imposed a fourfold division (bishop, poor, clerics and buildings). *Gaul and *Spain adopted other types of distribution. (c) If ecclesiastical assets were inalienable for the most part, some exceptions were allowed, esp. in aid to the poor, ransom of prisoners and the assistance for all the needy under great distress.

G. Bovini, La proprietà ecclesiastica e la condizione giuridica della Chiesa in età precostantiniana, Milan 1949; G. Martínez Díez, El patrimonio eclesiástico en la España visigoda estudio histórico jurídico: Miscelánea Comillas 32 (1959) 1-281; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IV^e^-V^e^ s.), Paris 1958, 288-311; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana, I, Rome 1976, 1-96; A. Faivre, Clergé et propriété dans l'église ancienne: statut des biens, hiérarchie, célibat: Lumière et vie 25 (1976) 51-64; V. Recchia, Gregorio Magno e la società agricola, Rome 1978; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (II^e^-III^e^ s.), Paris 1979, 264-274; I. Fasiori, Storia della decima dall'editto di Milano (313) al secondo concilio di Mâcon (585): VetChr 23 (1986) 39-61; G. Arnaldi, Le origini dello Stato della Chiesa, Turin 1987; G. Barone-Adesi, Il sistema giustinianeo delle proprietà ecclesiastiche, in La proprietà e le proprietà (Pontignano, 30 settembre - 3 ottobre 1985), Società Italiana di Storia del Diritto, ed. E. Cortese, Milan 1988, 75-120; G. Tabacco, L'origine della dominazione territoriale del papato: Rivista Storica Italiana 101/1 (1989) 222-236; A. Barzanò, La questione dell'arricchimento dei vescovi e del clero da Cipriano a Damaso tra polemica anticristiana, autocritica ecclesiale e legislazione imperiale: RSCI 47 (1993) 359-367; F. Marazzi, Le proprietà urbane della Chiesa Romana tra IV e VIII secolo: reddito, struttura e gestione, in Le sol et l'immeuble. Les formes dissociées de propriété immobilière dans les villes de France et d'Italie (XII^e^-XIX^e^ siècles), ed. O. Faron - É. Hubert, Lyon-Rome 1995, 151-168; A. Perlasca, Il concetto di bene ecclesiastico, Rome 1997; F. Marazzi, I "patrimonia Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae" nel Lazio (amministrazione e gestione), Rome 1998; G. Nedungatt, The Canons of the Ecumenical Councils on Church Property, in Laity and Church Temporalities: Appraisal of a Tradition, ed. G. Nedungatt, Bangalore 2000 (Dharmaram canonical studies 1), 159-180; C. Buenacasa Pérez, La legislación conciliar concerniente a la administración del patrimonio eclesiástico. El bajo imperio (siglos IV-V): SEA 78 (2002) 49-72.

CH. MUNIER - G. PILARA

PROPHET

1. Prophet in the early church - II. Iconography - III. Commentaries on the prophetic books.

1. Prophet in the early church. The prophet was above all "a man of the word": he spoke under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (Acts 21:11), fulfilling an important role in the community to edify, encourage and proclaim the future, thereby witnessing to the abiding action of the Risen One. His messages were received as authoritative expressions of the divine will. He was, however, subject to examination by the same community (1 Th 5:19-21). The division apostle-prophet-teacher, already present in 1 Cor 12:28 (see also Acts 13:1) and mentioned by the Didache (11–13), seems to have been of Hebrew origin and corresponds to the law-prophecy-wisdom pattern. In Acts 11:27, some prophets of *Jerusalem went to *Antioch. In Acts 13:1, five men from Antioch were called "prophets" and "teachers." In Didache 11,3, prophets are mentioned along with the *apostles (i.e., itinerant evangelists); in 15,2 prophets and teachers. The Shepherd of *Hermas likewise connects prophets to teachers.

The Didache reveals the organization and structure of the early Christian communities, which had a "diversity of ministries" (1 Cor 12:4): one finds the charismatic ministries of prophets (also some itinerant preachers) and teachers together with institutional ministries of bishops and deacons, chosen by the community, who also exercised the ministry of the prophets and teachers (Didache 15,1). "The flourishing of prophecy in early Christianity occurred fundamentally in the period that preceded the full institutionalization of the church" (Aune, 380).

The prophet, when he speaks under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, should not be subjected to test or criticism by the community; the communities, however, will be able to judge him by his conduct and unselfish attitude, by the coherence between life and teaching (Didache 11,7-12): in other words, the true prophet has "the style of the life of the Lord" (8,12). The prophets can at will give thanks after meals (10,7) and can make requests that the poor be fed (11,9).

Hermas (Mand. 11) supplied criteria acc. to which one can distinguish true from false prophets. The latter, by their dissolute behavior, teaching and method in prophesying, are illegitimate, they act like *pagan fortune tellers, who are known for their quid pro quo, mercenary approach. *Justin recognized some false prophets, who proffered teachings that came from the spirit of error (Dial. 35,5; 51,2; 69,1; 82,1-2; cf. moreover, *Eusebius HE 4, 26; 5, 17-19). The *Montanists claimed to prolong the era of the prophets, and they let themselves fall into violent states of "trance" (Tertullian, De An. 9,4; Cyprian, Ep. 75,10; Eusebius, HE 5,16,3; 5,17,2-4).

The decline of prophecy after the 2nd c. is also owed to sociological motives; the ancient role of the prophets was assumed by the heads of the Christian communities, and the charismatic spontaneity receded before the gradual process of the church's institutionalization and the justification given for the church's structures. The gifts of the Spirit were contained under other forms, and the prophetic function came to be manifested in other ways (as in the martyrs and saints).

A. Lemaire, Les ministères aux origines de l'Église, Paris 1971; É. Cothenet, Prophétisme dans le Nouveau Testament: DBS VIII (1972) 1222-1337; T.M. Crone, Early Christian Prophecy. A Study of Its Origin and Function, Baltimore, MD 1973; J. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy, Leiden 1973; W. Rordorf - A. Tuiler, La Doctrine des Douze Apôtres, SC 248bis, Paris 1998; D. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World, Grand Rapids, MI 1983 (extensive bibl.); C. Forbes, Prophecy and Inspired Speech in Early Christianity and Its Hellenistic Environment, Tübingen, 1995; R. Polanco Fernandois, El concepto de profecía en la teología de san Ireneo, Madrid 1999, 350-385.

II. Iconography. Images of the OT prophets already appeared in the most ancient repertoire of Christian arts as generic evocations of messianic prophecy or as historical depictions tied to the narratives of the biblical text or representations of the group.

1. Evocations of messianic prophecy. A generic allusion to the prophecy of the Messiah's birth from a Virgin rather than the historical identification with a prophet, Balaam, Isaiah or Micah, is recognizable in those isolated depictions of male individuals clothed with a pallium in the act of pointing to a sign in the heavens: a star in some frescoes of the catacomb of Saints *Marcellinus and *Peter, from the 1st half of the 4th c. (Wp 158,2, Nestori p. 55 n. 42; Wp 159,2, Nestori p. 55 n. 45; Wp 165, Nestori p. 57 n. 53), and in that of the cemetery of the Via D. Compagni (Ferrua, pl. 138, Nestori p. 83 n. 13); a christogram on a *painting from the cemetery of Cyriaca, from the 2nd half of the 4th c. (Wp 241, Nestori p. 45 n. 4). The fusion of an intense historical narrative and the symbolic expression of the evocation of messianic prophecy was recently believed to have been captured in a disputed pictorial figuration preserved in a cemetery of St. *Thecla, from the mid 4th c. (Santagata, S. Tecla, fig. 2), in which there are two male figures in the act of pointing to a star. Alongside these isolated figures, one should understand the images clothed with a pallium in the act of pointing to a star that appears alongside the Virgin with Child (see *Mary) also as a generic allusion to messianic prophecy, as in the case of a gallery's fresco from a sandstone of the cemetery of Priscilla, from the early years of the 3rd c. (Wp 21-22) and, at times, in scenes of the adoration of the *Magi, as, e.g., in the inscription of one Severa in the Museo Pio Cristiano (Kirschbaum, Balaam, pl. 3).

2. Historical representations. The prevalence of a historical narrative objective, however, is found in those representations more or less directly dependent on the biblical text, which are tied to the events of individual prophets, for many of which a discussion has already been provided in the pertinent entries. Concerning *Elijah, e.g., we find depictions of the encounter with the widow of Zarephath, the *resurrection of the widow's son, and the burnt offering on Mount Carmel in the frescoes of the synagogue of *Dura Europos, from the mid-3rd c. (Kraeling, Synagogue, pls. 31, 62-63), and that of his ascension to heaven in a chariot of fire, designed on the classical model of Elisha's ascent to heaven in a quadriga (Wp 230,2) in the paintings of the catacomb of *Domitilla and on the Via D. Compagni (Ferrua) and in some sarcophagi (Ws 189,2 and 190,3). For Jeremiah, in the biblical mosaic cycle of the basilica of St. *Ambrose at *Milan, acc. to the description of the illustrative distych (Forcella, Iscrizioni, no. 227), artists made a depiction of the vision of the angel under the form of a lamb. For *Ezekiel, there frequently appears on the *sarcophagi the vision of the field covered with bones that is repopulated with living people (Ws 112,2; 123,3; 151; 184,1; 206,7; 215,7; 219,1); the most ancient representation of an Ezekiel cycle is offered, however, by the frescoes of the synagogue of Dura Europos (Kraeling, Synagogue, pls. 69-72). Perhaps, to Micah and his proclamation of the birth of the Messiah at *Bethlehem, one can connect the fresco of the catacomb of Domitilla, from the 2nd half of the 4th c., with a bearded person in the act of pointing to two towered buildings (an allusion to Bethlehem?), before which is depicted the Madonna with Child (Wp 229).

3. Group images. Among the first monumental representations of the series of prophets one should mention that representation, in stucco, of the baptistery of the Orthodox at *Ravenna, from the mid-5th c. (Deichmann, Ravenna, pls. 72-79,81). In the same city, about 50 years later, a series of 16 prophets, depicted as majestic old men holding a scroll between their hands—a motif that would be a persistent feature in later iconography—appears in the mosaics of the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo (ibid., pls. 136-153). Likewise at Ravenna, from the mid-6th c., images of prophets appear in the mosaic decoration of S. Vitale (ibid., pls. 312-321).

EC 10, 101-103; LCI 3, 461-462; see the pertinent entries for the individual prophets in DACL, LCI, RAC, RBK. G.B. de Rossi, Altri monumenti di sacre vergini nell'Agro Verano: Bollettino Arch. cristiana 1 (1863) 76ff.; Garrucci, Storia, II, p. 63ff.; Wp 174ff., 183ff.; G. Wilpert, La divina maternità di Maria Vergine e il profeta Isaia: RivAC 11 (1934) 151ff.; E. Kirschbaum, Der Prophet Balaam und die Anbetung der Weisen: RQA 49 (1954) 129ff.; L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétien. II/1, Paris 1956, 343-419; L. de Bruyne, L'Initiation chrétienne et ses reflets dans l'art paléochrétien: RSR 36 (1962) 27-85; Id., Les lois de l'art paléochrétien comme instrument herméneutique: RivAC 39 (1963) 7-91; P. Testini, Alle origini dell'iconografia di Giuseppe di Nazareth: RivAC 48 (1972), esp., 281ff. For the monuments mentioned in the text, see V. Forcella, Iscrizioni di Milano anteriori al sec. IX, Codogno 1897; C.H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Dura-Europos. Final Report VIII. Part I: The Synagogue, New Haven, CT 1956; F.W. Deichmann, Frühcristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden Baden 1958; G. Santagata, Su due discusse figurazioni conservate nel cimitero di S. Tecla: Esercizi. Arte, Musica, Spettacolo 3 (1980) 7-14; D. Calcagnini, Nota iconografica. La stella e il vaticinio del Vecchio Testamento nell'iconografia funeraria del III e IV secolo: RivAC 64 (1988) 65-87; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la Via Latina, Florence 1990; M. Minasi: TIP 264-266.

M. Marinone

III. Commentaries on the prophetic books. Fundamental esp. for knowing the exegetical method used by the *Fathers in the interpretation of the OT, the patristic *commentaries on the prophetic books mark, with their presence, the history of Christianity from the earliest centuries. Before the systematic commentaries, the prophetic texts were certainly the object of homilies as evidenced by the fact that prophetic passages were read and commented upon during the liturgical assembly (Just., 1 Apol. 67). The reading, alongside a passage of the Torah and commentary on a prophetic text (haftarah), was already in use in the Hebrew language (cf. Lk 4:16-21). It is likely the case that it was precisely the liturgical and catechetical context that helped emphasize the messianic character of the prophetic preaching (see Iren., Dem. 30). Undoubtedly, it was in the works of the *apologists that the presence of prophetic passages began to become very important: the prophets were presented to the *pagan world as a testimony to God's truth and his revelation (Just., 1 *Apol.*53; Dial. 1-9; Tat., Orat. 29; Theoph. Ant., Autol. 1,14), although in the Jewish world they were put forward again following the messianic interpretation already sanctioned in the NT (Just., Dial. 43; Ign., Philad. 5,2; 9,2; Tertull., Adv. Jud. 8; cf. Eus., Dem. Ev.; Athan., De inc. 11; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 12,19). With *Irenaeus, the prophets became the irrefutable proof for simultaneously demonstrating the dynamism and the unity of the divine economy, which was based on the centrality of Christ, who was seen both as the one foretold and the fulfiller of every prophecy: the prophets spoke of him, he was the one who had filled what they revealed (Iren., Haer. IV, 33-34; see also Just., 1 Apol. 30).

Among the works explicitly dedicated to commenting on the prophetic books, but which have come down to us only through fragments or about which we have information solely because they were mentioned by other authors, we should mention here the following literary works: the systematic commentaries of *Origen, who had written 30 books on Isaiah (Eus., HE 6,32,2); *Victorinus of Petovium's commentaries on Isaiah, Ezekiel, Habakkuk; and the homily, or rather the treatise, on Hosea by *Peter of Alexandria (Jer., Vir. ill. 74 and 76). The more or less extensive glosses on various passages of Jeremiah are what remain of the commentary, certainly complete, of all the prophetic books composed by *Ephrem, acc. to a Christocentric and ecclesiological interpretation, which was also, however, always faithful to the historic meaning and philological analysis. We mention, moreover, the commentaries on Isaiah, Hosea and Malachi by *Apollinaris of Laodicea (cited by Jerome in the prologues on his commentaries on the same books); the commentaries on Ezekiel and Daniel by *Cyril of Alexandria; those on Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Daniel by *Theodore of Mopsuestia, heavily anti-Origenist in the condemnation of every christological interpretation of the text; those of ps.-Chrysostom on Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, marked by a heavy moralizing interest; the fragments on Jeremiah by *Victor of Antioch and *Olympiodorus of Alexandria, under the form of glosses that have come down to us through the catenae, and those on Isaiah by *Procopius of Gaza. The fragments on Hosea, Joel and Amos by *Julian of Eclanum reveal a historical and rational interpretation.

The patristic works that have survived containing commentaries on all the prophetic books or part of them are usually in the form of the homily or treatise. The first homilies that have come down to us are those on Isaiah which Origen composed, but which we only have in the Latin translation by *Jerome (the 9th homily, however, is considered inauthentic by Baehrens: GCS VIII). Likewise from Origen are 14 homilies on Jeremiah translated by Jerome: of these, 12 (on Jer 1:1–20:12) have also been preserved in the Greek text and are a model of balance between respect for the historical meaning and the spiritual implementation, which is frequent, perhaps because of the homily's catechetical character. These focused primarily on problems pertaining to God's *providence, *evil and suffering. Likewise by Origen, but translated by Jerome, we should mention the 14 homilies on Ezekiel that offer an interpretation that is primarily moral and typological. From *John Chrysostom there remain six homilies on Isaiah with a heavily moralizing tendency and 2 homilies titled De prophetarum obscuritate. these provide a general treatment of some of the prophetic books. From *Gregory the Great, we have 22 homilies on Ezekiel where the text, however, is often used only as a point of departure for developing a larger spiritual discussion.

With regard to the commentaries, the first that has come down to us—which is also the first exegetical treatise that has been passed down by the Fathers—is the Commentary on Daniel by *Hippolytus, datable to the beginning of the 3rd c. It consists of four books on the prophetic text of Daniel, as contained in the Greek version of *Theodotion, including the Deuterocanonical portions. The author proposed an interpretation geared toward calming the hearts of all those who were expecting an imminent end of the world. His exegesis was historical: he read at face value all the information that Daniel provided concerning himself and the visions that he had received, but he also made use of allegory, esp. in a christological sense. Jerome mentioned (Vir. ill. 81) *Eusebius of Caesarea's Commentary on Isaiah, written in 10 books (or in 15 acc. to the information provided in the prologue of his Comm. Is.). This work (recently reconstructed and edited in 1975 in the GCS 9, Eusebius Werke, IX), which, acc. to the author's promise, should have given a historical interpretation of the prophecies, depends, however, primarily on Origen's spiritual and allegorical reading. The text of Isaiah was taken from the LXX acc. to the *Hexapla. Also, one can consider as true and proper commentaries on prophetic passages books 2–9 and 15 of his work the Demonstratio Evangelica. A long commentary on Is 1–16 seems to have been falsely attributed to *Basil of Caesarea. We have much of *Ambrose's Expositio Isaiae prophetae, thanks to a weaving of fragments found in other works of the bishop of Milan or in Augustine's references to the bishop's work (P.A. Ballerini: CCL 14 [1957] 403-408). A systematic commentary on all the prophetic books was offered by Jerome (Vir. ill. 135), who, after having cited all the texts in their double translation from the Hebrew and the LXX, commented upon them first literally then spiritually. With regard to the spiritual interpretation, Jerome's dependence on Origen and, for the Comm. Zach., *Didymus is obvious. Perhaps a commentary by Chrysostom on Is 1:1–8:10 is authentic, but not the following part joined to the Armenian version. Eighteen books on Is 40–60 (the only part that he considered the original work of the prophet) and the entire Comm. Zach., which has been restored to us by the papyri of Tura, belong to Didymus. In this work, composed at Jerome's request (Vir. ill. 109), Didymus used the literal interpretation for a first approach to the text, but then passed immediately to a spiritual reading acc. to anagogy, allegory, tropology and conjecture, even if he often used these terms without numerous distinctions. Of his Comm. Hos., there remain only fragments in the biblical catenae*. From Ephrem, the Comm. Zach. has come down to us in *Syriac and in a Latin translation of the 18th c., which is heavily Christocentric and composed in a sober and concise manner to such an extent as to appear almost under the form of scholia. The books of the so-called twelve minor prophets were systematically commented upon by Cyril of Alexandria and Theodore of Mopsuestia: although the first made extensive use of tropology and interpreted the majority of the prophecies in a christological sense, the second referred to the history of the Jewish people—thanks to a careful historical and philological investigation—even those prophecies considered messianic by the dominant Christian tradition. Glosses on the twelve minor prophets, still almost entirely unedited, were written by *Hesychius of Jerusalem, whose Comm. Is. has also survived under the form of very brief glosses on individual verses. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's commentaries on all the prophetic books have survived to this day: the first, on Daniel, with a strong anti-Jewish tone; then one on Jeremiah composed in 10 books, the most extensive of those that have survived on this prophet, and which also includes Baruch and Lamentations; on Ezekiel (often reduced to a simple paraphrase of the text even if at the beginning he seems to echo aspects of the interpretation offered by Didymus); and the twelve minor prophets. The commentary on Isaiah, written in 20 books, clearly demonstrates how much Theodoret was able to be independent from the rigid literalism of his predecessor Theodore of Mopsuestia. In fact, alongside the literal sense, he made extensive use of the allegorical and typological method, by defending the messianic interpretation of numerous prophecies. In this sense, his commentary on Isaiah draws near to that of Cyril of Alexandria, who, in five books (pertaining respectively to Is 1–10; 10–24; 25–42; 42–66), first interpreted the prophetic text in a literal sense, then spiritual. A list, though not exhaustive, of patristic commentaries on the prophets can be found in *Cassiodorus's Inst. div. 3.

J. Harvey, Ézéchiel: DSp 4, 2217-2220; L. Doutreleau (ed.), Didyme l'Aveugle. Sur Zacharie, SC 83.84.85, Paris 1962; C. Kannengiesser, Jérémie (chez les Pères de l'Église): DSp 8 (1974) 889-901; A.-M. La Bonnardière, Biblia Augustiniana. AT. Livre de Jérémie, Paris 1972; V. Peri, Geremia secondo Origene. Esegesi e psicologia nella testimonianza profetica: Aevum 48 (1974) 1-57; V. Recchia, Le Omelie di Gregorio Magno su Ezechiele (1–5), Bari 1974; A. Benoit - P. Prigent, L'interprétation de Jérémie dans la tradition alexandrine: SP 12 (1975) 317-320; J.N. Guinot (ed.), Théodoret de Cyr. Commentaire sur Isaïe, SC 276.295.315, Paris 1980–1982; E. Gandolfo (ed.), Omelie su Ezechiele 1 e 2, Rome 1979–1980; P. Nautin (ed.), Origène. Homélies sur Jérémie, SC 232.238, Paris 1976–1977; M. Simonetti, Note sull'esegesi veterotestamentaria di Teodoro di Mopsuestia: VetChr 14 (1977) 69-102; Id., Note sul commento di Cirillo d'Alessandria ai Profeti minori: ibid., 301-330; J. Dumortier - A. Liefooghe (ed.), Jean Chrysostome. Commentaire sur Isaïe, SC 304, Paris 1983; M. Simonetti, Uno sguardo d'insieme sull'esegesi patristica di 'Isaia' fra IV e V secolo: ASE 1 (1984) 9-44; Id., Lettera e/o allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985; A. Cataldo (ed.), Cirillo di Alessandria. Commento ai Profeti minori. Zaccaria e Malachia, Rome 1986; M. Borret (ed.), Origène. Homélies sur Ézéchiel, SC 352, Paris 1989; Ch. Morel (ed.), Grégoire le Grand. Homélies sur Ézéchiel, SC 327, 360, Paris 1986–1990; M.P. Ciccarese, Perdix diabolus. L'esegesi patristica di Ger 17,11, in Paideia Cristiana. Studi in onore di M. Naldini, Rome 1994, 275-296; S.Ch. Kessler, Gregor der Grosse als Exeget. Eine theologische Interpretation der Ezechielhomilien, Innsbruck-Vienna 1995; D. Ciarlo (ed.), Giovanni Crisostomo. Commento a Isaia. Omelie su Ozia, Rome 2001; G.B. Bazzana, Autorità e successione. Fugure profetiche nei testi del giudeo-cristianesimo antico, Milan 2004; Jerome, Commentary on Jeremiah, Eng. tr., M. Graves, ed. C.A. Hall, ACT, Downers Grove, IL 2011; Eusebius of Caesarea, Commentary on Isaiah, Eng. tr., J.J. Armstrong, ed. J.C. Elowsky, ACT, Downers Grove, IL 2013.

M.G. Mara

PROPHETIAE EX OMNIBUS LIBRIS COLLECTAE. Anonymous book (CPL 84, PLS I, 177-180, 1738-1741), probably of *Donatist origin, from the end of the 4th c. A list of prophets from *Adam to Zechariah, father of *John the Baptist, and some passages of the NT concerning prophecy follows a very brief debate (disputatio) on the seven modes of prophecy. After a response mentioned by *Cyprian, the work closes with a condemnation of *Montanist prophecy.

For the MSS, see Fr. Dolbeau - É. Poirot: SE 32 (1994) 135ff.

J. Gribomont

PROPHETS, List of. The Vitae Prophetarum constitute a series of 23 biographies of *prophets in Greek: the four major prophets (the longer of the Lives), the twelve minor prophets in Greek and seven other biblical figures. The author probably came from *Palestine. The book was written in Greek (at times it has been suggested that there was a Hebrew original) and structured acc. to the model of the Hellenistic lives of famous men, emphasizing their tombs, which has given rise to the hypothesis forwarded by D. Satran that the work originated in Christian Palestine (1st-5th c.) for the use of pilgrims traveling ad loca sancta. There exist seven versions of the Vitae Prophetarum: two attributed to *Epiphanius of Salamis, one to *Dorotheus of *Antioch (or Tyre); there exist, moreover, many Eastern versions: *Syriac, Armenian, *Ethiopian, Arabic, Georgian, Slavic and *Celtic. The book is an example of a late Jewish-Christian hagiography. The work's objective is unclear. The Lives were composed from biblical and legendary material. Its work was interpolated by Christians and was perhaps known to *Origen.

CAVT 213 (bibl.); BHG 1585-1590; BHO 1004-1010, see the entry Apostoles. T. Schermann, Prophetarum vitae fabulosae, indices Apostolorum discipulorumque Domini, Leipzig 1907, 1-106 (ed.); C.C. Torrey, The Lives of the Prophets, Philadelphia 1946 (text, Eng. tr.); N. Fernández Marcos, in A. Díez Macho, Apócrifos del Antiguo Testamento, Madrid 1983, 507-525 (Sp. tr., bibl.); C. Lusini, in Sacchi 4, 529-570 (It. tr.); D.R.A. Hare, in Charlesworth, 2, 385-399; T. Schermann, Propheten und Apostellegenden, Leipzig 1907; Denis 1, 577-607; F. Dolbeau: RBen 100 (1990) 507-531; Id.: Augustinianum 34 (1994) 91-107. Concordance grecque des pseudepigraphes d'Ancien testament, ed. A.M. Denis, Louvain-la-Neuve 1987. J. Jeremias, Heiligengräber in Jesu Umwelt (Mt 23,29; Lk 11,47), Göttingen 1958; A.M. Schwemer, Studien zu dem frühjüdischen 'Vitae Prophetarum,' 1-2, Tübingen 1995–1996; D. Satran, Biblical Prophets in Byzantine Palestine, Leiden 1995; M. Petit, Génération et transformations de thèmes appartenant aux 'Vitae Prophetarum': Apocrypha 8 (1997) 273-286.

M. Starowieyski

PROSELYTE. From the Greek term προσήλυτος, which meant "foreigner," "stranger" (peregrinus), the term was used to refer to a convert to *Judaism. This term translates the Hebrew word ger (foreigner). The term appears several times in the NT. Jesus said of the Pharisees: "Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For you travel land and sea to win one proselyte" (Mt 23:15 RSV). On the day of *Pentecost there were pilgrims at *Jerusalem (Acts 2:11); a certain Nicholas was a proselyte from *Antioch, *Syria (Acts 6:5); likewise at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:43). At *Rome were found seven inscriptions concerning proselytes. Jesus' statement and the witness of Flavius Josephus, in the milieu of the Roman Empire, attest the missionary zeal of the Jews (C. Ap. 2,39). Nonetheless, scholars do not know of Jewish missionaries and the ways in which they spread Judaism; for this reason, several scholars, Will and Orrieux, e.g., have called into question Jewish missionary zeal. During the early centuries of the Christian era, Jewish authorities also elaborated the rules for accepting converts into Judaism: there was a need for instruction, indicating the precepts to observe, circumcision, immersion into water ("baptism") and a sacrificial offering. With the destruction of the *temple at Jerusalem, this latter condition was rescinded, although circumcision and immersion to be performed before three witnesses continued. Moreover, conversion also involved the change of one's name and full acceptance into the Jewish community, although there remained a few differences with the natives (e.g., the ability to assume public offices in the community). The *Talmud and the Mishnah conveyed a positive attitude toward proselytes, even if several rabbis were opposed to their conversion to Judaism for fear of infiltration and conversions of convenience (e.g., to marry a Jewish woman).

On numerous occasions, imperial legislation of the 4th and 5th c. intervened to regulate the conversion of Jews and of *pagans to Christianity and Christians to *Judaism. The emperors were favorable to the conversion of Jews to Christianity (CTh 16,8,1 from 315; Const. Sirm. 4), by protecting converts from Jewish retaliations (CTh 16,8,28 from 426), although they opposed conversions for the sake of convenience (CTh 9,45,2 from 397; 16,8,23 from 416). On the other hand, the legislation sought to restrict conversion to Judaism with the prohibition of circumcision of non-Jews (CTh 16,9,1 from 335; 16,9,2 from 339; 16,8,26 from 423) or with the explicit condemnation of those who had religious relationships with Jews (CTh 16,7,3 from 383) and the prohibition of participation in Jewish worship (CTh 16,8,1 from 329). The conversion of Christians to Judaism was explicitly prohibited (CTh 16,8,7).

Lampe 1171; M. Simon, Verus Israel, Paris 1958; GLNT 11 (1979) 297-336 (TDNT 6, 727-744); Encyclopedia Judaica 13, 1182-1191; J.M. Reynolds - R.F. Tannenbaum, Jews and God-Fearers at Aphrodisias, Cambridge 1987; E. Will - C. Orrieux, "Prosélitisme Juif"? Histoire d'une erreur, Paris 1992; L.H. Feldman, Jewish Proselytism, in H.W. Attridge - H. Gohei (eds.), Eusebius, Christianity and Judaism, Leiden 1992, 372-407; Id., Proselytism by Jews in the Third, Fourth and Fifth Centuries: Journ. for the Study of Judaism 24 (1993) 1-58; M. Goodman, Mission and Conversion. Proselytizing in the Religious History of the Roman Empire, Oxford 1994; J.M. Lieu, The Race of God-Fearers: JTS 46 (1995) 483-501; The Mission of the Early Church to the Jews and Gentiles, ed. J. Adna - H. Kvalbein, Tübingen 2000; M. Zetterholm, The Formation of Christianity in Antioch, London 2003.

A. Di Berardino

PROSOPON. Though retaining the various meanings of non-Christian Greek, the term prosōpon at first became a technical term in *trinitarian theology, then in *Christology. The specific trinitarian use, witnessed to for the first time by the treatise C. Noetum (7; 14) and indirectly by *Tertullian (Prax.), was explained primarily by three factors: by the scriptural use of prosōpon, esp. 2 Cor 4:6: "the glory of God in the face of Christ," a meaning that remained important in all patristic literature (Lampe, 1186); by the "prosopic" exegesis prepared by *Philo, in which, against the Jews and *monarchians, a distinction was made between the divine persons and their names (see *Justin, 1 Apol. 36,1-2); by the method of the *Stoics in opposing prosōpon, as individuality, to the generic (see Iren., Haer. III, 11,9). The term prosōpon, which was very rare in Eastern Christian authors writing before the 4th c., was initially found, as a trinitarian term, primarily in texts that rebuked *Sabellians for speaking of a prosōpon, i.e., one sole divine reality, or to speak of three prosōpa, but in a transitory sense (Lampe, 1187). Subsequently, even the anti-Sabellians used the word prosōpon, by identifying it more or less with hypostasis* (Lampe, 1187-1188)—as done by the synodic Epistle of the Council of *Constantinople of 381 (CoeD, 24). *Gregory of Nazianzus had already defended this synonymous use of the terms hypostasis and prosōpon (Or. 21,35: SC 270, 186; see Hammerstaedt, 1022).

In the 2nd half of the 4th c., prosōpon was used also as a key term in Christology, initially under the form of a denial of the two persons in Christ, then as an affirmation of one sole *person (Lampe, 1188ff.). Two particular details should be emphasized: the expression "one person" was often characterized by an exegetical nuance, referring to the sole subject of the biblical and divine and human attributes in Jesus Christ; also relevant is *Nestorius's quite complicated theory, which distinguished two natural prosōpa from the prosōpon of the union (Grillmeier, Jesus, 707-726; Lampe, 1188-1189).

M. Nédoncelle, Prosopon et persona dans l'antiquité classique: RSR 22 (1948) 277-299; G.-L. Prestige, Dieu dans la pensée patristique, Paris 1955, 141-146; C. Andresen, Zur Entstehung und Geschichte des trinitarischen Personbegriffs: ZNTW 52 (1961) 1-39; R. Braun, Deus Christianorum, Paris 1962, 207-242; C.J. de Vogel, The Concept of Personality in Greek and Christian Thought, in Studies in Philosophy and History of Philosophy, Washington 1963, 20-60; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, Freiburg 1979; A. Milan, Persona in teologia, Naples 1984 (bibl.); M. Fuhrmann, Person, 4: HWP 7 (1989) 274-282 (bibl.); J. Hammerstaedt, Hypostasis, RAC 16 (1994) 986-1035; L. Turcescu, "Prosopon" and "hypostasis" in Basil of Caesarea's "Against Eunomius" and the "Epistles": VChr 51 (1997) 374-395.

B. Studer

PROSPER of Aquitaine (d. after 455). According to *Gennadius (De Vir. ill. 84), Prosper of Aquitaine was born in Aquitaine at the end of the 4th c. The primary sources indicate that he was at *Marseille around 426, because he was attracted to the monastic and theological milieu of St. *Victor and *Lérins. There he had numerous contacts with *monasteries, though he always remained a *layman, and became involved in the *semi-Pelagian controversy. In 428, he wrote to *Augustine to send him the treatises De predestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae, which originally formed one work. After Augustine's death, he went to *Rome, along with his friend *Hilary, to obtain the condemnation of the ideas that circulated in the monastic communities of Provence, which caused *Celestine I to send a letter to the bishops of *Gaul (PL 50, 528-530). Prosper reentered Marseille, where between 432 and 436, he composed his most important writings. Then, in 440, he returned to Rome, where he was at the service of Pope *Leo I in the composition of some homilies. There he died shortly after 455. His feast day occurs on June 25th.

A man of letters and able to read *Greek, Prosper put his classical learning at the service of theology. One of his letters to *Rufinus is an excellent exposition of the Augustinian doctrine of *grace. Two works written in verse, De ingratis carmen and the Epigrammata, inspired by the *Pelagian controversy, defend the theological thought of Augustine. The theological works composed in Provence maintain the Augustinian theses in the semi-Pelagian controversy: Pro Augustino responsiones, De gratia Dei et libero voluntatis arbitrio contra collatorem (the collator is Cassian) and the Capitula added to Celestine I's letter. At Rome, he wrote Expositio psalmorum, which was inspired by Augustine, the Liber sententiarum ex operibus S. Augustini, Epitaphium Nestorianae et Pelagianae haereseon and the De vocatione omnium gentium that modern scholarship has reattributed to him (the first work in Christian literature on the salvation of nonbelievers). One should add the Epitome Chronicae, the history of humanity from the beginning of the world until 433, working from the earlier chronicles written by *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Jerome, then continued until 444 (Chronicon vulgatum) and to 446-455 (Chronicon integrum), which he called the Additamenta. This latter part helps us to know the activity of Pope *Leo. He probably wrote the Epistula ad Demetriadem de humilitate (PLS III, 149). Other works were attributed to him, among which was a Confessio (PL 51, 607-610), Poema coniugis ad uxorem (PL 51, 611-616).

An uncompromising Augustinian, Prosper vociferously defended his teacher's theology of grace. His stay in Rome, however, mitigated his strict positions, teaching him to not be more Augustinian than the pope. As a result, the Capitula have a more moderate tone. Along the same lines, the De vocatione maintains God's salvific will for individuals and all of humanity, by teaching human responsibility in history and revealing missionary concerns.

The Liber sententiarum is the first Augustinian *florelegium. This began a widespread literary genre in the Middle Ages. Its influence would be felt at the Council of *Orange in 529. Prosper was the "first representative of medieval *Augustinianism" (Cappuyns).

Editions: CPL 516-535; PL 51 and PLS 3, 147-149; MGH, Auct. ant. 9, 341-499 (Epitome); CCL 68A (Liber sententiarum and Expositio psalmorum); PL 45, 1756-1760 and 1833-1850 (Pro Augustino responsiones and Capitula); PL 55, 161-180 (Epist. ad Demetriadem). Eng. tr. (partial): ACW 14 and 32; De providentia Dei, text, tr. and comm. by M. Marcovich, Leiden 1989. It. tr.: La poesia davidica profezia di Cristo. Commento ai Salmi 100–150, intr., tr. and notes ed. A. Ruggiero, Rome 1996; La vocazione dei popoli, intr., tr. and notes ed. M.A. Barbàra, Rome 1998. Fr. tr.: L'appel de tous les peuples, ed. F. Frémont-Verggobi - B. Throo, Paris 1993.

Studies: E. Valentin, S. Prosper d'Aquitaine, Toulouse-Paris 1900 (still useful for its literary questions, antiquated for its critical and theological topics); G. Bardy: DTC 13, 846-850; J. Gaidioz, La christologie de S. Prosper d'A., Lyon 1947; G. de Plinval, P. interprète de s. Augustin: REAug 1 (1958) 339-355; C. Bartnik, L'universalisme de l'histoire du salut dans le De voc.: RHE 68 (1973) 731-758; Patrologia III, 522-528; M. Marcovich, Prosper, De ingratis. Textual Criticism: Illinois Classical Studies 14 (1989) 417-424; S. Muhlberger, The Fifth Century Chroniclers. Prosper, Hydatius and the Gallic Chronicler of 452, Leeds 1990; N.W. James, Leo the Great and Prosper of Aquitaine. A Fifth Century Pope and His Adviser: JTS 44 (1993) 554-584; M.A. Bar-bàra, Il "De vocatione gentium" di Prospero d'Aquitania: Messana 16 (1993) 107-139; A. Elberti, Prospero d'Aquitania. Teologo e discepolo, Rome 1999.

A. Hamman

PROSTITUTION. The term can have various social meanings. Historically, prostitution has been documented in the majority of societies since ancient times. In certain cases the practice was connected to religious and ritual practices. During the modern age, it refers to the giving of sexual relations, both male and female, as well as homosexual, for money, without any emotional involvement. In antiquity, the relationship between prostitution and the monetizing of one's own body was not so binding. Moreover, the definitions for the terms "prostitute" and "prostitution" were not so clear.

During the classical period, the chauvinism by which the Athenians interpreted *sexuality led to a belief that intercourse with a female was inferior. From this belief, moreover, there was a legal organization of prostitutes. This was established by the statutes of Solon, the first of the Western world, which was then continuously repeated, and saw prostitutes subdivided into the categories of private and public. They were also subject to taxation. The prostitute—pornē—was at the lowest level; she was a concubine (courtesan) if she was more educated and refined. Foreign women or freed slaves worked in the brothels (porneion) and solicited their services at the doors of homes and in streets. These women were required to pay a tax to the city (polis). Courtesans were more expensive because they were instructed in every art form, exercised by an entrepreneur (pornoboskos) and rented at varying prices acc. to the services performed. At the same time, prostitutes constituted a helpful source of income for the city (polis): for males they were pleasure for hire and a safeguard for women from their husbands. A certain social and economic discrimination, however, put the poorest women at the risk of prostitution (Artemidorus Daldianus, Oneirocritica 1,56, It. tr., Il libro dei sogni, Milan 1975, 57). A particular magistrate (astynomos) handled any possible dispute that arose from the practice.

In *pagan *Rome, there existed the postribula (brothel) and the meretrix (prostitute). The brothels were alongside the Tiber River, piazzas, markets and the tents where foreigners resided (castra pellegrina). Prostitution was also allowed in residential neighborhoods and public baths. Caligula ordered that the tax correspond to an eighth of one's income. Prostitution was regulated by the building's management and required a license (licentia stupri). In contradistinction to Greece, prostitutes at Rome also had to be inscribed onto a list and wear a certain type of clothing. They were prohibited from wearing a scarf and a palla (i.e., an outer garment or wrap usually worn outside by women). Female prostitution was not penalized, with the exception of cases in which the daughters of senators, consuls and equites were involved. Women of high social standing, however, frequently placed themselves on the list of prostitutes in order to be free from the bonds of marriage and society.

Prostitution had a social function: it allowed Roman males sexual freedom outside marriage, given the relatively advanced age of their first marriage. To marry a prostitute, however—aside from what took place between slaves and actors—was prohibited to the Roman citizen (civis romanus). A Roman citizen, however, could have casual sex with the same types of women without incurring the penalties tied to sexual defilement and adultery.

As proof of how difficult it was at times to clearly establish who could be defined as a "prostitute," turpitudo connected to the exercise of prostitution did not always end with the cessation of the activity (Ulp. 1 ad legem Iulia et Papia, D. 23.2.43.4); it ended, however, in the case in which the profession was practiced by a woman in the state of slavery. Furthermore, later among medieval theologians, the number of sexual partners was the key to determining when a woman could be properly defined as a "prostitute."

In the OT, despite the general condemnation, there was a certain tolerance toward prostitutes. The Jews admitted that single people, in a large city, had difficulty being chaste (1 Th 4:7). For *Paul (1 Cor 6:16), however, to have intercourse with a prostitute meant becoming "one sole flesh" with her: an image that before him had only been applied to the marital union.

From the very beginning, Christianity strongly condemned prostitution, but it did not exclude prostitutes from salvation, and at different points in history it considered the act tolerable in order to avoid worse evils. Generally speaking, Christians did not immediately and entirely change their perspective concerning prostitution with respect to pagan classicism: already in the writings of Ulpianus, the justification because of poverty was at the basis for understanding the prostitute. During this period, however, there appeared a clear rift between *Augustus, who transformed adulterers into prostitutes, and *Justinian, who sought to make them become nuns. The dress to which such women were obliged was an element of difference and a key factor in the politics of these two emperors. Moreover, the Christian age had to wait until 389, with Theodosius, to abolish the practice that obliged adulterers to work as prostitutes in brothels (Socr., HE 5, 18). The economic factor was decisive in the impact of this phenomenon. Already Suetonius and Cassius Dio emphasized the fact that the taxes came to the treasury almost exclusively from female prostitutes and their pimps. Moreover, *Justin Martyr (1 Apol, 27), our first source on this question, mentioned this obligation of taxes even for male prostitutes. He also confirmed once again that the revenues that came from prostitution were a large source of wealth for the investors in the Roman world. The Christian attitude toward the tax on prostitution, which was very different from the pagan attitude already in this first testimony, finally led to the abolition of this tax (see also *Zosimus, HE II, 38).

The condemnation was also expressed in the fact that in the writings of the Fathers the term is used to refer to an unclean moral condition, not necessarily tied to the selling of one's own body. Thus, the term porneia could refer to, among other *sins, having multiple marriages (e.g., Clem. Alex., Strom. 3) but also idolatry (e.g., *Greg. of Naz., Or. 31). The following authors wrote against prostitution, adultery and pederasty: *Clement of Alexandria (esp. The Pedagogue), *Origen, *John Chrysostom, the Cappadocian Fathers, *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Tertullian (esp. his De cultu feminarum), although *Salvian (De gub. dei 7,15) stated that the prostitutes were less criminal than adulterers and that *Vandals were better than the Romans (De gub. dei 7,99-100) because although the Romans transformed adulterers into prostitutes, the Vandals prohibited prostitution and adultery.

*Augustine laid the ethical foundations of his tolerance for prostitution for the Middle Ages. In fact, he maintained that if prostitution were abolished, there would be greater evils: unchecked excessive sexual desire, sexual violence, adultery and homosexuality (De ordine 2,4: Aufer meretrices de rebus humanis, turbaveris omnia libidinis). Thomas Aquinas perfected Augustine's theory by affirming, among other things, that "even the palace must have its drains."

During the mid-5th c., some laws permitted authorities to divide the legislative discipline that regulated prostitution. In 291, *Diocletian and *Maximian had already punished the ransom of a freeborn female (ingenua) if she was then forced into a life of prostitution (CI 8.50.7). In 343, *Constantius prohibited pimps from reselling Christian women who had already been forced into prostitution. The selling of slaves, however, was permitted to church officials and Christians of proven trustworthiness (CTh 15.8.1). It was *Theodosius II, however, who began the crusade against prostitution. CTh 15.8.2, from 21 April 428, represented a decisive turn: for the first time the official authorities legislated clearly against prostitution with heavy sanctions. This ban was based on the ius potestatis of the patres and domini with respect to the daughters and female slaves, who could turn to bishops and advocates if they were at risk of being prostituted. Legislation on 6 December 439, Nov. 18, from *Constantinople, recorded the progress of Theodosius's decree on prostitution and pimps: In the name of pudicitia and chastity, the condemnation of prostitution rejected the monetary gains of pimps and the state from this practice. Moreover, it granted freedom to slaves and freemen who had been forced into prostitution.

In an edict that can be dated between 457 and 467 (recorded in CI in two versions: more extensive in CI 11.41.7 and more brief in CI 1.4.14), the emperor Leo tightened the condemnation and the repression of prostitution, in the most direct, articulate way, without exceptions, without mitigations or compromises, with respect to CTh 15.8.2 and Theodosius II; moreover, he completely abolished the tax (Sicari has it right, p. 41; contra McGynn, The Taxation, p. 94, who attributes the abolition of the tax to *Anastasius, in 498, but the proof offered is not convincing). Justinian, perhaps under the influence of his wife *Theodora, a former prostitute, took measures to defend female prostitutes from pimps and to redeem them from that lifestyle.

As to persons, examples of repentant prostitutes are Pelagia and Mary the Egyptian, who ended their lives in isolation. The first, who was an actress/comedian, in Leontius's Life of John of Cyprus, led a monastery of women who were all repentant prostitutes. The Life of the second, which is legendary in its various editions, may be connected to the oral tradition of a real person. Called a "sinner" by Usuard, Mary was introduced into the martyrology for the first time (2 April), with the same brief elegy used for *Pelagia (8 October).

K. Kunze, Die Legende der heilig. Maria Aegyptiaca, Berlin 1978; R. Villa, La prostituzione come problema storiografico: Studi Storici 22 (1981) 305-314; P. Petitmengin (ed.), Pélagie la pénitente. Métamorphoses d'une légende, 2 vols. Paris 1981 and 1984; F. Gardner, Women in Roman Law and Society, London-Sydney 1986; I. Mereu, s.v. Prostituzione (storia), in Enciclopedia del diritto, vol. 37, Milan 1988, 440-451; T.A.J. McGynn, The Taxation of Roman Prostitutes: Helios 16/1 (1989) 79-110; J. Beaucamp, Le statut de la femme à Byzance (IV^e-VII^e siècle) 1. Le droit impérial, Paris 1990, 2. Les pratiques sociales, Paris 1992; A. Sicari, Prostituzione e tutela giuridica della schiava. Un prob- lema di politica legislativa nell'Impero romano, Bari 1991; W. Formigoni Candini, Ne lenones sint in ullo loco reipublicae Romanae: Annali dell'Univ. di Ferrara, Sez. V, Scienze giuridiche 4 (1991) 97-127; J.A. Brundage, Sex, Law and Marriage in the Middle Ages, Aldershot 1993; A. Leone, Un'adultera meretrix a Bulla Regia. Alcuni aspetti della città tardoantica, in Africa Romana, ed. M. Khanoussi - P. Ruggeri - C. Vismara, Ozieri 1996, 1371-1383; A.S. Scarcella, La legislazione di Leone I, Milan 1997; T.A.J. McGynn, Prostitution, Sexuality, and the Law in Ancient Rome, New York-Oxford 1998; B.E. Stumpp, Prostitution in der römischen Antike, Berlin 1998; R. Flemming, Quae corpore quaestum facit: The Sexual Economy of Female Prostitution in the Roman Empire: JRS 89 (1999) 38-61; T.A.J. McGynn, The Economy of Prostitution in the Roman World. A Study of Social History and the Brothel, Ann Arbor, MI 2004.

T. Sardella

PROTERIUS the Alexandrian (4th c.). After the deposition of Patriarch *Dioscorus by the Council of *Chalcedon (451), the *dyophysite Proterius was elected by the See of *Alexandria, with the approval of the local aristocracy and the support of the emperor *Marcian, and was forced to undergo the violence of the miaphysite reaction at the council. In fact, he came against much hostility among the populace, the clergy and the monastic milieu, where he was considered a betrayer of the theological tradition of the church of *Alexandria. It did not help him that he accepted Leo the Great's Tomus ad Flavianum and that he regained approval from *Rome. After the death of the pro-Chalcedonian emperor Marcian in January 457, Timothy Aelurus ("the weasel"), immediately after having been consecrated as the rival monophysite bishop, provoked the murder of Proterius at the hands of the crazed mob while he was celebrating the liturgy of Holy Thursday, and instead made himself Patriarch *Timothy II of Alexandria. The only document that has survived is the letter that Proterius wrote to Leo the Great (Ep. 133 in Leo's epistolary, and the Latin translation of *Dionysius Exiguus) around 454, in which he defended the Alexandrian calculation for the celebration of *Easter.

CPG 5473; PL 54, 1084-1094 = PL 67, 507-514 (Epistula ad Leonem papam); Patrologia V, 352-353.

K. den Biesen

PROTEVANGELIUM of JAMES. The proper title of the apocryphal work is the Birth of Mary; the title Protevangelium of James goes back to its first editor, G. Postel (1552). It is one of the most important apocryphal works in the group of the so-called infancy gospels. Written in Greek in the 2nd half of the 2nd c., it is preserved in the P. Bodmer V of the 3rd c. It was written outside Palestine but exactly where cannot be determined; the author is a *Jewish Christian, but it is not known why *James, brother of the Lord, is considered the author. The Protevangelium contains a midrash on Mary: it speaks of the parents of Mary, Joachim and Anna, of the birth of Mary, of her childhood, engagement and the annunciation and of the birth of Jesus; the last three chapters are dedicated to Zechariah, Elizabeth and *John the Baptist. There are numerous versions or paraphrases of the Protevangelium: in Arabic, Armenian, *Coptic, Ethiopian, Georgian, Old Church Slavonic and *Syriac, independent or inserted into other apocryphal texts that speak of the infancy of Jesus (e.g., the Gospel of ps.-Matthew). The Protevangelium is particularly important from the dogmatic point of view (Mariology), defending the virginity and purity of Mary against the affirmations of Jewish and *pagan polemicists (e.g., Celsus). It is important from the liturgical point of view: some feasts come from it (Joachim and Anna, the Presentation in the Temple). The Protevangelium, furthermore, gives an interesting example of the exegesis of certain texts of the OT. From the stylistic point of view it is a very beautiful and expressive book, with some poetic passages. The Protevangelium had a profound influence on Christian art, particularly in the Christian East, and on the Marian homiletic tradition of Christian Antiquity.

CANT 50; BHG 1046; BHO 611, 613-14. Editions: E. de Strycker, La forme la plus ancienne du Protévangile de Jacques, Subs. Hag. 33, Brussels 1961; E. Amman, Le Protévangile de Jacques et ses remaniements latins, Paris 1910. Concordance: A. Fuchs - E. Eckmair, Linz 1978. Lat. vers.: J. Gijsel, Het Protevangelium Iacobi in het Latijn, Antiquité classique 50 (1981) 351-366; J.D. Kaestli, Le Protévangile de Jacques en Latin: Revue de l'histoire des textes 26 (1996) 305-324; Id., Un témoin latin du Protévangile de Jacques. L'homélie "Postulatis filiae Ierusalem" en honneur de S. Anne (BHL 483-485): Apocrypha 9 (1998) 179-223; Id., Le Protévangile de Jacques latin et l'homélie "Inquirendum est" pour la fête de la Nativité de Marie: Apocrypha 12 (2001) 99-154; R. Beyers, CCAp 14 (2001) 884-957.

Translations: Eng.: O. Cullmann, in Schneemelcher ET 1, 421-439; Elliott 48-67; R.F. Hock, The Infancy Gospels of James and Thomas, Santa Rosa 1995; Fr.: Amman, Le Protévangile de Jacques; A. Frey, EApC 1, 73-104; Sp.: Santos Otero 120-171; J. González Núñez - C. Isaer Hernández - P. González Casado, Madrid 1997 (Apócrifos cristianos 3); Ger.: O. Cullmann, in Schneemelcher 1, 334-349; G. Schneider, Apokryphe Kindsheitsevangelien, Fontes Christiani 18, Freiburg 1995, 95-145; It.: A.M. di Nola, Parma 1986; Erbetta, 1, 7-43; Moraldi, 1, 60-87; Craveri 5-28; Fr.: E. Amman, Le Protévangile de Jacques; E. de Strycker, La forme la plus ancienne du Protévangile de Jacques; Starowieyski, 1, 267-290.

Studies: L.M. Peretto, La Mariologia del Protovangelo di Giacomo, Rome 1955; Id., Influsso del Protovangelo di Giacomo nei secoli II-IV: Mar 19 (1957) 59-78; J.A. de Aldama, El Protevange- lio de Santiago y sus problemas: EphemMar 12 (1962) 107-130; E. de Strycker, Le Protévangile de Jacques. Problèmes critiques et exégétiques, in Studia evangelica, TU 88 (1964), 339-359; P.A. van Stempvorort, The "Protevangelium Jacobi," the Sources of Its Themes and Style, and Their Bearing on Its Date, ibid., 410-426; H.R. Smid, "Protevangelium Jacobi." The Commentary, Assen 1965; F. Manns, Essais sur le judéochristianisme, Jerusalem 1977, 106-114; E. Cothenet, Le Protévangile de Jacques comme premier témoin de la piété mariale populaire, in Liturgie, spiritualité, culture, Conf. St. Serge XIX[e], Rome 1983, 63-80; Id., Le Protévangile de Jacques. Origine, genre littéraire et signification d'un premier midrash chrétien sur la nativité de Marie, in ANRW, 2, 25, 6, Berlin 1988, 4252-4269; W.S. Vorster, The Protevangelium of James and Intertextuality, in Text and Testimony, Essays in Honour of A.F.J. Klijn, ed. T. Baarda, Kempen 1988, 262-275; F. Bovon, La suspension du temps dans Protévangile de Jacques, in Id., Révélations et écritures, Geneva 1993, 253-270; I. Backus, G. Postel, T. Bibliander et le Protévangile de Jacques: Apocrypha 6 (1995) 7-65; E. Peretto, Criteri d'impiego di alcune citazioni bibliche nel "Protovangelo di Giacomo," in Saggi di patristica e di teologia biblica, Rome 1997, 25-52; S.J. Voicu, Verso il testo primitivo dei Παιδικὰ τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ "Racconti dell'Infanzia del Signore Gesù": Apocrypha 9 (1998) 7-95.

M. Starowieyski

PROTOGENES of Serdica (d. after 343). Bishop of the city of *Serdica (today Sophia) in Dacia, to whom a rescript from *Constantine was addressed (CI 1,13,1 from 316, or from 323). Constantine reinforced the concession of manumission of the slaves in church during an assembly, in the presence of the bishop—a practice already allowed by the law. Constantine often resided at Serdica: this leads one to think that Protogenes was an old friend of the emperor and followed his directions. He was present at the Council of *Nicaea and at the Council of *Constantinople of 336 to discuss the case of *Athanasius. The latter council was considered a continuation of the councils of *Tyre and *Jerusalem of 335. The Council that was celebrated in his city in 343 was presided over by Hosius of Cordoba and not by him. Protogenes signed fourth, i.e., after Hosius and the two Roman legates.

DCB 4, 500; L.W. Barnard, The Council of Serdica 343 A.D., Sofia 1983; S. Stoytcheva, Bishop Protogenes of Serdica. His Life and Theological View (335–351): ByzS 60 (1999) 308-314; H. Hess, The Early Development of Canon Law and the Council of Serdica, Oxford 2002.

A. Di Berardino

PROTOKTISTI (Protoktistoi). The Greek term meant "first creation," as, e.g., the angelic powers (Clem. Alex., Strom. 5,6: PG 9, 61, a; Greg. Naz., Carm. 2,1,13 and 182), light (*Epiphanius, Haer. 76,26), wisdom (Clem. Alex., Strom. 5,14: PG 9, 132A), etc. In the 6th c., in the context of the Origenist controversy in *Palestine, after the death of *Nonnus (d. 547), there occurred a division into two factions, the *Origenists of the New *Laura called the protoktistoi monks of Firminus's laura, although these referred to the others as isocristi, among whom one should mention *Theodore of Scythopolis. The former maintained Christ's superiority in relation to other rational beings in the context of preexistence, inasmuch as Christ was the first creation of all other creatures and joined to the *Trinity as a fourth person, hence the name tetraditi: they were moderate Origenists. The isocristi, however, maintained that in the final restoration (apokatastasis*) all rational beings would be equal to Christ: they were radical Origenists. Among the isocristi, we should mention *Theodore Ascidas (d. 558) who, before becoming bishop of *Caesarea, Cappadocia, was the abbot of the New Laura. The attitude of Theodore Ascidas led the protoktistoi to come close to the position of the orthodox; in fact, Isidore, the superior of Firminus's laura, renounced the doctrine of the preexistence of *souls and went to *Constantinople with the orthodox Conon, the superior of the Great Laura, in 552. The *Christology of the isocristi had connections to *monophysite Christology. (See also *creation [double], *protology.)

F. Diekamp, Die Origenistischen Streitigkeiten im sechsten Jahrhundert und das fünfte allgemeine Concil, Münster 1899; E. Schwartz, Kyrillos von Skytopolis, Leipzig 1939; DAFC 3, 1228-1258; A. Guillaumont, Les 'Kephalaia gnostica' d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et chez les Syriens, Paris 1962; J. Binns, Lives of the Monks of Palestine by Cyril of Scythopolis, Kalamazoo, MI 1991; J. Binns, Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ. The Monasteries of Palestine, 314–631, Oxford 1994; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy. A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth-Century Origenism, Rome 2001; Grillmeier II/3.

A. Di Berardino

PROTOLOGY - STUDY of ORIGINS
I. General notions: Religious-historical typology - II. History of Christianity.

I. General notions: Religious-historical typology. Scholars speak of "protology" and "protological theory" in analogy and at times in connection to "*eschatology" and "eschatological theory." The "beginnings," the prōta, the archē are thus seen in relation to the "last things," the eschata, the telos. If one looks at the religions and philosophies of the ancient world, this relationship appears to have been seen differently. At times, the beginning has only an inchoate character, implicit with respect to the fulfillment; at other times, however, the last things are presented as the restoration of the beginning; in other cases, the two views are combined in different measures and ways. Extreme cases of this phenomenology—foreign, however, to the writings of the patristic age—are positions familiar to Greek pre-Socratic thought of an evolutionary hylozoism from which variety in the world derived from a simple and basic archē or the idea of a repetitive cycle, which is based on the contrast or even dialectic of the One and the Many, as, e.g., in the dualistic monism of Empedocles and certain Orphic formulations. Another aspect of protological themes that directly interests scholars of Christian thought concerns widespread motifs in world religions: the foundational character at the beginning, with respect to the present state of the universe and humankind. The figures and events of the beginnings establish or rather condition the present, under the substantial and existential point of view. Herein lies the importance of the study of "protological theory." One also easily understands, outside and within Christian thought, how the characterization of entities and agents acquire importance, agents to whom a creative and an active or demiurgic power is attributed; at the same time the theme of a fault or a fall (or accident) that occurred in the beginning acquires importance, which imprinted on the world and humankind a mark that conditions them and renders urgent the need for salvation and *soteriology. This, in turn, has an eschatological function, but also with different modalities, in view of the reintegration of the beginning, i.e., the condition of the primordial integrity.

In this context, still remaining on the phenomenological level, but a phenomenology constructed with an eye to historical concrete research, there emerge alternative historical-religious categories: (a) that of a single creative act, even if developed in phases or moments, however, not motivated by faults or accidents situated at the level of the first creatures, or (b) that of a "double *creation," which in turn is expressed in different ways: (1) A creator God makes use of the collaboration of other creative "agents" of an inferior level, who render God "innocent" at every possible contact with the *evil that could emerge from the creatures' ontological imperfection (Plat., Timeaus 41A-43A: the Demiurge and the "young" gods, his collaborators in the creation of man; Philo of Alexandria, Op. mundi 72-75; Fug. 69-70, etc., for the most part follows the pattern given by the Timaeus; late Jewish conceptions of a deuteros theos or demiurgic *angels that are not hostile to God). (2) A single creator who, however, "adds" to the first creation a second creative intervention (second not necessarily in a chronological sense, but in an ontological sense), likewise justified by a fall of the first creatures (*Origen, *Gregory of Nyssa, etc.). (3) Also there is the *gnostic theory of an ignorant and proud Demiurge who transmits to beings formed by him these deformed characteristics of his, which, however, are not such that they abolish that pneumatic "self" that comes to the gnostic from an original outpouring of the divine substance, albeit unconsciously conveyed by the Demiurge itself. (4) Lastly, in the *pagan world, an alternative to the gnostic position was that of Plotinus, who maintained a radical monism (the One, whence the Nous, whence the *Soul), which, however, through a sort of rationality-necessity intrinsic to the system, implies the self-manifestation at the emanative levels below the One (the souls, but already in its own way the Nous), of a tolma ("boldness"), that is not only ethical but also ontological, demonstrating in itself the entire "devolutionary" process, down to the embodiment of the souls and the final shore of pure matter; a devolutionary idea that is also implicit in such gnostic systems as that of *Valentinus, who believed that in the last, peripheral, and feminine *aeon, Sophia, her qualities bore—almost inscribed as such—the ontological premise of a crisis that specifically would give rise to the Demiurge and the psychic and hylic substance in the world and man.

On the basis of the foregoing, one understands how the notions—diverse but specific—of the "double creation" implied dualistic positions that vary from an ontological *dualism of the monistic type (Plotinus and, in their own way, the gnostics) to a dualism in a broad theological sense (God and the Demiurge for the gnostics, but also, even in the other sense, well or poorly suited to biblical monotheism, the aforementioned teachings of Plato's Timaeus and *Philo of Alexandria, who obviously did not speak of "gods," but of powers or angels with a demiurgic duty). Further variations extend to an anthropological dualism (even this, however, in its own way is ontological as is any dualism, properly speaking) such as that implicit dualism (through the inheritance, esp. Platonist, of a different mediation) in Origen's doctrines concerning the "heavy" embodiment of souls (the noes) or the primordial *Adam "the *image of God" and therefore—acc. to this line of interpretation—not destined in the first intention of the Creator (i.e., in the "first creation") for the physiological function of *sexuality (an analogous position is found in the radical *Encratism of *Tatian or Julius Cassian, with the essential difference that these men used it to justify the absolute incompatibility of such a function with God's intention for humankind, or at least with the regime of the new covenant). We find intermediary positions in the Liber graduum and in the writings of several *Fathers, never, however, in the sense of a condemnation of *marriage and neither, with respect to these Fathers, in the context of an overall position on the topic, but rather in the context of the ascetic ends that (although making reference to protological theories such as these or the aforementioned ones) tend to express the novelty of evangelical *spirituality.

Returning to the aforementioned distinction between a single creative act (even if divided, but not as a consequence of a fault committed) and "double creation" (in its various specifications), we note how the protological theory of evil appears differently in two cases, just as the protological theory of the actual constitution of the *world and humankind. Facing a single creative act, the *sin of those who were first formed remains foundational in a certain (or explanatory) sense with respect to humankind at the present moment in its qualifying conditions of existence (death, fatigue, work, need for salvation, hereditary sin as expressed in the conception of "original sin"), but does not, however, involve anthropological dualism. Such dualism is involved, however, in the conception of "double creation," in a way that fits its various theorizations (Platonic, gnostic, *Origenist and perhaps already in certain positions of apocalyptic *Judaism: interpretations of the biblical account of the "sons of God" in Enoch, etc.). In all these cases, instead of "original sin," the sources speak of a "previous fault."

Lastly, we should note how the protological theme (and the theory) functions as a type, albeit in various ways, with respect to the eschatological theme (and its theory). In every form of Christian thought, an original integrity, lost by those who were first formed, was conceived as requiring a final reintegration or *apokatastasis. But when the notion of "double creation" is involved, the position that develops in its various aforementioned meanings is quite specific. In this instance, the reintegration leads to the elimination of the significance of the "second creation" itself, i.e., of the psychic-hylic components acc. to gnosticism, or of "heavy" corporeality, implying a sexual structure of human beings, acc. to Origen's perspective. Thus in the writings of Origen, on the basis of the correspondence (even if not complete in every aspect) between archē and telos, the archē is outlined acc. to the telos: i.e., the original situation of Adam is conceived—on the model of the eschatological situation—as "angelic," not sexual or at least not destined to the exercise of a sexual function and to procreation by means of sexual intercourse. Placing this projection at the inception of the Origenist line connects it, phenomenologically if not historically, to the line of Encratism in its various and nuanced meanings (from Tatian and Julius Cassian, to the Odes of Solomon, ps.-*Macarius, and the *Gospel of Thomas [in its Encratite component inasmuch as it can be distinguished from the gnostic component]). An Origenist-Encratite connection comes with the essential difference of the admission, quite clear in the Origenist line, of the lawfulness and advisability of the institution of marriage in the present *economy. To this one should add that it would be mistaken to miss the observation (at times undervalued or reduced in terms of generic Platonizing "language") of the effective ontological and anthropological depth of the protological theory because it is expressed with notions of "double creation" and "earlier fault"; this mistake neglects the fact that for the Fathers who adhered to the Origenist line and for nongnostic Encratism, the other dimensions and promptings of their spirituality and their biblical sources which they intended to refashion also often have a protological nature (the primordial innocence of Adam, the original splendor of the angelic creatures then fallen, the "new creation" introduced by Christ and the evangelical spirituality). Likewise, it would also be mistaken to underestimate the constant preoccupation of the Fathers with the safeguarding of *orthodoxy, not only with respect to *God the Creator, the ontological goodness of creatures and the doctrine of the *resurrection of the *body, but also with respect to the lawfulness and divine origin of the institution of *marriage, which was contested, albeit with certain nuances, by radical Encratism.

Thus, with respect to *virginity, theories of great protological depth (the original nature of Adam was not made for procreation through sexual intercourse) were aligned with other theories, also "protological" but not implying "double creation" (innocence and nonconcupiscence in the primordial couple and also of its eventual synousia), also eschatological (on the basis of Mt 22:30; Mk 12:15; Lk 20:34-36), and *ascetical, concerning the coming of the kingdom (Mt 19:12), etc. One must also consider the various distributions of these theories, keeping in mind chronology, literary genre, etc., as well as the concrete, reciprocal interchange that occurs between them. Under this last aspect, one should not forget the frequent connection, in being paired together (in pendant), that is made between protological and eschatological theories. Neither should one forget the possibility that, in the writings of the Fathers themselves, protological theories of the "double creation" type, though remaining significant for the reconstruction of their thought and its underlying foundations, may have been utilized by them as a conventional way of expressing a meaning that was more broadly ascetical and spiritual, or more specifically tied to personal spiritual experiences.

Finally, we should provide an entirely typical conception of protological theory, even if it can be essentially framed within gnosticism: the *Manichean explanation that implies the original separation and the coeternity of the two substances, *light and darkness. This original situation is distinct from the state of mixture that characterizes the time in between, the end of which will follow with a restored separation of the two substances. Such a separation characterizes both Manichean eschatology-soteriology and the sexual and dietary Encratism theorized by this religion. The historic-religious presupposition of the Manichean protological theory, i.e., the formula of radical dualism (implying the coeternity of two principles, in comparison to the "mitigated" dualism of other gnostics and the dualistic monism of the *Neoplatonists) is found even in the radical dualism of Zoroastrianism that also acknowledged a darkness coeternal with light (it is not, however, identical to matter, as it was for gnostics). In fact, Zoroastrianism even combined protology and eschatology on the basis of the notion of the original and final separation between light and darkness. The process of the cyclical, but not repetitive, aspect of this separation, however, both in Manicheism and Zoroastrianism, remained foreign to the Greek idea of an eternal return or, at least, of a pure and simple final restoration of the primordial condition. In fact, at the end, darkness will be emptied of that aggressive potentiality that characterized it at its origin.

U. Bianchi

II. History of Christianity. In the Christian tradition, the basis of every anthropological formulation is offered by Gen 1–3, which, after the double account of creation of the first couple, described the situation of the those who were first formed in *paradise. After the accounts of creation follow the narratives of the transgression of the commandment, the expulsion from the Garden of Eden and the definition of the state of humanity as subject to death, fatigue from work and, for the woman, submission to her husband and birth pains connected to procreation.

In the other books of the OT, references to this protological framework are scarce and allusive; the only significant uses of these occur in Deuterocanonical texts. In addition to the brief mention in Tob 8:5-6 to the union of Adam and Eve, the book of Sirach mentions the transgression by attributing it to the woman's responsibility (Sir 25:24), although Adam is exalted as the one who was "above every living being" (Sir 49:16). The Wisdom of Solomon defined the one who was formed first as the "father of the world," endowed with "strength to rule all things," being ransomed, through wisdom, from his "transgression" (Wis 10:1-2). Ps.-Solomon recognized, moreover, another individual responsible for the entrance of death into the world, when in 2:23-24 he stated that "God has created man for immortality, an image of his own nature he made him; it was through the envy of the devil that death entered the world." The motif of φθόνος (envy) toward man, evidently connected to man's special dignity; the implicit identification of the serpent from Genesis with the "adversary," Satan, of other biblical texts; the contrast between the original ἀφθαρσία (immortality) and the death that took over after the transgression—all these elements enrich the lines of the protological framework emerging from Gen 1–3.

These became further expanded and complex in the rich apocryphal literature that flourished within *Judaism in the centuries near the start of the Christian era. This literature is in fact characterized not only by having apocalyptic and eschatological interests, but also by its focus on the beginnings of human history, which were considered decisive in many ways for determining the present-day state of affairs. The literary cycle gravitating toward the figure of Adam, which finds its most ancient expression in the Life of Adam in its two versions, the Latin (Vita Adae) and the Greek (Apocalypse of Moses), presented the original state of those who were first formed in terms of their commonality of life with the angels, coexisting with them in paradise and consuming "angelic food," to which is compared the "animal" food that the two found on Earth once they had been expelled from their primitive dwelling (Vita Adae IV, 1-2). Of special interest for the purpose of characterizing the protological framework present in this work is the theme of the "venom of wickedness," injected from the serpent-Satan into the forbidden fruit, which is identified with "concupiscence" (epithymia), the beginning and root of all evil (Apoc. Mos. 19,3). Another tradition, rather solid and widely diffused, attributed a decisive weight in determining human destiny to the equally primordial activity of a group of angels, the Vigilant ones identified with the "sons of God" from Gen 6:1-4, who had come on earth to unite with women and teach them forbidden knowledge and skills. This theme, which finds its most ancient and elaborated example in the Ethiopian version of the book of Enoch, runs through a large portion of Jewish apocryphal literature from the book of the Jubilees to the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs*, to 2 Baruch and was known to the Essenes at *Qumran, *Philo of Alexandria and Flavius Josephus. This theme entered the patristic tradition from *Justin Martyr to *Ambrose, *Jerome and beyond, revealing the interests incited by such a topic even within primitive Christianity as an explanation for the origin of evil in the world, which is attributed to sinning angelic beings.

In the ancient Christian tradition, however, a decisive importance was attributed rather to Adamic protology, asserted, moreover, in the Pauline scheme of the first and second Adam as a paradigmatic sign of the history of salvation. Without pretending to exhaust the depth of such a scheme, suffice it to say that *Paul's focus on the redeeming universality of Christ's work led to an equally exclusive focus on the efficacy of the contrary sign of humanity's ancestor who, as the antitype of the Heavenly ancestor, "the first from the earth" (1 Cor 15:45-49), was depicted as the one "in whom all die, as in Christ all will be brought to life" (1 Cor 15:22), in the context of the invitation to put away the earthly image of him and to reclothe oneself with that of the epouranios. The theme of Adam typos tou mellontos in Rom 5:12-21 is based on the distinction between the paraptōma of the first pair and the salvific charisma (charis/dōrea) of Jesus Christ; the former, the forerunner of death and condemnation; the latter, of *life and *justification, respectively under the signs of complete disobedience and complete obedience.

It is not possible to trace here the various lines of development of the theme of protology in the patristic tradition. However, we should distinguish, alongside the Pauline line that heavily emphasized the negativity of the role of the first pair and discussed at length their status before sin, at least two primary tendencies respectively characterized: one by the idea of the inchoate character of the privileges of the original condition and the other by a notable insistence on the perfection and completeness of Adam, at times presented even as the goal of eschatological expectations. The first of such dispositions found its most organic and articulate expression in the writings of *Irenaeus, who, though exalting the very special prerogatives of prelapsarian Adam, privileged the notion of his "childhood" so that, if in one passage it implies "simplicity" and absence of malice (cf. Iren., Dem. 14), in another it also expresses that fundamental incompleteness and immaturity through which his fault was made possible. The divine work of redemption unfolding along the course of history was considered to be an education and guide toward humanity's complete maturity, within the framework of the "*recapitulation" in Christ of all creation. *Clement of Alexandria participated in the tradition that attributed to the first pair the quality of innocence, but also that of incompleteness, which is characteristic of childhood, when, in the Protrepticus (XI, 111,1), he depicted them as "free from everything," playing in paradise. Sin was thereby understood as a submission to pleasure, once Clement, following the example of Philo of Alexandria, identified in the serpent the figure of "pleasure that slithers on its belly, a carnal vice that turns toward matter." One encounters here the notion, elaborated in different ways, that would characterize the protological framework of the interpretive line that was interested in the exaltation of the exceptional privileges of prelapsarian Adam. The original state of the first pair is in fact defined as free from any worry of the material order, completely turned toward the *contemplation of *God, while sin consists in turning toward the sensible level, primarily described as ἡδονή. On the other hand, Clement, the only writer among the Fathers, with the exception of *Zeno of Verona, explicitly identified the first sin as the practice of marriage. With that, he conceded the chief point to his Encratite adversaries against whom he bitterly fought in the Third Book of the Stromata, except in the fundamental premise of the identification of Adam's fault with the physical union. Nevertheless, Clement substantially opposed the Encratite beliefs by affirming the intrinsic goodness and permissibility of marriage, oriented from the beginning by God for humanity and only unduly "anticipated" by the latter, because—the first pair were still "young" (neoi)—they should have waited for a better time (Strom. III, XIV, 93,3 p. 239, 16-21 Stählin; cf. XVII, 103, 1 p. 243, 23-25). Despite the fact that the first sin was seen in light of marriage, for Clement marriage appears to have been a reality pertaining to the divine plan for human beings, which did not therefore undergo substantial changes or "additions" because of the first transgression.

The Encratite perspective, to the contrary, implies the idea that physical union and subsequent generation are not only the matter of the first sin, but an activity that is substantially foreign to human nature, completed at the devil's instigation and in imitation of the beasts. The object of Clement's attack was the teaching of Tatian, Julius Cassian, the anonymous Encratites, already denounced by *Irenaeus for their radical abstaining, who continued in the biblical line with the admission of the one sole divine Demiurge, but defined marriage and physical procreation as "animal" activities, an object and sign of the fall introduced by Adam. With that, it attributed to the first sin a specific foundational efficacy, which introduced in human life, against the divine will of the Creator, a constituent element of its present dimension. These particular protological motifs of radical enkrateia that condemned marriage as "fornication and corruption," in the Encratite circles, were accompanied, moreover, by a series of other motifs that were only partially shared by the orthodox, among which, along with the motif of the imitatio Christi, was the essential eschatological tension, in the double sense that complete continence procured the final resurrection and, at the same time, anticipated it and made it present already in this life. Clement upbraided his interlocutors for already considering themselves resurrected (perhaps on the basis of an identification of *baptism with anastasis) and for this reason rejecting marriage and procreation.

Also evident among Encratite circles of this period was a particular type of *exegesis on the passage from Luke's gospel's about the condition of resurrected beings (Lk 20:34-36), acc. to which all those who do not marry show themselves to be "the sons of that aeon" because already at the present moment, they live "like angels," who do not take husband or wife. Within the entirety of themes that crept into the Encratite perspective for establishing their radical rejection of marriage, the special protological scheme underlying that supplied one of the essential explanations; in fact, given the notion of a state of original perfection (symphonia of soul and spirit for Tatian; the completeness of the soul as epithymia in Julius Cassian's writings; the unity preceding the sexual differentiations in the Gospel of the Egyptians) and construing the salvific action of Christ as the restoration of the prelapsarian condition, the specific connection between Adam's transgression and the use of marriage led the Encratites to consider abandonment of the practice of marriage, a practice that was identified by antonomasia as sin, an inevitable necessity for salvation itself.

In the patristic tradition, with the principle of the legitimacy of marriage and procreation safeguarded, one can identify a different, but substantially homogeneous interpretive line which, insisting at one moment on the very special prerogatives of Adam and on the other exalting the values of continence and Christian virginity, in the wide framework of ethical-ascetic, eschatological and ecclesiological explanations on which those values rest, also left space for the typical protological explanation. This occurred when, presenting the perfect Adam of paradise as a virgin and by identifying in marriage and physical generation "a remedy" made necessary by the state of the fall and postlapsarian weakness, configured the enkrateia and virginity not as a "sign" of the resurrected, but as the anticipated realization of it and, contextually, a restoration of the original perfection. In this interpretive line, one places authors from various doctrinal presuppositions, from Tertullian and Origen to *Athanasius, *Didymus the Blind, *Basil of Ancrya, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *John Chrysostom and, in the West, Ambrose, Jerome and, for the first phase of his position on the topic, *Augustine.

Given the heavy eschatological tension in Tertullian's thought, this entry has no need of specific examples; if the structure of Christian *virtues, and in the first place, continence, are aimed at the attainment of that blessed telos in which the saints, acc. to the text from the gospel of Luke, will be translati . . . in angelicam qualitatem et sanctitatem (Ad uxor. I, I,5), for the African author, virgins enact in advance that eschatological condition, those who iam in terris non nubendo de familia angelica deputantur (ibid., I, IV,4). Such a status is at the same time a return to Adam's prelapsarian condition, being characterized by the complete extirpation of concupiscence, which is foreign to *paradise. In fact, this makes room for perfect completeness (cf. De anima 38,2; De monog. 17,5), such that those "who want to be received into paradise must finally cease from that activity (i.e., marriage) by which Paradise was contaminated" (De exhor. cast. 13,4). One can see then how the preeminent eschatological explanation of Tertullian's ethics and its heavy ascetical components cannot be divorced from a particular protological vision: one established on the notion of Adam's virginity in paradise and the identification of marriage and procreation as the chief signs of the postlapsarian condition, characterized by such activities—although legitimate inasmuch as they have been granted by God as "added" elements in characterizing a fallen human condition, which are neither useful nor necessary in the state of original integrity.

In the writings of Origen, protology was divided into two stages, the first creation, pertaining to equal and free intelligences united to God and to each other in perfect charity, and the "second" creation (in the double sense of chronological posteriority and ontological inferiority), relating to the material substance that supplies a support—along with an opportunity for the fall and the means for redemption—for intelligent creatures that have distanced themselves in various ways, through "satiety" and incompetence, from the initial good and perfection. Human history is thus characterized by two beginnings: the one is metahistorical and immersed in the level of preexistence of the noes ("intelligences"), and the other, specifically connected with the story of Adam, where Origen maintained the biblical presupposition of a first human being created by God and a protagonist of the events in Eden. In a fragment from Origen's Commentary on the Letter to the Corinthians, this "historical" Adam is contrasted with the original state of perfect completeness, in the soul's total dedication to the contemplation of God. The contrast is made between the "historical" Adam and the postlapsarian condition in which marriage is practiced, for which his body was not ordered in the original divine plan. Thus it is clear that Origen's ideas about virginity and continence, which are so central to the spirituality of this Alexandrian master and his entire *anthropological vision, within the larger cosmological and eschatological framework, were deeply conditioned by the protology articulated acc. to the scheme of the double creation.

A further, typical example of the inevitable reciprocal connection between anthropological, ethical-ascetic and eschatological themes was offered by *Gregory of Nyssa. In his treatise De virginitate, Gregory passionately defended the postlapsarian condition of the institution of marriage, which, because it was a remedy and a "consolation" for the death begun by sin, is nevertheless prolonged with the continuation of birth and death, i.e., the present regime of genesis-phthora, while parthenia, which destroys this relentless cycle, poses a barrier to death itself; it restores the integrity of paradise and anticipates the blessed eschaton. His work titled De opificio hominis set forth a more complex and ontologically modified protological framework. The perfect creation of "complete" humankind, acc. to the image and likeness of God, contemplates the absence of sexual distinctions, because the multiplication of historic humanity has been entrusted to a mysterious form of generation in an "angelic" manner. The anticipation of Adam's future sin, because of which humanity would incline toward matter and sensible pleasure, led the Creator to add to the image the "animal" element of sexuality which, through physical union, would equally permit the multiplication of humankind that had by that time fallen, in order to reach that "fullness" to which it had been destined in the primordial divine project. A very peculiar scheme of "double creation" that, having put aside Origen's notion of preexistence and its implication for the chronological contextuality of the "first" (the element for the "image") and the second creation ("added" consisting in the distinction of sexes), equally configures one graded protology to two levels, which conditions the anthropological, ethical and eschatological vision of Gregory of Nyssa. Historic humanity is in fact the product of a single creative action of God that, nonetheless, in the foresight of Adam's transgression, confers to the human body that "animal"-type distinction of sexes, which is foreign by "nature" to the creature, which God would have wanted to be entirely in his own image corporeal but not sexual. Gregory reconfirms that sexuality, a constituent element of historical humanity, is a product of a secondary addition, caused by the historic Adam, and constitutes, moreover, a "second" anthropological level.

Augustine, after an early period of accepting the protological scheme that had been solidified by that time, acc. to which marriage appeared incompatible with Adam's complete state, rejected such a scheme in order to affirm, with an ever-more clear resolution during the *Pelagian controversy, that marriage and physical procreation belonged to God's original plan for humankind. He thus affirmed a different protology that was already widespread in the patristic tradition, including such representatives as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria and, later, *Theodore of Mopsuestia and others from the Eastern and Western churches. In Augustine's writings, protology acquired a specific awareness and articulation in relation to his doctrine of "original sin," which, while emphasizing the multiple and dramatic devastating effects of Adam's transgression on all of humanity, attributes to these effects an exclusively ethical-religious significance. In this manner, Augustine consciously rejected the explicit or implicit anthropological implications of a protology that identified in Adam's sin the "foundational" event of a typical human activity and existential dimension, the sexual, expressed in marriage and procreation.

J. Bonsirven, Le Judaïsme palestinien au temps de Jésus-Christ, I-II, Paris 1934; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani: Annali Fac. Lett. Filos. Università di Macerata II (1969) 1-227; U. Bianchi (ed.), La "doppia creazione" dell'uomo negli Alessandrini, nei Cappadoci e nella gnosi, Rome 1978; Id. (ed.), Arché e Telos. L'antropologia di Origene e di Gregorio di Nissa. Analisi storico-religiosa, Atti del Coll. di Milano 17-19 maggio 1979, Milan 1981; P. Pisi, Genesis e phthorà. Le motivazioni protologiche della verginità in Gregorio di Nissa e nella tradizione dell'enkrateia, Rome 1981; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Protologia ed encratismo. Esempi di esegesi encratita di Gen. 1–3: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 75-81; Id., Enkrateia e antropologia. Le motivazioni protologiche della "continenza" nel cristianesimo dei primi secoli e nello gnosticismo, Rome 1984; U. Bianchi (ed.), Atti del Colloquio internazionale su "La tradizione dell'enkrateia.

Motivazioni ontologiche e protologiche," Milan 20-23 aprile 1982, Rome 1985; G. Sfameni Gasparro, *L'*Epistula Titi discipuli Pauli de dispositione sanctimonii *e la tradizione dell'*enkrateia: ANRW II, 25, 6 (1988) 4551-4664, repr. with modifications in Id., Agostino. Tra etica e religione, Brescia 1999, 191-304; Id., Image of God and Sexual Differentiation in Tradition of Enkrateia. Protological Motivations, in K.E. Børresen (ed.), Image of God and Gender Models in Judaeo-Christian Tradition, Oslo 1991, 138-171; Minneapolis [2]1995, 134-169.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

PROTOPASCHITES. Numerous methods for observing *Easter and calculating the date on which it had to be celebrated were already known in ancient Christianity; nonetheless, the Council of *Nicaea imposed the Alexandrian calculation on all the churches of the empire: this date was similar to the practice in *Rome. As part of this calculation, authorities kept in mind the spring equinox; therefore, permission to celebrate *Easter before this time was not granted. Some Christians in *Syria, however, whose method of calculating Easter did not take into account the equinox, were not aware of this rule. For this reason, their Easter was occasionally celebrated on a different date from that of *Alexandria and *Rome: this question was resolved in a condemnation in 387. These Antiochene Christians, who were condemned by *Athanasius (Chronicon Paschale: PG 92, 76CD; Pasch. Ep. 39) and *John Chrysostom (Adv. Jud. 3,3), became known as Protopaschites.

V. Grumel, Traité d'études byzantines, I, La Chronologie, Paris 1958, 42; R. Cantalamessa, La Pasqua della nostra salvezza, Casale Monf. 1984 (repr.), 134.; P. L'Huillier, The Church of the Ancient Councils. The Disciplinary Work of the First Four Ecumenical Councils, Crestwood, NY 1996, 19-26; K. Gerlach, The Antenicene Pascha. A Rhetorical History, Leuven 1998, 257-317.

A. Stewart-Sykes

PROTREPTIC. The term refers to a type of discourse directed esp. to young people (προτρεπτικὸς λόγος), primarily for encouraging them to dedicate themselves to philosophy as true wisdom. Common Latin renderings for the concept of protreptic were as follows: adhortatio, cohortatio and exhortatio, but also the simple term hortatio. It was introduced as a genre by the Sophists, in the form of logoi of exhortation to the practice of *rhetoric; they intended to draw from the protreptic speeches of the Socratic philosophers Antisthenes and Aristippus. The most famous protreptic of Antiquity was written by Aristotle, only rare fragments of which remain. Works bearing the same title are connected to, among others, the names of Epicurus, Cleanthes and Chrysippus. In Late Antiquity, the genre of protreptic saw its use extend to the sciences and arts, with the works—lost like the earlier works—of Galen, An Exhortation to the Art of Medicine, and *Themistius, An Exhortation to Rhetoric. However, the protreptic of the *Neoplatonist philosopher *Iamblichus, which constituted part of his Summary of the Pythagorean Teachings, is extant. In Latin, among the works that were based on an Aristotelian model, we should esp. mention Cicero's lost dialogue Hortensius, the reading of which made a great impression on the young *Augustine, setting him ablaze in search for truth (Conf. 3,4,7-8): in this document, Cicero maintained that he silenced the detractors of philosophy (Tusc. 2,4). To the academic Philo of Larissa, whom Cicero had among his students at *Rome, scholars have in fact traced the canonical bipartition of the protreptic speech: in one part disputatious (at times called "aprotreptic"), from its apologetic character, and the second part a *parenesis (or protreptic in the strict sense of the term) intended to demonstrate the values of philosophy, or rather to push one to adopt a "philosophical" style of life, close therefore to an epidictic or deliberative speech.

Against the background of the traditional philosophical theme, we should read the intention of Christians to revert to the protreptic genre, in a manner more or less explicit, and reverting in particular to the Aristotelian paradigm. This occurred both inasmuch as the new faith came to be considered globally and inasmuch as it was proposed as the true philosophy, the only road to truth and a corresponding practice of life (Hadot), and because essential dimensions of the Christian existence can require a deeper explanation and defense because of their intrinsic difficulty and loftiness. In the Protrepticus, *Clement of Alexandria exhorted *pagans to convert to the Christian faith, demonstrating negatively the deceitful character of traditional and mystic Hellenic religiosity, which were founded on myth; he proposed in their place the superiority of Christianity, which consisted in following the teaching of the divine Logos itself. Among *Origen's writings, the following documents can be traced back to the protreptic genre: not only the Exh. ad mart., which makes explicit mention of this genre in its title, but also the treatise Peri euchēs, inasmuch as it is completely bent on defending the possibility of prayer against the pertinent metaphysical objections and the numerous practical obstacles that such an act encounters (Perrone). *Basil of Caesarea's Speech to Young Men is directed toward an audience receiving a school education that was still permeated by pagan culture in order to exhort them to value the secular paideia as an ethical and religious propedeutic for divine revelation, also with the objective of gaining cultural credit for the ascetic ideal in a society that looked upon it with much reservation (Gribomont, Naldini). In a broader perspective, one observes (Cook) that the protreptic genre of the works that can be ascribed to it in their totality borders the protreptic character diffusely interwoven in the language of early Christian literature, where the authors intended to lead the interlocutor or the recipient to conversion by using on the demonstrative level arguments that, despite their often topical framework, tended to become characteristic of a Christian rhetoric of persuasion, such as miraculous signs, the wisdom contained in the Scriptures, the great example of the lives of the faithful, prophecy and fear of punishment in the afterlife.

LACL 598 with bibl.; M. Naldini, Sulla "Oratio ad adolescentes" di Basilio Magno: Prometheus 4 (1978) 36-44; E.R. Curtius, Letteratura europea e Medio Evo latino, Florence 1992, 614.622 n. 38 [orig. ed. Bern 1948]; J.G. Cook, The Protreptic Power of Early Christian Language. From John to Augustine: VChr 48 (1994) 105-134; L. Perrone, Il discorso protrettico di Origene sulla preghiera. Introduzione al ΠΕΡΙ ΕΥΧΗΣ, in Il dono e la sua ombra. Ricerche sul ΠΕΡΙ ΕΥΧΗΣ di Origene, SEA 57, Rome 1997, 7-32; P. Hadot, Esercizi spirituali e filosofia antica, Turin 2005 [orig. ed. Paris 2002].

F. Pieri

PROVERBIA GRAECORUM. A collection of 74 apothegms, translated from Greek, that we know through the Irish scholar *Sedulius and also through references in other sources, such as Cathwulf's letter to Charlemagne (MGH, Epist. IV, 503). This collection is generally considered to be an adaptation, made in 6th-c. *Ireland, from the Greek.

CPL 1130; S. Helimann, Sedulius Scottus, Munich 1906, 121-135; J.F. Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland, I, New York 1929, 566.

S. Zincone

PROVIDENCE. The patristic teaching on providence as an active (as opposed to passive) divine attribute is the product of two traditions that as they flow together achieve development and theological depth: (1) the tradition of classical theodicy for which πρόνοια (= providentia) is the divine rationality that harmoniously organizes and guides the course of the *cosmos, and (2) the biblical tradition, acc. to which providence is the active and loving will of a personal and creator God in relation to beings created by him, esp. in view of the realization of the salvific plan for humanity.

The doctrine of divine providence that directs the life of the cosmos was already articulated by Plato (Tim. 30 and 44) and became the common heritage of the leading classical philosophical schools of the Hellenistic-Roman era, with the sole exception of the Epicurean school. It had, however, special relevance in the philosophical-religious tradition that drew upon *Stoicism: Panaetius wrote the περὶ προνοίας, used by Cicero in the second book of the treatise De natura deorum; Seneca wrote the De providentia (see also Diog. Laërtius, VII, 147; Cic., Nat. Deor. II, 22,58; Sen., Nat. Quaest., II, 45,2). Christian authors, esp. the *apologists, often referred to the classical teaching on providence esp. in contexts aimed at vindicating Christian monotheism (Just., Dial. 1; Athenag., Leg. 19,3; Theoph. Ant., Ad Autol. II, 8; Tatian, Orat. 2; Iren., Haer. III, 25; Elenchos I, 21,1; Orig., C. Cels. IV, 74; Tertull., An. 20,5; Min. Fel., Oct. 19,10; Lact., Div. inst. I, 2,2-3; VII, 3,6; Ira Dei 9). In the praise of divine providence in creation, the teaching of Christian authors moved in the direction of classical theodicy and did not substantially detach itself from it; providence is the divine reason that devises, disposes and governs the universe (Athenag., Leg. 8; Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 148,2; VII, 9,1-4; Novat., Trin. VIII, 43: Lact., Ira Dei, cc. 9-10; Aug., Civ. Dei XXII, 24). Providence is extended to the entirety and to the particulars of the cosmos (Athenag., Res. 18,5; Leg. 24,3; Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 153,4; Orig., Princ. IV, 1,7; C. Cels. V, 71; Min. Fel., Oct. 18,3; Novat., Trin. VIII, 43). In a particularly evident way, providence is manifested in the functionality, beauty and harmony of the members of the human body (Min. Fel., Oct. 18,1ff.; Lact., De opif. Dei 1,16; 2,10; 3,4; 4,23-24; 6,6; 8,15; Aug., Civ. Dei XXII, 24; Greg. Nyss., Hom. opif., cc. 8-9). Providence guides and governs all of humanity and individuals (Just., 1 Apol. 44,11; Clem. Alex., Protr. 91,3; Strom. VII, 9,1-4; Novat., Trin. VIII, 43; Lact., Ira Dei 19,6). But in this respect, Christian authors mentioned the substantial difference between the Christian understanding and the classical notion of εἱμαρμένη or fatum, that denies human freedom (Just., 2 Apol. 7,4; Theoph. Ant., Ad Autol. III, 7; Elenchos I, 21,2; Clem. Alex., Exc. Theod. 74; Orig., C. Cels. I, 10; Eus., Praep. ev. VI, 6; Aug., Civ. Dei V, c. 1ff.).

Providence governs and directs the destinies of peoples and human kingdoms. Already *Origen (C. Cels. II, 30) presented as providential the concurrence of the pax augusta in the universal Empire of Rome and the birth of Christianity; an analogous idea would return and be developed by *Eusebius of Caesarea (Praep. ev. I, 4,2-5; Dem. ev. VII, 30-33.35).

*Lactantius commemorated the intervention of divine providence in the fall of the persecutors of the church (De mortibus persecutorum, c. 1) and in the ascent of *Constantine to the position of emperor (Div. inst. VII, 26,12). The commemoration of providence in the development of human history is one of the driving motifs of *Augustine's treatise De civitate Dei; providence has directed the destinies of human empires (Civ. Dei V, 12; V, 13; V, 15); it wished to repay the moral virtues of the ancient Romans with the power of an empire (Civ. Dei V, 12; V, 13; V, 15). Not entirely foreign to the classical philosophical-religious tradition (cf. Asclepius 39) was the idea of a divine providence that exercises its cosmological functions through intermediary "powers"; in the Christian understanding, God exerts providence through angels (Athenag., Leg. 24,3; Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 148,2; Novat., Trin. VIII, 45; Method., Res. I, 37).

One can also connect back to the classical philosophical-religious tradition the idea of the divine Logos as the rational power that organizes and directs the cosmos, so that one can immediately attribute to the Logos the divine providence that pervades the cosmos; this doctrine can be found in the Letter to Diognetus (7,2), and it occurs in *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VII, c. 2) and Irenaeus's writings (Haer. I, 22,1-2). But this idea was esp. dear to Eusebius of Caesarea, for whom the Logos was the divine πρόνοια itself that creates and guides the universe (see Eus., Laud. Const. XII, 7); the Logos takes care of humankind with paternal love (Theoph. syr. I, 79); the Logos is responsible for the governance of kings and their legislation (Dem. ev. V, 1,6); the Logos educates humanity by guiding it to the summit of Christian civilization (Theoph. syr. II, 93).

Undoubtedly in the patristic tradition, esp. among the Greek Fathers, the influence of classical theodicy dominated with respect to the cosmological function of providence. But because Christian thinkers explicitly referred to the notion of providence as an active attribute of God, the Creator and Father of the biblical revelation, there were not lacking patristic statements specifically inspired by the biblical teaching through which providence is esp. manifested in the history of salvation. Moreover, in the writings of certain Christian thinkers, the idea of providence coincides with the divine will unfolding itself in the salvific "economy," so that the entire framework of the salvific "plan" and its individual traces are a manifestation of divine providence.

Divine providence is manifested in human history with a pedagogical action that leads to a progressive and ever deeper understanding of God and his work in the world (Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 17,153,1; Aug., Civ. Dei X, 14). Providence awoke the *prophets of the OT to foretell the coming of Jesus Christ (Just., Dial. 118,3; Clem. Alex., Strom. V, 6,2; VI, 128,3; Eus., Theoph. syr. II, 93); it illumined humanity through Holy *Scripture (Orig., Princ. IV, 7; Sel. in Ps. 1). The progressive education of humanity and its development in *grace until the contemplation of God was actualized by divine providence (or the divine "*economy") through the incarnation of the Word, the dispenser of paternal glory for the good of humanity (Iren., Haer. III, 20,2; IV, 20,6-7; Novat., Trin. XVIII, 100). According to Eusebius of Caesarea, the Word is the dispenser of divine providence, which is esp. actualized by it with deliverance from the cult of demons, from there onward with the call to the understanding and worship of the true God; by means of his laws and his precepts, by means of the prophets and other just men, the Word teaches the fear of God.

Lastly, by suggesting love through truth and for the good, it elevates humanity to civilization and an encounter with Christian truth (cf. Theoph. syr. II, 93). Divine providence arranged for the call of the Gentiles to be God's people instead of the Jews (Just., Dial. 118,3); it still predisposes humanity to receive the divine call to salvation (Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 2,3); it creates the church (*Hermas, Vis. I, 3,4) and edifies it with the sacred Scriptures (Orig., Princ. IV, 7). Inspired by biblical revelation is the understanding of divine providence that allows evil in the world, but it is not indifferent to it; it actually makes use of it as an occasion for merit for those who are good (Iren., Haer. IV, 38,4; Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 17,86, 1ff.; Aug., Gen. c. Man. II, 28; Civ. Dei XIV, 11; Enchir. 11).

Especially drawn from biblical revelation was the eschatological perspective on the doctrine of providence, namely, that it prepares one for reward or punishment acc. to one's merits. This was the thesis developed by Lactantius in his treatise De ira Dei, but it also occurs in his De mortibus persecutorum. Lactantius categorically rejected the Stoic idea of an exclusively benevolent providence; precisely because God is provident, he cannot become indifferent to the transgressors of his law: Si est providens, ut oportet Deum, consulit utique generi humani, quo sit vita nostra et copiosior et melior et tutior. Si est pater ac domimus universorum, certe et virtutibus hominum delectatur et vitiis commovetur. Ergo et iustos diligit et impios odit (De ira Dei 19,6). Precisely because he cannot be indifferent toward moral evil, God judges and condemns sinners (De ira Dei 22,3; 24,9). To be the final judge of the good and the evil worked by all people is in keeping with divine providence: this teaching occurs frequently in the writings of the Fathers (Athenag., Res. 18; Iren., Adv. Haer. IV, 36,6; Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 12,87,2; Orig., Princ. II, 9,8); in the variety and proportionality of the divine punishments against sinners, providence is clearly revealed (Aug., Civ. Dei XXI, 13; John Chrysost., Hom. in Matt. XIII; In Ps. IV, 10).

H.-D. Simonin, La providence selon les Pères grecs: DTC 13/1 (1936) 941-960; A. Rascol, La providence selon S. Augustin: ibid. 961-984; J. Behm, προνοέω, πρόνοια: TDNT 4 (1967) 1009-1017; Lampe, πρόνοια, 1157-1158; H. Koch, Pronoia und Paideusis. Studien zu Origenes und sein Verhältnis zum Platonismus, Berlin 1932; G.L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought, London 1936, 55-75; M. Spanneut, Le Stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église, Paris 1957, 325-331; V. Loi, Lattanzio nella storia del linguaggio e del pensiero teologico pre-niceno, Zürich 1970, 66-69; Ch. Parma, Pronoia und Providentia. Der Vorsehungsbegriff Plotins und Augustins, Leiden 1971; B. Brons, Pronoia und das Verhältnis von Metaphysik und Geschichte bei Dionysius Areopagita: FZPhTh 24 (1977) 165-186; H.S. Benjamins, Eingeordnete Freiheit. Freiheit und Vorsehung bei Origenes, Leiden 1994; R.J. Kees, Die Lehre von der Oikonomia Gottes in der Oratio Catechetica Gregors von Nyssa, Leiden 1995; G. Madec, Thématique augustinienne de la Providence: REAug 41 (1995) 291-308; P. Frick, Divine Providence in Philo of Alexandria, Tübingen 1999; S.-P. Bergjan, Der fürsorgende Gott. Der Begriff der PRONOIA Gottes in der apologetischen Literatur der Alten Kirche, Berlin 2002.

V. Loi - H.R. Drobner

PRUDENTIUS (348?–after 405). Born probably at Calagurris (Calahorra on the Upper Ebro), Aurelius Prudentius Clemens belonged to that provincial Hispanic-Roman aristocracy that made a career on the success of the Spanish Emperor *Theodosius (379–395) of Cauca—without a doubt present-day Coca in Old Castile. A melancholy that was still similar to the Roman poet Horace characterizes his work, the introduction to which is written in verses that he placed before the collection of his poems published in 404/405, under the form of Confessions in miniature, a biography that precedes the exposition of his poetic project. There one perceives the passionate scholar of *rhetoric, the ambitious lawyer, the governor of the province who ended his career in the high office of private counselor to the emperor (proximus), perhaps until the emperor's death in 395. Retirement was the occasion for a second "new life" for this well-read Christian: his *conversion to the perfect life then led him on the path of asceticism and great poetry. The second expressed and maintained the hopes of the first; or rather, it became a spiritual exercise in asceticism, praise of God, service to the church for a singular testimony to faith and poetic culture, an extremely diversified literary production.

Prudentius planned in advance the course of his entire work, like that of an enormous basilica, a sort of Christian archipoem, perhaps aiming to emulate in every genre the traditions of ancient poetry (W. Ludwig). Or, more likely, he slowly organized, in four works that had already been completed, a production scattered over the course of many years and perhaps begun before his retirement from his high post to his lands and the province of *Tarraconensis (at Calahorra? or at *Saragossa or at *Tarragona?—three cities whose martyrs he esp. praises). The fact is that the praefatio, in a summary that provides the outline, does not exactly correspond to the works preserved under Prudentius's name: "That my sinful soul may compose hymns all my days and not pass a night without praising the Lord, that it may fight heresies and display the Catholic faith"; this strophe specifically alluded to the lyric collection of the Cathemerinon and its title and appears to invoke in what follows, with less precision, the didactic and theological poems, in hexameters, of the Apotheosis and the Hamartigenia. "This poem, by trampling upon the *pagan rites brings about the destruction of your idols, O *Rome": this verse well announces the antipagan polemic of his epic books Contra Symmachum. The celebration, through hymns on the passion and the cult of the martyrs (esp. Roman and Spanish), shines through in the following verse: "It consecrates a cult for the martyrs; it celebrates the *Apostles" (see Peristeph. 12, on martyrdom and the Roman sanctuaries of *Peter and *Paul). But at this point the presentation comes to a halt; nothing allows one to suppose the existence of the allegorical epic poem of the Psychomachia ("the soul's combat"—for the soul and within the *soul—between vices and *virtues personified), nor the *epigrams that serve as captions to figurative representations of biblical scenes: the Dittochaeon ("double nourishment"—of the two testaments?). Perhaps these two poetic compositions were completed after the publication of the edition of 404-405.

Collections of poems in various lyric meters and long poems written in hexameter contrast with each other, in their form, as the two sides of Prudentius's poetry: on the one hand there is that lyrical side, on the other that epic and didactic side. But, in effect, the entire project draws its unity from a properly hymnodic design, even if it only appeared later to Prudentius as the unifying principle of his poetry: "being unable on its own merits, this poem praises *God at least with its voice": all this poetic production is, therefore, heard, thought and desired as a "lyrical oblation," as a literary form of a "spiritual sacrifice." This is the font whence flows a specifically religious poem, which, by means of hymnody, is directly connected to the *liturgy: this is the celebration (concelebret). As such, and even if it is progressively distinct in a very personal way (one observes that in the course of the Cathemerinon; see J.L. Charlet), it is found in the rich experience of its predecessors, the poet-bishops *Hilary of Poitiers and *Ambrose of Milan.

This learned poetry, the work of a layman of very broad and refined culture, produced a difficult synthesis of various currents of the Latin poetic tradition, as renewed and continued over the course of the 4th c. This is reflected in Prudentius's poetry like a sort of vast panorama. As a backdrop, we find the formation and the classical tastes of a "man of the Muses" who not only knew the writings of Virgil and Horace, but also Lucretius and Catullus as well as Ovid, Lucan and the poets of the Flavian Age. One can also perceive, in the background, the Renaissance of an innovative poetry in Latin letters of the 4th c.: *Optatianus Porfyrius's figured poetry, the scintillating overrefinement of Ausonius (J.L. Charlet recently demonstrated that their influence was considerable), the use in literate society of epigrams, wordplays and *centos. But most of all, Prudentius received the inheritance of three-quarters of a century of Latin Christian poetry. After an epic and meditative "re-presentation" of the Scriptures (*Juvencus—already during the time of *Constantine, a Hispano-Roman), during Prudentius's generation the following were released: the epigrams of Pope *Damasus, the hymns of *Hilary and *Ambrose, *Paulinus of Nola's search for a great Christian poetry (but the chronology with respect to Paulinus and Prudentius and their works, and therefore their reciprocal influence, remains difficult to establish).

Prudentius's genius consisted in taking on, in service of the project that we have tried to describe above, the three different styles and conceptions of poetry, by attempting at the same time to unite them, but also to follow their inflections in poetry of very diverse tones and genres. One cannot reduce him to a "neoclassicist," conscious of his means, demanding in his technique, a passionate retractator of the great ancestors of the Augustan Age and the Late Empire. Indeed, he was a poet imbued with the poetic aesthetics of Late Antiquity: consequently, his exaggerations and his baroque animation, the violence of his passion and imagination, his alternating taste for the pitiable and the gracious, the overly Hellenistic spark (poikilia!) of tones, levels of vocabulary and style—in short, a mixture of genres characteristic of the new "late" Alexandrianism. All this was established on the religious inspiration of the Christian poet, who was led to express in his verses this symbolic perception of the world and existence, which is common to the homo religiosus and the poet. In order not to misjudge Prudentius's talent, we should not reduce him to one of his three personages and neither should we eliminate any of them, but we should understand well that the first two were at the service of the third.

The lyrical collections are the most transparent witnesses of his spiritual project. With a concentric composition (or "mandala"), evidently from a Hellenistic source, each poetic work gravitates toward a center that is always the meditative paraphrase of one or many episodes of sacred history. Those works thus actualize, in their time, a lived and "ruminated" lectio divina*—as stated by Ambrose and medieval monks. Thus, each poem is like the libretto of a small liturgy for the Christian imagination.

The pious ballads of the Peristephanon end by exalting this literary cult of the martyrs, which had already been expanded, in prose, through literature of the Acts, which was increasingly more fictitious, and, esp., the Passions. Prudentius therein unfolds the art of the lyrical and dramatic narration that is at times colored with a popular zing, acc. to the oral legends, the keys of which we have often lost (but the 6th composition is dedicated to the martyrs of *Tarragona whose Acts have been preserved, and one can, in this privileged case, compare his poetic work against the outline of a prose source).

The iconography of the frescoes or mosaics located in the sanctuaries of the martyrs has also played a role that makes us certain of the poet's precise allusions: thus, at Imola for *John Cassian, or at Rome for Peter and Paul. The geography of the martyria he commemorated maps for us the itinerary followed by the poet during a mysterious trip to Rome, the causes for which trip he offered only oblique statements. The poetic works in hexameters are more austere, but less original. Here, the poet has great difficulty working as a theologian in verse: but this layman did not possess the solid theological genius of Hilary or Ambrose. He attempted to be a Lucretius of Christian doctrine, in the structure of his demonstrations as well as in the forms and vocabulary that they express. The rhetorical and polemical epic poem (one thinks of Lucan and Juvenal; one can demonstrate that he attempted to imitate them) of the two songs Contra Symmachum juxtaposes a violently satirical rhetoric of the pagan religions and the celebration of the ideology of the Christian empire, and the black and white antithesis between barbarians, rustics, pagans and Romans, citizens and Christians. The poem that would be most read and most represented by medieval iconography still merits greater attention. The discovery of the Psycomachia disturbs us because of its allegory. It is a Homeric series of duels between virtues and vices personified, dressed up as heroes and heroines of an Aeneid that would lead one to think of the "work," or the auto sacramental, every time. The ekphrasis (a poetic description of works of art acc. to Alexandrian poetry) reappears in this temple of the soul as the heiress of the allegorical temples of ancient poetry (cf. Georgics), and the prophetic visions of the heavenly *Jerusalem are concretized here in a splendor of precious materials and colors.

In the writings of Prudentius, Latin Christian poetry reaches its highest expression in the great generation of Ambrose, Augustine and Jerome. This work would immediately become a model that the poets of the 5th-c. West would not fail to reread, and more than anyone else, be read by medieval schoolboys. This "sweet Prudentius, with unrivaled mouth, so great and famous for his various poetic compositions"—as *Isidore of Seville would write at the beginning of the 7th c. on the walls of his library, where a picture of Prudentius may have well been—could be considered the prince of Christian poets.

Editions: CPL 1437-1446; PL 59, 767-1078; 60, 11-594; CSEL 61; CCL 126. Text and Translation: ed. M. Lavarenne, in 4 vols., Paris [2]1955–1963; LCL 2 vols., London 1949–1963; BAC 58, Madrid 1950. Studies: I. Rodríguez Herrera, Poeta Christianus, Prudentius' Auffassung von der Aufgabe des christlichen Dichters, Diss. Munich 1936 (Sp. tr. Salamanca 1981); B.M. Peebles, The Poet Prudentius, New York 1951; I. Lana, Due capitoli prudenziani, Rome 1962; Chr. Gnilka, Studien zur Psychomachie des Prudentius, Wiesbaden 1963; K. Thraede, Studien zur Sprache und Stil des Prudentius, Göttingen 1965; R. Herzog, Die allegorische Dichtkunst des Prudentius, Munich 1966; W. Ludwig, Die christliche Dichtkunst des Prudentius und die Transformation der klassischen Gattungen: Entretiens de la Fondation Hardt 23 (1977) 303-372; Patrologia III, 267-281 (with bibl.); W. Evenepoel, Studies in the Liber cathemerinon of Aurelius Prudentius Clemens (in Dutch, summary in Eng.), Brussels 1979; M. Sotomayor, La Iglesia en la España romana: Historia de la Iglesia en España, I, Madrid 1979, 312ff. and 318-333; J.L. Charlet, L'influence d'Ausone sur la poésie de Prudence, Aix-Paris 1980; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'occident chrétien, Paris 1981 (a fourth of the work is dedicated to Prudentius); J.L. Charlet, La création poétique dans le Cathemerinon de Prudence, Paris 1982; L. Gosserez, Poésie de lumière. Une lecture de Prudence, Louvain 2001; K. Smolak, Die Psychomachie des Prudentius als historisches Epos, in La poesia cristiana tardoantica e medievale. Atti del Conv. int., Macerata 4-6 maggio 1998, Turin 2000, 121-144; Id., Der Hymnus für jede Gebetsstunde (Prudentius, Cathemerinon 9). Eine interpretierende Analyse: Wiener Studien 113 (2000) 215-236.

J. Fontaine

PSALMODY. Throughout the Psalter one finds allusions to acts of worship: sacrifices, oracles, blessings, processions and feasts; some assistance was needed for the singing of the *Psalms; the psalmist sang and also mentioned the musical instruments. Titles and rubrics ("selah," "alleluia") show that the collection was made for the liturgy of that period. In the worship of the synagogue, the Psalter was not part of the readings (i.e., the Law and the Prophets) and does not seem to have had a fixed place, but it was nonetheless used. It is difficult to say how much of these adaptable and variegated worship traditions the first Christian assemblies preserved; one must undoubtedly insist on the inspired and charismatic character of the hymns and the Psalms joined to the readings, the *Eucharist and the exhortations. One can perceive a great interest for biblical songs analogous to the Psalms; the Psalms were certainly connected to the collection of the canonical *Scriptures at a very early date (one could possibly weigh the comparable influence of groups of biblical writings by counting the references to these biblical songs, i.e., the references to the Psalms, in the writings of the various *Fathers). One could certainly trace back to *Judaism the practice of having a soloist chant a Psalm aloud, with a slightly adorned melody, to which the community joined itself with shouts of praise under the form of a refrain ("responsory").

In the church, the well-prepared "choir," which knew the Psalter by heart and which for a long time was made up of consecrated *virgins, pious persons and the clergy, grew after the advent of *monasticism. In *Egypt, however, a community of monks tended to listen in silence to the song of the reader, accompanying it from time to time with a silent prostration and a concluding prayer. Traces have been preserved of the introduction of more active psalmodic practices at *Antioch or at *Milan in the 2nd half of the 4th c. in order to strengthen the communities of the Nicene opposition against the conservative and less popular customs of the *Arians. The spread of this antiphonal chant was rapid and placed an abundant amount of psalmody into the divine office. One can therefore recognize that one of the temptations of the richest and most artistic *liturgy was to immediately limit the monastic use of the Psalter to give more time to the melodies or free liturgical poetry (which was much more bland and less rich with profound *spirituality). Every local church experienced its own evolution, sometimes exceptional, at other times mediocre. This does not exclude the fact that psalmody remained the foundational structure of the liturgical prayer of the canonical hours.

H. Schneider, Die altlat. bibl. Cantica, Beuron 1938; J. Gelineau, Les formes de la psalmodie chrétienne: La MaisonD. 33 (1953) 134-172; P. Salmon, in A.G. Martimort, L'Église en prière, Paris 1961, 789-824; E.T. Moneta Caglio, Lo jubilus e le origini della salmodia responsoriale, Venice 1976-77; P. Jeffery, The Introduction of Psalmody into the Roman Mass by Pope Celestine I (422–432). Reinterpreting a Passage in the "Liber Pontificalis: ALW 26 (1984) 147-165; Ph. Bernard, Du chant romain au chant grégorien (IV^e-XIII^e siècle), Paris 1996; Id., A-t-on connu la salmodie alterne à deux choeurs en Gaule avant l'époque carolingienne?: RBen 114 (2004) 291-325; 115 (2005) 33-60; C.A. Blaising – C.S. Hardin, eds., Psalms 1–50, ACCS OT 7, Downers Grove, IL 2008; Q.F. Wesslschmidt, ed. Psalms 51–150, ACCS OT 8, Downers Grove, IL 2007.

J. Gribomont

PSALMS, BOOK of. The New Testament multiplies allusions to the Psalms, as does the book of Isaiah (see Nestle-Aland, Novum Testamentum Graece, Stuttgart [26]1979, 752-757); christological interpretation abounds in songs of messianic triumph, the prayers of the righteous sufferer, the interpretation of the history of salvation, the kingdom, the holy city. Perhaps the little-known historical context of these prayers, which were always applicable and relevant, esp. facilitated their evangelical interpretation (see, e.g., J. Dupont, Études sur les Actes des Apôtres, Paris 1967, 245-390). During the first three centuries, the Psalms remained (with Isaiah) the most-used prophetic book for *apologetics or pastoral ministry (see Biblia Patristica I-VII, Paris 1975–2000). The task was primarily to understand Christ's prayer and to participate in it as a church. The Septuagint translation was often obscure, and yet as an expression of a more universal and more prophetic prayer of the Hebrew Psalter, it presented itself esp. well for this adaptation (see B. Fischer, Le Christ dans les Psaumes. La dévotion aux Psaumes dans l'Église des martyrs: La MaisonD 27 [1957] 86-108; A. Rose, Psaumes et prière chrétienne, Bruges 1965).

The commentaries on the Psalter were so numerous and abundant that it was impossible to preserve them all in their original form; they were primarily transmitted through complicated exegetical catenae, which are only beginning to be studied in their entirety. The fragments, which numerous scholars have discovered from isolated MSS, were so full of lacunae and so unreliable that scholars still do not have any idea about the history and the development of this literary genre. The richness of *Origen's works was such that a very large number of later commentators (*Eusebius of Caesarea, *Hilary of Poitiers, *Ambrose of Milan, *Jerome and many others) ransacked them, a fact that, if harmful to their survival, favored their influence. At the present moment, M. Harl, who is at the head of a group of Hellenists, and E. Mühlberg are systematically working on an edition of the catenae; R. Devreese, who opened the way for them, as an older scholar has provided a global analysis of what is valid in what has been edited up to this point. One can therefore attempt to offer a systematic presentation of the primary commentaries. We must first of all mention Origen. Practically speaking, his first exegetical attempt, at *Alexandria, around the year 222, was a commentary on Psalm 15 (or 25), and for which P. Nautin (Origène, I, Paris 1977, 262-275) has identified around a dozen important fragments. A second commentary was begun at Caesarea around 247, after the homilies and the volumes on the *Prophets and the *Song of Songs; he reached Psalm 72 and also treated Psalm 118. Lastly, unable to finish this Herculean task, Origen drafted brief notes, Excerpta, on the entire Psalter. According to V. Peri's wonderful discovery (Omelie origeniane sui Salmi, Vatican City 1980), these Excerpta are to be identified with the Tractatus translated by Jerome (CCL 76), and perhaps with the document that Jerome had already used in his Epistles 20, 23, 25, 26, 28, 30, 34 and 37. Origen's fragments published in various works have been cataloged by Devreese (pp. 1-88).

Nautin suggested that Origen's second commentary is owed to the discovery of Quinta and Sexta *Hexaplar versions, likewise recognized in the Alexandrian commentary, and also to the publication of *Hippolytus's homily (printed by Nautin in his Dossier d'Hippolyte et de Méliton, Paris 1953, 161-183) which attributed the composition of the entire Psalter to David.

In the 4th c., around the year 330, the first commentator of the entire Psalter was *Eusebius of Caesarea (CPG 3467). He made use of Origen's *library at Caesarea and followed his footsteps. The commentaries on Psalm 37 (PG 30, 81-104) and 51-95 (PG 23, 441-1221) have been well preserved; for the remainder, see Devreese (pp. 89-146). Eusebius inherited Origen's erudition, not his religious genius.

Jerome attributed a commentary on the entire Psalter to *Asterius the Sophist, who died after 341. Asterius's work was a compilation of *homilies; more specifically, these were rhetorical sermons that performed the function of exhortation and were far from a historical-philological commentary, but they sought to insert the texts into the life of *David acc. to the traditional titles. Thirty-one homilies have been preserved (all authentic? CPG 2815; PG 40, 389-477; M. Richard, Asterii Sophistae commentariorum in Psalmos quae supersunt, Oslo 1956). The catenae allow one to reestablish the *scholia for the Psalter of *Athanasius of Alexandria (CPG 2140), which have also been preserved in *Coptic and *Syriac. Scholars are uncertain when to date them in the life of the saint; it is not even certain whether they are authentic. Being very basic, they do not bear any traces of the themes that were dear to Athanasius; instead, they bear witness to their dependence upon Eusebius of Caesarea. Keeping in mind PG 27 and G.M. Vian's work (Testi inediti dal commento ai Salmi di Atanasio, Rome 1978), one can definitely detect such themes therein. The letter to *Marcellinus, however, is certainly authentic (CPG 2097; PG 27, 12-45).

Chronologically speaking, it is necessary to mention here *Hilary of Poitier's Tractates on the Psalms (CPL 428; PL 9), which drew heavily upon Origen's work. The fragments of *Didymus and *Apollinaris of Laodicea's comments on the Psalms (CPG 2551 and 3681) supplied by the catenae have been wonderfully edited by E. Mühlenberg. Didymus's long commentary transmitted by the *papyri of Tura (CPG 2550) was published at Bonn by M. Gronewald (with L. Doutreleau and A. Gesché) from 1968 to 1970. *Basil of Caesarea left a series of homilies on chosen Psalms, which were heavily influenced by Origen (CPG 2836; PG 29, 209-494; CPG 2910; PG 30, 104-116). The commentaries attributed to *Diodore of Tarsus, certainly very Antiochene, must still be studied when they are published in their entirety (CPG 3818; CCG 6). The commentaries of *Theodore of Mopsuestia (CPG 3833) were published by R. Devreese (Le commentaire de Théodore de Mopsueste sur les Psaumes, Vatican City 1939). For the Latin version of *Julian of Eclanum, see CCL 88A, Turnhout 1977.

Moreover, the West produced the Explanationes by *Ambrose of Milan on the Twelve Psalms, then on Psalm 118 (CPL 140-141; PL 14 and 15), which was heavily influenced by Origen, as was the Small Commentaries on the Psalms by Jerome (Commentarioli in psalmos; CPL 582; CCL 72,163-245), whose Tractatus (CPL 592-593) can be considered, as was said, inspired by a translation of Origen's Selecta.

Likewise in the Origenian line—but at this stage having a more refined *spirituality—one could mention the work of *Gregory of Nyssa (In inscriptiones psalmorum: CPG 3155, PG 44, 432-608) and esp. *Evagrius of Pontus (CPG 2455; we are awaiting an edition by M.J. Rondeau, who has already published excellent studies).

From the Antiochene side, the homilies of *John Chrysostom (CPG 4413, PG 55) and the commentary of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (CPG 6202, PG 80) have enjoyed great success, and the published text still awaits improvements. From *Cyril of Alexandria only fragments remain in the catenae (CPG 5202; Devreesse, 24-233). From *Hesychius of Jerusalem, in contrast, we know of three distinct commentaries (CPG 6552-6554), which are also awaiting careful studies.

In the West, the most majestic and profound work is certainly represented by *Augustine of Hippo's very personal Ennarationes (CPL 283, PL 36, CCL 38-40). Late Antiquity would add to the commentary tradition *Cassiodorus's Expositions (CPL 900, PL 70, CCL 97-98).

This quick look at ancient exegesis must be restricted to these famous authors. The best part of this exegesis on the Psalms was put together verse-by-verse in the two anonymous volumes La tradition médite le Psautier chrétien joined together by E. de Solms (Paris 1973). This work happily complements the historical commentaries on the Psalter and enters more deeply into *prayer and the liturgical understanding.

CPG 5, 122-125; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs des Psaumes, Vatican City 1970; M. Harl, La chaîne palestinienne sur le Ps. 118, I-II, SC 189-190, Paris 1972; E. Mühlenberg, Psalmenkommentare aus der Katenenüberlieferung, I-III, Berlin 1975–1978; M.J. Rondeau, Les commentaires patristiques du Psautier, OCA 219-220, Rome 1982–1985; E. Zenger, Der Psalter in Judentum und Christentum, Freiburg-Basel 1998; C. Curti, La catena palestinese sui salmi graduali, Catania 200

J. Gribomont

PSALMUS RESPONSORIUS. A document published in 1965 from a *papyrus dating to the 4th c., bearing the library shelf mark 149[1]-153, the first 12 strophes of which have survived. The document recounts the story of Jesus by beginning with *David and coming to a halt at the wedding of Cana (Jn 2:1-11). It is not known, moreover, which other episodes from the gospels were poetically reread, because the last two folios do not permit any hypothesis. The composition conforms to the poetic norms of the responsio with its cursus, the harmony of sounds and the use of similar terms. Having a structure that is not rigid, the free combination of verses and stophes is guided by the author's poetic talent and mastery of Latin. One can identify its sources as the Protevangelium of James*, upon which scheme it constructs the scenes up until the coming of the *Magi and the gospel of *Matthew for the episode with the Magi and along with the gospel of John for the wedding at Cana. There are few debatable traces of the gospel of *Luke. Discriminant points of doctrine are the virginity, divine maternity and the intercession of

*Mary. Belonging to the category of the most ancient Latin liturgical texts, the presence of certain Greek consonants shows that the Latin alphabet had not yet fully replaced the Greek alphabet in the rhythmic compositions for liturgical use.

R. Roca Puig, Himne a la Virge Maria. "Psalmus Responsorius," in Papir llatí del sigle IV, Barcelona [2]1965; E. Peretto, "Psalmus Responsorius." Un inno alla Vergine Maria di un papiro del IV secolo: Marianum 29 (1967) 255-265; Patrologia III, 320-321; W. Speyer, Der bisher älteste lat. Psalmus abecedarius, in Id., Frühes Christentum im antiken Strahlungsfeld, 1, Tübingen 1989, 64-69; Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, ed. H. Herzog, Paris 1993, 275-276.

E. Peretto

PSEUDEPIGRAPHY. Pseudepigraphy in the strict sense of the term is a literary falsification concerning the author of a work. One must therefore distinguish it from the *falsification of the text. Moreover, the term is used for apocryphal books of the OT and the NT, but it also extends to all other secular and Christian works. One must distinguish two cases: the actual author intentionally hides himself under a fictitious or a well-known name. The deception is, therefore, one the author creates himself. The situation is different for texts that circulated under a name which was not the author's, without him being responsible. The error arose from a confusion of name, a false attribution or a copyist mistake. It is therefore important for textual criticism to correct the mistake, which remains its primary duty.

First, we should mention the anonymous gospels, Acts and Apocalypses or works falsely attributed to biblical characters, discussed under *Apocrypha. Moreover: the Epistola apostolorum, which in the *Ethiopian version bore the title: *The *Testament of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; *Paul's letter to the to Laodiceans; the third letter to the Corinthians; the letters of *Barnabas and Titus and, if one accepts it, the writings of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite as well. The author of these documents is unknown. *Tertullian noted that the Acts of Paul were the work of some priest who composed them out of devotion for the apostle (De bapt. 4). The taste for the spectacular is obvious, as is the case for most *hagiography.

A legislative collection that goes from the 2nd to the 5th c. and whose author is neither named nor known is attributed to the apostles and even Jesus Christ. The primary witnesses are the Didache, the Didascalia Apostolorum*, the Apostolic Tradition* (Traditio Apostolica), the Apostolic Constitutions*, theEcclesiastical Canons of the Apostles* (the title is often modified: see A. Hamman, Vie liturgique, 114, n. 1) and The Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The difficulty for all these collections lies in discovering their successive strata, the value and provenance of elements, and their influences, with the scope of establishing the place, date and, at times, motives for composition. The Apostolic Constitutions, e.g., undeniably present a Jewish foundation in the "Clementine liturgy." On the other hand, their objective was often polemical: the Didascalia railed against the *Judaizers, and the Apostolic Constitutions defended the hierarchy against monasticism.

Apart from New Testament figures, some authors hid themselves under a pseudonym. The most notable cases were ps.-Dionysius and *Macarius. Regarding the author who hid himself under the pseudonym of Dionysius the Areopagite, if he tried to confirm his own teaching through an apostolic figure, he esp. sought to act as a peacemaker during a period of violent christological controversy. A moderate *monophysite, he avoided, in this light, statements of the Council of Chalcedon and the monophysites, as well as the Henoticon. A certain Macarius appears to have been the author of a hundred sermons or spiritual homilies: the pseudonym was unintentional and cannot be charged against the writer. It seems that the work was anonymous and attributed to a blessed one (Gk. makarios), just as the Liber graduum*. Similarly, the author of the Commonitorium is called the Peregrinus*. With the progress of time, the adjective was understood as a proper name. It is therefore easy to confuse this author with "Macarius" the Great, also called the "Egyptian." It is also possible that because the author professed *Messalian ideas condemned by *councils, the editors considered it prudent to have recourse to a subterfuge by placing the homilies under the patronage of the Egyptian *ascetic or *Simeon Stylites.

Moreover, there is no writer of certain prominence who was not pulled away under a trail of spurious works. Those of the most famous authors (*John Chrysostom, *Ephrem and *Augustine) make up a considerable mass (CPG, 4500-5079, against 4305-4495 authentic for John Chrysostom; for Augustine, see Verzeichnis, 158-190). The reasons are many. They were not caused by the author's literary production but by his personal success and the transmission of his text(s). The point of departure could have been the imitation of famous writers. At one point in time, the entire West "Augustinized" its writings. And that continued to occur throughout the Middle Ages. The famous letter or homily Cogitis me, which circulated under the name of *Jerome, was likewise a fraud, perpetrated by Paschasius Radber-tus, and uncovered by modern textual criticism.

A large number of mistakes were owed to the scribes, for whom all the Johns tended to become John Chrysostom (Latin texts in CPL 916-945). An entire collection of homilies attributed to John Chrysostom, however, seems to have come from *Africa. A Latin text that went under the name of Gregory was assigned to *Gregory of Nazianzus, although it was written by Gregory of Elvira. Augustine was subjected to this same mistake. Coming across the abbreviation CHR, a scribe read Chrysostom, although the siglum meant Chromatius. It also occurred that all the writings of a codex were assigned to the author of the first text or the one immediately preceding. Old catalogs have not always examined the contents of each MS with the needed thoroughness. Because of lack of control, the errors were transmitted based on the faith of others.

The ancients themselves already posed the problem of authenticity. To resolve it, *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen had recourse to the examination of language and style. We find some principles of hermeneutics in the correspondence between Sextus *Julius Africanus and Origen, in the writings of *Tertullian (Adv. Marc. IV), *Rufinus (De adult. libr. Origenis), Jerome (Adv. Rufinum), *Amphilochius of Iconium (Pseudepigrapha haereticorum: PG 39, 115-117), the anonymous author of the Adv. Fraud. Apollin. (PG 86, 1947-76) and Nicephorus (Contra Eus. et Epiphanium 2).

For the printed editions edited by the humanists, two fundamental questions were raised: is the work authentic? If the answer was in the negative, then, who is its author? At an earlier time, the attempt was made to separate genuine from spurious works. To respond to these two questions and esp. to find the true author, today we make use of improved instruments: repertoires, Claves, PLS, that allow one to trek through this immense forest. A more precise and complete inventory of MSS, a better understanding of problems of chronology, vocabulary, teachings of Christian writers and currents of thought permit one to better identify the authors of anonymous documents and pseudepigraphy.

Th. Birt, Kritik und Hermeneutik, Munich 1913; J. de Ghellinck, Patristique et Moyen Âge, Brussels 1947, II, 80-92, 200-214; W. Speyer, Fälschung: RAC 7, 236-277 (bibl.); Id., Religiöse Pseudoepigraphie und literarische Fälschung im Altertum: JbAC 8/9 (1965/1966) 88-125; Id., Die literarische Fälschung im heidnischen und christlichen Altertum, Munich 1971; N. Brox (ed.), Pseudoepigraphie in der heidnischen und jüdisch-christlichen Antike, Darmstadt 1977; J.A. Sint, Pseudonymität im Altertum, Innsbruck 1960; D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon, Tübingen 1986; TRE 27 (1997) 645-655; La Letteratura pseudoepigrafica nella cultura greca e romana, ed. G. Cerri, Naples 1998; R. Burnet, Épîtres et lettres Ier-IIe siècle, De Paul de Tarse à Polycarpe de Smyrne, Paris 2003.

A. Hamman

PSOTES of Psoi (d. 305). Egyptian bishop who became a *martyr under the emperor *Diocletian. His Passio (the type that seems genuine, but not "epic") has been passed down in *Coptic, Latin and Ethiopian, and because of some traits is related to the account of the martyrdom of *Peter of Alexandria. In Coptic, numerous other texts speak of him, and there has also survived a speech he gave before his execution. This speech, which for the most part contains exhortations to the faithful, should, however, be considered a later forgery. Nothing is known for certain about the life of Psotes and his activity, but it is certain that he was greatly venerated.

H. Delehaye, Les martyrs d'Égypte: AB 40 (1922) 5-154 and 299-364; esp. 316-319 and 343-352; T. Orlandi, Il dossier copto del martire Psote, Milan 1978; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 2041-2042.

T. Orlandi

PSYCHICI (ψυχικοί). The term ψυχικός appears in the writings of Aristotle (Hist. anim. II 3, 737a 8 and passim) in a philosophical context, explaining the concept of the *soul (ψυχή). It therefore passed over to the philosophical and religious lexicon alongside νοερός (intellectual) and πνευματικός (spiritual), and in constrast with σωματικός (corporeal), ὑλικός (material) and χοϊκός (terrestrial). The adjective also entered into common parlance with the meaning "psychic, pertaining to the soul."

In the biblical translation known as the LXX, the term rarely appears, although in the NT, it appears clearly differentiated and supplies the lexical basis for the patristic and *gnostic use of the term. In the NT, the adjective psychikos often acquired a negative meaning, closer to the spectrum of the "material" than that of the "spiritual." In particular, in 1 Cor 15:46-49, ψυχικός is assimilated to χοϊκός and is opposed to οὐράνιος, and in Jas 3:15, it is juxtaposed to ἐπίγειος (earthly), and against ἄνωθεν κατερχόμενος (coming down from above). In 1 Cor 2:13ff., ψυχικός is interchangeable with σαρκικός—although the latter contains a negative connotation per se, inasmuch as it refers to the one who knowingly orients oneself acc. to the σάρξ—and is used to refer to the simple ἄνθρωπος, the natural man, who is devoid of the divine gift of the Spirit, inasmuch as ψυχή refers to mere physical life. For this reason, in 1 Cor 2:13-14 and 15:44, 46, the adjective is found in antithesis to πνευματικός (spiritual), because the psychic elements, although not sinful per se, remain deprived of the life-giving Spirit, the πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν of the risen Christ (see R. Morisette, L'antithèse entre le psychique et le pneumatique en 1 Cor 15,44-46: RSR 46 [1972] 97-143). This is an idea also present in Jas 3:15, where ψυχικός also refers to what is earthly and closed off to the world of God, and esp. in Jude 19, which seems to make a direct equation between ψυχικός and πνεῦμα μὴ ἔχων (not possessing the Spirit). In this global perspective, one should read the theory of the double *creation of humanity—the spiritual human being, without body and without distinction of gender, Gen 1:27, and the psychic or carnal person in Gen 2:7—which, already present in the writings of *Philo of Alexandria, was then developed by *Origen (see the analysis in M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004, 111-122).

In *gnosticism, the pneumatic beings, who belong to the Spirit and whose true homeland is the divine πλήρωμα (*see pleroma), are in fact opposed to the hylic and psychic beings and are truly identified by the *Ophites and the *Sethians as the "Sons of light" or the "race that does not falter," by *Basilides as the "Third Sonship" and by *Valentinus the Gnostic as the "church of the spirituals." The Valentinians, in fact, by distinguishing between simple faith in God and knowledge of God, attributed the first to the psychici, i.e., to common Christians, but reserved the second, however, for themselves. The Valentinians considered themselves to be pneumatic or spiritual beings, as attested by *Irenaeus of Lyons (Haer. I, 6,2): "psychic men are educated in the psychic way, those who are confirmed by works rather than mere faith [πίστις ψιλή] and do not have perfect knowledge [γνῶσις]: they maintain that we will be those types of men, members of the church." As one can gather from *Heracleon, in fact (frags. 27 and 32), the Valentinians distinguished the rudimentary faith of the psychici from that conscious faith of the spirituals. Even Origen (esp. in Comm. in Ioh. 19) attributed mere faith to simple Christians and knowledge to those progressing and perfected, but he believed that these categories depended on the personal commitment of each individual to the study of the *Scriptures, and not on an inscrutable *predestination (see M. Simonetti Psyche e Psychikos nella gnosi valentiniana: RSLR 2 [1966] 1-47; Id., Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004, 166-168). In this case, acc. to the gnostics, the *temple of *Jerusalem symbolized various πλήρωματα: the sanctuary was the pleroma that was accessible only to the pontiff, who was in turn a symbol of the pneumatic man; the pronaos (the vestibule) was the pleroma accessible to the Levites, i.e., the psychici, etc., as Origen attests (see Comm. in Io. X, 19).

*Ptolemy the Gnostic, a student of Valentinus along with Heracleon and *Mark, who lived in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. AD, wrote, among other things, a commentary on the prologue of the gospel of *John, contents of which were cited by *Epiphanius and Irenaeus. Ptolemy's line, which seems to attenuate Valentinian *dualism and views the OT in a positive light, calling the Demiurge "just," more highly esteems the psychic element, which is recognized as present in Christ and which returns to the Hebdomad with the Demiurge after the crucifixion, although the pneumatic element returned to the higher *Ogdoad, so that salvation could also be extended to the psychici as well as to the few pneumatici.

The other student of Valentinus, Heracleon (whose commentary on the gospel of John has many extant fragments), divided human beings into the categories of hylic, psychic and pneumatic, and also made a distinction between the God of the OT and that of the NT. The threefold division of human beings was precisely the object of allegorical interpretation in his commentary, in which the exegesis of the gospel of John was preeminently allegorical and also attentive to the details, although concise, at least judging from the fragments that have survived, thanks to the citations and refutations included by Origen in his own Commentary on John. The words and works of Christ were interpreted by Heracleon as a symbol of the spiritual realities; the three classes of hylic, psychic and pneumatic; and the relations between pneumatici and their angelic counterparts. For example, *John the Baptist, inasmuch as he was a *prophet, was considered to be the symbol of the psychic man, tied to the economy of the OT; nonetheless, inasmuch as he was more than a prophet, acc. to the definition of Mt 11:9, he represented the pneumatic man, symbolized also by the Samaritan woman: although the material shell in which he was enclosed led him to evil, he gradually became aware of his true nature and the Savior purified him and brought him to gnosis.

In sum, in the complex school of the Valentinians, the ramifications of its teachings seem to match, all things considered, a certain evaluation of the psychic element, whose most direct representative—i.e., the Demiurge, the created divinity of the world—was guided in a rather positive way and appeared destined to attain a good outcome (Iren., Haer. I, 7,1), which was extended, with a certain soteriological optimism, even to the other members of the class of the psychici. A similar tendency seems to have been consolidated in certain gnostic systems of the 3rd c.: e.g., in the four books of the Pistis Sophia, the Savior, who is Jesus and who grants revelations to his disciples after his resurrection, makes all the souls who desire him participants of gnosis and the mysteries: "all men who will receive the mysteries of the Ineffable one will become a king with me and will sit on my right and left in my kingdom" (ch. 96). It seems that in this manner, i.e., through gnosis, the door to salvation was opened even to the psychici.

A. Dihle - E. Schweizer: GLNT 15, 1303-1312 (cf. TDNT 6, 389-452); B.A. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-Psychikos Terminology in I Corinthians, Cambridge, MA 1973; Missoula, MT 1976; G. Stroumsa, Another Seed. Studies in Gnostic Mythology, Leiden 1984; J.P. Couliano, Les gnoses dualistes d'Occident, Paris [2]1989, It. tr. Milan 1989; J. Van Der Loof, The Plebs of the Psychici, in Eulogia. Mélanges offerts à Antoon A.R. Bastiaensen à l'occasion de son soixante-cinquième anniversaire, ed. G.J.M. Bartelink - A. Hilhorst - C.H. Kneepkens, Steenbrugge 1991, 353-363; G. Filoramo, Antropologie in conflitto. Il caso di Ireneo e degli gnostici: Humanitas 1 (1996) 52-67; R.T. Wallis - J. Bregman (eds.), Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, Albany 1992; J. Magne, From Christianity to Gnosis and from Gnosis to Christianity, Atlanta 1993; Gnosticism and Later Platonism, ed. J.D. Turner - R. Majercik, Atlanta 2000; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism and the Platonic Tradition, Québec-Louvain-Paris 2001.

I. Ramelli

PTOLEMY and LUCIUS. These Roman martyrs are known to us thanks to the philosopher *Justin (2 Apol. 2). Ptolemy led a woman to the faith who, with her husband, had led a dissolute lifestyle; this woman obtained a divorce by order of the emperor *Antoninus Pius (138-161). As an act of retaliation, her ex-husband accused Ptolemy of being a Christian, and Ptolemy was found guilty by the prefect Urbicus and sentenced to death. Lucius, who was present at the trial, protested against the unjust sentence, and was likewise condemned and sentenced to death. The two martyrs did not have a cult at *Rome until the historian Baronius inserted them into the Mart. rom. He did so following the example of Florus of Lyons, who had placed them on 23 August: Ado and Uswared preferred 19 October. The latter is the date retained by Baronius.

BS 12, 526-527; P. Lampe, From Paulus to Valentinus. Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, Minneapolis 2003, 237-240.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PTOLEMY the Gnostic. Lived in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. AD; along with *Heracleon and *Mark (whose sources were collected and studied by N. Förster, Marcus Magus, Tübingen 1999, with bibl. 421-454) he was a disciple of *Valentinus and a member of the Italic or Western branch of his school. He was probably alive around 180; Ptolemy's biography, however, is unknown to us and A. Harnack's hypothesis remains unproven (TU 13), namely, that one can perhaps identify him with the Ptolemy concerning whom *Justin Martyr speaks 2 Apol. 9-20, who provided instruction in Christianity to a Roman matron and was imprisoned and put to death under Urbicus, prefect of the city of *Rome from 150 to 160. Recent studies on the intellectual characteristics of Ptolemy have been supplied by C. Markschies, New Research on Ptolemaeus Gnosticus: ZAC 4/2 (2000) 225-254. His Letter to Flora, written in an elegant prose, was preserved in its entirety by *Epiphanius of Salamis, Pan. I, 33,3-8 (PG 41, 558-568: Ptolémée, Lettre à Flora, ed. tr. G. Quispel, Paris 1949, SC 24 [[2]1966]; see G. Quispel, La Lettre de Ptolémée à Flora: VetChr 2 [1948] 17-54; F.T. Fallon, The Law in Philo and Ptolemy. A Note on the Letter to Flora: VetChr 30 [1976] 45-51; W.A. Löhr, La doctrine de Dieu dans la Lettre à Flora de Ptolémée: RHPhR 75/2 [1995] 177-191). For this reason he was able to escape the subsequent destruction of the heretical works by the Great Church. Before the discovery of the gnostic library of Nag Hammadi, it was probably the most important gnostic document that we possessed. In it Ptolemy explains to a noble Christian woman, Flora, the gnostic doctrine, reducing to the bare minimum the mythological explanation with the formation of the pleroma and dwelling a bit on the beginning on the law of the OT. With respect to these, only the Ten Commandments are of divine origin, since the meticulous precepts come neither from the Supreme God, because he is still imperfect, nor from the Devil, because he is just, but from the "intermediary" Demiurge, the creator of the universe. The rest comes partly from *Moses through his personal initiative, who kept in mind the weakness of the recipients of such a law, and partly from the elders of the Jewish people. The pure legislation of the *Decalogue, not mixed with evil, was not abolished by the Savior but rather perfected; the laws of the second type, however, which are mixed with evil, such as the law of vengeance for the admission of divorce, were abolished by him because "they are incompatible with his nature." The law of the third type, namely, the ritual law, with such precepts as circumcision, Sabbath, offerings and fasting, should be read in an "allegorical and symbolic" perspective of the "spiritual and transcendent world," inasmuch as the Savior has elevated the ritual law to the pneumatological level: circumcision is that of the heart, the offerings are spiritual, and fasting is the extension of evil. Ptolemy's statements about the apostolicity of his own teachings and on their scriptural foundation at the end of the excerpt provided by *Epiphanius is interesting: "If God will allow it, you will learn the origin and the generation [of the essences that proceed from the Supreme God], when you will be considered worthy of the apostolic tradition which even we have received through succession. We are also able to prove all our teachings on the basis of the teachings of the Savior." From this document, moreover, it also turns out to be clear that for Ptolemy, as in the case of Valentinus and in contradistinction to other gnostics, the Savior is to be identified with *Jesus Christ: in addition to the foundational study by A. Orbe, Cristología gnóstica, I-II, Madrid 1976, see also P. Perkins, Logos Christologies in the Nag Hammadi Codices: VetChr 35 (1981) 379-396; P. Perkins, Gnostic Christologies and the New Testament: Catholic Biblical Quarterly 43 (1981) 590-606; D. Voorgang, Die Passion Jesu und Christi in der Gnosis, Frankfurt a.M. 1991 and G. Sfameni Gasparro, Gesù il Cristo nello Gnosticismo, in Gesù Cristo nei Padri della Chiesa (I-III sec.): Dizionario di Spiritualità Biblico-Patristica 24, Rome 2000, 128-199 (in the Parafrasi di Sem, NHC VII, 1, Soldas: M. Roberge, La crucifixion du Sauveur dans la Paraphrase de Sem, in Actes du VI[e] Congrès Copte, II, Louvain-la-Neuve 1992, 381-387).

Ptolemy the Gnostic also wrote a commentary on the Prologue to the gospel of *John, which was mentioned around 180 by *Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 8,5-6, stating at the beginning his desire to lay out and refute "the opinions of those who are going about spreading their heresies; I am referring esp. to the disciples of Ptolemy, whose school can be considered an offshoot of that of Valentinus." (With respect to the modern research on the antignostic polemic in the writings of Irenaeus, see G. Filoramo, Antropologie in conflitto: il caso di Ireneo e degli gnostici: Humanitas 1 [1996] 52-67; J. Holzhausen, Irenäus und die valentinianische Gnosis: VetChr 55/4 [2001] 341-355; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Eretici e maghi in Ireneo: l'accusa di magia come strumento di polemica anti-gnostica, in Munera amicitiae. Scritti di storia e cultura sulla Tarda Antichità offerti a S. Pricoco, ed. R. Barcellona - T. Sardella, Soveria Mannelli 2003, 471ff.).

In the commentary, Ptolemy is more decisive in setting forth the salient points of the gnostic teaching and provides an allegorical exegesis of the prologue, maintaining that "John intentionally spoke there of the origin of the pleroma through which the Father emitted all things," locating in Jn 1:1-14 the mention of the first *Ogdoad, i.e., the first eight fundamental *aeons of the Valentinian pleroma (composed of 30 aeons formed by the outward deployment of the first principle, Bythos; then Sophia, the Mother, produces the hylic, psychic and pneumatic reality outside the pleroma), which, divided into couples, are so listed by Ptolemy: Begetter or Father // Grace (Charis); Only Begotten (Monogenes) // Truth (Aletheia); World (Kosmos) // Life (Zoe); Humanity (Anthropos) // Church (Ekklesia) see G. Iacopino, Il Vangelo di Giovanni nei testi gnostici copti, Rome 1995 (SEA 49).

Ptolemy was also the author of the system upon which Irenaeus based his "Great Notice" of the Valentinians (Adv. haer. I, 1,1–8,5: see F.M. Sagnard, La gnose valéntinienne et le témoignage de Saint Irénée, Paris 1947), which was of fundamental importance for the study and understanding of Valentinian gnosticism and esp. its "Italic" side of which the Great Notice seems to be a reflection (G. Sfameni Gasparro, Tempo della storia e tempo della salvezza nello Gnosticismo, in Theoretical Frameworks for the Study of Graeco-Roman Religions, Thessaloniki 2003, 171-207: 171). While interspersing some criticisms, Irenaeus turns to relating the teachings of the "followers of Ptolemy" in Adv. haer. I, 12: Bythos, the Abyss, has two spouses, the dispositions (diatheseis), Ennoia (or thought) and Thelēsis (or will), which generate Alētheia and Monogenēs as their respective images. Others, however, maintain that the first Ogdoad was not gradually produced, as one aeon from another, but once and for all by the Pre-Father and his Ennoia: when he wished to create, the Pre-Father took the name "Father." Because whatever he produced was true, it was said to be Alētheia; when he wished to reveal himself, he was called Anthrōpos; when he produced the creatures that he had thought of, he was called Ekklēsia. Inasmuch as he was the Anthrōpos, when speaking, he formed the Logos, the Only Begotten, who was followed by Zōē, and this completes the first Ogdoad. Other variants are also reported.

It seems that Ptolemy reworked the Valentinian system by attenuating its heavily dualistic bent and bestowing a greater value to the psychic element and, in part, the OT, perhaps to promote the acceptance of gnostic ideas by the Catholic Church—though one must keep in mind the difficulty of reconstructing the "original teaching" of Valentinus, due to the paucity of sources. One should also at least recall the attempts of the following scholars to achieve this difficult task: G. Quispel, The Original Gospel of Valentine: VetChr 1 (1947) 43-73; The Original Doctrine of Valentinus the Gnostic: VetChr 50

(1996) 327-352; Valentinus and the Gnostikoi, ibid. 1-4, and G.C. Stead, In Search of Valentinus, in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, ed. B. Layton, I, Leiden 1980, 75-95. C. Markschies (Valentinus gnosticus?, Tübingen 1992 [WUNT 65]; Nochmals: Valentinus und die Gnostikoi: VetChr 51 [1997], 179-187; Valentinian Gnosticism, in The Nag Hammadi Library after Fifty Years, ed. D. Turner - A. McGuire, Leiden 1997, 401-438) denies Valentinus's gnosticism, leading to a redefinition even of his followers. But one should examine the observations offered by M. Simonetti, Valentinus Gnosticus: Cassiodorus 1 (1995) 197-205, and the earlier contribution by U. Bianchi, À propos de quelques discussions récentes sur la terminologie, la définition et la méthode de l'étude du gnosticisme, in Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Gnosticism, Stockholm 1973, Leiden 1977, 16-26. In fact, M.A. Williams, Rethinking Gnosticism, Princeton, NJ 1996, precisely sought to destroy the very category of gnosticism, a category which he regarded as an invention of the ancient heresiologists (N. Brox, Gnostikoi als häresiologischer Terminus: ZNW 57 [1966] 105-114; M. Smith, The History of the Term "Gnosticism," in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, II, ed. B. Layton, Leiden 1981, 796-807; M. Tardieu, Histoire du mot "gnostique," in M. Tardieu - J.D. Dubois, Introduction à la littérature gnostique, I, Paris 1986, 21-37; M.J. Edwards, Gnostics and the Valentinians in the Church Fathers: JTS n.s. 40 [1989] 26-47) and an invention of modern scholars: contra Sfameni, Tempo, n. 3; Sfameni, Temi apocalittici nello Gnosticismo, in Millennium, ed. R. Uglione, Turin 2002, 101-141: 103-104. Logan also regarded the gnostic movement as unitary and believed that it arose during the 1st c. of Christianity. He also offers the hypothesis that the hypogeum of the Aurelii at *Rome, from the beginning of the 3rd c., represents a gnostic cultural center.

In the writings of Ptolemy, the Demiurge is not seen too negatively: he is neither perfect nor the author of evil, but must be called "righteous" (although, e.g., in the Gospel of the Egyptians, NHC III 2, IV 2, the Demiurge, called "Saklas," is not righteous, but rather arrogant, and proclaims himself to be the only God: see B. Barc, Samaèl - Saklas - Yaldabaôth, in Colloque International sur les textes de Nag Hammadi, ed. B. Barc, Québec-Louvain 1981, 125-150; M.A. Williams, The Demonizing of the Demiurge: The Innovation of Gnostic Myth, in Innovations in Religious Traditions, eds. M.A. Williams - C. Cox - M.S. Jaffee, Berlin-New York 1992, 73-107). Christ, moreover, had a pneuma and a psychic body, which allowed him to extend salvation even to "psychic" human beings, and not only to the few "pneumatic" humans, acc. to a generally well-known gnostic division of humanity already attested in the NT (e.g., B.A. Pearson, The Pneumatikos-psychikos Terminology in 1 Corinthians: A Study in the Theology of the Corinthian Opponents of Paul and Its Relation to Gnosticism, Missoula, MT 1976, SBL Dissertation series 12). After the crucifixion, Christ apparently abandoned his material body on the cross (see *docetism and U. Bianchi, Docetism, in Myths and symbols. Studies M. Éliade, Chicago-London 1969, 265-273 = U. Bianchi, Selected Essays, London 1978, 303-311), although the spiritual Christ, "pneumatic," turned into the Ogdoad and that "psychic" man sat at the right hand of the Demiurge in the Hebdomad, groups of eight and seven aeons acc. to the teaching of *Valentinus, which was adopted by Ptolemy with some interesting variations. In fact, *Tertullian, who declared that he had committed himself to fighting more the Valentinians like Ptolemy than Valentinus himself, in the Valentinianos 4,2, effectively summarizes Ptolemy's innovations with respect to the teacher in the doctrine of the aeons: "having turned to combat the truth, Valentinus made his own the seed of a certain ancient teaching and paved the road with his serpent. On that road, Ptolemy then entered, inasmuch as he distinguished the names and the numbers of the aeons making of them substantial persons, determining, however, to make them outside the divinity, although Valentinus had enclosed them in the complex of the divinity itself, as if they were the very feelings and affections and movements of this same divinity" (see Tertullian, Contre les valentiniens, ed. tr. comm. J.-C. Fredouille, Paris 1980-81, SC 280-281).

TRE 27, 699-702; A. Orbe, Los primeros herejes ante la persecución, Rome 1956 (Est. Valentinianos 5); Id., La unción del Verbo, Rome 1961 (Est. Valentinianos 3); Id., La teología del Espíritu Santo (Est. Valentinianos 4), Rome 1966; The Origins of Gnosticism, Leiden 1967 (Studies in the History of Religions. Numen Suppl. 12); B.A. van Groningen, First Century Gnosticism: Its Origin and Motifs, Leiden 1967; H. Jonas, Lo gnosticismo, pres. M. Simonetti, Turin 1973; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica, Bari 1973; Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Gnosticism, Stockholm, August 20-25 1973, Stockholm-Leiden 1977; G. Lüdemann, Zur Geschichte des ältestens Christentums in Rom: ZNTW 70 (1979) 86-114; B. Layton, The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, I, The School of Valentinus, Leiden 1980; J.D. Kaestli, Valentinisme italien et valentinisme oriental, in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, I, The School of Valentinus, Leiden 1980, 391-403; G. Filoramo, Luce e gnosi, Rome 1980 (SEA 15); S. Pétrement, Le Dieu séparé: les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984; L'exposé valentinien: les fragments sur le baptême et sur l'eucharistie: NH XI, 2, par J.É. Ménard, Québec 1985 (BCNH, Textes 14); M. Tardieu - J.D. Dubois, Introduction à la littérature gnostique, Paris 1986; G. Filoramo, L'Attesa della fine: storia della gnosi, Rome-Bari 1987, with bibl. 291-304; M.

Marcovich, Studies in Graeco-Roman religions and Gnosticism, Leiden 1988 (Studies in Greek and Roman Religion 4); I. Grünwald, From Apocalypticism to Gnosticism, Frankfurt a.M. 1988; J.P. Couliano, Les gnoses dualistes d'Occident, Paris ²1989, It. tr. I miti dei dualisti occidentali, Milan 1989; Gnostica, mandaica, liturgica. Festschrift E. Segelberg, ed. J. Bergman et al., Uppsala 1990; Gnostikerne og bibelen, intr. tr. M. Müller, København 1991; M. Scopello, Les Gnostiques, Paris 1991; Encyclopedia of the Early Church, II (1992) 724, s.v. Ptolemy the Gnostic; G. Zuntz, Aiôn in der Literatur der Kaiserzeit, Vienna 1992; R. McQueen Grant, Heresy and Criticism: The Search for Authenticity in Early Christian Literature, Louisville-Westminster 1993; G. Filoramo, Sulle origini dello Gnosticismo: RSLR (1993) 493-510; G. Filoramo, Il problema del tempo nello Gnosticismo, in G. Filoramo, Figure del sacro, Brescia 1993, 29-45; P. Perkins, Gnosticism and the New Testament, Minneapolis 1993; H. Strutwolf, Gnosis als System: zur Rezeption der valentinianischen Gnosis bei Origenes, Göttingen 1993; M. Tardieu, Cahiers contre rouleaux: GH 27 (1993) 135-141; A. Böhlig - C. Markschies, Gnosis und Manichäismus: Forschungen und Studien zu Texten von Valentin und Mani . . . , Berlin-New York 1994 (Beihefte zur ZNTW 72); J. Iwersen, Gnosis und Geschichte . . . von Alexander d.G. bis ins zweite nachchristliche Jahrhundert, Hamburg 1994; A. Orbe, En torno al mito teológico de la sombra, in Scritti classici e cristiani offerti a F. Corsaro, ed. C. Curti - C. Crimi, Catania 1994, II, 513-535; Apocalittica e gnosticismo, Atti del Colloquio int., Rome, 18-19 June 1993, ed. M.V. Cerutti, Rome 1995; W.A. Löhr, Basilides und seine Schule, Tübingen 1996, with bibl. 338-382; A.H.B. Logan, Gnostic Truth and Christian Heresy: A Study in the History of Gnosticism, Edinburgh 1996, with bibl. 321-340; G. Hanratty, Studies in Gnosticism and in the Philosophy of Religion, Dublin 1997; A. Magris, La logica del pensiero gnostico, Brescia 1997; A. Magris, L'escatologia valentiniana: AnSE 16 (1999) 133-139; F. Bermejo Rubio, La escisión imposible: lectura del gnosticismo valentiniano, Salamanca 1998; Th. Lechner, Ignatius adversus Valentinianos? Chronologische und theologiegeschichtliche Studien zu den Briefen des Ignatius von Antiochien, Leiden 1999 (VChr Suppl. 47); Dizionario di eresie [http://www.eresie.it/index.htm], s.v. Tolomeo; La gnose, une question philosophique. Actes du colloque 16-17 octobre 1997 Univ. Paris IV-Sorbonne, ed. N. Depraz - J.F. Marquet, Paris 2000; H.W. Attridge, Valentinian and Sethian Apocalyptic Tradition: JECS 8 (2000) 173-211; K. Rudolph, Die Gnosis: Wesen und Geschichte einer spätantike Religion, Göttingen ²1980, It. tr. La gnosi: natura e storia di una religione tardoantica, Brescia 2000; M. Waldstein, Hans Jonas' Construct "Gnosticism." Analysis and Critique: JECS 8 (2000) 341-372; Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, ed. M. Simonetti, Rome-Milan ³2001; G. Casadio, From Hellenistic Aiôn to Gnostic Aiônes, in Religion im Wandel der Kosmologien, ed. D. Zeller, Bern . . . 1999, 175-190; K.L. King - C. Markschies, Gnosis, Poole, Dorset 2003; A.H.B. Logan, The Gnostics: Identifying an Early Christian Cult, New York 2006; I. Ramelli, Tricotomia, in Enciclopedia Filosofica 12, Milan 2006, 11772-11776.

G. Filoramo - I. Ramelli

PUBLISHING. The term edere or διδόναι, which in a general etymological sense means "to cause to go out," acquires specific meanings acc. to its object. An author's intention to write for the public and the desire that his literary work be successful are subjective elements that recur in every age, but to understand what it meant in practical terms to publish a text in Antique and Late Antique periods, one must avoid imagining parallels with the editorial practice established in the modern period after the invention of the printing press. Manual writing and the impossibility of producing multiple identical copies simultaneously drastically conditioned the publishing process in Antiquity. For a letter, publication coincided with its being sent to the recipient, in that the author accepted, or hoped, that the work would enter the public domain and be reproduced (e.g., the apostolic and subapostolic *letters). The intent to publish was even more evident when the author kept copies of the letters to publish them in a collection (e.g., the epistolaries of *Cyprian, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Augustine). The sermons of prestigious orators were often transcribed by stenographers, and from that moment they were considered published; indeed often not even a preliminary revision was requested by the author, unless perhaps they were sermons in a series, which the author could then reuse and reelaborate to compose monothematic treatises (e.g., *Ambrose's works on *virginity and widowhood). For written works, the editorial process was more schematic. After dictation to a stenographer, a first draft of the text was made in longhand, which the author reviewed, and then a definitive copy was made, which the author kept in his possession; from this copy, a librarius made the copy for publication, or the copies to be sent to customers or recipients. In some cases it was the recipient who, having received the publication copy from the author, looked after its successive dissemination, as occurred with Augustine's De civitate Dei, which he had sent to *Firmus.

In the modern period, after the invention of the printing press, the editing, effective publication and dissemination of a book are phases so closely connected as to constitute a single, well-defined event, even chronologically. In the Ancient and Medieval eras the period of editing, which is the preparation of the author's copy destined for the public, did not always coincide with the actual publication: not only was Origen's famous *Hexapla edition of the OT never reproduced, but it remained unconsulted and almost unknown in the library at Caesarea for several decades until *Pamphilus's arrival. A work's dissemination then consisted in making copies from one copy to another: more or less slowly and without a deadline, during which the text underwent a gradual evolution or degradation, since no MS copy could ever be identical to its model, and as new copies were produced, the older copies easily disappeared. There could also be different recensions of a single work due to later modifications introduced by the author, as was the case with *Tertullian's Adversus Marcionem and his Apologeticum. Or there could be spurious reworkings, as with *Eucherius's Instructiones. It could also happen, as with the first 12 books of Augustine's De Trinitate, that a nondefinitive draft could be circulated without the author's consent.

F.W. Beare, Books and Publications in the Ancient World: Un. Toronto Quart. 14 (1945) 150-167; J. de Ghellinck, Patristique et moyen âge, II, Brussels 1947; H.-I. Marrou, La technique de l'édition à l'époque patristique: VChr 3 (1949) 208-224; RAC 2, 664-668; var. aus., Le biblioteche nel mondo antico e medievale, ed. G. Cavallo, Bari 1988; A.G. Hamman, L'épopée du livre. La transmission des textes anciens, du scribe à l'imprimerie, Paris 1985; H.Y. Gamble, Books and Readers in the Early Church. A History of Early Christian Texts, New Haven-London 1995.

F. Gori

PUBLIUS of Athens (2nd c.). Bishop of *Athens, who was martyred at the beginning of the reign of *Marcus Aurelius (161–180). *Eusebius of Caesarea mentioned him with regard to the letter of *Dionysius of Corinth (ca. 160–170) to the Athenians. In this letter, Dionysius criticized the Athenian faithful for being lukewarm in their faith "after their leader Publius was martyred during the persecutions of that time"; Eusebius added: "*Quadratus became their bishop after the martyrdom of Publius" (HE 4,23,2).

DCB 4, 519; BS 10, 1237.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PUDENS and PUDENTIANA. The church of S. Pudenziana appears in the Roman councils of 399 and 595 as the titulus (s.) Pudentis, and in the inscription of the apse mosaic as the ecclesia Pudentiana. The excavations that ended in 1962 demonstrated that it was a worship building dating back to the years 390–398, inserted within a preexisting thermal building, to which was then added an apse with the mosaic and the aforementioned inscription (before the year 417). The founder, concerning whom we do not possess any historic information, was transformed into a saint over the course of the 6th c. At around the same time, in the context of the legend on St. *Peter, he appeared as the host of the apostle, the father of Pudentiana and *Praxedis. Moreover, even the daughter Pudentiana emerged from an erroneous interpretation of the mosaic and the inscription contained therein. The identification of Pudens with the person named in 2 Tim 4:21 has the feeling of a novel. With respect to Pudentiana, who in the *itineraries, *martyrologies and the liturgy was also called "Potentiana," appears in texts beginning from the 7th c., contemporary with her sister. In the Middle Ages, Pudens and Pudentiana were celebrated 19 May; Praxedis, however, 21 July.

BHL 6988-6991; BS 10, 1062-1072; LCI 8, 224; J.P. Kirsch, Die römischen Titelkirchen im Altertum, Paderborn 1918, 61-67; R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae 3, Vatican City 1971, 280-305; W. Buchowiecki, Handbuch der Kirchen Roms 3, Vienna 1974, 650-677; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 68-69; Chr. Ihm, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom 4. Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1992, 130-132; S. Heid, Kreuz – Jerusalem – Kosmos, Münster 2001, 176-188.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PULCHERIA (AELIA PULCHERIA AUGUSTA) (399–453). Eastern empress, born on 19 January 399 at *Constantinople, daughter of the emperor *Arcadius and *Eudoxia; she died in July 453. She became Augusta on 4 July 414. Pulcheria was consecrated a *virgin, along with her young sisters Arcadia and Marina. She exerted a notable influence on their education and formation, but also on the political and ecclesiastical activity of her brother, the emperor *Theodosius II (408–450). This influence was reduced after 439 through the work of the eunuch Chrysaphius, whom Pulcheria put to death in 450. After the death of her brother, she ascended to the throne, contracting a mystical *marriage with the older *Marcian.

The Council of *Chalcedon had the task of settling the christological disputes; instead, it created new conflicts with the debated terminology of its definition (Gk. horos). The council was entirely prepared and organized by Pulcheria; moreover, its 28th canon established the position of the patriarch of the new Rome and incited opposition from Pope *Leo I. *Bishops and clerics from every part of the empire had recourse to Pulcheria on any given question: during his controversy with *Nestorius, *Cyril of Alexandria in fact sent her two letters dated to 430; moreover, we have a vast correspondence with Pope Leo and his archdeacon Hilary on *Eutyches and the *monophysite *heresy. In defense of the Council of Chalcedon she wrote two letters: one to the monks of *Palestine and another to an abbess of a convent in *Jerusalem. Pulcheria, who left her inheritance to the poor and promised humanitarian institutions and the construction of churches, was proclaimed a saint (10/11 September).

PWK 23, 1954-1963; BS 10, 1245-1256; M. Abineau, Ps.-Chrysostome, In S. Stephanum. Proclus de Constantinople, l'impératrice

Pulchérie et saint Etienne: Instrumenta patristica 19 (1989) 1-16; N.P. Constas, Weaving the Body of God. Proclus of Costantinople, the Theotokos and the Loom of the Flesh: JECS 3/2 (1995) 169-194; J.A. McGuckin, Nestorius and the Political Factions of the Fifth Century Byzantium. Factors in His Downfall: BJRL 78/3 (1996) 7-21.

J. Irmscher

l'Antiquité tardive: De pulchritudine mundi. Remarques sur le Liber XXI sententiarum (CPL 373): REAug 42 (1996) 21-43. Cf. Liber XXI sent. PL 40, 725-732; PLS II, 1364; CPL 373; J. Divjak, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung der Werke des heiligen Augustinus IV, Vienna 1974, 67; D. Weber, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung der Werke des heiligen Augustinus VI, 1, Vienna 1993, 158; J. Machielsen, CPPM, IIA, 150.

M. Mendoza

PULCHRITUDINE MUNDI, De. A brief philosophical poem of 83 verses, transmitted under the authorship of *Augustine in ch. XVI of the Liber viginti unius sententiarum, which was probably contemporary to his De diversis quaestionibus LXXXIII. With respect to meter, it is very irregular, a variant of the so-called Sotadic, used in didactic poems, even though rarely attested in Antiquity and the Middle Ages; the varying meters are explained by the fact that the poem possibly used an original Greek text as a model, without, however, being a translation. On account of internal literary criticism, the doctrinal content that is typically against the *Manichean thesis that nature was created by an insane principle (vv. 2-4), and the position coinciding with that of Augustine on the nature of the good (Mor. ecc. Cath. et mor. Man. II, 4,6; C. adv. leg. et proph. I, 1,1; S. Mai 126,5; Ep. 138,5), modern scholarship maintains that the De pulchritudine mundi was written by an anonymous author of the *Thagaste circle between 388 and 391 (Dolbeau, 41).

The philosophical controversy takes into consideration the positive opinion of the four elements of the world (vv. 5-18), which are considered good because they were created by God; therefore, it is the number four that brings the cosmic order into harmony and perfection (vv. 19-25). In this order, harmoniously created (vv. 26-29), even the four contrary elements participate in explaining the success of the order of the seasons (vv. 39-57), as in the relationship between these in the interpretation of the succession of daily time (vv. 59-73), which seizes human existence and creation, and where the events of human life meet in contrasts (vv. 74-79). But even in this respect, these correspond to the laws of the Creator (v. 80), calling upon it as a principle of all things. The author finishes with a sort of profession of faith and praise in v. 81 (Unum carmen modulantur concinuntque in unum), celebrating the harmony established in the world and inviting readers to think differently and to listen to this teaching and be instructed (vv. 82-83), because the harmonious mode speaks by itself and for its creator (cf. Aug., Nat. boni, 13-23; Ep. 138,1,5).

PL 40, 729-730; F. Dolbeau, Un poème philosophique de

PUNIC. *Augustine often made reference to the existence of the Punic language that was still spoken among the rustici, and he also mentioned Punic words. In many areas, interpreters were necessary to communicate between Latin speakers and others. Augustine ordained a lector named Anthony of Fussala because he spoke Punic (Ep. 209,2-3; 20,21 Divjak). What did Augustine mean when he said lingua punica, id est afra (Tract. in Ep. Ioh. 2,3)? N *Africa was inhabited by peoples who spoke Libyan, a Hamitic language; the dominance of the Phoenicians spread the Punic language (a Phoenician dialect) throughout the Phoenician colonies of the West, such as *Carthage and the markets of *Malta, *Sardinia and elsewhere. The Roman conquest did not destroy earlier elements, esp. in the most internal areas. Ulpian, in the 3rd c., affirmed that the legates could write in Punic (Dig. 32,11 pr.). The second son of Apuleius, Pudens, could only speak well in Punic (Apol. 98). Furthermore, acc. to some scholars, Augustine understood Punic (the new Punic of the 4th c. AD); others, however, maintained that it was Libyan, a language spoken in his time, which was an indigenous language, not an imported one (most recently G. Camps). The reasons for this position are the permanence of Libyan in the subsequent Berber dialect and the existence of numerous Libyan inscriptions in *Numidia, which are difficult to date, but nonetheless date back before the 4th c. It is actually impossible to reconcile Augustine's claims with the epigraphic evidence.

Nevertheless, Augustine bore witness that Punic was spoken in the countryside around *Hippo and of its importance for *evangelization and contacts with the *Donatists and the inhabitants of the villages. He asked Crispin, the Donatist bishop of Calama, that their discussions be translated into Punic for the inhabitants of the village of Mappalia (Ep. 66,2). *Macrobius, the Donatist bishop of *Hippo, needed a Punic interpreter in order to speak to the *Circumcellions (Ep. 108,14). Augustine himself mentioned various Punic words when he found Hebrew terms that had not been translated in the Latin text of Scripture: Messiah (C. litt. Petil. 2,104,239; In Ioh. Tract. 15,17), mammona (Serm. 113,2; 359A,1; De serm. Domini in monte 2,47). On various occasions, he noted that Punic belonged to the same linguistic family as Hebrew, a language similar to Punic. "In reality, these two languages were united by a certain relationship of meaning" (Serm. 113,2); "mammona is a Hebrew term meaning 'rich,' and also here, in Punic, mamon is profit" (359A,1). Augustine refused to send the deacon Lucillus to his brother Novatus, bishop of Sitifis (*Mauretania, today Sétif), because "the preaching of the gospel in our area continues to encounter difficulties because of the lack of people who speak the Punic language, but over there the same language is actually used on a daily basis" (Ep. 84,2). Therefore, in many areas of Numidia, Punic was widespread: in addition to people who were bilingual, there were others who only spoke Punic.

W.M. Green, Augustine's Use of Punic: Semitic Philology 9 (1951) 179-190; M. Simon, Punique ou Berbère? Note sur la situation linguistique dans l'Afrique Romaine, in Recherches d'histoire Judéo-Chrétienne, Paris 1962, 88-101; F.X. Millar, Local Culture in the Roman Empire. Libyan, Punic and Latin in Roman Africa: JRS 58 (1968) 126-134; C. Courtois, Saint Augustin et le problème de la survivance du punique: Cahiers de Tunisie 23 (1975) (no. 89-90) 273-294; Die Sprachen im römischen Reich der Kaiserzeit, ed. G. Neumann - J. Untermann, Cologne 1980, 267-299; S. Lancel, La fin et la survie de la latinité en Afrique du Nord. État des questions: REL 59 (1981) 269-297; A. Penna, Vocaboli punici in S. Girolamo e in S. Agostino, in Atti del I Convegno internazionale di studi fenici e punici, Rome 1983, III, 885-895; I. Opelt, Augustins Epistula 20 (Divjak). Ein Zeugnis für lebendiges Punisch im 5. Jh nach Christus*: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 121-132; M.G. Cox, Augustine, Jerome, Tyconius and the Lingua Punica: Studia Orientalia 64 (1988) 83-105; G. Camps, "Punica Lingua" et épigraphie libyque dans la Numidie d'Hippone: Bulletin Archéologique du Comité des Travaux Historiques et Scientifiques 23 (1990–1992) 33-49; F. Vattioni, Note di onomastica punica nell'epistolario agostiniano (ep. 17,2; 29,12): Augustinianum 32 (1992) 177-182; M.-F. Berrouard, Le punique: BA 71 (1993) 950-951; C. Lepelley, Quelques témoignages sur l'histoire de l'Afrique romaine épars dans les sermons de Saint Augustin découverts par F. Dolbeau, in Aspects de l'Afrique romaine, Bari 2001, 391-396; K. Jongeling - R. Kerr, Late Punic Epigraphy, Tübingen 2005.

A. Di Berardino

PURGATORY. Purgatory is the intermediary state for *souls that must be purified from *sin. Although the technical term appeared as a noun only in the 12th c. (cf., PL 171, 741), the doctrine of purgatory was gradually prepared by the doctrinal elaboration of scriptural texts (esp. 1 Cor 3:11-15 and 2 Macc 12:43-46); faith in divine mercy that grants the remission of nonmortal sins even after death and the strong solidarity between the deceased and the living, which can, with intercessory petitions, obtain the remission of punishment for the dead. The efficacy of *prayer for the dead is present in Acta Pauli 28-29 and in the Passio Perp. 7-8.

In the first two centuries of Christianity, it was believed that the martyrs went directly into *paradise; all others had to expiate their own shortcomings in a certain type of sheol (*Tertullian, De an. 58). Purgatory had more of a medicinal character than a punitive one. For *Clement of *Alexandria, a "spiritual" fire purified souls (Strom. V, 14,91,2; VII, 6,34,4); for *Origen, the stains of human imperfection were eliminated through the fire (Num. Hom. 15; Lc. Hom. 24,13; cf. Edsman, 1-14).

Especially in the West, the "technical" vocabulary was applied to refer to the idea of purification and expiation of less grave sins: *Cyprian used the verb purgare (Ep. 55,20), and in the 4th-5th c. the adjective purgatorius characterized the fire and the punishments to which sinners in the intermediary time were subjected. The existence of purifying punishments was affirmed by *Ambrose (In Ps. 36,26), *Gregory of Nyssa (Or. de mort.) and *Caesarius of *Arles (Serm. 167 and 179). *Augustine provided a solid theoretical foundation for the doctrine of purgatory by emphasizing the distinction between punishment and purification with fire (Gen. c. manich. II, 20.30; Civ. Dei 21,26), the duration of the punishment in relation to the gravity of sins (Ench. 69) and esp. the efficacy of intercessory prayers for the dead (Conf. 9,13; Nat. orig. Anim. 1,13; De cura mort. 3; Ench. 110). *Gregory the Great also made a great contribution: he was persuaded that "for some light sins, there would be a purgatorius ignis before judgment day" (Dial. 4,41,3) and supplied some examples in the form of anecdotes and visions (cf. Dial. 4,42.57) and insisted on the helps that the living provide for the dead esp. through alms, *prayer and the *Eucharist (Dial. 4,55). Moreover, the threat of purgatory would also gradually become an instrument for influencing the behavior of the living.

Western and Eastern epigraphy attests that the Christians prayed for their dead. Tertullian already mentioned the eucharistic celebration for the dead esp. on the anniversary of their death (see De Corona 3,2-3). A momento for the dead was incorporated into the Eastern liturgy, and the Latin *sacramentaries contained some Masses pro defunctis.

DTC 13 (1936) 1163-1326; DACL 4 (1920) 427-456; 14 (1948) 1978-1981; H. Rondet, Le Purgatoire, Paris 1948; C.M. Edsman, Le baptême de feu, Upsala 1940; P. Jay, Le purgatoire dans la prédication de Césaire d'Arles: RecSR 24 (1957) 5-14; A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim, Bonn 1957; J. Ntedika, L'évolution de la doctrine du purgatoire chez saint Augustin, Paris 1966; J. Le Goff, La naissance du purgatoire, Paris 1981 (It. tr. Turin 1982); TRE 11 (1983) 69-78; M.P. Ciccarese, La nascita del Purgatorio: ASE 17 (2000) 133-150.

M. Maritano

PURIFICATION. Purity is a common concept in all religions: it is the disposition required to draw near to sacred realities. According to the primitive conception, purity was obtained through rites; conversely, it is lost through contact with certain material things. In the Bible, the notion of purity became interior and moral.

The Mother of God was "very pure" or "purified" by the coming of the *Holy Spirit and divinized (cf. M. Gordillo, Mariologia orientalis, [OCA 141], Rome 1954, 111ff.). But in the language of the ascetics, the term purification was reserved for the first level of the spiritual life, the praxis (in opposition to theoria, contemplation) which is, acc. to the definition of *Evagrius (Praktikos 78: SC 171, 666), "the spiritual method that purifies the passionate part of the *soul."

Greek philosophy insisted on purification in view of theoria: only the pure individual can reach the Pure One, says Plato, with a widely accepted aphorism (Phaed. 66d, 67bc, 70a). The theme is taken up by the Fathers but in a larger context. They presented perfection as an apokatastasis, i.e., a restitution of the primitive state. In this context, perfection and katharsis coincide (cf. Greg. Naz., Or. 2,20).

To determine the various elements of purification, one must determine what is considered evil and an obstacle to perfection. For Christians, the first and essential purification is that from sin in repentance. The second purification pertains to the consequences and occasions of sin, primarily, the passions. The result of this ascetic purification is, therefore, apatheia*. Purification requires, for the writers of the Alexandrian school and the Cappadocians, who were influenced by the former, that they be freed from pathos. The doctrine of the pathos—i.e., passion—in the writings of *Clement of Alexandria derives from *Stoicism (cf. Strom. II, 59,6 and SVF I, 205; III, 479.130), as in the individuation and characterization of the four primary passions (fear, joy, desire and anger). But the entire doctrine of pathos was already widely developed by *Philo of Alexandria. Stoicism had set forth a rigorous and total removal of passion (the apatheia), although the peripatetic school had maintained that passion could exist, but on the condition that it was controlled and directed toward the good (the so-called metriopatheia). This last doctrine found its place also in *Middle Platonism: it was maintained primarily by Plutarch and was found after *Clement in the writings of *Porphyry of Tyre, who put it in relation to the first class of virtues, that of the so-called "political virtues" (Sententiae 22,2-3), and in *Plotinus (I, 2,2 and 2,7).

Clement reused the doctrine of "moderation of the affections" but did not consider it the highest level of ethics, which is represented by "correct action" (κατόρθωμα, a Stoic word and concept). This means that to reach perfection, simple moderation of the affections is not enough, but the absolute lack of passion is necessary. But this distinction between the two levels of ethics, established by moderation and lack of passions, was reached by Clement through the mediation of Philo of Alexandria. As a result, Clement had recourse to Stoicism's commonplaces to describe the virtue of the perfect Christian. For the Christian, *gnosis is sufficient for happiness, and he does not allow himself to be attracted by external goods. By eliminating all the passions, the Christian can put "assimilation to God" as the ideal, the ideal that was articulated by a Platonist passage (Theaetetus 176b), which later became famous, and the characteristic of being "assimilated to God" was considered a typical characteristic of the philosopher. Clement borrowed from contemporary Middle Platonism, as well as its preceding teachings. Just as living acc. to the moderation of the affections means a lower level of Christian perfection that must be replaced by their complete domination, so too living acc. to nature must be exchanged for a higher ethical level—that of assimilation to God.

*Gregory of Nazianzus also set forth the ideal of the beatific vision of God, but it is only obtained through the purification of the body and mind (Oration 2,7). This conception, and the language with which it is expressed, clearly derived from Plato's Phaedo (cf. 65c; 66a; 66c; 67a). Gregory of Nazianzus maintained that one must shut off one's sense of individual self in the face of sensations and, therefore, the external world; one must receive an interiorizing force, to be able to contemplate the true reality which is God. This contemplation is exclusively reserved to the one who is prepared through a proper purification (Oration 39,8). The "end of our religion" was, yes, prophesied by books and souls who spoke with God (Oration 7,17), but it is also "the talk of wise men," namely, Plato (7,21). In conclusion, Gregory considered the knowledge of God to be conditioned by purification, and purification in turn can be none other than Christian virtue. There is also evidence here of the Christian transformation of the Platonist teaching: "and prudence itself, perhaps, is none other than purification" (Phaedo 69c), if we replace the virtues that properly belong to the Christian with the "prudence" of which Plato spoke.

The most radical purifications were described by classical authors on contemplation: the soul must renounce everything that can, in any way, cast a shadow over the vision of God. *Isaac of Nineveh established three levels of this purification: (1) the bodily stage (dûborô pagronô): combating the passions of the body; (2) the psychic stage (napšonô): the fight against ephemeral thoughts; (3) the spiritual stage (ruhonûtô): to allow oneself to be totally governed by the Spirit (see DSp 7, 2043ff.). Moreover, Isaac returned to Evagrius's idea, which held that perfect purification demands the "nudity" of the intellect, divested not only of passions, fanciful images, but also of the multiplicity of rational concepts—because they are incomplete—in order to arrive at the intuitive vision of the "pure *light" (I. Hausherr, Ignorance infinie: OCP 2 [1936] 351-362; repr. in Hésychasme et prière, OCA 176, Rome 1966, 38-49). Many of Evagrius's ideas were then adopted by *Maximus the Confessor.

TWNT 3, 416-434 (TDNT 3, 413-431); DSp 8, 1664-1883; W. Völker, Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden 1965; R. Arnou, Le désir de Dieu dans la philosophie de Plotin, Paris 1967, 153ff.; M. Simon, Souillure morale et souillure rituelle dans le christianisme primitif: SMSR 38 (1967) 498-511; T. Špidlík, Grégoire de Nazianze. Introduction à l'étude de sa spiritualité (OCA 189), Rome 1971, 26ff.; Id., La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique (OCA 206), Rome 1978, 180ff.; C. Desalvo, L'"Oltre" nel presente. La filosofia dell'uomo in Gregorio di Nissa, Milan 1996; G. Urso, Purificazione e perdono. Una polemica fra pagani e cristiani, in Responsabilità perdono e vendetta nel mondo antico, ed. M. Sordi, Milan 1998, 249-266; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004.

C. Moreschini

PURPLE. For all ancient peoples of the Mediterranean world, purple, extracted through a very expensive process from various types of shellfish (Murex brandaris, M. trunculus and others) off the Mediterranean coasts, was a color of deep symbolic value, the use of which in religious, political-institutional and social contexts could be attributed to a radically anthropological justification (purple-blood-life). In the ancient church, the suggestion of the symbolism of purple was immense, determined by its presence in the OT and in a few but significant passages of the NT (the rich man who dressed in purple and fine linen [Lk 16:19]; a garment of purple was placed on *Jesus during his passion [Mk 15:17; Mt 27:28]; the prostitute and Babylon identified as the one dressed in purple [Rev 17:4; 18:16]). On the other hand, receiving the cultural Hellenistic inheritance, Christianity reserved purple for the most elevated levels of the church's hierarchy and developed its symbolism in various contexts of theology (liturgical-sacramental, christological and spiritual). But at last the color became an omnipresent expression of imperial power in the theocratic Byzantine regime.

In contradistinction to the pre-Nicene period, which was characterized by the simplicity of the colors used for the clergy's attire (white was the common garment for all, without respect to the high levels of the hierarchy), after the Constantinian turn, there began a gradual ceremonial and liturgical use of colors and purple in the church, to the point of reaching a certain regulation of the color of the garments during the Roman-barbarian period. The Liber pontificalis*, in addition to indicating a chlamys rubea for the exclusive use of the pope, mentioned other purple garments. Moreover, by permission of *Justin I, the pope had the right to wear a purple garment as a title of honor, a use that then passed to those who held certain important clerical roles within the city of *Rome and lastly to the cardinals (1245, Council of Lyons). Nevertheless, only with Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) did purple and other colors achieve a precise codification for liturgical uses, a codification finally accepted by the definitive systematization of Pope Pius V.

The gradual introduction of purple into the papal ceremony and the ritual attire is also reflected in the theological symbolism. Thus we find a "criticism of purple" by the 2nd-c.*apologists (Clem. Alex., Ped. 2,114,3-115,1; Tertullian, De cultu fem. 1,8,2): purple was a color for seduction and was thereby unsuitable for Christian women. Another criticism is found in the Apologeticum 15,7, in reference to *pagan priests, clothed with purple; or rather the contempt for purple in the writings of *Minucius Felix, Oct. 8,4; 37,10). A positive evaluation of its symbolism already emerges in the 4th c. in the reflections of the Fathers on the sacraments of initiation. The esteemed color represents well, in fact, the high dignity of the human condition, having passed through the laver of *baptism (see the homilies on baptism by *Gregory of Nyssa, PG 46, 420 and *Chromatius of Aquileia, Hom. 19,2).

Thanks to the typological reading of Scripture, already from the first centuries and in contrast to the criticisms of its equivocal use, purple also entered into the church's christological and soteriological symbolism. Through a complex of successive rereadings, the "blood of the covenant " (Ex 24:6-8), with which *Moses, after the reading of the law, sprinkled the people through the "scarlet wool and hyssop" (Heb 9:19-10), became a figure and prophecy of the redeeming blood of Jesus Christ. The "scarlet wool," which acc. to the *Epistle of Barnabas (VII, 6-11), crowned the head of the expiatory goat in the OT, thus acquired the figurative meaning of "Jesus who had to leave." This ingenious interpretation of the piece of scarlet wool (that is a light shade of purple), from *Justin Martyr onward, became a sort of commonplace in the texts of the *Fathers (see Dialogue 111; Tertullian, Marc. 4,9; in Irenaeus, AH 2,4, for Rahab's "scarlet wool" in Josh 2:1ff.) and established the preceding exegetical substratum for the symbolic use of purple in the christological debates of the 5th c. *John of Damascus would conclude that the incarnation was the assumption of purple, i.e., the human body suitable for the most precious attire, by the Lord of glory (Hom. 6,4: PG 96, 668 A).

In *monasticism and *ascetic literature, which did not remain immune from the symbolism of the royal color, purple now touched the garment of the tribulations that the monk put on in this world, a garment thanks to which he would overcome, with *faith and *hope, the attacks of the devil (*Evag. Pont., Treatise for Eulogius 2). Now, in the hierarchy of the heavenly court of the blessed, represented by the image of an earthly king, it clothes those "eunuchs" who overcome the seduction of sin on earth and therefore occupy a privileged place, higher in dignity to the very milites Christi (ps.-Macarius, Hom. 4,1,1-3). The calling to the dignity of purple is therefore universal, because the final end of Jesus Christ's coming is that of rectifying the intelligence of human beings that has been corrupted by the devil, to reclothe them with the purple of the *Holy Spirit (ps.-Macarius, Hom. 22,2,3).

In the society of ancient *Rome, because of the cost, purple distinguished the most elevated senatorial and equestrian classes (the laticlavium, a large flounce of purple for the first group, and the angusticlavium for the second). But in Byzantine society, where the culture of purple acquired a new boost by the color's association with Christ, the most esteemed use of purple was an obsessive prerogative of the basileus. Everything around the emperor was red. The room in which his child was born was purple (porfirogenito), just as the entire palace was made of porphyry (porphyra) that hosted the empress who had recently given birth; the emperor's ceremonial and triumphal garments were made of purple, likewise the walled-tents, the omphalium, a round room in the stadium that lifted him above everyone else, physically and symbolically, and even the imperial ribbons with which the officials set apart confiscated assets, the books from which the royalty learned to read and the documents issued from their court. At *Constantinople, purple was the indication of God's choice in favor of the man who had the difficult task of representing him for the governance of the earth. There was no lack of criticisms to such a flamboyant display that forced the emperors into a voluntary prison, to live "the life of a marine shellfish" (so said *Synesius of Cyrene in his speech addressed to the emperor *Arcadius). The sacred ideology, however, was widespread. This ideology was also favored by a legislation (already starting from the CTh, with laws received by the Justinian Code) that severely regulated the production and commerce of this precious color, restricting certain gradations of it to the use of the emperor alone.

M. Cagiano di Azevedo, s.v. Farbe, in RAC 7, 417-447; O. Longo (ed.), La porpora. Realtà e immaginario di un colore simbolico. Atti del Convegno di studio, Venezia, 24 e 25 ottobre 1996, Venice 1998; H. Blum, Purpur als Statussymbol in der griechischen Welt, Bonn 1998; B. Virgilio, Lancia, diadema e porpora. Il re e la regalità ellenistica, Pisa-Rome 1999.

V. Lombino

PYRRHUS. Patriarch of *Constantinople (638–641; d. 654). Presbyter of the Hagia Sophia and the *hegumen of the *monastery of the Theotokos of Chrysopolis on the Bosporus, he was elected patriarch on 20 December 638. At the end of that year or the beginning of the following, he promulgated a dogmatic conciliar decree approving the Ekthesis*, excommunicating whoever refused to sign, a signature which he requested twice (639 and 641), even from Pope *John IV. The arrival of the emperor *Constans II ruined his standing and forced him to withdraw from the patriarchate (night of 28-29 October 641). After he had withdrawn to the monastic life in *Africa, he became convinced of his own errors in a public debate held at *Carthage with St. *Maximus the Confessor (July 645). At *Rome, he rejected the *monothelite heresy, but then, shortly thereafter, he renounced the *orthodox position, provoking the *anathema of a council and a deposition pronounced by Pope *Theodore. After the death of Patriarch *Paul II, 8 or 9 January 654, he reoccupied the Byzantine See for a period of six months, during which time he approved the Typos. He died on *Pentecost (10? July) of 654. The Third Council of *Constantinople (680) condemned him as a heretic.

CPG 7615-7618; Grumel, Regestes[2] 294-298; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del secolo VII, Rome 1971, passim (index p. 583); L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1982, 205-215; J.L. van Dieten, Geschichte der patriarchen von Sergios I. bis Johannes VI. (610–715), Amsterdam 1972, 57-78, 104-105; Patrologia V, 108-109; BBKL 7, 1076-1078.

D. Stiernon

Q

QALAT SEMAN. The famous remains of this religious structure (Qalat Seman, Qal'at Semān; Qalat Semân) are found on the peak of a hill nearly 60 km (= 37.2 mi.) northwest of *Aleppo and northeast of *Antioch: near the border with Turkey, where *Simeon Stylites (d. 459), called "the Elder," to distinguish him from the one who lived near Antioch, was born around 390. After he had spent a few years in the monastery in *Syria, first at Telada, then at Telanissos (Deir Seman, or rather Deir Samaan, under the hill where a sanctuary was constructed), at first he adopted the life of a recluse, then he started a new way of ascetic life and set himself upon a column that increasingly grew, on top of the mountain. According to legend, the last column was nearly 16 m (= 52.5 ft) high, or even more, and 2 m in diameter (= 6.6 ft), set upon a square platform of 4 m (= 13.1 ft). He did it perhaps to remove himself from the faithful who wanted to touch him. He lived on a column from which he also preached to the faithful for 30 years until his death. His column became a center for *pilgrimages; among its pilgrims were the historian *Evagrius Scholasticus (HE 1,4) and the emperor Maurice. Several people were at Simeon's service.

After the death of Simeon, which occurred between 476 and 490, an octagonal church was built around the column, with a chapel, which in earlier times was not closed; the foundation still remains. Four arcs of the octagon opened to four basilicas with three aisles, separated by columns, arranged in the form of a cross. The other four corners of the octagon tapered off in the exedra. The church had an area of 3840 m^2 (= 41333 ft^2). The E basilica, which ends with three apses, was slightly larger and covered with marble, and the floor was made of mosaics; it was the most important of the three because the primary liturgical activities took place there. The other three were designed for pilgrims waiting for some miracle. The S basilica was preceded by a narthex and a triple portal, which was the primary entrance. Women were not allowed to approach the column. The entire structure formed an immense sanctuary and a place for pilgrimages, with a monastery and lodgings for the pilgrims; it also included a baptistery and a martyrium, but the martyr's body was first taken to Antioch, perhaps before 467 (Malalas 369,10-16), and then to *Constantinople. The baptistery, which was built upon another small church, had an octagonal tank to the E with small steps to descend into the water. To the N of the sanctuary there was a funeral chapel hewn into the rock. A processional road began from the foot of the mountain, from the village of Deir Seman (the same name of the monastery on the mountain). Here lay the remains of a monumental rock at the beginning of the processional road toward the mountain that was lined with lodgings for pilgrims. Upon arriving at the baptistery, these people still needed to go another 200 m (= 656 ft) on the holy road to arrive at the church.

For the protection of the structure, girded walls were built, hence the name Qalat Seman (= Simeon's Fortress), which was coined by the *Melkite patriarch of Antioch. This Christian center underwent an earthquake in the 6th c. and a subsequent fire, then the Arab occupation. A bilingual inscription on the mosaic, before the ambo in the central nave of the E church, bears witness to the remodeling that occurred in the year 979. A few years later, in 985, it was occupied and sacked by the Arabs from the Emirate of Aleppo, Sa'ad ed-Dula; the final strike occurred in 1017. Impressive ruins remain alongside the foundation of the column, as shown at the center of the octagonal basilica of St. Simeon—remains that attest to the harmony in the constructions of a masterpiece of Syrian Christian art. Several sculptures were taken to the Museum of *Damascus.

I. Peña - P. Castellana - R. Fernández, Les stylites syriens, Jerusalem 1975; F.W. Deichmann, Qalb Loze und Qal'at Sem'an. Die besondere Entwicklung der nordsyrisch-spätantiken Architektur, Munich 1982; J.L. Biscop - J.-P. Sodini, Qal'at Sem'an et les chevets à colonnes de Syrie du nord: Syria 61 (1984) 267-330; J.-L.

Biscop - J.-P. Sodini, Églises syriennes apparentées à Qal'at Sem'an. Les exemples de Turin et de Fasuq dans le Gebel Wastani: Syria 64 (1987) 107-129; J.-L. Biscop - J.-P. Sodini, Travaux à Qal'at Sem'an, in Actes du XI^e Congrès Int. d'archéologie chrétienne, II, Rome 1989, 1675-1695; P. Donceel-Voûte, Les pavements des églises byzantines de Syrie et du Liban, Louvain-La-Neuve 1988, 225-240; RBK 3, 854-891; ODB 3, 1763; John Malalas, Chronographia, ed. L. Dindorf, CSHB, Bonn 1831.

A. Di Berardino

QIIORE (d. 436/437). Director of the school of *Edessa during the first decades of the 5th c., he was the first to promote the *Syriac translation of *Theodore of Mopsuestia's writings. In so doing, he opposed the vociferously anti-*Nestorian agenda of *Rabbula, bishop of Edessa. *Ibas, a colleague of Qiiore, continued and extended his work, even the editorial aspect, primarily from the year 435 onward, when he was asked to succeed Rabbula on the episcopal chair.

P. Bettiolo, Lineamenti di Patrologia Siriaca, Rome 1989, 518, 543.

C. Dell'Osso

QUADRATUS, apologist. *Eusebius (HE IV, 3,1) identified him as the author of an apology in defense of the Christian religion, addressed and offered to the emperor *Hadrian. It was, therefore, the most ancient apology for which we possess information. Eusebius also bore witness, moreover, that this work was still widely available during his time and that he owned a copy (ibid.). By reading this document, he was convinced of the author's intelligence and the clear apostolic character of his teaching. Lastly, in demonstration of its antiquity, he cited a passage of the apology in which Quadratus made the connection between the truth of the miracles worked by the Savior with their lasting verifiability. In this regard, he maintained that several people who had been healed by Jesus had survived to his own time (HE IV, 3,2). With regard to this fragment, scholars have discussed whether it was in fact inserted into the tradition of the information that attributes to *Papias of Hierapolis the attestation of the existence of people whom Jesus had raised from the dead, even during Hadrian's period (see frag. 16 of Papias, ed. J. Kürzinger, pp. 116-117). Eusebius also mentioned Quadratus in his work Chron., ad ann. 125–126, ed. R. Helm, p. 199, calling him a "disciple of the apostles," and in this context, he seems to identify *Athens as the place in which he presented this document, during the trip that *Hadrian took to Greece in the years 124–125 in order to be initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries. It is possible, furthermore, that the apologist should be identified with the similarly named prophet of the apostolic age, who was perhaps active in *Asia Minor, an individual whom Eusebius mentioned (HE III, 37,1), in all likelihood on the basis of the testimony of the anonymous anti-*Montanist (Eus., HE 5, 17,2-4). It appears, however, that the identification of Quadratus with the similarly named bishop of Athens, who lived during the time of *Marcus Aurelius (Eus., HE 4, 23,3), an idea already proposed by *Jerome (Vir. ill. 19; Ep. 70,4 ad Magnum), is unwarranted. With the exception of the fragment preserved by Eusebius, Quadratus's apology has been entirely lost. The attempts undertaken by J.R. Harris and P. Andriessen to reconstruct the work, in its entirety or in part, as contained in other patristic texts, has not garnered consensus among scholars.

CPG 1060; the bibliography contained therein should be combined with the extensive literary documentation collected by H.R. Drobner, s.v. Quadratus: BBKL 7, 1081-1084. On frag. 16 of Papias, see J. Chapman, John the Presbyter and the Fourth Gospel, Oxford 1911, 95-99 (esp. 97-99); M. Hengel, Die johanneische Frage. Ein Lösungsversuch (WUNT, 67), Tübingen 1993, 77 n.234; Papia di Hierapolis, Esposizione degli oracoli del Signore, ed. E. Norelli, Milan 2005, note 6 on frag. 10.

V. Zangara

QUADRATUS of Athens (pseudo). An apocryphal letter of *James bishop of *Jerusalem to Quadratus (probably the bishop of *Athens), written in *Syriac, that circulated in Syriac *Jewish-Christian circles. There exist versions in Syriac and *Armenian (the latter being the better of the two). The letter discusses the passion of *Jesus Christ and the situation in Jerusalem after his death.

CANT 308. Armenian version: Die Lehre der Apostel, das apokryphe Buch der Kanones, der Brief des Jakobus an Quadratus und die Kanones des Thaddäus. Untersuchungen und Texte, J. Daschean, Vienna 1896. German trans.: R. Van den Broek, Der Brief des Jakobus an Quadratus und das Problem der judenchristlichen Bischöfe von Jerusalem (Eusebius, HE IV,5,1-3), in Text and Testimony. Essays on New Testament and Apocryphal Literature in Honour of A.F.J. Klijn, ed. T. Baarda et al., Kampen 1988, 56-65. Syriac version: Ignatius Ephraem II Rahmani, Studia Syriaca [1], Scharfe (Libano) 1904, text, Latin trans. 1-2. Italian trans.: Erbetta 3; 134-135. Polish trans.: Starowieyski 1, 747-749.

M. Starowieyski

QUAESTIONES ET RESPONSIONES on Holy Scripture. Among the exegetical genres of the *Bible, that is, the scholia, *homilies and *commentaries, the Quaestiones et responsiones (in Greek erōtapokriseis) are connected to the scholia. These, like the scholia, do not offer a systematic and complete interpretation of an entire sacred book (which is characteristic of commentaries), but consist in explanatory notes, which are brief for the most part, on specific passages or verses or even biblical terms. However, in contradistinction to scholia, they use the generally artificial and fictitious method of questions and answers that had been introduced (especially the questions) by typical formulas that were repeated with tired monotony. Before being applied to *Scripture, the genre was widespread in pagan literature. Aristotle wrote a work entitled Ζητήματα καὶ λύσεις and even earlier the sophists and orators had made use of it in the schools to prod students to solve numerous questions that various texts posed, especially the poems of Homer.

*Philo of Alexandria seems to have been the first to compose quaestiones on the Bible, whose work, Problems and Solutions on the Book of Genesis and Exodus (Eus., HE 2,18,1), commented on certain chapters of the two texts. It is not known, however, who among the Christian authors first had the idea to use this exegetical genre. It does not seem to have appeared specifically in the writings of *Origen, even if at times, both in the homilies and the commentaries, he introduced an imaginary interlocutor to propose a difficulty that then received a solution. *Eusebius left one specific work in this genre, Questions and Solutions on the Gospels; some fragments in *Greek and *Syriac of this work have survived and, fortunately, a compendium, later edited, that allows us to have a sufficiently precise idea of the original work and its contents. The work is divided into two parts: the first in two books treated problems relating to Jesus's childhood; the other, in just one book, the accounts of the resurrection. From the Various Questions of *Acacius, who was a disciple and successor of Eusebius in the episcopal see of *Caesarea, a long fragment relating to 1 Cor 15:51 has been preserved thanks to *Jerome (Ep. 119,6); from this fragment we conclude that Acacius's work treated biblical questions.

Under *Augustine's name, some manuscripts have passed down the Questions on the Old and New Testament; we possess three recensions: the first, 151 questions; the second, 127; and the third, 115. On the basis of linguistic, stylistic and conceptual arguments, the work has been reattributed to the author of the commentary on the epistles of St. *Paul, who is also known by the name of *Ambrosiaster. The Questions presented various characteristics: some are from true and proper treatises intended to develop all the aspects of a problem; others are focused on quickly clearing up a specific difficulty. Others, however, aim at the church's enemies and Christian believers who assert dangerous opinions. Lastly, other questions have a homiletical character dedicated to the interpretation of a psalm or biblical figure. The author reveals a good knowledge of both classical and Christian authors: among these, according to Alexander Souder, the foremost scholar on the Questions, are the following: Cicero, Sallustius, Titus Livius, *Tertullian, *Cyprian, *Victorinus of Petovium (Petau), *Hilary of Poitiers and others.

Various letters of Jerome made use of the literary genre of the quaestiones. These letters were dedicated to solving scriptural difficulties that were posed to this learned father of the church. Some examples of these are Ep. 35, in which five questions on Genesis are analyzed for Pope *Damasus; Ep. 36, sent to the same pontiff, and Ep. 120 and 121. But Jerome, at the beginning of his exegetical activity, also composed a specific document titled Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim: in this work, he places the Septuagint version alongside the Hebrew throughout 220 questions, which constitute a true and proper commentary on the entire book under the form of scholia.

Various works of Augustine are connected to this exegetical genre: Quaestionum in Heptateuchum libri 7; De octo quaestionibus ex Veteri Testamento; Quaestionum evangeliorum libri 2; Quaestiones 17 in Ev. secundum Matthaeum (a few doubts on the authenticity of this last work have been raised); Expositio 84 propositionum ex epist. ad Romanos; De diversis quaestionibus 83 liber unus; De diversis quaestionibus ad Simplicium libri duo; De octo Dulcitii quaestionibus liber unus. The placement of these documents in the genre of quaestiones has been disputed by several scholars for specious reasons, namely because in these texts one does not find solutions for imaginary difficulties but actual problems that were presented to Augustine and his correspondents. With respect to the character and content, some of these documents are rather brief, others are extensive; some are a type of systematic repertoire of the difficulties that the study of the sacred book presents, others are restricted to solving a certain number of problems.

The first book of *Eucherius of Lyons's Instructiones is devoted to the interpretation of selected passages from the Bible, from *Genesis to *Revelation, under the form of a dialogue (Eucherius's work contains two books). The Instructiones are dedicated to his son *Salonius, bishop of Geneva, to whom were attributed—but the attribution is not satisfactory—four short treatises, in which, through a fictitious chain of questions and answers, answers are given to questions pertaining to selected passages from the book of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the gospels of Matthew and *John. Both the Instructiones and Salonius's short treatises offer very little personal information, but they use previous works, at times even to the point of plagiarism. The following works are also characterized by a lack of originality: *Isidore of Seville's Expositiones mysticorum sacramentorum seu Quaestiones in Vetus Testamentum; these, however, belong more to the literature of the scholia than to the quaestiones properly speaking. Another work is the De Veteri et Novo Testamento quaestiones, whose authorship by Isidore has been maintained with convincing arguments. Likewise showing the same lack of marked originality are the Venerable *Bede's Quaestiones in librum Regum.

Three documents that appear among the writings of *Justin Martyr should be placed in the genre of the quaestiones: Quaestiones et responsiones ad orthodoxos, Quaestiones christianorum ad gentiles, Quaestiones gentilium ad christianos. Justin's authorship of these works has been rejected—with good reason—and some scholars have maintained that the authors of these works and the Confutatio quorumdam Aristotelis dogmatum were *Diodore of Tarsus and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, without either of these two attributions finding significant support. For the actual truth of the matter, one can only say that the four writings all come from the same hand and probably date back to the middle of the 5th c. We possess two recensions of the Quaestiones et responsiones ad orthodoxos, one that includes 146 questions, the other—which probably represents the original recension—161. The questions proposed are among the most diverse and only partially concern sacred Scripture; in fact, among the themes treated are discussions on apologetics, dogma, morality, exegesis, the liturgy and the natural sciences. There are also various interlocutors who range from the catechumen to the learned pagan to the disciple. The other two short treatises of ps.-Justin, Quaestiones christianorum ad gentiles and Quaestiones gentilium ad christianos, lie outside our scope of interest because they treat philosophical problems.

For the genre under examination, Theodoret of Cyrrhus also dedicated part of his literary activity to composing Quaestiones in Octateuchum and In libros Regnorum et Paralipomenon. The two works were addressed to Hypatius, who had insistently asked the author to explain difficult passages from the Bible. In effect, the Quaestiones in Octateuchum is the only work that truly belongs to the genre, because the other document—that constitutes a continuation of the preceding work—especially the questions on the book of Chronicles, is presented under the form of scholia.

To *Hesychius of Jerusalem probably belongs the Collection of Objections and Solutions, which seems to be an abridgment of his Harmony of the Gospels that has now been lost. The Collection is a type of harmonizing intended to illustrate, through questions and answers, 61 problems on the gospels pertaining to the public life, passion and death of Jesus.

At least two collections of scriptural questions are owed to the work of *Maximus the Confessor: Quaestiones ad Thalassium (PG 90, 243-786) and Quaestiones et dubia (PG 90, 785-856). In the first work, the author explains 65 questions for Thalassius, who had made a specific request. In this second collection, some of the problems proposed have no relation to Scripture. Altogether, this second work is simpler than the other and corresponds better to the classical type of scriptural questions. In contrast, the questions for Thalassius are characterized by long considerations, undoubtedly more important, but less in conformity to the genre. Much later were the Erotapokriseis of ps.-*Caesarius (6th c.?). Even *Macarius of Magnesia's Apocriticus was written under the form of questions and answers.

From the works of *Anastasius the Sinaite the only treatise that interests us here is the Quaestiones et responsiones (PG 89, 312-824). In the current editions, the work includes 154 questions; not all the manuscripts, however, attest the same number. Moreover, it is certain that some of the 154 published questions were not written by Anastasius. In addition to scriptural problems, dogmatic, moral and liturgical themes are treated.

G. Bardy, La littérature patristique des "Quaestiones et Responsiones" sur l'Écriture Sainte: RBi 41 (1932) 210-236, 341-369, 515-537; 42 (1933) 14-30, 211-229, 328-352; J.H. Declerck, Maximi Confessoris Questiones et dubia, Turnhout-Leuven 1982; G. Geraci, L'utilizzazione dell'Antico testamento nelle Quaestiones et responsiones di Eusebio di Cesarea: AnSE 2 (1985) 251-255; A. Pollastri, Le Quaestiones di Agostino su Genesi. Struttura dell'opera e motivazioni storico-culturali: AnSE 5 (1988) 57-76; F. Scorza Barcellona, La parabola della zizzania in Agostino. A proposito di Quaestiones in Matthaeum 11: AnSE 5 (1988) 215-223; M. Simonetti, Le Quaestiones di Teodoreto su Genesi e Esodo: AnSE 5 (1988) 39-56; G. Rinaldi, Tracce di controversie tra pagani e cristiani nella letteratura patristica delle quaestiones et responsiones: AnSE 6 (1989) 99-124; L. Perrone, Le Quaestiones evangelicae di Eusebio di Cesarea. Alle origini di un genere letterario: AnSE 7 (1990) 417-435; Id., Sulla preistoria delle "quaestiones" nella letteratura patristica: AnSE 8 (1991) 485-505; C. Mandolfo, Le regole di Ticonio e le "Quaestiones et responsiones" di Eucherio di Lione: AnSE 8 (1991) 535-546; G.M. Vian, Le Quaestiones di Filone: AnSE 9 (1992) 365-386; A. Garzya, Appunti sulle "Erotapokriseis": VetChr 39 (1992) 305-314; L. Perrone, Echi della polemica pagana sulla Bibbia negli scritti esegetici fra IV e V secolo. Le Quaestiones Veteris et Novi Testamenti dell'Ambrosiaster: AnSE 11 (1994) 161-185; G. Girardi, "Erota- pokriseis" neotestamentarie negli "Ascetica" di Basilio di Cesarea. Evangelismo e paolinismo nel monachesimo delle origini: AnSE 11 (1994) 461-490; L. Perrone, "Quaestiones et responsiones" in Origene. Prospettive di un'analisi formale dell'argomentazione esegetico-teologica: Cristianesimo nella Storia 15 (1994) 1-51; Id., Perspectives sur Origène et la littérature patristique des "Quaestiones et Responsiones," in Origeniana Sexta, ed. J. Dorival et al., Leuven 1995, 151-164; De diuersis quaestionibus octoginta tribus, De diuersis quaestionibus ad Simplicianum di Agostino d'Ippona, comm. L. Perrone - J. Pépin - F. Cocchini [et al.], Rome 1996; G. Folliet, La "Quaestio 12" des "83 Quaestiones" d'Augustin et un recueil de dix-sept "Apophtegmes" de Poemen dans le manuscrit de Nonantola (Vat. Lat. 5051): Augustinianum 37 (1997) 165-182; M. Maas, Exegesis and Empire in the Early Byzantine Mediterranean. Junilius Africanus and the Instituta Regularia Diviane Legis, Tübingen 2003; Erotapokriseis. Early Christian Question-and-Answer Literature in Context, ed. A. Volgers - C. Zamagni, Leuven 2004; M. Richard - J.A. Munitiz, Anastasii Sinaitae Quaestiones et responsiones . . ., Turnhout 2006.

C. Curti

QUAILS, MIRACLE of the (iconography). The biblical event of the gathering of the quail (Ex 16:13, repeated in Num 11:13-14) to feed the Israelites during their journey in the desert was intended to show the work of divine *providence. Given the remaining monuments, the artistic representation of this episode does not seem to have found extensive use in the repertory of ancient Christian art. The most well-known example is the *sarcophagus front of Camposanto Monumentale at Pisa, in which the event is portrayed by a group of people, men, women and children, with their arms raised to snatch the birds, and others with knees bent toward the large birds on the floor in the foreground. This scene is essentially represented with the same *iconography on other sculpted monuments: on the front of the sarcophagus lid preserved in the Museo Lapidario of Avignon, on the side of a sarcophagus now at the Musée des Beaux Arts in Aix-en-Provence; from *Arles, a fragment of the sarcophagus lid discovered at Trinquetaille with people divided into groups of three surrounded by trees; and perhaps the sarcophagus front of the Museo Civico di Carcassonne. In these, as at Pisa, it is presented in association with the artistic representation of the crossing of the Red Sea. The event is also present in the *mosaic decoration of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore at *Rome. And recently, some scholars have maintained that they have identified it on a fresco of the Roman cemetery of the Jordani, where a figure, who seems to be nude, holds in his left hand a sack in which to place a bird he is approaching. The monuments cover a chronological arc that ranges from the Age of *Constantine (sarcophagus of Pisa) to the era of Pope *Sixtus III (the mosaic of S. Maria Maggiore).

For the Pisa sarcophagus, see P. Arias, in Camposanto Monumentale di Pisa. Le antichità, Pisa 1977, 168, figs. 244-245 (the list is not exhaustive and contains errors of interpretation). For the sculptures: F. Benoit, Fragments de sarcophages inédits: RivAC 17 (1940) 266ff. For the mosaic, in particular, C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, 157-158, pl. 33; G. Matthiae, Mosaici medievali delle chiese di Roma, Rome 1967, 106; J. Wilpert - W.N. Schumacher, Die römischen Mosaiken der kirchlichen Bauten vom IV-XIII Jahrhundert, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1976, pl. 40; U. Fasola, Le recenti scoperte nelle catacombe sotto Villa Savoia. Il "coemeterium Iordanorum ad S. Alexandrum": Actas VIII Congr. Int. Arqueol. Crist., Vatican City-Barcelona 1972, 283, pl. CXII, fig. 11; F. Bisconti, Il cubicolo dell'Esodo nel cimitero dei Giordani, in Domum tuam dilexi, Misc. A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 81-108; TIP 267-268.

L. Pani Ermini

QUARTODECIMANS. Both in *Asia and *Syria, Christians continued to observe the Jewish Passover even after their separation, but they associated their practice not only with the *Exodus from Egypt, but also with the events of the death and *resurrection of Jesus, which was understood as the true Passover from the moment that Jesus had acquired the role of the true Paschal Lamb. Because this feast was celebrated on the 14th of Nisan, they became known, once the practice was publicly presented alongside different practices, as tessareskaidekatites, which was translated as "Quartodecimans" or "Quartadecimans."

Although this was the practice of certain Christian groups, it was not universal; it was possible that other Christians did not observe an annual commemoration of Passover, although in certain areas Sunday could be understood as a weekly celebration of the resurrection. With the gradual unification of the Roman Church at the end of the 2nd c., the quartodeciman practice of certain Roman Christians became a question that threatened the nascent unity of the Roman communities, from the moment that a different *Easter practice brought it about that some Roman quartodecimans, perhaps of Asian origin, fasted on Sunday in preparation for the Easter celebration that could have taken place without accounting for the day of the week. This situation led Pope *Victor to start an epistolary correspondence with other churches concerning this problem, and *Eusebius preserved a letter that Victor sent to *Polycrates of *Ephesus, who defended the Asiatic practice on the basis of its antiquity (HE 5,24). In Polycrates's letter seven famous quartodeciman leaders were mentioned, namely the apostles *Philip and *John, *Traseas, *Polycarp, *Melito of Sardis, Sagaris and Papyrius. In addition to these famous leaders mentioned by Polycrates, we should note the quartodeciman provenance of the following authors and literary sources: *Apollinaris of Hierapolis (Chron. pasch.: PG 92, 80-81), the Epistula apostolorum*, the first 21 chapters of the Didascalia apostolorum*, the author of the ps.-*Hippolytan homily In sanctum Pascha, *Blastus (ps.-Tertullian, Adv. omnes Haer. 8), and "*Hippolytus" the author of the Refutation, whose antiquartodeciman statements are cited (Chron. pasch.: PG 92, 80-81; Ref. 8.18) and which could also be the product of tensions between quartodeciman communities. Actually, in addition to the fact that the quartodeciman practice was clearly distinct from that of other Christian groups beyond Asia and Syria, a variety of practices existed then among the quartodecimans themselves. There were some who observed Easter on the same day as Jews observed Passover and appealed to one chronology offered by the synoptic gospels to justify their choice, despite the quartodeciman origin of the practice that had arisen in the context of the Johannine circles; the others celebrated Easter the whole night and fasted during the Jewish celebration and began their liturgy at midnight.

The general tendency to celebrate Easter in one way, and the subsequent discussion of the paschal question after the Council of *Nicaea, effectively isolated the quartodeciman practice from the wider church, and this practice began to disappear entirely, with the exception of isolated groups such as the *Montanists of Asia Minor who, in their isolation, developed a quartodeciman solar year.

C. Schmidt, Gespräche Jesu mit seinen Jüngern nach der Auferstehung, TU 43, Leipzig 1919; B. Lohse, Das Passafest der Quartadecimaner, Gütersloh 1953; R. Cantalamessa, L'omelia "In S. Pascha" dello pseudo-Ippolito di Roma, Milan 1967; Id., La Pasqua della nostra salvezza, Turin 1971; S.G. Hall, Melito in The Light of the Passover Haggadah: JTS 22 (1971) 29-46; S.G. Hall (ed.), Melito of Sardis. On Pascha and Fragments, Oxford 1979; G.A.M. Rouwhorst, The Quartodeciman Passover and the Jewish Pesach: Questions liturgiques 77 (1996) 152-173; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Lamb's High Feast, Leiden 1998 (bibl.); G. Visonà, Pseudo Ippolito, In Sanctum Pascha Studio, edizione, commento, Milan 1988 (bibl.); TRE 25, 93-97.

A. Stewart-Sykes

QUICUMQUE VULT. Also known as the Athanasian Creed (Symbolum Athanasianum) and the Exposition of the Catholic Faith (Expositio fidei catholicae), this *creed was composed in the 2nd half of the 5th c., probably in southern *Gaul, in Latin (PL 88, 585-586). There exists a Greek translation (PG 28, 1581A-1584C), which was certainly after the original version. From the 7th c. onward, it was erroneously attributed to *Athanasius, perhaps because the creed explained very clearly the trinitarian theology and the doctrine of the two natures in Christ. The author emphasized numerous times that all those who do not believe in its doctrines cannot be saved. The style of the work permits one to recite the creed in its entirety; it is easy to see why the Synod of *Autun (670) enjoined all clerics to memorize it by heart. All attempts to identify the author (*Ambrose, *Eusebius of Vercelli, *Vincent of Lérins, *Fulgentius of Ruspe and others) have been wrong. During the Middle Ages, it was revered at the same level of the Apostles' and *Nicene Creeds and was even used in the *liturgy.

CPL 167; CPG 2295; CPPM II A 36; J.N.D. Kelly, The Athanasian Creed, London 1964; V. Laurent, Le symbole "Quicumque" et l'Église byzantine, EO 35 (1936) 385-404; C.H. Turner, Symbolum "Quicumque": JTS 11 (1910) 407-411; ODC[3] 119.

S. Samulowitz

QUINISEXT. See *TRULLO (Quinisext), Council in

QUINTASIUS of Carales (d. after 314). He was the first known bishop of Cagliari: along with his presbyter Ammonius, he appears among the signers of the canons of the Council of *Arles of 314, convoked by *Constantine to settle the controversy between *Caecilian and the *Donatists (Mansi II, 477; Concilia Galliae, CCL 148, 15, 17, 19, 20, 22) and those who sent a letter to Pope *Sylvester on the same occasion (CCL 148, 4).

PCBE 1870.

A. Pollastri

QUIRICUS. Saint and *martyr who probably died during the *Diocletian *persecution (303–305). Quiricus was a child of only three years, who was capable, however, of giving speeches and working miracles, when he was killed, by order of the judge, in the sight of his mother Julietta. The hagiographical sources, however, do not agree about his tragic end. One can easily see the variations among the Hieronymian Martyrology, the Roman Martyrology and The Synaxarion of Constantinople and a Passio (BHL I, 272, nos. 193-194), perhaps an apocryphal text (see Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis, PL 59, 164), which was dedicated to him; he may have been killed on June 16th or July 15th, at *Antioch or *Tarsus in Cilicia, and with 404 companions, or some number between 54 and 11,504! Nevertheless, despite these discrepancies, which even in antiquity must have been well noted (see above Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis), the cult of Quiricus stopped suddenly in the East, and beginning from the 5th c., when the bishop of Auxerre Amator (or Amantius) ordered that the relics of the saint be placed at *Marseille, it began to spread in the West.

AASS Iunii III, Venice 1743, 15-37; Mart. hier., 321; Mart. rom., 240; Synaxarium Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, ed. H. Delehaye, in Propylaeum ad AASS Novembris, Brussels 1902, 821-822; H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels [2]1933, 167ff.; LTK[2] V, 1203; EC X, 430; BS X, 1324-1328; L.P. Jessop, The Cycle of Saints Quiricus and Julitta in the Church of Santa Maria Antiqua, at Rome, Diss. University of London (Courtauld Institute of Art), 1985 (with bibl.).

P. Marone

QUIRICUS of Barcelona. The bishop of *Barcelona approximately 654–666, he participated at the 10th Council of *Toledo (656), but already as abbot he had probably participated at the 7th Council of Toledo (653). He maintained his friendship with *Taio of Saragossa, to whom he had sent a letter encouraging him to publish his book of Sentences. He also wrote two letters to *Ildefonsus of Toledo: the first to thank him for the copy of the treatise on the *Virginity of Mary, which he considered a book rich with spiritual edification and consolation, and the second to encourage him to write commentaries on some books of *Scripture. A *hymn in honor of St. *Eulalia of Barcelona was attributed to him.

CPL 1271-1273; Díaz 211-213; PL 80, 729-730; 96, 193-196; J. Tarré, Santa Eulalia de Barcelona: Vida cristiana 2 (1915) 122; A. Fábrega, Santa Eulalia de Barcelona, Rome 1958, 45-53; J.F. Rivera Recio, Los arzobispos de Toledo en el siglo VII: Anales Toledanos, III. Estudio sobre la España Visigoda, Toledo 1971, 203-205; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 479-481.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

QUIRINUS, martyr. Various martyrs had this name. (1) Quirinus of Novesia in Germany (feast day 30 March, translation of relics 30 April): according to the Passio of the 6th-7th c., he was a Roman tribune under the emperor *Hadrian (117–138), and after his martyrdom he was buried in the catacomb of *Praetextatus on the Via Appia, where a few years ago L. Spera was able to identify the possible place for his tomb, which was already venerated during the time of Pope *Damasus (Tauch 46-56). Tradition states that during a visit to the Mamertine Prison, Quirinus found the chains of St. *Peter, which were subsequently preserved in the Roman church known as S. Pietro in Vincoli (St. Peter in Chains). The local 15th- to 16th-c. legend of Novesia maintained that Gepa, the abbess from a monastery of Novesia, the sister of the German Pope Leo IX, had translated the relics from Rome to her country in 1050. (2) The bishop of Siscia (Sissek in Croatia) (feast day June 4th): according to the Passio, he was martyred ca. 308 in Savaria (Szombathely/Steinamanger in Hungary), perhaps translated to Rome and the so-called Platonia of St. *Sebastian under the Appia, where he was at least venerated. (3) Quirinus from Tegernsee (feast day March 25th): according to the Passio, he was martyred under the emperor Claudius II (268–270) and buried in the catacomb of *Pontianus; in ca. 765 his remains were translated to Bavaria.

BHL 7026-7039; BS 10, 1329-1332; BBKL 7, 1130-1133; LCI 8, 240-244; M. Simonetti, Su S. Quirino di Siscia: RivAC 31 (1955) 234-243; M. Tauch (ed.), Quirinus von Neuss, Köln 2000; C. Zangs - G. Holländer (eds.), Quirinus. Tribun, Märtyrer und Stadtpatron, Köln 2000; P. Hommers (ed.), Verehrungsstätten des heiligen Quirinus von Neuss in Europa, Neuss 2000.

S. Heid

QUMRAN

I. Archaeology - II. History - III. Literature from Qumran - IV. Scripture and spirituality - V. Connections to Christianity.

In present-day scholarship, the term Qumran refers to an archaeological site at Khirbet Qumran, a hill at the NW corner of the Dead Sea (2 km [= 1.24 mi.], S of *Jericho and 32 km [= 19.88 mi.] N of Engedi [Ein Gedi]), which once had a settlement of a Jewish community between the 2nd c. BC and AD 68. The term Qumran also refers to the ancient manuscripts discovered in caves that are more or less near each other. Both the archaeological remains and the nearly 900 discovered scrolls, intact or in fragments, have opened a myriad of archaeological, historical, biblical-linguistic and socioreligious questions, some of which are very far from a definitive solution.

I. Archaeology. Launched following the discovery of scrolls in a cave by a Bedouin (1947), explorations and excavations have shed light upon the following: There are more than forty caves on the cliff to the N and S of the settlement with remains showing the presence of people from different periods. The caves were adapted for emergency stockpiles but never used as living quarters (with the exception of one). There is a central structure that was used by the residents of Qumran for community activities, enclosed by a wall with three openings without doors for protection, with a tower alongside the chief entrance. Also there are tanks (miqwôt) for ritual baths of purification; a dining room for the community meal, with a pantry and a kitchen a short distance away; a scriptorium (place for writing); and various workshops, including one used for ceramics. There is also a large adjacent central cemetery (1200 tombs) with human skeletons belonging only to males, flanked by two other much smaller burial sites, where skeletons of women and children were also found, probably those of Bedouins. The residents, whose number could have varied between a minimum of 55 and a maximum of 150, would have lived in all likelihood in caves on the marly terrace of the settlement.

II. History. The only archaeological evidence tends to associate the site of Qumran with a place inhabited by the Essenes described in the Natural History (V, 15,73) by Pliny the Elder (d. AD 79). Nonetheless, almost immediately after the discovery of the scrolls and the sites, an enormous debate began in identifying the inhabitants of Qumran on the basis of the discoveries. Placed alongside some of the texts, some of the positions became entirely untenable because of the archaeological evidence and the publication of all the discovered manuscripts. The positions have today polarized: they are represented by N. Golb's thesis and the (University of) Groningen hypothesis, the latter of which is passionately advanced by F. García Martínez. The former denies that there were any residential inhabitants with a communal life at Qumran, asserting it would have been only a military outpost for defending the territorial annexations during the Hasmonean dynasty. The scrolls, this thesis maintains, would have been taken to the caves for precautionary purposes by the wealthy families of Jerusalem before its fall in AD 70. Golb's thesis, which, in short, denies that the Essenes ever lived at Qumran, is based on the heterogeneity of the manuscripts found in the caves and especially the Copper Scroll (3Q15), which, with the notes taken of enormous treasuries and goods, leads one to doubt that they could have belonged to the Essene community, whose members, according to Flavius Josephus, numbered 4,000 adherents (Ant. XVIII, 20).

Today, Golb's thesis has been undermined by recent archaeological research and by textual analyses, evidence that, however, does not contradict the hypothesis of Groningen, which identifies the people of Qumran with those of the Essene community concerning whom the sources spoke, both ancient Jewish (*Philo of Alexandria, Prob. 75; Josephus, Ant. XII, 171, 172, 298, 311, 372, 373; XVIII, 11, 18; Wars II, 119, 158, 160; V, 145) and non-Jewish (Pliny, Natural History V, 15,73; Dio Cassius, in *Synesius of Cyrene, Dio or the Life and His Example 2,3). For the most part, the descriptions of these ancient sources agree with the characteristics attributed to the community of Qumran after the discoveries: sharing of goods, communal meals, ritual baths, the sacerdotal character of the community, a long and severe regimen for the admission of new adherents, celibacy of some sort, and the solar calendar of 364 days.

The common position of scholars who have adhered to the Groningen hypothesis, nevertheless, breaks down into various hypotheses regarding the origin of the Essenes and the Qumran community. These can be summarized in three categories: (1) the origin of the Essene hasidim (H. Stegemann); (2) the origins of the movement at Babylon (J. Murphy-O'Connor); (3) Qumran as a schismatic sect of the Essenes. This last hypothesis (A.S. van der Woude; F. García Martínez), which seems to have the best arguments, distinguishes two historical moments that are difficult to date with precision: one pertains to the origin of the Essene movement during the time of the apocalyptic traditions before the edict of Antiochus Epiphanes; the second, to the origin of the Essenes of Qumran during the time of John Hyrcanus (134–104 BC). Following the Teacher of Righteousness (CD-A I, 5-12), whose identity has not been determined but is certainly a person who belonged to the priestly class of the *temple and the high priest, a schismatic group separated from the movement and went into self-exile in the desert at Qumran looking for a heightened eschatological spirituality based on dualism; they adopted a never-changing solar calendar, upon which they based their sacrifices and rules for ritual purification. The solar calendar they used was based on 364 days, thus divisible by 7, which allowed every year to start on the same day, Wednesday (the day the sun was created). In AD 68, the community was destroyed by the Romans, and Qumran became a military garrison for the occupants. Nothing more is known of the community; only the scrolls of its library have survived, which were well hidden in the caves before the community's demise.

III. Literature from Qumran. Without a doubt, the greatest amount of interest in Qumran comes from the Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek manuscripts—all religious in character—discovered in 11 caves and cataloged with the siglum 1Q to 11Q, according to the order of the discovery of the caves, with the addition of the abbreviation of the contents (e.g., 1QIs stands for the Isaiah scroll found in the first cave discovered; 1QS stands for the serek [=Rule of the Community] scroll found in the first cave) or the number of the inventory (1Q28). Because of the different teachings of the various texts and because some date from before the establishment of Qumran, the manuscripts cannot be traced back to the Qumranic matrix. According to some of the criteria adopted (linguistic, literary genre, thematic, etc.), the texts, however, admit various classifications. By taking into account their origins and their purpose, these can be divided into the following categories: (a) biblical manuscripts that contain the text or part of a book in the Hebrew Bible (all the books of the present-day *canon are represented, with the exception of Esther); (b) apocryphal manuscripts that are Jewish works written between the 3rd c. BC and the 2nd c. AD, already known even before Qumran; (c) parabiblical manuscripts that have a more or less definitive relationship to biblical texts (*commentaries, *florelegia, etc.); (d) nonbiblical manuscripts that specifically pertain to the community of Qumran. Nearly a fourth of the texts (around 220 of some 900) were biblical writings and were an expression of the life of the community, which centered its life, alongside liturgical celebrations, on the study of the Tôrāh, which was interpreted authoritatively by its founder, the Teacher of Righteousness, to whom, as clarified by the Pesher of Habakkuk, were revealed the mysteries of the *Scriptures (1QpHab VII, 1-8). Because the biblical books were not controlled by a canon and did not have a stabilized order, they were ordered around a central nucleus established by the Tôrāh and the Major *Prophets.

The importance of these biblical texts in Hebrew derives from their antiquity (last quarter of the 3rd c. BC), existing in a version that therefore preceded the Hebrew text that would later be transmitted by the Masoretes. The texts of the Samaritan Pentateuch and the Septuagint have no less importance. Far from being finished, the study of the manuscripts has opened almost unlimited new horizons for research previously unknown. Certainly, this study has enriched the knowledge of the Hebrew and Aramaic languages; it has allowed scholars to better develop the history of the biblical text before the advent of Christianity and the rabbinic era; it has clarified numerous questions on the Greek translation of the Septuagint; it has supplied materials for the textual criticism of the OT; it has exerted influence on literary criticism that seeks to reconstruct the formation of individual biblical books.

IV. Scripture and spirituality. Various manuscripts pertain to the interpretation of biblical texts. Seen within the larger picture, biblical hermeneutics at Qumran presented the twofold objective of explaining the text (pure exegesis) and its application (applied exegesis) to the concrete situations that emerged (G. Vermes). Nevertheless, all the exegetical methods used (literal explanations, “rewriting” or halakhic paraphrase, pēšer, testimonia, typology and allegory, midrash)—methods shared, moreover, with contemporary *Judaism and the NT itself—tended more toward a practical application of reading the biblical text, with an eschatological orientation, corroborated when possible by the authoritative and revealed interpretation of the Teacher of Righteousness (1QpHab VII, 1-8).

From the various manuscripts that pertain to the community and especially the Damascus Document, it appears that the community understood biblical history as its own history of salvation (CD-A III, 1-2). The members of Qumran were in fact convinced that they had established the ideal community of the end times, that they had remained faithful to God’s covenant, and that the God of the Jews spoke directly in the Scriptures and in the first person to the adherents of the sect (J.V. Allegue). At Qumran, there was no fear of modifying the biblical text by conveying it in the first-person voice of God, even though the text was in the third person, as had occurred, for example, in the Temple Scroll with regard to Num 30:3-4 (11Q19 LIII, 14-17). Because they believed themselves to be the recipients of the tradition preserved in the Hebrew Bible, the members of Qumran conferred on the texts both an authority and a sacredness that had never before been given to this extent. Scripture was truly at the center of the community’s life. They studied the Scriptures, discovering in them the community’s own saved condition and the hope for what it would become.

In a document foundational for the sect, the Rule of the Community (or the Manual of Discipline), the perception of the members of Qumran of already being saved is observed in the question of *justification, a topic in which Qumran differed from the rest of contemporary Judaism. Belonging to the sect meant one was already justified, because by belonging to the community one entered “through pure grace” into the “lot” (goral) of Light, which from the divine foundation of the world was opposed to the goral of Darkness, i.e., the adversary. Both goralim were understood as historical realities. For the theology of Qumran, in fact, sin, both ontological and voluntary, could be expiated only by God, and the community of Qumran was the only place where the *Holy Spirit of God was present, because it was the only true temple (1QS 3,6-7). Accompanying the community’s dogmatic “predeterminism,” however, was also a spiritual journey that the individual adherent in the tension of his incessant search for God had to undertake, leading along two parallel paths: one was practical, with the sequential acquisition of three virtues, the spirit of humility, patience and "great love" for the other members of the community; the other was dianoetic (i.e., intellectual), with the passage from empirical knowledge to supreme *wisdom. Lastly, the "great love" and the "highest wisdom" confer on the adherent the highest good with which he esteems God's works with trust (P. Sacchi). The search for God by the members of Qumran had various ends: fidelity to the law (4QMMT) and "to obtain eternal life" (4Q521, On the Resurrection), and yet, the ultimate goal of the path undertaken when they became a part of the desert community, the place of authentic contact with God, was the very vision of God (1QS XI, 3-13).

Seeking God in Scripture day and night (1QS VI, 6-8), this lifetime project that expressed an all-encompassing choice translated concretely into the full observance of the precepts established by God in the law of Moses and therefore also the full observance of the feasts and set times established there (1QS I, 11-15). The observance of the calendar (not the lunar one of 354 days and 12 months of 30 or 31 days, which was introduced at Jerusalem by the Hellenization of Jason and Menelaus, but that solar one of the tradition consisting in 364 days and 12 months of 30 and 31 days) and the liturgy, understood as service to God with prayer—both communal and at regular set times (B. Nitzan, 64)—served to establish two unavoidable expressions of the path toward God. In the solar calendar of Qumran, which was presented in the texts as the solar calendar revealed by God, every feast and every *sabbath falls on the same day of the year. It thus possessed the great advantage of regularity and precision that created the ideal instrument for liturgical use (F. García Martínez, in J.V. Allegue, 259-292). By means of the liturgy, the member of Qumran meditated on the cosmic order that is revealed in the regular and repetitive succession of times and that is definitively inserted into the very history of creation, which from the eternal present of God is revealed in nature with its unchangeable cycles (P. Sacchi, 88). At Qumran, prayer underwent an exceptional development, and even though we only have a few concrete descriptions of the liturgy (1QS VI, 6-8), because of the constant presence of Scripture in it, one can conclude that at its core the life of Qumran was marked by continual and full service to the written word of God.

V. Connections to Christianity. Beyond the ancient Christian references to discoveries of biblical scrolls in the environs of Jericho (*Origen, cited in Eus., HE 6,16,3; *Epiphanius of Salamis, On the Weights and Measures: PG 43, 265-268; at the beginning of the 9th c., *Timothy I, the historian bishop of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon; see O. Braun), which would also pertain to the history of texts, the scientific debate on Qumran, alive and belabored because of ideological distortions of the sources, has also concentrated on its relationship to early Christianity (Berger; Betz - Riesner; Stegemann; Fitzmyer; Yécora, in J.V. Allegue). Although the influences of the Qumranic tradition are also found in the early rabbinism of the Mishnah and the Tosefta, for Christianity it was important not to find direct dependencies and to justify the analogies of some of its notions with the ideas of the community (J. Coppens, in M. Delcor, 373-383). Thanks to such a comparison, studies on Qumran allow us to know a Judaism that was richer with respect to the rabbinic Judaism known before 1947, and such studies contribute to better reconstructing that humus (ground) in which the message of Jesus and the Christian community was born.

In particular, however, the rigorous comparisons have ascertained that the original presupposition of *John the Baptist's membership in the sect, endorsed by some popular publications, is shown to be false by the peculiarity of his *baptism with respect to the repeated ritual baths of Qumran (H. Stegemann). Both because of the profound doctrinal differences and the geographical distance, it is therefore certain that "Jesus did not have any personal acquaintance with the Essenes" (H. Stegemann) and that he was never at Qumran (J.A. Fitzmyer). If it is possible to observe several points of contact between his teaching and that of the schismatic Essene community, one must also note the radical discrepancies of fundamental aspects of his life with respect to the sect of the desert: his openness toward the world; the commandment of love; purity-impurity understood as interior; his attitude toward women, sinners and lepers; the simplicity of his teaching in parables. The case of second- and third-generation Christianity is different; here one can find similarities and even influences of Qumran on nonessential themes (for Paul: the similarity between the literary production of Qumran and the biblical texts of Eph 5:6-20 and 2 Cor 6:14-18). For the synoptic gospels, common literary elements can be noted in the *Beatitudes, because Qumran possessed a small collection in 4Q525 frag. 2, II, 1-3, and between the messianic passage of Mt 11:3-5 and 4Q521 frag. 1, II. The enigmatic figure of Melchizedek from the epistle to the Hebrews, which applies the title to Jesus, is also better explained thanks to the literature of Qumran, because this figure is presented as the executor of divine judgment on the day of expiation Heb 7:1, 3 / 1 QGenAp; 11QMelch II, 6-8). The hypothesis advocated by J. O'Callaghan that the fragments 7Q4 and 7Q5 contained texts of the NT seems to be false by their belonging to the Greek book of Enoch. Lastly, also false is the thought that it is certain that early Christianity was directly influenced both by the sophisticated use of Scripture at Qumran ("thus it is written"; "as it is written") and by the apocryphal texts of the OT rejected by Pharisaic Judaism and known by Christians in Greek and in other languages, texts that Qumran restored to scholars in their Semitic version. From this apocryphal literature, which reflects the ideas of a diverse Second Temple Judaism, only those texts were received by early Christianity that presented a broader, universal openness (J. Trebolle Barrera).

The study of the biblical texts of Qumran has contributed to a better understanding of the controversy between Christians and Jews that arose already at the beginning of the 2nd c. (see *Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho) on the reciprocal accusation of falsifying the Scriptures. Neither party was responsible for distorting texts, but rather, in that period the Greek version of the Septuagint as well as the Hebrew pre-Masoretic text and the Masoretic text had equal authority in the faith of Israel. The further insight of the textual themes of the Dead Sea Scrolls could have positive effects in future interreligious dialogue between Jews and Christians (J. Sanders, in P.W. Flint).

F. García Martínez - E. Tigchelaar, The Dead Sea Scrolls Study Edition, 2 vols., Leiden 1997; E. Tov - S.J. Pfann, The Dead Sea Scrolls Electronic Reference Library, vol. 1 (CD-Rom), Leiden 1997; vol. 2, 1999. Translated texts: F. García Martínez, Testi di Qumràn, ed. C. Martone, Brescia 1996; L. Moraldi, I manoscritti di Qumràn, Turin ²1986.

Studies: J. Murphy-O'Connor, The Essenes and Their History: RB 81 (1974) 215-244; M. Delcor (ed.), Qumran. Sa piété, sa théologie et son milieu, Paris-Gembloux-Leuven 1978; J.A. Soggin, I manoscritti del Mar Morto, Rome 1978, ²1994; N. Golb, L'origine des manuscrits de la Mer Morte: Annales 40 (1985) 1133-1149; Id., Who Hid the Dead Sea Scrolls?: Biblical Archaeologist 48 (1985) 68-82; Id., Who Wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls? The Search for the Secrets of Qumran, New York 1995; J.A. Fitzmyer, The Dead Sea Scrolls. Major Publications and Tools for Study. Revised Edition, Atlanta 1990; F. García Martínez - A.S. van der Woude, A Groningen Hypothesis of Qumran Origins and Early History: Revue de Qumran 14 (1990) 52-541; N. Golb, Hypothesis of Jerusalem Origin of Dead Sea Scrolls: Qumran Chronicle 1 (1990) 36-40; K. Berger, Qumran und Jesus, Stuttgart 1993; J.A. Fitzmyer, Qumran. Le domande e le risposte essenziali sui manoscritti del Mar Morto, Brescia 1994; B. Nitzan, Qumran Prayer and Religious Poetry, Leiden-New York-Köln 1994; O. Betz - R. Riesner, Gesù, Qumràn e il Vaticano. Chiarimenti, Rome 1995; H. Stegemann, Gli esseni, Qumran, Giovanni Battista e Gesù, Bologna 1995; J.C. Vanderkam, Manoscritti del Mar Morto. Il dibattito recente oltre le polemiche, Rome 1995; F. García Martínez - J. Trebolle Barrera, Gli uomini di Qumràn, Brescia 1996; A. Lange - H. Lichtenberger, s.v. Qumran: TRE 28 (1997) 45-79; C. Martone, I LXX e le attestazioni ebraiche di Qumran: Annali di Scienze Religiose 2 (1997) 159-174; E. Ulrich, The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Origins of the Bible, Grand Rapids, MI 1999; Th.J. Kraus, 7Q5 Status quaestionis und grundlegende Anmerkungen zur Relativierung der Diskussion um das Papyrusfragment: Revue de Qumran 19 (1999-2000) 239-258; P.W. Flint (ed.), The Bible at Qumran. Text, Shape and Interpretation, Grand Rapids, MI 2000; Th.H. Lim et al. (eds.), The Dead Sea Scrolls in Their Historical Context, Edinburgh 2000; J.A. Fitzmyer, The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins, Grand Rapids, MI 2000; L.H. Schiffman - J.C. Vanderkam (eds.), Encyclopaedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, 2 vols., Oxford-New York 2000; J.V. Allegue (ed.), I manoscritti del Mar Morto, Rome 2005; P. Sacchi, Regola della Comunità, Brescia 2006.

V. Lombino

QUO VADIS? An apocryphal event mentioned in various versions of the Acts of Peter by St. *Ambrose, ps.-*Hegesippus and in the Passion of Processus and Martinianus, probably belonging to the most ancient version of the Acts (2nd-3rd c.). Upon the requests of the faithful, *Peter, threatened with death, fled from *Rome. At the city gate, he met Christ, who was traveling to Rome to be crucified again. Peter then returned to Rome and underwent death. In this event, which established a theological introduction to Peter's death, expression is given to the theology of martyrdom (Christ suffers in the *martyr); it emphasizes the legitimacy of fleeing during *persecution (a problem discussed over the course of the 2nd-3rd c.) and Rome's special role, where upon Christ's order, Peter returned to die. The event is famous thanks to H. Sienkiewicz's novel and the Roman legend (the church of Domine, Quo vadis? on the Via Appia and the footprints of Christ in the church of St. *Sebastian).

A.A. Bell, Early Latin Versions of the Quo Vadis Story and the Ambrosian Authorship of the "De Excidio Hierosolymitano": The Patristic and Byzantine Review 9 (1990) 171-180; C. Cecchelli, Gli Apostoli a Roma: Archivio della R. Deputazione Romana di storia patria 60 (1937) 1-106 [esp. 26-32]; D.R. MacDonald, The Acts of Paul and Acts of Peter. Which Came First?: Society of Biblical Literature, Seminar Paper Series, 31 (1992) 214-224; M. Starowieyski, Scena "Quo vadis?" (Acta Petri, Martyrium 6): Vox Patrum 32-33 (1997) 281-290; Id., L'épisode Quo vadis? (Acta Petri, Martyrium 6): Humanitas 50 (1998) 257-262; Id., L'épisode Quo Vadis? in Philomathestatos Studies . . . Presented to J. Noret, ed. B. Janssens et al., Leuven . . . 2004, 591-601.

M. Starowieyski

QUOD IDOLA DII NON SINT (That Idols Are Not Gods)—hereafter, QId. A short apologetic treatise transmitted under the name of *Cyprian. It was composed of three parts: (1) a criticism of mythology from a euhemerist point of view (i.e., views that regard myths as traditional accounts of real events that occurred in history), a refutation of the idea that *Rome owed its greatness to its religion and a rejection of the role of the demons who used paganism to turn men from the true God (I-VII), (2) an examination of the divine attributes, especially the divine unity (VIII-IX), (3) an outline of *Christology, with the subsequent appeal to follow Jesus in *martyrdom in the form of a peroratio (X-XV). For its ideas and expressions, QId primarily borrows from the work of *Minucius Felix, Oct. 20–22, 25–27, 18, 32 (chs. I-IX) and *Tertullian, Apol. 21.23 (chs. X-XV). The treatise is not mentioned either by *Pontius or the List of Cheltenham; it was attributed to Cyprian by *Jerome (Ep. 70,5) and *Augustine (Bapt. 6,44,87; Unic. Bapt. 4,6). This attribution led some to see in the QId the work of a neophyte (or at least Cyprian before his episcopate, and it was therefore dated to 246–249). The work synthesized the ideas drawn from the most famous apologies of the day: the "centonical" method analogous to that of Cyprian's Ad Quirinum or Ad Fortunatum. After the end of the 19th c., this position and Cyprian's authorship of the work were called into question. Against this objection, one scholar pointed to this work's numerous verbal affinities to Cyprian's known treatises (Koch). This defense was in turn attacked by the thesis according to which, identifying in the QId some points of relation with the works of *Lactantius (Inst. I and IV; Epitome), some maintained that the QId drew upon the work of Lactantius, and therefore that it could be dated between the time of Lactantius and Jerome, that is, in the 2nd or 3rd quarter of the 4th c. (Diller, Axelson, Heck and Wlosok). Some scholars, however, argued that the original thesis was demonstrated poorly (Simonetti). Others, nevertheless, argued that the refutation of the original defense did not necessarily mean that one must therefore accept Cyprian's authorship of the text (Deléani, Heck). As a result, the question of this text's authorship remains subject to debate.

CPL 57; PL 4, 564-582; W. Hartel, CSEL 3,1 (1868) 17-31; A. Wlosok, Herzog, § 481.3, with exhaustive bibl.; S. Deléani, Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea: REAug 42 (1996) n. 43.

P. Mattei

QUODVULTDEUS (d. 454). According to one hypothesis, Quodvultdeus, the bishop of *Carthage, who was exiled to Campania by *Genseric following the occupation of the city (19 October 439), should be identified with the deacon of the same name who was an epistolary correspondent of *Augustine of *Hippo and the one to whom Augustine dedicated De haeresibus. On the other hand, the identification with the author of the Liber promissionum et praedictorum Dei and a group of ps.-Augustinian homilies is today considered more likely the case. Quodvultdeus was perhaps born at Carthage, where he was at the time of the consecration of the temple of Caelestis as a church, during *Easter of 399 (according to the traditional chronology) or 408 (according to Braun 1986, 2882). Because he was an adulescens (adolescent) at that time (as he himself states in the Prom. 3,38,44), the date of his birth ought to be placed around 380 or 390. During the years 417–421, he was deacon of the church of Carthage; in 428–429 he sent two letters to Augustine (Ep. 221 and 223 from Augustine's collection of letters), to ask him to compile a brief compendium on the heresies. Ceding to his insistence, Augustine in 429 composed and dedicated the De haeresibus to Quodvultdeus. Around 437, the deacon (or more likely the archdeacon) Quodvultdeus succeeded *Capreolus on the episcopal cathedra of Carthage. From this cathedra, he courageously lifted up his voice not only against the *Vandal invaders, who were carrying out massacres and devastating North Africa, but also, and especially, against the Vandal *Arians, who reviled the body of the holy church. The day after the capture of Carthage by Genseric, Quodvultdeus and a crowd of ecclesiastical officials embarked—as *Victor of Vita informs us (1,5,15)—on half-broken ships, naked and robbed of everything, then docked at Naples, a city of Campania, thanks to a fortuitous journey. It was here that he probably died on 8 January 454 (according to the 6th-c. calendar of Carthage) or 19 February (according to the marble calendar of Naples, 8th c.).

During the course of the 20th c., textual criticism has attributed to Quodvultdeus a group of ps.-Augustinian sermons, delivered in *Africa, perhaps at Carthage, during the years immediately before the Vandal occupation of the city (434–439), mostly during the period near the *baptism of *catechumens or during the baptismal liturgy. These documents provide precious information for reconstructing the religious and civic life of a *Catholic community of Africa on the eve (and at the very beginning) of the Vandal occupation. With respect to Quodvultdeus's authorship of the sermons—a view held between 1914 and 1919 by Morin and defended and supported with new and compelling arguments by Braun—there has been no lack of disagreements and reservations by such scholars as Kappelmacher and Simonetti.

The sermons of Quodvultdeus are (in the order of Braun's 1976 edition) the Contra Iudaeos paganos et arrianos, which was preached during the Vandal occupation, probably during the Easter vigil of 439, and comments upon the baptismal abrenuntiatio and the articles of the *creed in an anti-Jewish, anti-*pagan and anti-Arian perspective; the treatise Aduersus quinque haereses, which attacks pagans (against whom he uses the testimonia of hermetic and Sibylline literature) as well as Jews, *Manicheans, *Sabellians and the Arians; the three sermons De symbolo, tied to the liturgy of the traditio symboli and preached to the catechumens during the Easter vigil; the sermon De quattuor uirtutibus caritatis, which is a spiritual commentary on 1 Cor 13:7-8 (charity omnia tolerat, omnia credit, omnia sperat, omnia sustinet); the sermon De cantico novo, which develops the symbolic theme of the journey toward the heavenly homeland; the sermon De ultima quarta feria, preached on Holy Wednesday of 439, in which the preacher explains the parable of the sower of seed and invites the catechumens to allow themselves to work from the cross-plow; the sermon De cataclysmo, which was preached near Easter, in which he develops the baptismal typology of the *exodus from Egypt, the crossing of the Red Sea and the Passover; De tempore barbarico I; and the two sermons De accedentibus ad gratiam and De tempore barbarico II, in which one can perceive in all its gravity the dramatic situation of Africa at the time of the Vandal invasion and persecution.

Braun has reattributed to Quodvultdeus (1964, 88-113) the Liber promissionum et praedictorum Dei, which had been previously assigned to *Prosper of Aquitaine until 1711, when J.B. Lebrun des Marettes and L.U. Mangeant placed it in their edition among Prosper's spurious writings (the text was then reprinted in PL 51). Composed between 445 and 451, the Liber presents itself as a collection of scriptural testimonia concerning God's "promises" and the "prophecies" from the beginning of the world. From the creation of humanity, which is mentioned in the first chapter, to the eternal blessedness of the saints, which occupies the last 13 chapters, the history of salvation unfolds, which has as its guiding motif the idea that it is the *progressive realization of an uninterrupted series of God's "promises" and "predictions," and that the promises and predictions that have been fulfilled justify the Christian's faith in those that still need to be fulfilled. The work is divided into three parts: Ante legem, Sub lege and Sub gratia, which encompass the three major epochs into which the tradition divides human history: that of the patriarchs until the giving of the law of *Moses; that of the Jewish people; that of the manifestation of the Son of God in Jesus Christ. The third epoch is extended by two additions dedicated to eschatology: the first, entitled Dimidium temporis, is dominated by the figure of the *antichrist and discusses the demonic attacks against the saints before the *parousia; the second has as its object the eternal glory of the saints and the final return of saved humanity to God's bosom (Gloria regnumque sanctorum). The number of 153 chapters, which make up the Liber, corresponding to the number of *fish from the second miraculous catch (Jn 21:11), symbolizes the infinite multitude of the saints. Each of the three parts is framed within a prologue and epilogue. In the three epilogues, which are indistinct from the final chapters, the same comparison with the same symbolism returns: each of the three times is paralleled to a day that shines on the world, and this symbol is developed by a double parallelism: that of the four points of the compass that respectively symbolize the four major patriarchs, the four major *prophets and the four evangelists, and that of the twelve hours, that respectively symbolize the twelve *patriarchs—the sons of Jacob, the twelve minor prophets and the twelve *apostles. The day, of course, is Christ.

The first two parts establish a sort of compendium of "biblical typology," although the third assumes the aspect of a collection of "verbal" promises and processes on the coming of the Savior (his earthly life, passion, *ascension and the birth of the church). Each chapter is conceived according to the following scheme, which makes use of substantially similar formulas: (1) prophetic testimonies; (2) testimonies from the gospels that are a confirmation (firmat, confirmat); (3) apostolic testimonies, which are an attestation to it (testatur); (4) secular testimonies taken from Hermes Trismegistus, the Sibyl and Virgil, which are introduced by the word fatetur. The two excurses of the third part (which draw upon books 20 and 22 of Augustine's De civitate Dei) are presented as a collection of testimonia. The Dimidium temporis, although respecting the scheme of the preceding portion, accords special attention to *Daniel and the book of *Revelation. The Gloria sanctorum, almost exclusively made up of NT citations, assumes the tone of a litany or refrain of Augustine's formula: impii non videbunt.

CPL 401-413a. Editions: PL 51, 753-838; R. Braun, SC 101-102 (Paris 1964); Id., CCL 60 (Turnholti 1976); text, English translation and commentary of the Sermones De tempore barbarico: R.G. Kalkman, Washington, The Catholic University of America, 1963 (Diss.); trans. of Symb. I-II-III: Th.M. Finn, ACW 60, 2004; Ital. trans. of the Liber: A.V. Nazzaro, CTP 82, Rome 1989 (with intro. and notes); L. Dattrino, Vatican City 2002.

Studies: G. Morin, Pour une future édition des opuscules de saint Quodvultdeus, évêque de Carthage au V[e] siècle: RBen 31 (1914-1919) 156-162; A. Kappelmacher, Echte und unechte Predigten Augustins: WS 49 (1931) 89-102; M. Simonetti, Studi sulla letteratura cristiana d'Africa in età vandalica: RIL 83 (1950) 407-427; Id., Qualche riflessione su Quodvultdeus di Cartagine: RSLR 14 (1978) 201-207; Id., Note sul testo di alcuni passi di opere attribuite a Quodvultdeus: RFIC 106 (1978) 291-299; Id., La produzione letteraria latina fra Romani e barbari (sec. V-VIII), Rome 1986, 35-39; P. Courcelle, Quodvultdeus redivivus: REA 67 (1965) 165-170; V. Saxer, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 184-186; A. Isola, La tipologia dell'agnello Pasquale in [Quodvultdeus], in F. Vattioni, Sangue e Antropologia. Riti e culto, Rome 1984, 1203-1211; Id., I Cristiani dell'Africa Vandalica nei Sermones del tempo (429–534), Milan 1990; R.J. De Simone, The Baptismal and Christological Catechesis of Quodvultdeus: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 272-282; R. Braun, Quodvultdeus: DSp 12 (1986) 2882-2889; A.V. Nazzaro, Quodvultdeus, in Enciclopedia Virgiliana IV, Rome 1988, 383-384; Id., Quodvultdeus, in M. Sodi - A.M. Triacca, Dizionario di Omiletica, Turin 1998, 1310-1313; Id., Quodvultdeus. Un vescovo dell'Africa vandalica a Napoli, in M. Rotili (ed.), Società multiculturali nei secoli V-IX. Scontri, convivenza, integrazione nel Mediterraneo occidentale, Naples 2001, 33-51; W. Strobl, Notitiolae Quodvultdeanae: VChr 52 (1998) 193-203; BBKL 7, 1137-1142; R. González Salinero, The Anti-Judaism of Quodvultdeus in the Vandal and Catholic Context of the 5th Century in North Africa: Revue des études juives 155 (1996) 446-459; Id., La invasión vándala en los "Sermones" de Quodvultdeus de Cartago: Florentia Iliberritana 12 (2001) 221-237; Id., Poder y conflicto religioso en el norte de Africa Quodvultdeus de Carthago y los vándalos, Madrid 2002; D. Van Slyke, Quodvultdeus of Carthage. The Apocalyptic Theology of a Roman African in Exile, Sydney 2003.

A.V. Nazzaro

R

RABBAN SHABUR. Born in a village in the mountains of Bet Huzaye (Susania or Khuzestan, in the S of modern-day Iran), between the cities of al-Ahwaz and Shushtar, he established, probably in the second quarter of the 7th c., a monastery next to the latter city that subsequently became very famous and even came to be called "the monastery of Rabban Shabur." Venerated for his holiness, Shabur attracted many disciples and was visited by *Catholicos *Isho'yahb III during the years 650–660. At his monastery, at least for a certain amount of time, lived such famous authors as his disciple *Simon of Taybutheh, *Isaac of Nineveh (who died and was buried there) and *Dadisho of Beth Qatraya. The latter, in his commentary on the speeches of Abba Isaiah, recounts various episodes from the life of Rabban Shabur.

R. Draguet, Commentaire du livre d'Abba Isaïe par Dadisho' Qatraya (CSCO 326-327), Louvain 1972.

K. den Biesen

RABBULA of Edessa (d. 435). The anonymous *Syriac Life allows us to reconstruct the biographical profile of Rabbula bishop of *Edessa during the time of the Council of *Ephesus. Having converted to Christianity as an adult, thanks to the influence of *Acacius of Beroea, he left his family and career in order to embrace the monastic life. Elected bishop of Edessa (ca. 415), he directed his pastoral zeal into reforming the clergy and *monasticism and the fight against *heretics, *pagans and Jews. During the *Nestorian crisis, he first sided with the Easterners, signing at Ephesus the decisions taken against *Cyril of Alexandria and his adherents. Subsequently, however, he drew near to Cyril's position, to the point of condemning the writings of *Theodore of Mopsuestia. The study of Theodore's writings had been promoted until that time by *Ibas in the *school of Edessa. These positions incited tensions in the relations with the Antiochene episcopate. In 432, *Andrew of Samosata, rejected by Rabbula for his refutation of the Kephalaia, noted the behavior of the metropolitan of Edessa to the Patriarch John, who had asked the bishops of *Osroene to break *communion with him. Rabbula turned to Cyril and received his support, but later he also adhered to the union of 433. Nevertheless, along with *Acacius of Mitilene, he put the churches of nearby *Armenia on guard against Theodore's errors. Despite his deep commitment to charity that animated his actions as bishop, with his ascetic rigor and doctrinal intransigence Rabbula made many enemies for himself. It was precisely one of these enemies, Ibas, whom he had exiled from the city, who was chosen to be his successor upon his death (8 August 435).

The governance of his diocese did not leave much space for the development of his literary activity. We have a few traces in the homily delivered at *Constantinople against Nestorius (CPG 6496), the Syriac letter to *Andrew of Samosata (CPG 6495), and the fragments of a letter to Gemellinus of Perrhae, which has also come down to us in Syriac (CPG 6493). Furthermore, only fragments from a letter to Cyril of Alexandria have survived (CPG 6494), but Rabbula helped to spread Cyril's teachings by translating into Syriac the treatise De fide orthodoxa. As the citations from the gospels contained in this document show (which are also adopted by the Diatessaron*), the thesis that saw Rabbula as the promoter of a separate translation of the gospels no longer seems tenable.

His most significant legacy, however, was the canons for the secular clergy and the monks (CPG 6490-6491). These are marked by a special care as much as by the form of their relations ad extra and convey to us the image of a still rather ancient state of Syriac monasticism of the *cenobitic style. The Epistula ad Gemellinum episcopum Perrhae, in which Rabbula criticized the use of the *Eucharist as a substitute for daily food by certain monks, was directed at these monastic groups. With respect to the christological teachings of the bishop of Edessa, alongside the Life, the most significant text is that of the Epistula ad Andream Samosatenum, in which Rabbula rejected the division of Jesus Christ into two natures after the union. An analogous emphasis on the unity of the *hypostasis is found in the Epistula ad Cyrillum in the context of the criticisms directed at the *dyophysitism of Theodore of Mopsuestia. In reality, Rabbula seems to have reconnected primarily with the legacy of *Ephrem the Syrian's Christology, without, therefore, noticing the issues regarding the soul of Christ, which were primarily developed by the Antiochenes.

Duval 339-341 (and passim); Baumstark 71-73; Chabot 45-47; Ortiz de Urbina 89-91. Editions: J. Overbeck, S. Ephraemi Syri, Rabbulae episcopi Edesseni, Balaei aliorumque opera selecta, Oxford 1865; F. Pericoli-Ridolfini, Lettera di Andrea di Samosata a Rabbula di Edessa: RSO 28 (1953) 154-169 (on which matter, see L. Abramowski, Zum Brief des Andreas von Samosata an Rabbula von Edessa: OrChr 41 [1957] 51-64); A. Vööbus, Syriac and Arabic Documents regarding Legislation Relative to Syriac Asceticism, Stockholm 1960.

Studies: G.G. Blum, Rabbula von Edessa, der Christ, der Bischof, der Theologe (CSCO 300, subs. 34), Louvain 1969; H.J.W. Drijvers, The Man of God of Edessa, Bishop Rabbula, and the Urban Poor Church and Society in the Fifth Century: JECS 4 (1996) 235-248; P. Bruns, Die Kanones des Rabbula (d. 435) und ihr Beitrag zur Reform des kirchlichen Lebens in Edessa, in Theologia et Jus Canonicum (= FS H. Heinemann), ed. J.F. Reinhardt, Essen 1995, 471-480; Id., Bischof Rabbula von Edessa. Dichter und Theologe: Symposium Syriacum VII (1996), Orientalia Christiana Analecta 256, Rome 1998, 195-202; Id., The Protonike Legend, the Doctrina Addai and the Bishop Rabbula of Edessa: VChr 51 (1997) 298-315; Id., Rabbula, Bishop of Edessa. Spiritual Authority and Secular Power, in Portraits of Spiritual Authority. Religious Power in Early Christianity, Byzantium and the Christian Orient, Leiden 1999, 139-154; G. Bowersock, The Syriac Life of Rabbula and Syrian Hellenism, in Greek Biography and Panegyric in Late Antiquity, ed. T. Hägg - P. Rousseau, Berkeley, CA 2000, 255-271.

L. Perrone

RADEGUND (520–587). Born in 520 at Erfurt (?), the daughter of Berthar, king of Thuringia, she was taken as hostage in France after the defeat of the Thuringians in 531. It is uncertain if she was already a Christian, but she certainly was when she married Chlothar I (before 540). When her husband put her brother to death about 555, she first fled to St. Medard, bishop of Noyon, who consecrated her a nun (diacona), then to the royal palace of Saix (in the area of Touraine and Poitou), where she performed works of charity and, lastly, to *Poitiers, where Chlothar had built a monastery for her within the city. This monastery took the name of "Holy Cross" when Radegund obtained from *Justin II, in 569, a relic of the holy *cross. On this occasion, *Venantius Fortunatus composed the hymn Pange lingua (Repertorium Hymn. 14, 475) and the Vexilla Regis (Repertorium Hymn. 21, 481). The monastery followed the *Rule of *Caesarius of Arles. A letter from the Abbess Caesaria to Richild and Radegund survives (CPL 1054). Radegund died on 13 August 587 in her monastery of the Holy Cross (Mart. hier.) and was buried in Notre Dame outside the city, which subsequently took the name "St. Radegund." Venantius Fortunatus (d. 601) wrote the first biography on her life (CPL 1042); the nun Baudonivia of Poitiers (6th-7th c.) wrote the second (CPL 1053), and Hildebert of Lavardin wrote the third in the 12th c.

BHL 7048-7054; BS 10, 1347-1352; LCI 8, 245-247; R. Aigrain, Sainte Radegonde, Paris 1987; C. Papa, Radegonda e Baltilde: Benedictina 36 (1989) 13-33; F.E. Consolino, Due agiografi per una regina. Radegonda di Turingia tra Fortunato e Baudonivia: Studi Storici 1 (1988) 143-159; S. Gäbe, Radegundis sancta, regina, ancilla. Zum Heiligkeitsideal der Radegundisviten von Fortunat und Baudonivia: Francia 16 (1989) 1-30; I. Moreira, Provisatrix optima. St. Radegund of Poitiers' Relic Petitions to the East: Journal of Medieval History 19 (1993) 285-305; E.G. Whatley, An Early Literary Quotation from the Inventio s. Crucis. A Note on Baudonivia's Vita s. Radegundis (BHL 7049): AB 111 (1993) 81-91; P. Santorelli, La Vita Radegundis di Baudonivia, Naples 1999.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

RANSOM of PRISONERS. This was one of the forms of Christian charity and assistance (see *Works of Aid and Charity), according to *Tertullian: "the care that we take for the needy and our commitment to works of charity have become a sign that distinguishes us among our opponents" (Apol. 39,7). And he added that the monthly voluntary collection that was taken in the community served, among other things, to help those who were in prison: "if some of our people are in the mines, the islands or prisoners in some way, condemned solely for their adherence to the church of God, they earn the right to be assisted by their companions in the faith" (Apol. 39,6). *Justin Martyr similarly affirmed that the collections served the needs of the prisoners (1 Apol. 67). As early as the gospel of *Matthew mention is made of how it is a work of charity to visit those in prison (Mt 25:36, 39, 43). The first form, therefore, of care for prisoners pertained to those who were imprisoned for the faith, a form that was attested to by the most ancient Christian texts. The author of the letter to the Hebrews writes: "For you took part in the prisoners' suffering" (10:34; cf., 13:3; cf. Clement of Rome, Ep. Cor. 59,4 and 55,2; Ign., Smyrn. 6,2). The ransoming of prisoners was one of the Christian virtues (Hermas, Mand. 8,10). *Aristides wrote the following: "when they know that one of their own is in prison or is being persecuted for the name of their Christ, all take to heart his pains, and if possible to free him; money is no object to attain this goal" (Apol. 15).

To visit those in prison was a normal practice for consoling them and alleviating their pains, an obligation even for married Christian women (Tertullian, Ad ux. 2,4). Even the *pagan *Lucian of Samosata, in his satirical work, attests to how much care Christians took to serve Peregrinus who was in prison (De morte Per. 1-16). At times, the Christians had to pay to visit those in prison: *Thecla had to bribe the guards to visit Paul (Acta Pauli 18: ed. Erbetta 2, 261), something that must have been rather common (see Lucian, De morte Per. 12; Eus., HE 5,1,61; Passio Perp. 3,7). The care of Christian prisoners was consistent; at times it was even criticized for the excessive attention given to them (Tertullian, De ieun. 12), not only for those locked up in prison, but also for those condemned to the mines and exile (see Cyprian, Ep. 66-70). In the 2nd c., *Dionysius of Corinth praised Pope *Soter and the Roman church for their commendable tradition of helping others and even Christians condemned to the mines (Eus., HE 4,23,10). The Didascalia Apostolorum*, from the 3rd c., exhorted Christians not to overlook any means necessary to aid prisoners (19; see Apos. Con. V, 1-2). The bishop of Rome possessed a list of those to assist who had been condemned to the mines in *Sardinia and in certain cases even obtained their freedom (Philosoph. 4,7). Eusebius wrote that *Licinius prohibited Christians from caring for those who were in prison (HE 10,8).

Another expression of Christian charity was the ransom of prisoners of war, pirates or barbarian invasions, because when civilians were captured, it represented an opportunity for their captors to acquire great wealth by selling them as slaves. The captivus could volunteer to loan himself for money, which he then had to pay back in some way, or rather had to obtain help from his family and friends. Roman law conflicted with the redemptio (buying back) of prisoners practiced by Christians. The Christians also highly regarded this work of charity and solidarity. At *Rome, as early as the 2nd c., *Hermas considered ransom "of the servants of God" a work of mercy (Mand. 8,10). *Cyprian sent a hundred thousand sesterces collected in the communities to help the Christians of *Numidia for the ransom of prisoners and said that he was ready to give more through the generosity of the Christians of *Carthage: "if this were to occur again, until now you have counted on their voluntary and large contribution" (Ep. 62,4). *Lactantius considered the ransom of prisoners an action of great kindness (Div. Inst. 6,12,39; Epitome 65). We see how this work of charity was put in practice after the disaster of Hadrianopolis, for example, at *Milan: *Ambrose took the initiative to sell the church's sacred vessels; and not just this, he also offered an extensive justification for his work of charity (De off. 2,15,70: PL 16, 129; esp. 2,28,136-143; see 2,15,50ff.: PL 16, 129). The criticisms must have been very strong against this use of sacred vessels. Nevertheless, his action was a model for future generations. Ambrose was able to throw it in the face of the pagan *Symmachus that the pagan temples had no concern for works of charity: "let them tell us how many prisoners the temples have ransomed, how many times they have come to the aid of the poor, how many exiles they have helped with financial support" (Ep. 18: PL 16, 977). *Augustine did the same in *Africa (see *Possidius, Vita Aug. 24,15). In the 4th c., the church of Cappadocia also recalled the assistance sent by the church of Rome for the ransom of prisoners during the Gothic invasion of the mid-3rd c. (*Basil, Ep. 70 to Pope *Damasus). *Pinianus and *Melania even sold their own property for the redemption of prisoners (*Gerontius, Vita Melaniae 20: SC 90, pp. 168-169). It is interesting and significant that the imperial authorities required Christian priests, as an obligation, to focus on the ransom of prisoners, with a law of 408 (CTh 6,7,2). In Late Antiquity, the commitment to the ransom of prisoners of war was considered one of the obligations of a good bishop (*Julian Pomerius, De vita 1,25: PL 59, 440; Vita Honorati 20; Vita Paulini 6: PL 53, 862-863; *Avitus of Vienne, Ep. 35; *Venantius Fortunatus, Carmina 4,8,23-24; etc.). *Patricius wrote that it was a typical custom for Christians to spend their money for ransoming baptized prisoners (Ep. ad Corot. 14: SC 249, 144-166). Klingshirn studied the works of charity performed by *Caesarius of *Arles for the ransom of prisoners after the wars between the *Franks and the *Burgundians on the one hand, and the *Ostrogoths and the *Visigoths on the other during the years 506–507. Likewise at the end of the 6th c., *Gregory the Great made reference to the need for the ransom of prisoners during the invasion of the *Longobards (Ep. 7,23 and 23; 9,17; Dialogues 2,1).

DACL 2, 2112-2127; C. Osiek, The Ransom of Captives. Evolution of a Tradition: HTR 74 (1981) 365-386; W.E. Klingshirn, Charity and Power: Caesarius of Arles and the Ransoming of Captives in Sub-Roman Gaul: JRS 75 (1985) 183-193; P. van Minnem, Prisoners of War and Hostages in Graeco-Roman Egypt: JJP 30 (2000) 155-163 (the Christian part 158ff.); L. Amirante, Appunti per la storia della "redemptio ab hostibus": Labeo 3 (1957) 7-59; 171-220; G. De Gregorio, Cesario di Arles e la redemptio dei captivi infideles. Vita Caesarii I, 3-33: Cristianesimo nella storia 26 (2005) 671-682.

A. Di Berardino

RAPE. The modern-day meaning refers to sexual union violently imposed on the victim without respect to gender or age, and is not limited to only the legal sense. The distinction that included violence, however, was not binding in antiquity as a way of describing rape. Under the emperor Augustus, the term rape was used to refer to one of two forms of sexual relationships outside of marriage. These could be inflicted upon any citizen, through public accusatio, and they consisted in two types of crime: adulterium if the woman was united in iustae nuptiae; stuprum, in the opposite case, if engaged in relations with an unmarried woman, virgin or widow. The lex Iulia de adulteriis established that adultery consisted in a sexual union with a free and upright, but unmarried, woman and existed independent from the fact that the woman was or was not consenting and that the rape was carried out with violence. The same lex, however, also used the terms adulterium and stuprum indistinctly. And Ulpian equated rape with adultery even in relation to the loss of conubium and the ensuing prohibition of remarriage (Dig. 48,5,30,1).

A man who had sexual relations with a young boy, young girl or a widow who still maintained the status of mater familias was guilty of rape (Dig. 48,5,35, Modestino). The man, moreover, who had a sexual relationship with any free woman, with whom sexual relations were only permitted in marriage or in concubinage, also committed the crime of rape. For the rape of a young boy, in ancient times, a man ran the risk of incurring the death penalty, but, during the imperial age, he suffered the punishments prescribed for adultery (Dig. 48,5,9 and 11). The law did not mention lesbianism.

The woman who had a heterosexual relationship outside marriage or concubinage was guilty of rape. In the case of sexual relations with a virgin, the man and the woman were both punished with the confiscation of their goods, if it could not be demonstrated that the man used violence. This crime was under the jurisdiction of the public tribunals.

Difficulties of application in the suppression of stuprum derived from the very fact of defining what was elicit with respect to the well-known lack of constitutive formalities proper to Roman marriage. When jurisprudence regarded that consuetudo with a woman was to be seen as a marriage (Dig. 23,2,24), stuprum occurred only in the case of a nonmarital consuetudo (Ed. Theod. 52 and Institutiones 4,18,4). It could be punished only through popular accusation, in contrast to the trials of adultery brought about by the iure mariti vel patris. With *Trajan and *Marcus Aurelius, the accusation could also be brought by the iure extranei. In any case, the difficulty remains of tracing the sources on nonviolent or consensual stuprum: this leads one to think that there was a broad social tolerance with respect to these types of unions.

The law, moreover, established various categories of women in quas stuprum non committitur and whom one could not marry, although casual sex and concubinage were allowed: the actress; the procuress; publico iudicio damnata; adulterio deprehensa; the prostitute; also, of course, slave women in case of a cessation of activities (Dig. 23,2,43,4, 6 and 12; Dig. 25,7,1,2; Dig. 48,5,6 and Dig. 48,5,11,2; Tit. Ulp. 13,2). This circle of women in quas stuprum non committitur tended to broaden. The entrance into such categories, chosen by some of the more unrestrained women in order to enjoy a freedom not allowed to their status, led the Senate to impose restrictions in this regard (Dig. 48,5,11,2: cf., Suet., Tib. 35 and Tac., Ann. 2, 85). *Constantine affirmed the impunity of the sexual unions of some categories of women, including waitresses of inns and freedwomen, as well as alienae.

Postclassical legislation was more oriented toward the suppression of violent stuprum and abduction, which was regarded as a crimen, inasmuch as a woman was deprived of her divorce settlement rights because of her supposed economic share. *Constantine foresaw the case of the violation of an orphan's castitas by her guardian (CTh 9,8,1, from the year 326: cf., CI 9,10,1) to vindicate the deceived woman who had married a man who was still married (CI 9,9,18,1, from the year 258) or who had undergone violence (CI 9,9,20, from the year 290; Dig. 3,1,1,6; Dig. 48,5,14,7), or even other cases. Constantine himself restricted the right of raising an accusation of adultery only to near kinsmen (CTh 9,7: ad leg. Iul. de ad. 2), establishing a path later followed by the emperor *Justinian. The only crime punishable by victims of violence tended to merge with the crimen vis and the abduction.

In the writings of the fathers of the church, the meaning of the term rape leaned toward referring to generally immoral sexual relationships, even before referring to unlawful ones, and was often used as a synonym for adultery and thus not necessarily violent (Jerome, Epist. 70,2; 77,3; 123,6; 147,4); in the writings of the same author it can also mean sexual violence (Ambr., De off. 2,20), or, from the religious point of view, it can be meant metaphorically referring to idolatrous action (Ambr., De virginib. 1,16). This last meaning was frequently used, as was the more specifically immoral meaning (for which see, e.g., Cypr., Epist. 13,5). Both of these meanings can be found in the writings of Tertullian (De praescrip. haeretic. 3).

*Augustine, facing the emotional situation of women who had been raped, developed a significant solution from the moral point of view, using prevalent theories of virginity. On this basis, rape leaves chastity intact even if one's physical integrity has been compromised (Civ. Dei 1,16; 1,28; 1,18,1; 1,25; 1,27, in NBA, vols. 1-3, Rome 1991). *Basil of Ancyra, an important figure within *Arianism, had already promoted the thesis, however, that the body is not corrupted if the *soul is pure. He did so in a text, however, whose authorship has been called into question by some scholars (De vera virginitatis integritate 1-2). In canon law, the term rape is used to refer to a forced sexual relationship with a woman who is a virgin (CIC, can. 2357).

H. Herter, Die Soziologie der antiken Prostitution im Lichte des heidnischen und christlichen Schrifttums: JbAC 3 (1960) 70-111; M. Molè, Stuprum, in Novissimo Digesto Italiano, vol. 18, 1971, 582-587; G. Rizzelli, "Lex Iulia de adulteriis." Studi sulla disciplina di "adulterium," "lenocinium," "stuprum," Lecce 1997; F. Lucrezi, La violenza sessuale nel diritto ebraico e romano. Studi sulla "Collatio," II, Turin 2004; C. Venturini, Legislazione tardoantica romana dopo Costantino in materia di stuprum, adulterium e divortium, in Comportamenti e immaginario della sessualità nell'alto medioevo (Spoleto, 31 marzo-5 aprile 2005), CISAM 53, Spoleto 2006, 177-214.

T. Sardella

RATIO PASCHAE (or Cyclus paschalis annorum LXXXIV). The Vatican Codex 2077 (incipit: Dicente Domino ad Moysen Mensis hic), written at the end of the 6th c., preserves an Easter register that begins in 354, the year in which the Chronography of 354 ends, and finishes in 437. For several years (i.e., 414, 424, 428 and 433), it names only the Western consuls and omits those of the East. After having demonstrated that Easter can be celebrated only starting from 22 March until 20 April, it presents a cycle of 84 years: a table reports the day of the week for 1 January, the age of the moon, the date of Easter and the consuls of the year. For example, for the year 354: 1 January is Saturday, the 21st day of the moon; Easter, 27 March; the consuls, *Constantius emp. for the seventh time and *Constantine the Gaul, for the fourth time.

CPL 2293; Mommsen, Chronica Minora, I, 740-743; G.B. De Rossi, Inscriptiones Christianae urbis Romae septimo saeculo antiquiores, Rome 1861, I, LVIII-LIX; B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie: I. Der 84 jährige Ostercyklus und seine Quellen, Leipzig 1880, 43ff., 73ff.; R.S. Bagnall et al., Consuls of the Later Roman Empire, Atlanta 1987, 51.

A. Di Berardino

RATIONE EMBOLISMORUM, De. This short work was written in England at the beginning of the 8th c., probably around the year 720. As a result of the history of certain manuscripts, C.W. Jones has inserted it into the volume dedicated to the works of the Venerable *Bede (CCL 123), and specifically in the part titled Alia opuscula coaeva. In reality, one should not exclude a connection to the prolific Bede or with some author of this milieu. The term embolismus was used by the ancient Greeks to refer to the months to which intercalary days were added in order to make the lunar cycle coincide with the solar one. The ancient Romans, taking into consideration the Greek usage, used the noun embolismus to refer to the intercalary day (leap day) for the month of February. The work was divided into seven short chapters that corresponded to seven years; the individual intercalary passages begin with the formula: in primo anno embolismi (in secundo . . .etc.), or with similar expressions. The work can be considered a type of calendar, that indicates through a chronological procedure the dating of the celebration of *Easter. The entire text aims at the concluding sentence: Illa enim luna quae secundo non. Aprilibus initiatur prima, et extenditur usque in sexto non. Maiis vigesima nona, Aprilis est; et ipsa est paschalis, et evenit decima quarta in decimo sexto kal. Maiis. Et nisi ita fecisse, evenisset tibi in termino paschali luna decima quinta, et fuisset error in pascha et in aetatibus lunae.

CPL 2315; PL 129, 1335 (exc.); CCL 123, 685-689; C.W. Jones, Bedae Opera de temporibus, Mediaeval Academy of America 41, Cambridge, MA 1943, 3-122: Development of the Latin Ecclesiastical Calendar; see also p. 380.

W. Turek

RATIONE PASCHAE, De (or Computus Carthaginensis AD 455). Migne's Patrologia Latina mentions the text Anonymi libellus de computo Paschali (59, 545-560), divided into two short books. The first begins with the word Dum mens curiosa in re tam graviori. . . . The work is framed in the context of the controversy between the Africans and Romans on the date of the celebration of *Easter. In the text, many terms are used that refer to the calendar, and therefore, the months, the days and the hours. The anonymous author mentions and comments on certain passages of sacred *Scripture that in a special way describe the creative work of God, which was completed in six days and described in the book of Genesis. He emphasizes the importance of fasting by mentioning some passages of the *Bible and, in particular, the words that God addressed to Moses. The codex containing the document is in very bad condition, and it is therefore difficult, at least in some passages, to understand the individual phrases, which are at times composed without observing the rules of Latin grammar. The Liber secundus has as a subtitle qui in se omnia ornamenta continet circulorum (col. 549) and is dedicated to the explanation of the time passed since the sacratissimo Paschae die in Aegypto immolato. The text mentions, among others, Julius Caesar and the emperor Augustus, with the pertinent chronological dates surrounding their governance (col. 552). After providing various chronological, biblical and theological pieces of information, the author concludes with the following words: Haec omnia sollicitius observabis, et dies paschae in integro invenies (col. 560).

CPL 2296; PL 59, 545-560. B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie, Leipzig 1880, 279-297.

W. Turek

RATIONE PASCHAE, Prologus de (or Ratione Paschae, Praefatio de). The so-called Anonimi liber de computo (PL 129, 1275-1372) begins with the Prologus sancti Cyrilli Alexandrini episcopi de ratione Paschae (ibid., 1275-1278; see also PG 77, 383-390). The Latin term compotus or computus should be taken as referring to the lunar phases as well as the science on the course of the sun and the moon. The noun itself derives from the Latin verb computare (i.e., to calculate, reckon, sum up). It was necessary to count the years, months and days, to refer to the various events of human history, and in particular, the precise day on which *Easter should be celebrated. The characters on this codex (Bibliotheca Ambrosiana) that transmit the text have not permitted scholars to identify with precision the period in which this short treatise was composed (beginning of the 9th c.?). Scholars have noted some elements that occur in the writings of the Venerable *Bede, suggesting that this text must be later than Bede's. The prologus begins with the phrase: Sanctum Paschae mysterium, eiusque sacra solemnitas. . . . The author faces the famous question on the dating of Easter, in opposition to some who are not "illumined by divine *revelation, but who were puffed up by the human presumption of knowledge"—divina revelatione inluminati, sed humana scientiae praesumptione elati sunt (col. 1275). The author maintains that "by apostolic authority, the universal church throughout the whole world knew the specific day of Easter without any discussion"—apostolica auctoritate universalis Ecclesia per totum orbem definitam Paschae diem sine ulla disceptatione cognosceret (ibid.). Then he recalls the emperor *Theodosius (who was referred to as religiosissimus) who, considering the great confusion on this topic, asked St. *Theophilus bishop of Alexandria in order to be informed with accuracy on the dating of Easter. The author of the short treatise, because 428 years had been indicated by the bishop, saw now the necessity of taking up the question again: "I sought a revelation from the Lord, and because I knew that none of those men had understood, among whom I saw the orbit itself, I undertook to insert in this booklet this thing which I merited to derive from the source itself," Revelationem Domini postulavi. Et hoc, quod de ipso fonte haurire promerui, in ipso libello praesumens, quia nec illos, apud quos ipsum circulum vidi, intellexisse cognovi (col. 1276). There follows the Liber de computo, a true and proper calendar with many technical chronological terms, that ends with a Versus in poetry, that summarizes the preceding text (cols. 1369-1372).

CPG 5242-5243; CPL 2290-2291; PG 77, 383-390; PL 129, 1275-1278. B. Krusch, Studien zur christlich-mittelalterlichen Chronologie, Leipzig 1880, 337-343; C.W. Jones, Bedae Opera de temporibus , Mediaeval Academy of America 41, Cambridge, MA 1943, 38-39; A. Cordiolani, Textos de Cómputo español del siglo VI: Hispania Sacra 9 (1956) 127-139.

W. Turek

RATIONE PASCHAE, Tractatus de. Incipit: Pleriqui [qui] mysterium Paschae. This work has come down to us under various names and in two recensions: the Ambrosian recension attributes it to *Athanasius (CPG 2297: PG 28, 1605-1610); it is also ascribed to other such authors as *Niceta of Remesiana (CPPM 3, 821), *Jerome (CPPM 3, 800/2), but especially *Martin of Braga (d. 572; CPPM 3, 810). Jones and Barlow thought that the text was the work of the latter, although other scholars generally considered it anonymous (from *Spain, *Gaul or even *Ireland). It was dated after the mid-6th c. The author cited *Scripture according to the Itala (an early Latin version of the Bible) and drew upon the Acta concilii Caesareae, also known as the Epistula Syn- odica, which is attributed to *Theophilus of Caesarea. The anonymous author affirmed that until recent times in Gaul, Easter was celebrated on 25 March, the day of Christ's resurrection, although he wanted to follow the *tradition of the ancestors, for whom the creation occurred on 22 March. Therefore, Easter should not be celebrated before 22 March or after 21 April.

CPL 2302; CPPM 3, 810; PL 72, 49-52; M. Schanz, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, IV, Munich 1904, 407-408; A.E. Burn, Niceta of Remesiana, Cambridge 1905, 92-111; C.W. Jones, The "Lost" Sirmond Manuscript of Bede's Computus: English Historical Review 52 (1937) 204-219, esp. 212ff.; C.W. Barlow, Martini episcopi Bracarensis opera omnia, New Haven, CT 1950, 270-275; V. Loi, Il 25 marzo data pasquale e la cronologia giovannea della Passione in età patristica: EphLit 85 (1971) 48-69; Patrologia IV, 73-74, esp. 65-68; A. Strobel, Texte zur Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Munich 1984, 107-115.

A. Di Berardino

RATIONE PASCHALI, Disputatio de. The somewhat obscure text, which presents itself as a letter of Morianus (Moranus, Maurinus, etc.) bishop of *Alexandria (incipit: [Eo quod senserunt alii discere] de eo quod scriptum est), is cited by *Cummineus. The anonymous author—who followed the lunar cycle of 19 years—maintained that in the equinox of spring, 25 March, the following events came to their completion: the creation of the world, the Jewish Passover, the crucifixion of Jesus Christ: it was the feria sexta and the 14th moon; the resurrection occurred on the 16th moon, that is, Sunday, 27 March. The terminus post quem of the composition is the era of *Dionysius Exiguus, who is mentioned by the author. Jones thought that the present document was a coupling of two different texts and placed it in Ireland at the beginning of the 8th c.

CPL 2306; CPPM III/A 815; PL 129, 1357-1358; A. Cordoliani, Les traités de comput du haut moyen âge (526–1003): ALMA 17 (1943) 51-72; Id., Les computistes insulaires et les écrits pseudo-alexandrins: Bibl. École des Chartes 106 (1945–1946) 23ff. (text: 30-34); M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400–1200, Dublin 1985, 326; J.-B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesm., I, Paris 1852, 14-15; C.W. Jones, Bedae Opera de temporibus, Cambridge, MA 1943, 97-98; A. Strobel, Texte zur Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Münster 1984, 116-118 (Ger. trans. of the first part).

A. Di Berardino

RATIONES SEMINALES. The concept of rationes seminales (λόγοι σπερματικοί) is first found in the writings of the *Stoics, who used it to explain the origin and development of the world. Broken up into many particles, the Logos is therefore present, organizing the cosmos and creating harmony between all things. The Stoics thus better understood prophecy, *providence and life in conformity to human nature. In patristic writings (Lampe 1248-1249), the theme was adopted in various forms: *Justin Martyr used it to emphasize that all humans, by participating in the Logos, at least know a part of the truth (2 Apol. 10); *Origen, to help understand the fight of opposing forces in the human being (Com. Jo. 20,2-5); *Methodius, to demonstrate the *resurrection (Res. 1,24); *Eusebius of Caesarea, to define the notion of Logos (Eccl. theol. 2,13); *Augustine, to emphasize the connection between natural causality and the divine will that in an instant created all things (Gen. Litt.).

M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, Göttingen [3]1964; G. Faggin, Rationes seminales: Enc. Filosof. 2, 1967, 549-550; BA 48 (1972) 653-668, 685-690; HWP 5 (1980) 484-489; M.L. Colish, The Stoic Tradition from Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, Leiden 1985 (passim).

B. Studer

RAVENNA
I. City and archaeology - II. Councils.

I. City and archaeology. Rising on a group of outlying sandy mounds that made up the ancient shoreline, Ravenna was in immediate contact with the open ocean and defended by marshes that isolated it from the mainland. Due to its unique geographical location that made it almost impregnable, the city, having long flourished as a commercial center after the Roman conquest of the Po Valley, became a strategic stronghold of great importance. To better ensure the defense of the Adriatic Sea and the E Mediterranean, *Augustus built the base for a praetorian fleet of 250 ships to the southwest of the city's famous military port of Classis. Augustus also desired that the port be united by means of a canal that would cross Ravenna and join a S branch of the Po River: the fossa Augusta (Augustus's trench) thus assured that the city functioned as a nexus between the Adriatic routes and the internal navigation of the lagoons and the Po. From that point onward, the industrious life of the shipyards developed, according to the testimony of the sepulchral stele of Publius Longidienus, a carpenter for the fleet (faber navalis), who was depicted as holding an ax near a ship in the process of construction.

At the beginning of the 2nd c., *Trajan built an aqueduct that carried the waters from the nearby Apennine Mountains to Ravenna because it was lacking water resources. The city continued to grow slowly in importance and population, and extended itself outside the ancient municipal oppidum in that area later called Regio Caesarum. But a noteworthy expansion of the urban center and the surrounding walls, in addition to a vast building activity, were begun in 402, when, before the danger of *Alaric's invasion, *Honorius strategically transferred the capital of the Western empire there from *Milan for reasons of safety: from that point on the city took on the look of a lavish imperial residence with astounding buildings for worship, which were covered on the inside with splendid *mosaics, such as the baptistery to the N of the cathedral that Bishop Neon (451–475) decorated with stucco and mosaics, the so-called Mausoleum of *Galla Placidia attached to the church of the Holy Cross, the Placidian basilica of St. *John the Evangelist, which was erected by Augusta for a vow she made during a sea storm while she was returning to Ravenna from the East (424), and the basilica dedicated to the apostles by Bishop Neon, today called the basilica of St. Francis, near which Dante's tomb lies.

The first cathedral, replaced by the current one in the 18th c., is identified in the five-aisled basilica consecrated by Bishop Ursus perhaps in 386 (Deichmann) under the shelter of the wall during the period of the Republic, which was, at least at that time, already partially knocked down by the superimposition of the residential buildings (Bermond Montanari); these are also attested, in addition to archaeological discoveries, by a much later piece of information by Andrea Agnello (9th c.), according to whom the Ursus basilica came to flank the already existing bishop's palace. From the text of the protohistoric "Ravennate letter" it appears that this basilica was the first worship building for the Christian community of Ravenna, which, moreover, already organized for a long time, must have been gifted with a meeting place that is unknown to us, but which should be placed in Ravenna itself, perhaps in the vicinity of the Basilica Ursiana (Cantino Wataghin).

In effect, contrary to the historiographical tendency represented by Testi Rasponi and Lanzoni and commonly received until a few decades ago, the tradition that placed the origins of the local Christian community near the port of Classis, from which the first episcopal see moved to Ravenna, which by that time had become an imperial see (Deichmann), now seems to be void of any historical foundation. This scholarly conclusion seems to find confirmation in the relatively late chronology of the worship buildings that have been identified in the Classis area (Farioli), although some cemeterial areas also used by Christians, according to the testimonies of the few but significant epigraphs that have come to light here, along with many reused ships belonging to the fleet, seem to refer to the first Christian settlement in the fleet area and the entire Emilia region until the end of the 2nd c. or in the first decades of the 3rd c. The reference is primarily directed at the sepulchral titles of Flavius Anastasius, Valeria Maria and Antifon, which came from the "Probian" area and are now at the Museo Arcivescovile; the last two especially, if in fact one recognizes their Christian character—as it seems reasonable to conclude—constitute a bit of evidence that could not be ignored in this respect.

Nonetheless, we do not know much about St. *Apollinaris, the protobishop and only martyr of the church of Ravenna, who was immediately surrounded by a halo of legend, beyond the scarce bits of information that have come down to us from sermon 128 by *Peter Chrysologus, the most ancient ecclesiastical writer from Ravenna and the first bishop of Ravenna who was invested with the authority of a metropolitan around the year 430. For the remainder, we are informed by the ancient *episcopal lists, which have come down to us authentic and intact: between Apollinaris and *Severus, who was present at the Council of *Serdica (343), another ten bishops succeeded who, the received and accepted tradition by Andrea Agnello maintained, were buried in those sepulchral areas of Classis, outside the walls of the castrum (fortress) where Probus I or, according to others, Probus II had supposedly constructed the first cathedral (basilica Probi) and much later *Maximian consecrated the majestic basilica of S. Apollinare (549).

Once the Roman Empire of the West had fallen in 476 and the experiment of *Odoacer, the first of the Roman-barbarian kings in *Italy, had come to a tragic end, Ravenna recorded its second moment of political greatness and building activity during the Gothic kingdom of *Theodoric (493–526). A wise and illuminated sovereign, in the first decades of his kingdom he tried to follow a political agenda of peaceful coexistence between conquerors and those conquered. He restored Trajan's aqueduct; he heightened his residence, that is, the Palatium portrayed on the mosaic on the right wall of the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo, the palatine basilica that was originally dedicated to the Savior and requested by Theodoric alongside his royal palace; he constructed churches for his own people who adhered to the *Arian faith such as the Anastasis Gothorum (today the church of the *Holy Spirit) to function as a cathedral with an adjoining baptistery.

Following the conquest of Italy by *Justinian, the city, which had become the seat of the exarch who retained civil and military powers in the name of the Eastern emperor, came alive with its third period of political power and civic splendor. The Byzantines vigorously reaffirmed the dogmas of orthodoxy; they reconciled the Arian churches to *Catholic worship and brought into the city the magnificent resourcesce of the East, adorning buildings with marble from the Proconnesus and with mosaics executed by a workforce that was perhaps trained in *Byzantium. Linked to the most important monuments of this period—among which one should mention the basilica of S. Vitale and the imposing basilica of S. Apollinare in Classe—are the names of Julian Argentarius, who was probably Justinian's emissary at Ravenna seeking to obtain public approval for the emperor, and *Maximian of Pola who, when appointed to tenaciously lead the fight against the inchoate *schism caused by the *Three Chapters, was the first to assume the title of archbishop. A tireless builder and reorganizer of his church, he should be considered along with Chrysologus among the most prestigious successors of Apollinaris and the architect of the influence of the church of Ravenna which, in its vying for power with the Roman see, foreshadowed its later claim to autocephaly. It was Bishop *Maurus, in 666, who was able to obtain recognition from the Eastern emperor for Ravenna's hierarchical independence from *Rome on the basis of a supposed *apostolicity of his episcopal see, which derived from a legendary passio that made St. Apollinaris a disciple of St. *Peter.

G.B. De Rossi, Il primitivo cimitero cristiano di Ravenna presso S. Apollinare in Classe: Bullettino di Archeologia Cristiana s. III, 3 (1879) 98-117; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia dalle origini al principio del secolo VII, II, Faenza 1927, 723-767; R. Farioli, Chiarificazione sulla topografia delle necropoli pagane e delle aree cimiteriali cristiane nella zona di Classe (Ravenna), Atti del I Congr. Int. di Archeologia dell'Italia settentrionale, Turin 1963, 79-92; G. Bovini, I principali monumenti paleocristiani del Museo Arcivescovile di Ravenna: Corsi di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 11 (1964) 43-99 and esp. 43-48; Id., Memorie cristiane scomparse dall'antica città di Classe: Corsi di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 12 (1965) 45-169; Id., Saggio di bibliografia su Ravenna, Bologna 1968; Id., Edifici di culto d'età paleocristiana nel territorio ravennate di Classe, Bologna 1969; Id., Principale bibliografia su Ravenna preromana, romana, paleocristiana, bizantina ed altomedioevale apparsa tra la fine del 1972 e la fine del 1974: Felix Ravenna 107-108 (1974) 253-257; F.W. Deichmann, Zur ältesten Geschichte des Christentums in Ravenna: RivAC 42 (1966) 167-175; G. Cortesi, Classe e Ravenna Origini cristiane e antichi edifici cultuali, Ravenna 1966; Id., Il porto e la città di Classe, Alfonsine 1967; P. Bruun, I primordi di Classe cristiana secondo le testimonianze epigrafiche, Atti del Conv. Int. di Studi sulle antichità di Classe, Ravenna 1967, 427-439; G.A. Mansuelli, Le stele romane del territorio ravennate e del Basso Po, Ravenna 1967; Id., Geografia e storia di Ravenna antica: Corsi di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 14 (1967) 157-190; M. Mazzotti, Problemi sul primitivo cristianesimo nella regione di Classe, Atti del Conv. Int. di Studi sulle antichità di Classe, Ravenna 1967, 463-479; Corpus della scultura paleocristiana, bizantina ed altomedioevale di Ravenna, diretto da G. Bovini, Rome 1968–1969; R. Budriesi, Le origini del cristianesimo a Ravenna, Ravenna 1970; G. Zattoni, Il valore storico della "Passio" di S. Apollinare e la fondazione dell'episcopato a Ravenna e in Romagna Scritti storici ravennati, Ravenna [2]1975; R. Farioli, Edifici paleocristiani di Classe. Stato attuale delle ricerche e problemi, in Ravenna e il porto di Classe, Bologna 1983, 23-51; Id., La topografia imperiale di Ravenna dal V al VI secolo: Corsi di Cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina 36 (1989) 139-147; G. Bermond Montanari, Topografia di Ravenna e Classe, in Ravenna e il porto di Classe, Bologna 1983, 18-22; P. Testini - G. Cantino Wataghin - L. Pani Ermini, La cattedrale in Italia, Actes du XI[e] Congrès Int. d'Archéologie Chrétienne, Rome 1989, 140-142; V. Zangara, Una predicazione alla presenza dei principi. La Chiesa di Ravenna nella prima metà del sec. V: AntTard 8 (2000) 265-304; Ravenna da capitale imperiale a capitale esarcale, Ravenna 6-12 giugno 2004 (XVII Congresso Internazionale di Studio del CISAM), 2 vols., Spoleto 2005; G. Cuscito, Riflessi della cristianizzazione dell'Italia settentrionale attraverso l'epigrafia, Atti del IX Congr. Naz. di Arch. Cristiana, Agrigento 20-25 novembre 2004, Palermo 2007, 651-670; C. Carletti, L'origine della prassi epigrafica dei cristiani nell'area ravennate: mitografia e realtà storica, in G. Cuscito (ed.), La cristianizzazione dell'adriatico, Trieste 2008, 127-150.

G. Cuscito

II. Councils. 419. After the death of Pope *Zosimus (27 December 418), a small group of deacons and presbyters at Rome elected the archdeacon *Eulalius while the majority of presbyters chose *Boniface (418–422) as the new pope. The Emperor *Honorius, who at that time was residing at Ravenna, convoked a council at the beginning of February 419 to resolve the question, at which the two contenders were present. This council, however, was unable to come to a solution because of the disagreement that existed between the participating bishops. The emperor then commissioned *Achilleus of Spoleto to celebrate the *Eastern rites at Rome and, shortly after, due to the insubordination shown by Eulalius, the emperor recognized Boniface as the pope.

Mansi 4, 399; Hfl-Lecl 2, 211; Palazzini 4, 42-43; DTC 2, 988-989; EC 2, 1863-1864; Fliche-Martin IV, 315-317; A. Simoncini, La Chiesa Ravennate, Ravenna 1964, 165-169; EPapi 1, 398-399; 1, 404ff.

499. In 498, upon the death of Pope *Anastasius II (18 November 498), *Symmachus was elected as his successor (498–514). Symmachus was opposed by *Laurentius (22 November 498), who was supported by the senate and a minority of the faithful. Both claimants were then called by *Theodoric to Ravenna, where a council was called by Archbishop Peter. At this council, Symmachus was recognized as the pope. Laurentius agreed to the ruling, and Pope Symmachus appointed him as bishop of Nocera.

EC 11, 629-630; Fliche-Martin IV, 424-425; A. Simoncini, La Chiesa Ravennate, Ravenna 1964, 170-174; T. Sardella, Società Chiesa e Stato nell'età di Teodorico. Papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996; EPapi 1, 473-475; Il papato di san Simmaco (498–514), ed. G. Mele - N. Spaccapelo, Cagliari 2000.

A. Di Berardino

RAVENNIUS of Arles (d. 460/461). Successor of *Hilary on the cathedra of *Arles in 449, the cause of which, even while a *presbyter, he had defended at Rome before Pope *Leo I in 446, but without, it seems, great success. During his election and consecration, twelve bishops of S *Gaul, among whom was *Rusticus of Narbonne, gathered at Arles and wrote a letter to Pope Leo about the event (see Leo, Ep. 40). He responded and expressed his satisfaction that they had chosen a person with everyone's agreement, namely, that of the bishops, the people and the nobility. During the same occasion, Leo wrote a letter to Ravennius and asked that he inform him more frequently about his most recent activity. Against Pope Leo's orders to the hierarchy of Gaul, he ordained the bishop of Vaison in 449 and incited a reaction from the bishop of *Vienne. This bishop wrote to the pope and obtained the support of 19 bishops, who asked Leo to recognize all the preceding rights of Arles. In 450, to resolve the dispute the pope was forced to organize the ecclesiastical provinces in a different way in order to impose other decisions on the bishops of the S, and practically speaking, Leo adhered to decisions of the Council of *Turin in 398. The pope sent Ravennius the *Tome to hand on to the bishops of Gaul (Ep. 67); a letter of support was received only in January of 452. Ravennius, with his claims, did not please the central-northern bishops of Gaul. He presided over the Council of Arles of 453.

E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, II, Paris [2]1966, 145ff. and passim; P.-M. Duval, La Gaule jusqu'au milieu du V^{e} siècle, Paris 1971, 775; R.W. Mathisen, Ecclesiastical Factionalism and Religious Controversy in Fifth Century Gaul, Washington, DC 1988, passim, esp. 173-205.

A. Hamman

REBAPTISMATE, De. This small treatise discusses "heretical *baptism": is it necessary to rebaptize those who, baptized by heretics, request to enter the *Catholic Church? Written by a bishop who was hostile to this practice, this treatise attacks another bishop who favored rebaptism. The work has been preserved under *Cyprian's name: an attribution that must be rejected because Cyprian favored rebaptism. The reconstruction of the text has been difficult to achieve because of the state of the manuscript tradition: the De rebaptismate has been passed down by only four late and corrupted sources, manuscripts and printed editions (17th-18th c.). The *heresies to which it alludes (*Marcionism) and its mention of martyrdom has led scholars to date it during the period of the 3rd-c. baptismal controversy and the time of Cyprian (255–256; against Baluze and Rauschen, who situated it in the 4th c.); it is less likely that the accusations that the treatise directs at and, in a certain way, attributes back to Cyprian could have been leveled after the martyrdom (14 September 258), or even after his exile (August 257). A further consideration: the De rebaptismate demonstrates that it not only knew Cypr., Ep. 69-72 (Ernst), but also Ep. 73 and 74 (non liquet with reference to Ep. 75 and Sent. LXXXVII episcop.); it was therefore written after Ep. 74 (Summer 256) and could have been before the dissemination of the Sent. and Ep. 75 (during the autumn of 256?).

In favor of the work's Italian, and not African, origin, some scholars have appealed to the probable use of Cyprian's Ep. 72, a synodal letter that supported rebaptism, that was sent to *Rome—which an African who was not aware of its wording, and which even *Augustine, during the *Donatist controversy, did not mention—must not have, as they maintain, been aware (Campeau). But it is incorrect to say that Ep. 72 was not circulated in *Africa: it was in fact read together with other letters at the council held on 1 September 256. The African origin of the De rebaptismate can be deduced from its biblical text (von Soden) and its silence on the primacy of Rome; that is, it does not presuppose that the anonymous author was from *Mauritania (Ernst). There were bishops, however, in Proconsular North Africa and *Numidia who did not perform rebaptism (Cypr., Ep. 70).

The De rebaptismate distinguished between the baptismal water (the baptismal washing) and the baptism of the *Spirit (*the laying-on of hands by the bishop); heretics and Catholics confer the first, but the second has no value except in the Catholic Church; the heretical washing does not confer any *grace, and the penitent heretic who receives nothing more than the impositio manus (the laying-on of hands), at least with this gesture obtains the entire efficacy of the *sacraments of initiation; neither does the Catholic washing produce any grace, unless it is followed by the baptism of the Spirit (or by the desire for this baptism, as in the case of an orthodox person who dies before the intervention of the bishop). It is a "certain initiation into the Lord's mystery," initium quoddam mysterii dominici (ch. 7), which by itself is insufficient (Ernst); the "baptism of blood" (according to the true *faith) makes up for all the other forms of baptism (the case of the *martyr *catechumen). The De rebaptismate's notion of the church allows one to measure Cyprian's paradoxical influence on it: because it was focused on its adversary, the anonymous author poorly defended the renewed sacramental theology, the intuition of which he was able to perceive; if he anticipated the idea of the opus operatum, Cyprian's formula extra ecclesiam nulla salus*, which he accepted, echoes the author's mere ambition for originality without the actually providing any (Mattei). The work's obscurity is owed to the author's inability to present a unified doctrine. Moreover, the anonymous author's literary culture situates him between Cyprian and the rest of the African episcopate.

CPL 59; PL 3, 1183-1204; W. Hartel, CSEL 3,3 (1871) 69-92; G. Rauschen, FP 11 (1916); J. Doignon, Herzog 4, § 480.3, with an exhaustive bibl.; F. Bovon, De Vocatione Gentium. Histoire et interprétation d'Act. 10,1-11,18 dans les six premiers siècles, Tübingen 1967, 271-280; L. Campeau, L'origine de la querelle baptismale (2): Science et Esprit 22 (1970) 34-41; P. Mattei, Remarques sur la tradition textuelle (manuscrite et imprimée) du De rebaptismate: SP 26 (2001) 35-45.

P. Mattei

REBEKAH (iconography). The only scene relating to Rebekah, the wife of Isaac (Gen 24ff.), is considered to be that of the Mausoleum of the Exodus located in El-Bagawat, *Egypt (beginning of the 5th c.). Depicted therein are Rebekah and Eliezer at Nahor's well (Gen 24:11ff.). Rebekah (with the subtitle PENBEKA) is facing a well, giving Eliezer something to drink, alongside whom are two camels and a servant, who is leading a saddled donkey. Often, however, Rebekah appears in the miniatures. Among the most ancient is the Genesis of Vienna (6th c.), in which she is found on three pages. On the first (VII, 13), Rebekah comes to Nahor with the jug on her shoulders, and, in the lower portion, she gives something to drink to *Abraham's servant, who has ten camels with him. In the second (VII, 14), Rebekah receives a golden necklace as a gift from the servant; in the lower register, to the left, he asks her a question, and to the right, in the inset, he is speaking with Laban. Lastly (VIII, 16), in a scene containing Isaac and Abimelech, Rebekah stands alongside Isaac, who has the two Gerarenes behind him; in the lower quadrant she embraces Isaac, under Abimelech's palace. In the Latin Pentateuch of Tours (now known as Ashburnham), from the Bibliothèque Nationale de France (Paris) (8th c.), inspired by a 6th c. model, on f. 22v, one finds the event of Rebekah's giving birth; alongside her stand three individuals.

EC 10, 601; LCI 3, 503-504; Garrucci, Storia 3, pl. 115, 1, 2, 4; G. von Gerhardt, The Miniatures of the Ashburnham Pentateuch, London 1883; W. von Hartel - F. Wickhoff, Die Wiener Genesis, Vienna 1895, 150-151: pls. XIII, XIV, XVI; H. Stern, Les peintures du Mausolée de l'Éxode à El-Bagawat: CArch 11 (1960) 93-119; A. Grabar, Christian Iconography, Princeton, NJ 1968, fig. 308; M.L. Thérel, La composition et le symbolisme de l'iconographie de l'Éxode à El-Bagawat: RivAC 45 (1969) 228-270.

M. Perraymond

RECAPITULATION. According to the classical and biblical use of the term ἀνακεφαλαίωσις (Rom 13:10; Eph 1:10) and especially by adhering to the Pauline theme of the two *Adams, *Irenaeus elaborated his famous doctrine of recapitulation within the framework of his presentation of the history of salvation, which was characterized, moreover, by concepts of οἰκονομία, the mutual adaptation of God and man, and *progress and education. By ἀνακεφαλαίωσις, he understood the *incarnation as it summarizes and completes earlier human history, the institution of Christ as head of the entire universe, the fact that Christ and *Mary, through their obedience, have repaired Adam and Eve's disobedience. Even if later authors did not adopt this soteriological theory in its entirety, they did draw on it, esp. for the idea of the ineffable exchange between sinful humanity and God the Savior.

RAC 1 (1950) 411-414; J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique, Paris 1961, 156-169; R. Schwager, Der wunderbare Tausch, Munich 1986; L. Scheffczyk, Anakephalaiosis: LTK³ 1, 572-573 (bibl.).

B. Studer

RECARED (mid 6th c.–601). King of the *Visigoths of *Spain. He succeeded his father, *Leovigild, who, when dying, entrusted him to Bishop *Leander of *Seville so that he might be instructed in the Catholic faith. Already shaken by the violent death of his brother *Hermenegild, who had rebelled against his *Arian father, he rejected *heresy and thereby led his subjects to embrace *orthodoxy. He convoked the 3rd Council of *Toledo (589). Leander probably edited the speeches Recared delivered during that gathering. His *conversion marked a definitive turn in the political and religious history of Spain. He died at Toledo in 601.

Historia de la Iglesia en España, ed. R. García Villoslada, I, Madrid 1979, 401-413; S. Teillet, Des Goths à la nation Gothique, Paris 1984, 448ff.; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Los discursos del rey Recaredo. El Tomus, in var. aus., Concilio III de Toledo. XIV Centenario 589–1989, Toledo 1991, 223-236; Domínguez del Val, II, 478-481.

L. Navarra

RECTA IN DEUM FIDE, De. After the translation of *Origen's De principiis, *Rufinus, probably with the objective of distancing himself from every possible accusation of *heresy, translated the dialogue De recta in Deum fide, and attributed it to Origen under the pseudonym *Adamantius. *Basil of Caesarea and Gregory of Nazianzus (Philocalia 24) and earlier *Eusebius (HE 6,23,2) had already made the identification of Origen under the name Adamantius. In reality, this Adamantius, the primary interlocutor, if not the very author of the dialogue, can hardly be considered a contemporary of Origen, but could, however, be placed in the 4th c., and thus a contemporary to *Methodius of Olympus. Like Methodius, Adamantius was hostile toward Origen's teachings.

The work was directed against the followers of *Marcion, *Bardesanes and *Valentinus, and consisted of two parts: the first mentions Marcion's ideas and is defended by his two students (Megantius and Mark); the other takes the opinions of Bardesanes, which were defended by his student Marinus. Adamantius vociferously defended the orthodox doctrine and at the end obtained the agreement of a certain Eutropius, who, though pagan, was chosen as an arbiter in the controversy. There still remains the original Greek text written probably in *Syria from which the Latin translation was made.

CPL 198*i*; PG 11, 1755-1762; W.H. van de Sande Bakhuyzen, GCS 4, Leipzig 1901; V. Buchheit, Tyranii Rufini librorum Adamantii Origeniis adversus haereticos interpretatio, Studia et Testimonia antiqua I, Munich 1966; Pamphilus Caesariensis - Eusebius: Caesariensis - Rufinus Tyrannius, Apologie pour Origène. Texte critique, tr. et notes par R. Amacker et E. Junod, Paris 2002; EC 4, 1449-50; V. Buchheit, Rufinus von Aquileja als Fälscher des Adamantiosdialog: ByzZ 51 (1958) 314-428; Altaner 217; G. Sanders, Un écrit oublié, le Dialogue d'Adamantius: Antiquité Cl. 37 (1968) 644-651; J. Quasten, Patrologia I, 406-407; Patrologia III, 236-237; EP 541-544; V. Volpi, Dizionario delle opere classiche, Milan 1994, I, 13.

L. Dattrino

REDEMPTION. In the modern languages, under the terms that derive from the Latin noun redemptio, or that are translated literally (Ger. Erlösung), one commonly understands the totality of the salvific work of Jesus Christ, accomplished especially in his death (DTC 13/2, 1912). In the strict sense, however, redemption is equivalent to the ransom paid by Christ to deliver humankind from the forces of evil (the devil, demons and cosmic powers). Because, however, behind the metaphor of ransom, taken from military language (prisoners of war) rather than legal-mercantile language (slavery) (Elert), there is the idea of liberation, it is also necessary to take into consideration the categories and images that evoke the same idea of liberation such as the victory over demons, the deception of the devil, the devil's abuse of power, human revenge on an equal footing, etc. That is much more legitimate because in the same patristic literature all these motifs are continually intertwined not only among each other but also with other soteriological themes (see *soteriology, *expiation, *divinization, *illumination). Moreover, it is significant that in Latin the term redemptio and the verb "to redeem" do not include the idea of the price of the ransom in texts before the 4th c. (Braun, Deus, 506-511).

As in the NT itself, both in the gospels (Lk 10:18; Jn 12:31; 14:30) and in the Pauline corpus (1 Cor 2:8; Eph 2:2; Col 2:15), the victorious supremacy of Christ is so frequently mentioned that it is not surprising that this theme appears early in patristic texts. In the 2nd c., in fact, which was heavily dominated by dualistic tendencies and heavily influenced by Greek-Jewish demonology, *Justin Martyr often emphasized the victory Christ obtained over the demons both in his earthly existence, first in the temptation and passion, and in the persecuted church (Studer, Soteriologie, 69-70). After him, in part even before, Christian authors, as in the case of Christian *iconography, continually turned to the mysteries of Jesus' life that were understood as a manifestation of his superiority in comparison to the demons (Turner, Jesus, 55-59). This primarily held with respect to his death, which put *death to death (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 18,6.8; Aug., Tract. Joh. 12,11; Leo, Serm. 22,4); with respect to his *descent into hell in which the last forces of the devil were conquered (Grillmeier); and with respect to his ascension as a triumphal return through the celestial spheres (Daniélou).

In the 2nd c., in the controversy against *Marcion, who opposed the good and merciful God of the NT to the vengeful God of the OT (Mk 10:45; 2 Pet 2:1), this concept and the precious blood (1 Pet 1:19) (Braun, Deus, 506-507) was used to elaborate a theory of redemption, according to which God or especially Christ paid the just price to the devil to redeem men, who had become his prisoners or who had actually sold themselves to him as the price for sin. This theory that concedes a certain right acquired by the devil—that is, it attributes a certain "fair play" to God who is always just, even if good—is already announced in the writings of *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. V, 1,1). Moreover, united to the motif of the devil's ignorance (1 Cor 2:8; Ign., Eph. 19,1-3) and especially to that of the deception (fishhook, venom), it reached its full development in the writings of *Origen of Alexandria (Hom. Ex. 6,9; Com. Mt. 16,8) and *Gregory of Nyssa (Cat. 22-23; Barbel, Gregor, 146-149; Studer, Soteriologie, 71-72). Nevertheless, the idea that God, though conceding to the devil a certain right over humanity, deceived the devil by inducing him to take revenge on an innocent person, Christ, who was without sin, and thereby caused the devil to lose dominion over humankind, was criticized as early as the 4th c. by an anonymous author (Adam. dial.: PG 11, 1756-1757) and by *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 45,22). Both in the East (DTC 13/2, 1939-1940), and especially in the West, a similar theory, namely that of the abusus potestatis (abuse of authority), is found in patristic literature especially in homiletic texts (Kessler, Bedeutung, 76-77). By arguing that the devil's ignorance primarily pertained to the mystery of Jesus's virginal conception, it emphasized even more heavily the devil's abuse of power with respect to Christ, who was void of original sin, although fully human and therefore in solidarity with all humankind (*Hilary, Psalm. 68,8; Aug., Trin. 13,12, 16-15,19; Leo, Serm. 22,3-4, etc.).

Moreover, it is significant how *Augustine, who was followed by Pope *Leo and others, played word games with the term redemptio and other terms such as pretium, mercator, etc., making clear that for him, redemption was a metaphor that, in the end, does not signify anything beyond the gospel's idea of "the stronger man" (Mt 12:29) (Serm. 130,2; En. ps. 147,16). In the controversial perspective of the 2nd c. (anti-*gnostic and anti-*Marcionite) in which it was necessary to defend the unity of the two testaments, the Pauline antithesis of the first and second *Adam (Rom 5:12-19) was already taken in the sense of revenge (see *recapitulation). The one who had been overcome in *paradise in turn had to overcome, in Christ, his overcomer. The following authors were influenced by this view: Irenaeus (Adv. haer. III, 18,7) and much later adherents to Augustinian theology (Aug., Ench. 108; Trin. 13,17,22-23; Leo, Serm. 22,3; 42,3; 63,1) and even the *liturgy that was inspired by it (see Miss. Rom., praef. De cruce, in Rivière, Dogme 98 n.1).

When finally in the 4th c. Christianity showed itself to be victorious over ancient *paganism, Christian authors, especially in their *Easter *preaching, expressed Christ's supremacy with respect to all adversarial forces; they even used the triumphal language of a Roman conquest. Already outlined in the NT (Col 2:15; 2 Cor 2:14; Rev 19:11-16) and always present in the writings of the first three centuries, especially in the acts of the martyrs, the manner of comparing the death and *resurrection of Jesus to a military victory was now used even in the very details of the Roman triumphus. Thus, in the writings of *Ambrose (Fid. IV, 1-2; Luc. 10,107-112) and Pope *Leo (Serm. 69,4; 74,1), the way of the cross (via crucis) and the ascension are presented as the triumph of the King of Glory (rex gloriae—see also *John Chrysostom, Hom. 2 Cor. 5,1 and another texts in Lampe 654-655 and Blaise 830-831). From ancient criticisms concerning the theology of redemption, but also from certain reservations passed on by the authors themselves who had used it (Aug., Trin., 13,13,17), it is evident that already in a certain way the categories and images used should often be judged as excessive concessions both to the anti-Marcionite controversy and popular taste. One should understand, therefore, that to a large extent later theology eliminated it and substituted it with the idea of vicarious substitution (substitutio vicaria—e.g., St. Anselm of Canterbury). Nevertheless, although the early theory of redemption was a bit one-sided, one cannot deny that it, especially for its essential idea of Christ's victory over the forces of evil, includes a fundamental gospel truth, that is, that God alone in Christ leads humanity—who has been freed by and created by him, and who is exposed to many external pernicious influences—to an open dialogue with him.

J. Rivière, Le dogme de la rédemption après s. Augustin, Paris 1930; DTC 13, 1912-2004; W. Elert, Redemptio ab hostibus: ThLZ 72 (1947) 265-270; J. Daniélou, Bible et Liturgie, Paris 1951, 409-428; R. Braun, Deus Christianorum, Paris 1962; H.E.W. Turner, Jésus le Sauveur, Paris 1965; C. Andresen, Erlösung: RAC 6 (1966) 54-219, esp. 55-61: terminology; J. Barbel, Gregor v. N., Die grosse katechetische Rede, Stuttgart 1971; H. Kessler, Die theologische Bedeutung des Todes Jesu, Paderborn 1970; A. Grillmeier, Der Gottessohn im Totenreich. Mit ihm und in ihm, Freiburg 1975, 76-174; B. Studer, Soteriologie der Kirchenväter, in HDG 3/2a, Freiburg 1978; S. Poque, Le langage symbolique dans la prédication d'Augustin d'Hippone, Paris 1984; H. Wagner, Erlösung, III: LTK³ 3, 805-808; F.G. Clancy, Redemption: Augustine (1999) 702-704 (bibl.).

B. Studer

REFRIGERIUM. From the Latin refrigerare, refrigerium, "to cool, refresh" and "comfort" (it corresponds to the Greek terms: ἀναψύχω, ἀνάπαυσις, "relax, rest," "refreshment" and "relief"). The term was used in classical literature both in its physical sense (Cicero, De Sen. 16.67, "cool, refresh"; thus even Pliny, Nat. Hist. 21,46) and in a moral sense ("to appease," "to cool the flames of passion"). In the ancient Christian tradition, especially in the Latin West, it was intended to refer to two very precise and very broad concepts: On the one hand, refrigerium, which was used widely in the writings of the *Fathers, designated that eschatological reality which was intended to refer either to the deceased souls' blessed lingering in an intermediate state before the judgment, or to the eternal repose in *paradise, eternal happiness (Tert., Apol. 49,2; De Monog. 10). On the other hand, it also referred to the funerary cult that the Christians offered to their own dead and to the martyrs who were near their tombs with the hope of bringing their memory back to life in their minds. With that cult—which was developed on the framework of the sacred meal, as in the case of the pagan parentalia (from 13-21 February, a feast intended to placate the souls of the ancestors: Ovid, Fast. II, 533)—in addition to recalling the dead to memory, they prayed for their condition and eternal comfort. In this manner, they also appeared to be very connected concepts in the Christian tradition. Initially, only the relatives of the deceased participated at this banquet, but having been established as an ecclesiastical practice supported by communal money (Tert., Apol. 39,12), even the poor took part. Nonetheless, one should not confuse this practice with the agape*, which was also present until the 4th c.

The semantic origins of the term among the Christian communities, in the sense of "eternal rest" or rather of the "blessed condition" of the righteous after death, was garnered not only from classical literature but also and especially from *Scripture itself (OT: Ps 65:11; Wis 4:7; Jer 6:16; in the new vulgata, NT: Lk 16:24; 2 Tim 1:16). From the 2nd c. onward we find a use in its eschatological sense (Passio SS. Felicitas et Perpetua, 3). Various graffiti attest to its use and constitute definite sources for the Christian meanings applied to the term (IG 638, CIL 14.3323). These graffiti have been found primarily in the catacombs, which speak of this awaited rest by the parents for their dearly beloved and righteous relatives: in pace et in refrigerium, spiritus in refrigerium.

There are also clear testimonies of the dissemination of this concept, tightly connected to funerary practice used among Christians, especially in the rooms in the underground cemeteries (Catacomb of Domitilla). There one perceives a semantic transition from refreshment in the physical sense to that eschatological sense of eternal comfort. Patristic documentation of its use is sizable both in official ecclesiastical documents (the letter to Pope *Damasus, Council of *Constantinople 381) and in literary texts: e.g., *Tertullian (De orat. 25.26; Adv. Marc. 3), *Cyprian (De mort. 15), *Ambrose (De bon. mort. 2,5), *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 34.35.36), *Zeno of Verona (Tract. 1,2.62), *Augustine (Conf. 13,25; En. ps. 38.65) and *Jerome (Comm. Is. 9,28).

Refrigerium as a funerary ritual practice is closely connected to the Hellenistic Euergetism, both to the banquets found therein among *pagans and Jews—banquets the attendees used to establish a relationship with the world of the dead and to "refresh" their present condition and their memory. In Roman rituals, funerary meals had the function of establishing the role of the deceased person in the familial group; in Christian communities, its practice was enriched both by *eucharistic elements (in relation to the heavenly banquet) and by the fraternal component that made charity explicit. This banquet recalled the anniversary of the deceased person's birth to the heavenly life, and it was celebrated near their tomb. Soon this banquet also became a pious way of rendering veneration to the martyrs, and it spread quickly in the 3rd and 4th c., in a special way in the African church, where it became a special and popular devotion (Aug., Conf. VI, 2). Toward the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c., the practice of this cult fell into various vices and assimilated pagan practices. As a result, it was condemned and prohibited by many bishops, even though they themselves had encouraged this practice as a cult of devotion to the dead and the martyrs as due expressions of faith and works of charity, which expressed solidarity with those most in need. Initially, it was prohibited in the church of *Milan and subsequently in the African church (Aug., Ep. 29.22; Serm. 361,6).

A.M. Schneider, Refrigerium, I, Freiburg 1928; G. Van der Leeuw, Refrigerium: Mnemosyne 3 (1935) 125-148; J. Quasten, Vetus superstitio et nova religio. The Problem of Refrigerium in the Ancient Church of North Africa: HTR 33 (1940) 253-266; A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim. Die Vorstellungen vom Zwischenzustand und die frühchristliche Grabkunst, Bonn 1957; A. Hamman, Vie liturgique et vie sociale, Paris 1968, 202-218; P.-A. Février, Le culte des morts dans les communautés chrétiennes durant le III^e siècle, in Atti del IX Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana, Roma 21-27 settembre 1975, I, Vatican City 1978, 211-264; Ch. Pietri: RAC 12 (1983) 561; E. Dassman, RAC 17 (1996) 395-400; A. McGowan, Ascetic Eucharists, Food and Drink in Early Christian Ritual Meals, Oxford 1999; B. Mazzei, s.v. banchetti: TIP 2000.

J.F. Rubio Navarro

REGINUS. (5th c.). Bishop of Constantia (Salamis), *Cyprus. He participated at the 3rd ecumenical council (*Ephesus 431). Along with his colleagues Zeno of Kurion and Evagrius of Soli, he presented to the council a booklet that accused the patriarch of *Antioch of having violated the autocephaly of the church of Cyprus. In a homily delivered during the same occasion, a homily which has also been passed down in an Ethiopian version, he took a stance in favor of the dismissal of *Nestorius from the patriarchate of *Constantinople.

CPG 3, 6485-6486; the Libellus in Greek: ACO I, 1,7, pp. 118-119; in Latin: ACO I, 5, p. 357-358; the Sermo in Greek: ACO I, 1,2, pp. 70-71; in Latin: ACO I, 3, pp. 168-169.

J. Irmscher

REGULA FIDEI. This expression in antiquity indicated, among other similar expressions such as professio fidei (a brief formula of a confession of faith) and the symbola fidei (the creeds tied to *baptism), a norm for the Christian search for truth. We have explicit testimony concerning the regula fidei in the writings of *Tertullian and *Irenaeus of Lyons. Tertullian spoke of it in the De virginibus velandis 1 (regula fidei credendi scilicet), in Adv. Prax. 3 and especially in the De praescriptione, where in ch. 13 he also provided the enumeration of the articles of faith (there are 13). Irenaeus called it the regula veritatis in Adv. haer. (I, 1,20) and the regula fidei in the Demonstr. apost. (ch. 3). There are three difficulties inherent in understanding the phrase regula fidei: (1) the specific pinpointing of its content, recognizing, in general, a substratum that borders on the baptismal creeds, because it encompasses not only a confession of faith but also the observance of customs practiced in the church (ecclesiastical canon or rule of tradition, as *Clement of Alexandria calls it, Strom. I, 1,15; VI, 18,165; "the preaching of the church": *Origen, In Joh. com. V, 81). (2) A second problem pertains to its origin (how it came to be formed and under what directive norm) and to its function (did this norm of faith—one may ask—at the same time also establish its synthesis?). It had an adequate evaluation at the beginning of theological reflection, that is, in the controversy with *gnosticism and at the time of the translation of the Christian message into the categories of Greek thought. An appeal was made to the regula fidei as a methodological norm for study: in reading the *Scriptures (ps.-Athan., De trin. VII, 5); in the language to be used (Aug., Civ. Dei X, 23); in the traditions to respect, for example, the date established in the celebration of *Easter by the church leaders of *Asia Minor (Eus., HE 5, 24,6); and also in the trinitarian formulation to be used in the administration of baptism (ps.-Athan., De trin. VII, 10). In general, this rule was identified as a guiding norm for the investigation of the faith as opposed to and distancing itself from *philosophies (Ambr., Exam. 11, 1,3) and Christian views judged as heterodox. (3) In reality, the regula fidei, although difficult to clarify, performed the function of a regulating norm of faith in the dialectic of *orthodoxy-*heresy that sharpened with every contact of Christian acculturation. A recovery of this meaning of regula fidei would give evidence to its positive function over against its negative function of elimination (although this is inherent within it), and it would help create a more appropriate dialectic in the relationship between magisterium and theological research, proposing more meaningful formulations for all the faithful and therefore not only for theologians. The various regulae fidei of ancient Christianity were therefore not retrospective records for safeguarding the Christian faith, but by inserting themselves in the journey of Christian history, they constituted a guiding method for transmitting the essential nucleus of Christian truths, providing an orientation for research amid the continual process of acculturation and inculturation of faith. This concept slowly began to be identified with that of the Christian tradition, that stream of the Christian communities' journey through ever-changing cultures but ultimately arriving at its own unique Christian culture.

D. Van den Eynde, Les normes de l'enseignement chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles, Gembloux 1933; B. Hägglund, Die Bedeutung der "regula fidei" als Grundlage theologischer Aussagen, Lund 1958; A. Brekelmans, Professione di fede nella Chiesa antica. Origine e funzione: Concilium 1970, 49-58; V. Grossi, "Regula veritatis" e narratio battesimale in s. Ireneo: Augustinianum 12 (1972) 437-463.

V. Grossi

REIMS. Durocorturum, then in Late Antiquity the Urbs Remensis (the city of Reims), became the metropolis of Belgica II under *Diocletian and an economic and vibrant military center. The first bishop who is identified with certainty, Imbetausius, who was preceded in the *episcopal list by three unknown titulars (Sixtus, Sinicius and Amausius), appears in 314 (Council of *Arles). The testimony of *Gregory of Tours on the two local martyrs Timothy and Apollinaris (Glor. Martyr. 55) does not guarantee the historicity of the two saints; their historicity is as hypothetical as that of the purported founder Sixtus, who is first on the list of bishops (Flodoard, Hist. Rem. Eccles. I, 2; Duchesne, Fastes III, p. 77).

Imbetausius is followed on this list by Aper, Maternianus, Donatianus, Viventius, Severus and Nicasius (it is not known whether he fell victim to the *Vandals in 407, or the Huns in 451), Baruc (Barucius), Barnabas, Bennasius, who were all of little importance before the work of Remigius (an Alemanni bishop 457–518). In 482, he greeted the advent of *Clovis, whom he baptized between 496 and 508 at Reims, which became a metropolis of Catholic *Gaul for the S churches that were already under the rule of the *Arian kings. But his successors Romanus, Flavius (. . . 535 . . .), Mappinius (. . . 549) seem to have been erased from the record; Egidius placed himself, at the end of the 6th c., at the service of the political interests of King Sigebert and Fredegund, but was deposed by Childebert in 590. This indicates that by that time the bishops in some way performed the role of palace prelates.

Regarding the bishops of the 8th c., our knowledge is reduced almost entirely to Flodoard's testimony, who makes reference to their *donations; Romulf, Sonnatius (. . . 614–627), Laudigesilus, Angelbert, Landon, Nivon and Reolus (former count of Champagne); for the 8th c., Rigobertus (who was deposed in 717 by Charles Martel, who imposed the bishop of Trèves, Milo, on Reims), then an Irish monk, Abel, in 743, who preceded another monk (from Saint-Denis) Tilpinus (748–794).

From the buildings of the Christian community there remain only the testimonies supplied by the texts: intra muros (within the walls), a cathedral (initially dedicated to the *apostles), doubled by a second building (attested to since the 6th c. and dedicated to St. Maria), a baptistery and a church of St. *Peter (7th c. according to Flodoard); outside the walls, the Mausoleum of Jovinus, a military commander (magister militum), which would then bear the title of St. Nicasius, three basilicas dedicated to Timothy and Apollinaris, at St. Julian and at St. Remigius, attested by Gregory of Tours and, from the 7th c., the ecclesia Sancti Sixti et Sinicii: these buildings were grouped together to the south of the castrum in a cemeterial area that would become the village of St.-Rémy.

J. Leflon, Histoire de l'Église de Reims du Ier au Ve s.: Travaux de l'Académie de Reims 152, 1941; DACL 14, 2213-2290; H. Reinhardt, La cathédrale du VIe s. à Genève et l'Église du baptême de Clovis à Reims: Geneva 11 (1963) 127-139; L. Pietri, Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule (IV-VIII s.), I, Paris 1974, 73-83; J.-P. Martin, Une grande alliée des Romains, in P. Desportes (éd.), Histoire de Reims, Toulouse 1983, 13-54; P. Desportes, La capitale cléricale du haut Moyen Âge (Ve-XIe siècles), in ibid., 55-91; Reims. Ville du sacre: Les dossiers d'archéologie 186 (1993).

Ch. Pietri - M. Ghilardi

RELICS. The term reliquiae, λείψανα, only acquired a technical sense starting from the mid-4th c. (can. 8 of the Council of Carthage of 397 and Greg. Naz., Or. 5,29); the term appears gradually later (452) in the inscriptions IN HOC LOCO DEPOSITAE SUNT RELIQUIAE SANCTI LAURENTI MARTYRIS (CIL, VIII, 8630). The practice of collecting remains of the *martyrs is ancient: as early as the 2nd c., churches sought to obtain the restitution of the martyrs' bodies, an authorization that the magistrate could refuse if the martyrs were accused of lese majesty, indeed, the only crime for which the magistrate could refuse their request. The Martyrium Policarpi 18,1-3 is the most ancient testimony in this regard: despite the requests, *Polycarp's body was burned and not returned; the faithful, however, were able to collect the bones and bury them in a place where they had gathered to celebrate his birthday "in memory and for the exercise and preparation" of future martyrs. The martyrs of *Lyons and *Vienne did not have their remains buried, because the faithful were unable to put into effect the necessary means—money offerings, the carrying away of the bodies overnight—by which they sought to circumvent the magistrates' prohibition (Eus., HE 5,1,49-61). The extraordinary success of the cult of the martyrs and the saints starting in the 4th c. brought to the fore numerous legal, political and liturgical problems tied to the presence of the relics in the places of worship.

Humatum corpus nemo ad alterum locum transferat, nemo martyrem distrahat, nemo mercetur: thus reads one of *Theodosius's constitutions (386) that extended to the bodies of saints the traditional legislation that regarded the violation of tombs as a serious crime; this constitution was reiterated in 439 by the Theodosian Code (IX, 17,7). Despite these laws, the practices—even of the imperial court itself—were very different, even if with time the differences tended to decrease. In the West, at least until the 7th c., the official position of the church was to exclude the possibility of touching the bodies of the saints and a fortiori to divide them for distributing their relics: *Gregory the Great, when responding to Constantina, the wife of the emperor Maurice who had asked him for the head of St. *Paul or some other part of his body, affirmed that "among the Romans and all the West" it was intolerable and sacrilegious to touch the bodies of the saints (Ep. IV, 30) and, in effect, it seems that the church of the West remained faithful to these guidelines by continuing to construct churches and oratories on places where the bodies of the saints were found.

There is no lack, however, of even famous exceptions both with respect to the translation and the fragmentation of the bodies of the saints: one thinks, for example, of *Ambrose, bishop of Milan, to whom was owed the translation of the bodies of Saints *Gervasius and Protasius, *Nazarius and Celsus to *Milan, *Vitalis and Agricola to Bologna (Ep. 22; De exhort. Virg. 1.2; *Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii 29), and *Gregory the Great himself seems to have sent to *Recared, king of the Goths, the hair of *John the Baptist (Ep. IX, 122). The movement and fragmentation of the body of the saints, however, remained events surrounded by precautions and special fears because in hagiographical literature stories abounded concerning the direct intervention of the saints (in a vision, dream or with other miraculous signs) to legitimate or prevent their removal: St. *Fructuosus, a martyr of *Tarragona, appeared in a dream to the faithful who had divided his bodily remains in order to enjoin their proper restitution to one sole place (Passio S. Fruct. BHL n. 3196, § 1); a presbyter attempted to remove part of the relics of Timothy and Apollinaris, but was unable to get away from them and was thereby forced to return them to their place (Gregory of Tours, Libri mirac. I, 55).

In the East, however, we see important proponents of the churches publicly making statements in favor of the practice of distributing the relics of the saints: *Basil of Caesarea approved that the relics of the *Forty Martyrs of Sebaste be present in more churches and that they protect such relics (Hom. In sanctos XL martyr. 8); *Theodoret (Graec. Affect. Cur. 8) and *Gregory of Nazianzus (C. Iulian. I, 69) affirmed that even though they were dismembered and divided into various tombs, the bodies of the saints continue to possess their indivisible virtus.

The use of relics in the dedication of churches and even secondary altars between the 4th and 7th c. was the most significant catalyst toward an increasingly self-confident practice regarding the bodies of the saints. This ceremony included precisely the deposition of relics under the altar: this was done, for example, at Milan by Ambrose with the relics of Gervasius and Protasius during the inauguration of the church of Porta Romana. In the East, the possession of famous relics capable of competing with those possessed by the most important cities such as *Rome, *Antioch and *Alexandria was considered by the emperors an essential aspect both of their own prestige and *Constantinople's. For this reason, they sought to obtain elsewhere those relics that the recent history of the city did not make available: when in 360 *Constantius inaugurated the Hagia Sophia, he ordered that the bodies of *Pamphilus and his companions who were put to death under *Diocletian at Caesarea, *Palestine, be brought from Antioch. To obtain for their own city the bodies of the saints or part of them was considered even by bishops an essential element for legitimizing their power. The translation of relics grew into collective rites that were celebrated at every feast; political motivations were inextricably intertwined with religious faith in the effective protection offered by the saint toward that city in which the relics lay: the De laude sanctorum by *Victricius of Rouen (d. 410) precisely described a ceremony of this type.

A source of new relics was the inventiones, the discovery and identification of the bodies of the saints for which there did not yet exist a cult tradition. A dream revealed to Pope *Damasus (366–386) the place where the remains of Eutychus lay; and for *Ambrose, the remains of Sts. Gervasius and Protasius. The inventio (discovery) of St. *Stephen's relics (415) and their fragmentation among many churches of the empire were events of such resonance so as to change Augustine's attitude with respect to the cult of the relics, who went from initially being indifferent to becoming an active supporter (Saxer).

Other ways of obtaining the relics were easier: we have already seen how Christians did not have any scruples about using any means necessary to obtain the remains of martyrs from the pagan authorities who often denied such relics to them. Soon relics were stolen from other Christians; the most ancient testimony seems to be that recorded by the *Chronography of 354, Depositio Martyrum, 10 July: Hunc Silanum martyrem Nouati furati sunt (other examples can be found in Leclerq, col. 2312). Disputes often arose between churches in different locations over which had the right to receive the mortal remains of the saint. The way to resolve this disagreement was often to simply steal the body by using various ploys. This was the case with the remains of *Martin, which were fought over by *Poitiers and *Tours: the first was the city see of the monastery established by Martin, and the second, the episcopal see of the saint himself. With deception and some violence, the inhabitants of the second city got the upper hand because—as Gregory notes, who was the successor of Martin in the same episcopal see—"Almighty God did not want the city of Tours to lose its patron" (Hist. Franc. I, 48).

In any case, the requests—even by private individuals—for relics were such that they could not be satisfied by either translations or even the fragmentation of the bodies of the saints: from the end of the 4th c., the church considered those objects that came into actual contact with the body of saints worthy of devotion; these were objects that either had belonged to the saints when they were alive or had come into contact with their relics at a later point. To the first type belonged such objects as the saint's clothes: Simplicius Severus recounts that the threads taken from Martin's clothes healed the sick (Vita Martini 18). After the death of St. *Honoratus a crowd of faithful who were eager to possess a relic of the saint removed the clothes from the corpse (Ven. Fort., Sermo de vita s. Onorati 7,35). They were even satisfied by less "intimate" objects: for example, the instruments used for his torture were the objects of great devotion: although he refused to send Constantina the head of St. Paul, *Gregory the Great sent her the links of the chains that held Paul prisoner (Ep. IV, 30). The second type of relics pertain to all those objects, which had various names—brandea, pignora, sanctuaria, beneficia—that entered into contact with the bones of the martyr or were sanctified by a continued presence near their sepulcher (as, e.g., the oil of the votive lamps). From the point of view of the saint's "presence" they were considered equivalent to the bodies themselves (Greg. the Great, Dial. 2,38). In this category of relics, one should especially mention the palliola, that is, pieces of material sanctified by contact with the saint's body and then distributed among the faithful.

A special devotion surrounded those contact relics that recalled *Jesus's life and passion: from the cross—according to a tradition known by *Ambrose and *Paulinus of Nola—discovered by *Helena, the mother of *Constantine, on Golgotha, to the lance that pierced his side, the sponge that was placed near his lips, the rocks of the well near which Jesus stopped to talk with the Samaritan woman, etc. (a list concerning especially *Constantinople is found in H. Leclerq).

A very delicate problem that faced the bishops early on was that of the control of the cult of the relics: the African church was the most active in pushing for the need to clamp down on the cults of the *Donatist martyrs; at Tours, Martin ordered the demolition of an oratory dedicated to a martyr who turned out to be a brigand who had been killed for his crimes: his inquiry among the clergy was unsuccessful, and only through divine revelation obtained through prayer was he able to attain clarification on the matter (V. Mart. 11); in addition to the edifying result, the means used by Martin to unmask the false martyr was rather indicative of the practical impossibility of the episcopate to check by every ordinary means at their disposal the proliferation of the cults of relics of dubious authenticity. In effect, the episode with Martin remains a rather isolated event in the documentation pertaining to the Late Antique and Early Medieval church (see Hermann-Mascard, 81ff.).

Altogether, the cult of the relics in the ancient church obtained the support of all its members: the bishops, monks, simple faithful and, among these, first and foremost, the representatives of the highest social strata; it is enough to simply cite for all these the case of *Paulinus of Nola and his activity in promoting the cult of St. *Felix. The use of burial (de-positio) ad sanctos, that is, near to the relics of the saints in the conviction that this practice would help the *soul of the deceased person's journey into the afterlife became widespread starting from the 2nd half of the 4th c., especially with regard to the privileged social classes who were able to take initiative in constructing chapels, establishing another mighty spring for the cult of relics. It would be erroneous, therefore, to consider it an expression only of the popular contingent of society. This success found one of its most significant expressions in the hagiographic work of Gregory of Tours: his eight Libri miraculorum consist of a vast repertory of miracles that occurred near the relics of saints. On the other hand, before the iconoclast crisis that also involved relics, there were few dissenting voices: the only voice of a certain importance that caused Jerome's response was that of *Vigilantius (C. Vigilan.). The lack of consistent and repeated criticisms explains the absence of deep theological reflection on the theme of the relics, even if with a few exceptions: *Victricius of Rouen affirmed that "the one who heals also lives, and lives in the relics. The *apostles and the martyrs heal and purify and therefore resided in the relics locked with the bond of all eternity" (De laude sanct. 11). The reflections offered by *John of Damascus were more theologically profound: through the intellect of the saints God has taken up his habitation in their bodies, and "therefore, would it not be necessary to honor the temples and the tabernacles animated by God?" (De fide orthod. 4,15).

H. Leclercq, Reliques: DACL 14, 2294-2359; N. Hermann-Mascard, Les reliques des saints, Formation coutumière d'un droit, Paris 1975; M. Heinzelmann, Translationsberichte und andere Quellen des Reliquienkultes, Turnhout 1979; V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, réliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980; Y. Duval, Auprès des saints corps et âme. L'inhumation ad sanctos dans la chrétienté d'Orient et d'Occident du III^e^ au VII^e^ siècle, Paris 1988; J. Dubois - J.L. Lemaitre, Sources et méthodes de l'hagiographie médiévale, Paris 1993, 247-319; A. Angenendt, Heiligen und Reliquien. Die Geschichte ihres Kults vom Frühen Christentum bis zur Gegenwart, Münich 1994; E. Bozóky - A.M. Helvétius (eds.), Les Reliques. Objects, cultes, symboles, Turnhout 1999.

A. Monaci Castagnos

REMIGIUS of Reims. Remigius (459–533) was one of the most famous bishops of *Reims, but whether the fact of having baptized *Clovis gained for him a certain notoriety remains uncertain. We are still very poorly informed about his life. *Sidonius Apollinaris delighted in his ability as a writer (Ep. 9,7); Remigius wrote to Clovis to congratulate him upon his accession to the throne as the king of Tournai in 481 (CCL 117, 407-408). He catechized and baptized him on 25 December between the years 496 and 506, presumably at Reims. Remigius reorganized his ecclesiastical province and wrote to numerous bishops (CCL 117, 407-413). His homilies have been lost. According to *Gregory of Tours (Glor. conf. 78), Remigius was a bishop for seven years. In the Mart. hier., he appears on 15 January, the date of the end of his service as bishop, and on 1 October, the date of his translation. At Reims, his natale (episcopal ordination) was celebrated on 13 January. Two Lives were written about him, one wrongly attributed to *Venantius Fortunatus, but accurate (BHL 7150), the other written by Hincmar, which lacks any historical value (BHL 7152-7159). His testament has been preserved in two recensions: the longer recension contains *interpolations; the shorter, alterations, but is substantially trustworthy.

BHL 7150-7173; CPL 1070-1073; BS 11, 104-113; LCI 8, 261-263; BBKL 8, 19-21; K. Schäferdiek, Remigius – Kirchenmann einer Umbruchszeit: ZKG 94 (1983) 256-278; E. Panella, Nuova cronologia remigiana: Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 60 (1990) 145-311.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

RESTITUTUS (Restutus) (4th c.). Catholic bishop of *Carthage, successor of *Gratus before 359, the year in which he participated at the Council of *Rimini, over which he had perhaps presided. An adversary of *Sirmium's formula of 22 May 359 (known as the credo datato), he was appointed head of the delegation of the Nicene majority that was asked to travel to *Constantinople to summarize the council's documents and present a letter to the emperor *Constantius. This delegation, which was preceded by the pro-*Arian delegation, was not even received and was forced to stop at Nike (in *Thrace), where on 10 October 359, it was forced to cede and sign a new formula of *faith (the formula of Nike).

At that time Restitutus dictated a letter to justify his rejection—and that of the delegation he presided over—of the formula of faith of the Nicaeans at Rimini and the acceptance of *communion with the pro-Arian party, which had previously been condemned (see Hilary of Poitiers, Frag. hist. 8,5-6: PL 10, 702). Restitutus's attitude was criticized in *Africa (see PLS 1, 303-304), but the event must have been forgotten soon after. We do not know anything else about the life of Restitutus, except that in 390 Geneclius was bishop of Carthage.

Simonetti 314-321; PCBE 1, 968-969.

A. Di Berardino

RESURRECTION of CHRIST (iconography). The gospels are silent on the central moment of their narration, the *resurrection of *Jesus. The four Evangelists, in fact, although in different versions, appeal to a common tradition that clearly distinguished the account of the crucifixion from that of *Easter morning. This silence is highlighted by expectation of the Sabbath interval, in which the women delayed their visit to the Teacher's tomb to observe the "rest according to the commandment" (Lk 23:56). The various accounts then vacillate on the number and identity of the women and the motive that led them to Christ's tomb, but all transmit the record of the tomb that was found to be empty and the appearance of an angel (or even of Jesus himself), who proclaimed to them the resurrection and in turn made them proclaimers of this event to the *apostles.

1. Paschal iconography in early Christian art. Early Christian *iconography respected the gospels' silence on the moment in which Jesus rose again, and the image familiar to us of Christ emerging from the tomb is actually unknown to the figurative repertoire of the early centuries. It is undeniable, however, that images closely connected to the theme of Christ's resurrection were widespread from the beginning of Christian iconography, thus giving expression in images of the chief event of the Christian faith. In addition to symbolic images taken from the pagan cultural context (such as the image of the Sol triumphans, which in a Christian context seems to allude specifically to the resurrection), this expression used primarily some OT biblical personages and episodes to suggest a typological reading in reference to the events of Easter. This is undoubtedly the case for the cycle of the *prophet *Jonah, whom Jesus himself identified, in the gospel of *Matthew, as a sign of his burial and resurrection from the dead (Mt 12:38-41; parallel passages in Lk 11:29-32; Mk 8:11-12; the *Fathers, from *Irenaeus and *Tertullian onward, deepened this meaning). Even the figure of patiens (suffering) *Job, in his reference to the faith in the resurrection of the dead, thanks to the Latin translation of Job 19:26 (et rursum cir- cumdabor pelle mea et in carne mea videbo Deum), was full of paschal christological meanings, which made Job known to the Fathers as the "great athlete" in the contest and a model of martyrdom (*Origen, *Basil of Caesarea): the *sarcophagus decorated with trees from the Museo Pio Cristiano in the Vatican would seem to demonstrate this fact (Rep I, 61). The sarcophagus places Job in parallel with *Abel and connects their test to the central element of the Anastasis (resurrection), a symbol, which we will encounter shortly below, of the death and resurrection of Christ. The Pauline idea of the resurrection of Christ as a presupposition of Christian salvation (see Rom 6:5) makes the scenes used by the first Christians to represent God's salvific power in death, such as the image of *Daniel in the lions' den, refer to the resurrection of Christ (Dan 6:1-25; 14:23-42). Moreover, Christ himself is the source of resurrection (the daughter of Jairus; Mt 9:18-19, 23-26 and parallel texts; the son of the widow: Lk 7:11-17; Lazarus: Jn 11:38-44), which shows him to be a participant of the creative power of God and anticipates and depicts his own resurrection, as *John reveals specifically with regard to the "sign" of Lazarus (see Jn 11:25). Lastly, in the late 4th c., the words of the Apostolic Constitutions (V, 7) clarify the sense of the Eastern iconographies in early Christian art: "the reasons for believing in the resurrection from the dead we find specifically in the resurrection of the Lord. He in fact raised Lazarus, who was dead for four days, and the daughter of Jairus and the son of the widow, he also reawakened himself on the third day, upon command of the *Father; he is the pledge of our resurrection. Therefore, the one who caused Jonah to come out on the third day alive and intact from the belly of the large fish, and the three young men from the Babylonian furnace, and Daniel from the lions' den will not lack the power to also raise us from the dead!"

2. The iconographies of the resurrection of Christ. 2.1 The empty tomb. If to the silence of the gospels on the moment of the resurrection there corresponded for centuries a lack of iconography, Christian art, on the other hand, was able to draw direct inspiration from the gospel narration of the proclamation of the Risen One, which an angel directed to the godly women who had come to the tomb with oils for embalming the body of the Teacher (as clearly expressed in Mk 16:1; for this reason, these have also been called mirophore, from the Greek term, μύρον, i.e., ointment). These accounts' individual details differed in the synoptic gospels, but it seems noteworthy that in Matthew 28 the appearance and proclamation of the angel was followed by the appearance of Jesus himself (vv. 9-10). It was specifically Matthew who seems to have given inspiration to the representations of the proclamation near the tomb, which proclamation, after the unique (but uncertain) precedent offered by the fresco in the baptistery of *Dura Europos in ancient Mesopotamia (before 256), reappeared on reliefs of Christian sarcophagi throughout the 4th c. and distinguished the women standing before the seated angel (Mt 28:2) from those women who prostrated themselves in adoration before the Risen Christ who was standing before them (ibid. v. 9). At the beginning of the 5th c., the two scenes appeared on the wooden panels of the doors of the church of Santa Sabina in *Rome, placed next to the most ancient image of the crucifixion. The episode also appears on the ivory diptychs intended for private devotion, at times with the original details owed to a learned and distinguished patron.

This is the case for the so-called Trivulzio diptych, today at *Milan, in the 1st half of the 5th c. Here, it is possible to faithfully follow Matthew's text: on the top (under the symbols of Matthew and *Luke) are the guards who were "struck with terror" (Mt 28:4) upon the appearance of the angel. The guards were standing on top of the tomb, which is somewhat different from the gospel's account, which stated that it was "an empty tomb . . . hewn out in the rock . . . with a large rolling rock" (Mt 27:60). The circular building represented, however, recalls the one constructed by *Constantine upon the tomb of Christ at the beginning of the 4th c., which was then ruined in 614 and destroyed, finally, in 1099. At the bottom, the scene moves to the slightly open door of the tomb, the panels of which depict scenes of the resurrection of Lazarus, the call of Zacchaeus and the healing of the woman with the flow of blood. To the right is the "angel of the Lord who descended from heaven," seated on the rock that he has rolled away (Mt 28:2). The splendid garment of the philosopher, wearing ornate shoes, recalls that "his appearance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow" (v. 3). He wears a halo and is without wings as maintained by the Western tradition of the first centuries, and he gestures with his left hand side of the spoken word ("he said to them . . .": v. 5), as is fitting for a messenger angelos. What is surprising in this image, however, is the attitude of the two women "Mary Magdalene and the other Mary" (v. 1). The canonical iconography would have them standing, incapacitated and shocked before the angel, who in the text, in fact, exhorts them, saying: "have no fear . . ." (v. 5). Here instead these women prostrate themselves before him in adoration; they extend to him their hand, they grab his feet. Matthew's account, after the angels' appearance, proceeds with the two "Marys" who, "having left the tomb in a hurry . . . ran to report it to the disciples" (v. 8). But shortly after, "Jesus" himself "encountered them saying: 'Hail!' And they came up and took hold of his feet and worshiped him." The women were represented in this pose only before the Teacher, but never thus before the angel (v. 9). The Trivulzio diptych, moreover, completed a refined and unique synthesis of the two moments of the account in Matthew and transformed the seated angel before the tomb into Jesus himself, by recovering in this manner a very ancient christological attribute according to which Christ is the "Angel of the Lord, glorious and very tall" (Hermas, Sim. 8,1). *Tertullian left an illuminating definition: "he was also called 'Angel of Great Counsel,' that is 'Messenger,' which is a term that denotes an office, not the nature. In effect, he had to proclaim to the world the Father's great design for the restoration of man" (De carne Christi 14).

The patron of the diptych wanted to place on the lips of Jesus himself the Easter proclamation by attributing to him the "office" of the angel, for proclaimer of the Father's design of love worked in the resurrection. Matthew's text, however, favors the identification: one can really say of Jesus that he is "the angel of the Lord, who has come down from heaven" (28:2), the Son of God sent from the Father to reveal himself to men and save them (see Jn 1:18; 3:16-17). The white garments of the angel then recall the transfiguration, when "he was transfigured before them, and his face shone like the sun, and his garments became white as light" (Mt 17:2). Even the scenes on the door of the tomb recall the "restoration" of the project of God the Creator proclaimed by the "glorious angel," and the image of Jesus is, in these, the same as the image of the angel, although the prostrated woman from the lower scene is none other than the image reflected of the two Marys, and in one a puzzling repetition, on a lower scale, of the larger scene that unfolds before the door.

If the Trivulzio diptych reasons upon the proclamation of the Risen One, the *Syriac evangelistary of *Rabbula (586) closely ties the scene of the empty tomb to that of the crucifixion with the Christus triumphans clothed with the liturgical garment and eyes open as a sign of his victory over death: "I see the crucified one and I call him King" (*John Chrysostom, De cruce, hom. II). Under the large scene of the cross, a brief register below shows the women at the tomb who go to the sellers of the aromas mentioned by *Mark and Luke. They first meet the angel and then, to the right, Jesus, whom they adore. At the center, from the closed tomb, the rays of light strike the guards, a figure of the sons of darkness. Among the women at the tomb—one observes—is *Mary, the Mother of God (who was present at the crucifixion with John), whom 5th-c. Christians believed was present among "the women who had come with him from Galilee" (Lk 23:55), making her a witness to the resurrection of the Son. Even the cover of the reliquary of the Vatican Library (Musei Vaticani, inv. 61883), slightly behind, places the crucifixion at the center of the mystery of Christ, now glorious, in whom is revealed God's love for humankind. Around it and from it the other scenes find their meaning. In addition, the Constantinian dome of the basilica of the Holy Sepulcher, near which occurred the scene of Easter (with Mary), recalls at the bottom of the grotto, the Nativity, with the manger in the form of a sarcophagus for the Son of God who, "taking the form of a slave, being born in human likeness . . . humbled himself and became obedient to the point of death—even death on a cross" (Phil 2:7-8).

2.1.1 A paschal cycle on the sarcophagus of Servanes at Arles. Before the miniature of *Rabbula, who set forth the essential cycle of the passion and the resurrection of Christ, a Roman sarcophagus from the mid-4th c. placed the scene of the empty tomb as the fulcrum of a truly proper iconographic paschal cycle, in which were collected as many scenes as possible referring to the various moments of the passion and glorification of the Lord: it was a sarcophagus of St. Honorat or Servanes, today in the Museum of *Arles (Rep III, 42), a product of Roman craftsmanship from the mid-4th c., filled with many lacunae, but very legible on the basis of 17th-c. sketches. The "paschal cycle" in its entirety occupies the lower section of the sarcophagus (on the upper section four episodes from the OT and the NT, with young Jewish men who refused to worship Nebuchadnezzar's idol are placed next to and compared to the *Magi who recognized and worshiped the Son of God). Represented there are the following scenes: the prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mt 26:36-46 and parallel texts); Judas's kiss (Mt 26:47-50; the embrace between Jesus and the apostle-betrayer recalls the embrace between *Peter and *Paul of the Vigna Chiaraviglio at Rome); Christ led to Pontius *Pilate, who washes his hands (Mt 27:1-26 and parallel texts); the godly women who worshiped the Risen One near the empty tomb (only in Mt 28:9-10); the appearance of the Risen One to the disciples (see below); Judas's hanging (Mt 27:3-10); the *ascension of Christ (Lk 24:50-53 and parallel texts in Mk and Acts). The episodes are all common to the fourfold tradition, though with certain variants. The first two (Gethsemane and the arrest) always follow one after the other in the four accounts, all of which, before the scene with Pilate, add the scene of Jesus being led to the high priest and Peter's simultaneous denial (the two scenes, here absent, are presented together as a contemporary front of a Vatican sarcophagus: Rep I, 13). The narration of the passio Christi continues precisely with the interrogation by Pilate, including the detail about the washing of the hands, which is only found in Matthew's gospel (27:24-26). From this scene we are transported before the empty tomb: the break corresponds exactly to the middle of the relief. The empty tomb appears flanked by two alarmed soldiers (which recalls Mt 28:4), exactly as they appear in the iconography of the Anastasis, which reveals that it was therefore already known; there are three women who prostrate themselves before Christ as in Mk 16:1 instead of the two, as it is more properly in Mt 28. Christ subsequently appears to the disciples, who are four in all, symmetrically lined up next to the Risen One and praising him: this number, which has no correspondence to the gospel accounts of Jesus's appearances after his resurrection, had the value of a generic reference and, at the same time, in the iconographic disposition, a decorative effect. At this point, one observes the improper insertion of the hanging of Judas, which Matthew, the only witness to this event (the mention of this event is different in Acts 1:18-19), however, ties to the very moment of Jesus's presentation to Pilate, who is also represented here. The ascension of the Lord—only found in the accounts of Mark and Luke (Mk 16:19; Lk 24:51; cf., Acts 1:6-11)—completes the decoration of the section in an iconographically effective manner. This is the most ancient attestation to this scene.

2.1.2. The appearances of the Risen One. The appearances of the godly women near the empty tomb and the generic appearance to the apostles on the sarcophagus of Servanes established the first and most ancient examples of scenes taken from the gospel narratives pertaining to the risen Jesus. Among these we can mention at least the appearance to *Mary Magdalene narrated in Jn 20:11-18 and the episode of the gospel of Luke of the disciples on the road to Emmaus (Lk 24:13-35; also mentioned in Mk 16:12-13), which appears on the wooden door of the church of Santa Sabina at Rome (datable between the pontificates of Pope *Celestine and *Sixtus III: 422–432, 432–440) and also among the *mosaic insets in the christological scenes in the church of S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna (beginning of the 6th c.) and which is perhaps even recalled on one of the sides of the Pignatta sarcophagus in the same city (Rep II, 376).

With respect to the iconographic effects, the most fortunate, however, of such episodes is that of the apostle *Thomas's unbelief, which John narrates in 20:19-29. Its most ancient attestation is on two sarcophagi produced in N Italy shortly after the mid-4th c. Among these, the sarcophagus housed in S. Celso at *Milan is truly pertinent (Rep II, 250); it shows, on the continuous front, two brief Christmas and Easter cycles, flanked by the central majestic scene with Christ between Peter and Paul. To the right of it is the scene of the Magi who follow the star, but give their backs to the Child and turn toward the central Christ; to the left are the two Marys in the gospel of Matthew at the empty tomb (with the angel who appears between the clouds) and the scene of unbelief, with Thomas, accompanied by only one other apostle, who places his hand in the Lord's side, who in turn raises his arm and uncovers his chest with the other hand. The contemporary fragmentary representation of another sarcophagus now kept at Brescia is analogous (Museo Cristiano; Rep II, 249), as well as a fragment from the Museo Nazionale di Ravenna, which dates to the beginning of the 5th c. (Rep II, 377).

One should also attribute to the first decades of the 5th c. the representations contained on one of the four small ivory plates from a lost small box (Lat. capsella), today housed in the British Museum of London (inv. 56.6-23.6). The scene imitates, more than half a century later, the iconographic layout of the Risen One on the sarcophagus of Servanes, with only four apostles (instead of 11) and adding only the detail of Thomas's left forefinger, which touches the side of Christ. The London plates, all decorated with scenes from the passion, can be considered—along with the sarcophagus of Servanes—an updated attempt to formulate a complete iconographic cycle of the passion and resurrection of the Lord. One sees upon these plates the presence of the scene of the crucifixion, which appears there for the first time during the same years of the wooden door of the church of Santa Sabina, on the latter of which is, moreover, also carved the scene of Thomas. The eleven apostles appear for the first time on one of the mosaic insets of the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo, a century later: Christ's pose is that of the Lombardian sarcophagi, at the center of the two most numerous and matched groups of the apostles (in the first to the right one can identify Thomas), although a large barred door dominates in the background, according to Jn 20:26. The same image reappears then on a Palestinian leaden ampule of the 6th-7th c., in the same British Museum, with the addition of a Greek inscription that overshadows the circular iconographic field, citing in full the confession of faith finally proclaimed by Thomas, "ὁ κύριός μου καὶ ὁ θεός μου" (Jn 20:28). Lastly, during the time of Pope *John VII (705–707), the scene appears again in the frescoes of S. Maria Antiqua in the Roman Forum, where it was inserted between the broadest iconographic repertory of appearances of the Risen One known at that time (the disciples on the road to Emmaus, the appearance to the Eleven, the appearance near the Sea of Tiberias, and the dialogue with Mary Magdalene). Among the appearances of the Risen One, one should also include that exceptional appearance to the apostle Paul narrated in Acts 9:1-9. This is attested in *paintings in the iconographic group cycle of the cubiculum of Leo in the Roman cemetery of Commodilla (Rep 142,5), at the time of Pope *Damasus (366–384), where Christ appears only from the waist up looking down from heaven, and in a sculpture on an important sarcophagus constructed in the shape of columns at *Marseille (Rep III, 291), from the end of the 4th c., where Christ and Paul appear standing side-by-side in the act of speaking alongside the very frequent scene, even though apocryphal, of the beheading of the apostle.

2.1.3. The ascension of the Lord. The establishment of the iconography of the ascension is late with respect to the other scenes from the life of Christ, tied to the late origin of the corresponding liturgical festival, attested not earlier than the end of the 4th c.—and specifically in 388 in the East (*John Chrysostom)—and only from the beginning of the 5th c. for the West. Thus, after the episodic appearance on the "Easter" sarcophagus of Servanes and on another fragment at Clermont-Ferrand (Rep III, 219; 2nd half of the 4th c.), the first known representation of this scene is that of the famous ivory from the Bavarian Museum of Munich (from ca. 400), that ties the iconography of the ascension to that of the resurrection of Christ, faithful to its theological interpretation as the accomplishment of the exit from hell. In that, at the bottom, is a representation of the episode of the godly women at the tomb, with a marvelous reproduction of the rotunda of the Jerusalem Anastasis; the right part, toward the top, is filled with the image of the ascension, with two astonished apostles who witness Jesus ascending on high, drawn by the hand of God. It is interesting that Jesus, who climbs a rocky mountain as on the sarcophagi from the city of Arles, seems to come from the already emptied tomb, in a surprising idea of temporal connection between the two scenes. The intervention of the divine hand, which draws Christ to itself, nears the messianic interpretation of Ps 18:16 [17] ("he stretched out his hand from on high and took me") and 73:24 ("you have taken me by your right hand"), reread by Acts 2:33 ("exalted at the right hand of God"), although the attitude of Christ during his ascent on the mountain (which is common to the event of *Moses who ascends Mt. Sinai to receive the law there) reproduces an ancient gestural character. In addition to this attestation it appears on a formula of the wooden door of Santa Sabina at Rome (beginning of the 5th c.), which moreover presents details that were then abandoned that have led some to doubt its very identification. In it, Christ, who is in the act of ascending a rocky mountain, is pulled up by three angels, one of which, in the upper right corner, takes him by the hand. In the lower portion, four apostles make gestures of astonishment or sadness. The presence of the angels and the place of the divine hand, however, is to be interpreted as a manifestation of the intervention of God himself, who "has exalted him" (Phil 2:9) and is taken most directly from the passive verbal forms from the attestations of the event recorded in the gospel of Mark and Luke (anelēmphthē [Mk 16:19] or anephereto [Lk 24:51] eis ton ouranon [to heaven]; and again epērthē from Acts 1:9).

These iconographies of the ascension, which we could call "Western," were soon placed alongside the original contributions of the Eastern part of the Orbis christianus antiquus. We can already see this scene on a column of a ciborium in Venice (from the 6th c., according to the most early dating), which includes the inscription ascensio Cristi ad celos apostolis cu(m) miratione aspicentibus, and we see Christ inserted in a circular mandorla, flanked to the right and the left by two winged angels. Surrounding him are six individuals, two of whom could be, following the description of the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, *Elijah and Enoch, the good *thief from the crucifixion, who had just arrived and is represented with his cross. Even the various cruets from Monza, Italy (6th-7th c.), offer a similar representation to that of the Venice ciborium, but here Mary is at the center among the twelve apostles.

On the Syriac codex of Rabbula, from 586, Christ is within a mandorla, raised on high by two angels, although the two others are beside him in adoration. The mandorla has at the bottom the Tetraform angel with wings with eyes, endowed with four flaming wheels, according to the vision of Ezek 10. Mary is at the feet of Christ, and alongside her are two angels facing the outside toward the group of apostles who are gazing toward heaven and to whom they say:

"Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking up toward heaven? This Jesus, who has been taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). In this short verse, in my opinion, is the hermeneutical key of the insertion of the image of the Tetraform, which derived from the book of Revelation, in the context of the *parousia of the Son of Man: it seems that, through an iconographic procedure that we could call "inductive," the image of the second coming of Christ was used, which was fully described in the last book of the *Bible and already experimented with in the arts, for representing the particular details of his departure from the world, which is not described by the gospels, but occurred, the Acts of the Apostles tell us, "in the same way." The same iconography, likewise in the Syro-Palestinian context, is already taken up in the aforementioned cover of the reliquary of the Sancta Sanctorum, in the Vatican Museum, or in the apse of the chapels of Bawît, some of which, under the representation of Christ in a mandorla with the Tetraform of the basin, repeat the image of Mary Magdalene alongside the group of apostles, reusing the iconographic integration between the ascension and the parousia on the aforementioned codex Rabulensis. A further iconographic mixing, this time with a scene of *Pentecost, was done on a cruet from Monza, in which from the mandorla of Christ there emerges the divine hand from which descend the dove and the rays of the *Holy Spirit, whom precisely and only after the ascension of Christ "the Father will send in my name" (Jn 14:26).

2.2. The iconography of the Anastasis. Since the institution of the Feast of inventio Crucis in 325—with the memory of the dedication of the *Jerusalem basilica of the Holy Sepulcher, or the Anastasis (resurrection), and Calvary—the celebration of the Crux invicta of the Lord favored the ascent of a new paschal iconography, in which the cross appears as a trophy of Christ's victory over death, at whose feet are "conquered" soldiers from Matthew's account. This scene—that finds conceptual and excellent graphic parallels in the Constantinian labarum and precedents in the triumphal vessels that had been carried in the procession to Rome after the conquests—appears on numerous Christian sarcophagi starting from the crucial years of the 4th c. The scenes on these sarcophagi are said to be precisely of the Anastasis, and are always placed so they occupy the central space. The image merges the cross from the passion (which appears for the first time in Christian iconography) with the monogram and the laureate of Christ—placed on the upper portion of his vertical arm, while the two doves perched on his horizontal arm nibble on the fruit of the crown wreath, alluding to the faithful who are nourished by the fruits of the resurrection. Initially they were sarcophagi in the form of columns with scenes from the passion of Christ (such as a very famous example from the Vatican Rep I, 49) or rather of trees with episodes of the OT and the NT (just as the other famous sarcophagus likewise in the Vatican, Rep I, 61). These make way for, in the 2nd half of the century, two depictions of the apostles, who pray or offer crowns to the Risen Lord, who is personified by this elaborate iconographic emblem (famous examples at Arles: Rep III, 49; or at Palermo: Rep II, 143; in the Vatican: Rep I, 59).

The Easter-oriented interpretation of the Anastasis group is further confirmed by the appearance of this typology from the scene of the empty tomb on some sarcophagi, inserted at the foot of the cross in the place of the soldiers. The two clearest examples are those of a lost sarcophagus from the Vatican Basilica, attested by Bosius and datable to the *Theodosian age (Rep I, 933), on which two miniature women prostrate themselves in adoration of Christ, who is standing there; and of an earlier fragment, today in Aix-en-Provence (Rep III, 20), where the angel is instead seated near the tomb.

2.3. The Risen One who emerges from the tomb. Using the eulogies of the Holy Land from the 6th-7th c., there were developed for the first time, with the push of serial production, images increasingly directed toward expressing the mystery of the resurrection of the Lord, beginning from the most established in the existing iconographies of the crucifixion and the women at the tomb. The most significant of these images was that of the cruet from Monza, which merges these two scenes showing the Christ of the crucifixion without the cross and in ornate garments as a living and Risen One, standing over the empty tomb and towering over it. The same scene is on another cruet from Bobbio, where Christ, however, is on a mandorla, lifted up by the angels (as in the ascension) above a cross with wooden arms, which is adored by two other angels. The Eastern development of the scene of Christ who emerges from the tomb is already mature: the first certain proof that has come down to us in the West, by work of the Greek Pope John VII (705–707), is in his Marian oratory up against the front of the old St. Peter's Basilica built by the emperor *Constantine. This scene—which is known through the reproductions before the basilica's destruction—is placed at the end of the inset motifs with a life of Christ, next to the scene of the crucifixion and before that of the *descent to hell and the godly women. The Lord emerges from the cave, whose closing stone is rolled away, although near there are the terrified guards: this scene evidently reformulates the appearance of the Lord near the empty tomb, with the guards who were "struck with terror," already encountered on the Trivulzio diptych or on the scene of the Anastasis. The fortunes of this representation are well known, especially in the Western part of the Christian world, which preferred it to that of Jesus's descent into hell, forgetting the scene of the women at the tomb.

2.4. The descent into hell. A last representation of Easter, inspired by the apocryphal gospels—but established also by the words of Peter at Pentecost (Acts 2:24-31) and in his first letter (1 Pet 3:18-20) and Paul's various letters (Rom 10:7 and Eph 4:9)—appears only starting from the 7th c., and became established especially in Byzantine art. It was Jesus's descent into hell, attested in addition to the ancient formularies of faith by the imaginative account of the Gospel of Nicodemus from the 4th-5th c. Following an ancient Christian tradition, it there narrates that Jesus, who died on the cross, descended into hell to free the first parents (*Adam and Eve) and the patriarchs and to defeat Satan's kingdom. Perhaps its most ancient iconographic attestation is on the cruet from Monza mentioned previously with respect to the image of the Risen One; at the very least it is possible to identify Adam and Eve in the two kneeling figures on his sides. More certain is the identification of the scene of the so-called Fieschi-Morgan cross-shaped reliquary housed at the Metropolitan Museum of New York (ca. 700, according to the earliest dating), where Christ holds Adam by the hand while Eve gives him her left hand. In the other images that derive from this scene, as in the oratory of John VII and at St. Praxedes and St. *Clement, at Rome, or in the churches of the Christian East, Jesus descends into hell as the king of divine light, with the dazzling garments of Tabor, the true angel of the resurrection into the heart of the creation: "you have come down on earth to save Adam and, not finding him on the earth, he went to look for him even in hell" (*Byzantine Liturgy, morning of Holy Saturday). Under his feet are the unhinged doors of hell, and the Evil One is already imprisoned. Jesus, the New Adam, seizes with a decisive gesture the hand of the Old Adam. The two look each other in the eye; in Adam's face one can see the resemblance of Christ; there occurs a dialogue: "'I hear the steps of someone coming toward us!' 'Remove yourself from the dead. I am your God, and because of you I have become your son . . . get up, and let's depart from here, because you are in me and I am in you . . . let us escape from pain to joy: the kingdom of heaven that existed before all ages awaits you'" (ps.-Epiphanius, Hom. II in Sabbato Sancto). Adam and Eve have halos on their heads: redeemed by Christ, the church venerates them as the progenitor saints of humankind. *Solomon and *David or *John the Baptist are often together with them, along with a crowd of righteous people from the old covenant. Jesus is in the pose of ascending along with the saved, and the Greek name, in fact, no longer describes the scene as descent, but rather as Anastasis, escape from below—the resurrection. "For earth it is the day of pain, the duty of the tomb and the tears of the Mother of God; but for hell, holy Friday is already Easter, its power shatters the darkness in the heart of the kingdom of the dead (Evdokimov, Teologia della bellezza).

See the individual entries of this encyclopedia dedicated to the representations of the scenes from Easter and, especially, for the scene of the empty tomb, see *Women, pious. More general and useful, although dated, is the work of J. Villette, La résurrection du Christ dans l'art chrétien du II^e au VII^e siècle, Paris 1957. On the scene of Emmaus, see LCI 1, 622-626; TIP 171; P. Testini, Su una discussa figurazione del sarcofago detto del profeta Eliseo o Pignatta: Felix Ravenna 113-114 (1977) 319-337; F. Bisconti, Verso Emmaus (Lc 24,13-35): alle origini di un tema minore: Bessarione 8 (1991) 83-98; R. Giordani, Di un controverso rilievo funerario cristiano con presunta rappresentazione della "cena in Emmaus," in XLII Corso di Cultura sull'Arte Ravennate e Bizantina, Ravenna 1995, 383-405. On the appearance to Mary Magdalene, see A. Recio Veganzones, Maria Magdalena, protagonista de la escena "Mulieres ad Sepulcrum Domini," en la iconografía sepulcral de Occidente (siglos IV-V), in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes. Miscellanea in onore di Mons. Victor Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 667-688. On the unbelief of the apostle Thomas, see DACL 15, 2273-2275; LCI 4, 301-303. On the conversion of the apostle Paul, A. Recio Veganzones, El "carmen" paulino de Dámaso y la interpretación de tres escenas pictóricas de la catacumba de Comodila, in Saecularia Damasiana, Atti del Conv. Int. per il XVI centenario della morte di papa Damaso I (11/12/384 – 10-12/12/1984), Vatican City 1986, 323-358. On the ascension of the Lord, see DACL I/2, 2926-2934; LCI 2, 268-276; TIP 127-129; E.T. Dewald, The Iconography of the Ascension: American Journal of Archaeology, II s., 19/3 (1915) 3-39; H. Schrade, Zur Ikonographie der Himmelfahrt Christi, in Vorträge der Bibliothek Warburg, 1928-29, 66-190; H. Gutberlet, Die Himmelfahrt Christi in der bildenden Kunst von den Anfängen bis ins hohe Mittelalter, Strassburg 1935. On the iconography of the Anastasis: DACL XIV/2, 2400-2401; LCI 1, 201-218; A.R. Saggiorato, I sarcofagi paleocristiani con scene di Passione, Bologna 1968. On the Risen One who emerges from the tomb, LCI 1, 201-218, in addition to the aforementioned work by Villette. On the descent into hell, see LCI 2, 322-331; B. Bagatti, L'iconografia dell'Anastasis o Discesa agli Inferi: Liber Annuus 32 (1982) 217-230. On the paintings and mosaics containing Easter scenes from the time of Pope John VII, see G. Matthiae, Pittura romana del Medioevo. Secoli IV-X, scholarly update by M. Andaloro, Rome 1987, 104-116; 251-252.

U. Utro

RESURRECTION of the DEAD. The affirmation of the resurrection of the dead or of the flesh, contained in the most ancient creeds, for example, in the Apostolic Tradition (beginning of the 3rd c.), in the *papyrus Dêr Balyzeh (mid-4th c., but from an ancient tradition) and in the professions of faith; it becomes evident that this was a consistent belief of the ancient church, and in general it was specified by three components: it is an eschatological event that will take place "on the last day" at the second coming of Christ; it is universal, in the sense that everyone will rise again; it includes the idea of a simultaneous identity and newness of the body (Resurget non aliud corpus, quamvis in aliud: *Hilary of Poitiers, In ps. 2,41). This faith established ancient Christianity's litmus test especially working within Greek thought, which, anchored in spiritualism, would not allow the corporeal or the sensible to reenter as a good for humanity. After the phase of defending the resurrection had been overcome, the question reemerged in specifying the modality of the risen body and how it might be imagined. But let us take a look at its developments.

In the writings of the Apostolic *Fathers, the resurrection of the body was often referred to as the true life, of which the resurrection of Christ is the beginning, the pledge and the model. *Clement of *Rome sought to find analogies by appealing to the rhythms of nature and the history of the *phoenix and by basing it on quotations from the OT. 2 Clement derives an exhortation to chastity from it. Through passing allusions to it, we find the traditional primary affirmations.

The same approach occurs in the writings of the *Apologists, with further developments to be found in the writings of *Tatian (Or. ad Graecos 6 and 13), *Justin Martyr's Apologies and his dialogue that contains a *millenarist development (80-83), in the fragments of a treatise titled De resurrectione, falsely attributed to Justin, in the writings of *Theophilus of Antioch and in *Melito of Sardis.

The first important treatise on the resurrection of the dead was the De resurrectione by *Athenagoras: its authenticity, which has been rejected by R. Grant, who sees in it—wrongly we believe—a response to *Origen, has been defended by L. Barnard, E. Bellini and J. Vermander for good reasons. The work was a lectio publica, a lecture probably delivered before a *pagan crowd to demonstrate that faith in the resurrection is not absurd according to reason: therefore, the treatise is not based on revelation and does not contain any scriptural citations, with the exception of some allusions. Constructed according to all the rules of rhetoric, it first eliminates all the counterarguments—God does not want or is not able—and then moves on to the positive arguments. The first part shows a rather crass understanding of the resurrection because the major problem is this: if an animal eats a human being and then another human being eats the same animal, in the resurrection then, to whom will the elements of the first body which then passed into that of the second human belong? The arguments contained in the second part are more convincing because they are essentially based on the fact that human beings are simultaneously body and spirit.

*Irenaeus specifically treats the resurrection in book 5 of the Adversus haereses. It contains a traditional and rather complete doctrine supported by apologetic arguments, permeated by a millenarism expressed especially with a surprising citation from a work of *Papias (V, 33,3-4), of which he fully approves. *Clement of Alexandria did not discuss this topic. *Tertullian, however, dedicated an important treatise to it, De resurrectione, which was written while he was under the influence of *Montanism but still had not yet broken ties with the mainstream church. He reacts against the allegorical interpretations of the resurrection that were specific to the *gnostics, especially *Marcion and his disciple *Apelles, *Basilides and *Valentinus. After an introduction, in which he focuses on the opponents of the resurrection and praises the dignity of the body (1-17), in the first part he offers a magisterial explanation of the scriptural arguments (18-55), and in the second (56-62) he explains how, through the working of God, this same body that has suffered here is no longer subject to death and suffering, and examines the problems that arise from this argument.

Origen's teaching on the resurrection is present in almost all his works: his treatise De resurrectione, which was written during his younger years, has been lost with the exception of a few fragments. His teaching contains many important and traditional elements, but it was primarily his understanding of the resurrected body, an understanding that was misrepresented by later scholars, that created a scandal. This teaching attempted to demonstrate the existence of both an identity and an otherness between the earthly body and the glorious body, according to the example of the seed and the plant mentioned in 1 Cor 15:34-44. This teaching, moreover, is attentive to information that seems to have escaped his predecessors, that is, the fluid character of the earthly body, which cannot be defined by its ever-changing material elements. The glorious body that will be endowed with an ethereal quality is the same earthly body with its rigid quality: the same, with respect to its substance, although different in quality. The permanence of the earthly body in the different moments of its existence and the permanence between the earthly body and the glorious body are expressed both with the *Stoic notion of seminal reason (rationes seminales)—that expresses in philosophical language the Pauline notion—and the Platonic term of eidos (form), the metaphysical principle of the unity and identity of the body. This term, which is understood by *Methodius in his treatise De resurrectione according to the common meaning of outward appearance, became the cause of a profound interpretive error that would have repercussions in later centuries. The millenarism and anthropomorphism of Methodius, even if near to those of his predecessors, certainly could not accept a teaching constructed precisely in relation to millenarism and anthropocentrism.

In the writings of the Valentinian gnostics, the cosmos and history are the moments of recovery of the "divine dispersed seeds," the moments of their deliverance by means of gnosis by the cosmos (= the visible, the material), through a salvation that will consist of reintegration of all that is divine that has fallen into matter; the moments of the *apocatastasis are the restoration of everything to its original condition: the reconstitution of the scattered members of God (Ev. veritatis 41,28-29). In a Letter to *Reginus, the resurrection is gnosis, that is, the reawakening of the spiritual ego in the gnostic: the moment of the rising from the dead to return to the kingdom of light, that original kingdom of one's existence in the *pleroma (in Erbetta, ed., I/1, 244-248). The anonymous author rejects the psychic resurrection, that is, the resurrection of the soul and the resurrection of the body as a biological continuity. The only reality is the spiritual resurrection of the living members, that is, of thought, mind and pneuma (spirit). The gnostic vision is to be placed on the level of the interior man, the spiritual man; even Origen's understanding is similar but with the exception of the resurrection of the body. Irenaeus's vision and that of Justin and the Apologists, however, falls within the Jewish apocalyptic vision: a belief in the millennium, the end of the world as a cosmic tragedy, the end of the empire and the appearance of the *antichrist. Origen overcame this tradition and tended to interiorize the end of the millennium (Princ. 2,11,2) and the end of the world as the unleashing of cosmic events. Apocalyptic themes, he believed, were not that important. He even spoke of the heavenly *Jerusalem as the provisional place until the number of the righteous be completed, but it is not the place of the millennial beliefs where the just people risen with Christ will live for a thousand years before passing into eternity definitively, although there is the opportunity for the righteous to progress in their understanding of God.

The book of Revelation, according to the different interpretation that Christian authors from *Asia Minor gave to it (e.g., Irenaeus) on the one hand, and the Origenists on the other, marked the major schools of thought with regard to the understanding of the resurrection of the dead or the body in ancient Christianity. In the East, the book was read without the preoccupation of seeing it as a unitary text, focusing the reader's attention instead toward an allegorical reading of the images and the individual passages; in the West, however, it was read as a succession of real events (*Victorinus of Petovium and *Tyconius) in light of the theory of the *recapitulation. After Origen, the second coming of Christ and the resurrection of the body were passed down as categories of truth without creating much of a problem. With the Constantinian peace, interest in the afterlife waned and historical time acquired space in reflection on the faith (*Eusebius of Caesarea). In the writings of the Cappadocian Fathers, the future has special value for its ethical interests given the moment of judgment that awaits all. In the West, there was also the emphasis on the eschatological problem as a moral problem, which was especially tied to the book of *Daniel, which spoke of the fourth kingdom (2:40).

From all this, *Augustine's contribution stands out in particular because he created a synthesis between Asiatic and Alexandrian Christianity. Because he considered the eschaton to be that which is perfect, he conceived of the human being's ultimate destiny as the destiny of the body-soul, a unity that, to be happy, must be saved in its entirety. He rejected the Platonist thesis on human blessedness being tied to liberation from the body—and which therefore saw a possible resurrection of the body as an evil (Ep. 166,9,27)—and the sarcasm of *Porphyry and his followers regarding the Christians' faith in the resurrection (Civ. Dei 13,16,1). Augustine's thesis rested on two arguments: (1) the body, as such, is not an obstacle to happiness, but only that body that has fallen into mortality and corruptibility following the sin of the first parents (Civ. Dei 13,16,1 and 24; En. in ps. 141,17-19); (2) the soul, the vital principle of the body, does not fall into the body because of a previous fault (Gen. ad litt. 7,27,38; De imm. animae 15,24), but naturally tends toward it. In fact, even after death there remains in it "the natural appetite to govern the body that slows it down, in a certain sense, and hinders it from proceeding with all its might toward the highest heaven" (Gen. ad litt. 12,36,68). Augustine overcame the stumbling block of the Platonic understanding of the body as the prison of the soul by introducing the category of the hierarchy of body-soul-God. The soul can actualize itself only by contact with the body, which, on the scale of being, has its own dignity. It is, therefore, not actualized by rejecting the body but by restoring the order destroyed, in other words, what will take place with the resurrection of the body (De musica 6,5,13). The risen body will recover its sanctity, but its real state will only be known when it is experienced. Augustine, therefore, was not slow in theorizing about the modalities of the risen body; the eschaton represented for him a given of the faith. What constituted the drama for Augustine was historical time, the state of human existence before the eschaton.

DTC 13, 2504-2572; A. Fierro, Las controversias sobre la resurrección en los siglos II-V: RET 28 (1968) 3-21; T. van Eijk, La Résurrection des morts chez les Pères Apostoliques, Paris 1974; P. Siniscalco, Ricerche sul De resurrectione di Tertulliano, Rome 1966; H. Crouzel, La doctrine origénienne du corps ressuscité: BLE 81 (1980) 175-200, 241-266; M. Alfeche, The Basis of Hope in the Resurrection of the Body According to Augustine: Augustiniana 36 (1986) 240-296; G. af Hällström, Carnis resurrectio. The Interpretation of a Credal Formula, Helsinki 1988; B. Pouderon, Athénagore d'Athènes, philosophe chrétien, Paris 1989; Id., Athénagore et Tertullien sur la résurrection: REAug 35 (1989) 209-230; Athénagore, Supplique au sujet des chrétiens; et sur la résurrection des morts, introd., texte et tr. par B. Pouderon, Paris 1992 (SC 379); H.E. Lona, Über die Auferstehung des Fleisches. Studien zur frühchristlichen Eschatologie, Berlin-New York 1993; S. Sabugal, Anástasis. Resucitó y resucitaremos, Madrid 1993; E. Puech, La Croyence des Esséniens en la vie future. Immortalité, résurrection, vie éternelle? 2 vols., Paris 1993; A. Wartelle, Saint Justin, philosophe et martyr, De resurrectione. Intr. et tr.: BAGB 1993, 66-82; C. Walker Bynum, The Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity, 200–1336, New York 1995; M.J. Edwards, Origen's Two Resurrections: JTS 46 (1995) 502-518; B. Pouderon, Le "De resurrectione" d'Athénagore face à la gnose valentinienne: RecAug 28 (1996) 145-183; K. Schneider, Studien zur Entfaltung der altkirchlichen Theologie der Auferstehung, Bonn 1999; Augustine Through the Ages, ed. A. Fitzgerald, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 722-723; Origene, Dizionario, ed. A. Monaci Castagno, Rome 2000, 401-405; Pseudo-Giustino, Sulla resurrezione. Discorso cristiano del II secolo, ed. A. D'Anna, Brescia 2001 (cf., B. Pouderon, Apocrypha 13 [2002] 245-256); Pseudojustin über die Auferstehung, Text und Studie, ed. M. Heimgartner, Berlin 2001; Tertulliano, La resurrezione della carne, ed. P. Podolak, Brescia 2004; C.J. Setzer, Resurrection of the Body in Early Judaism and Early Christianity. Doctrine, Community, and Self-definition, Boston 2004; A.F. Segal, Life After Death. A History of the Afterlife in the Religions of the West, New York 2004.

H. Crouzel - V. Grossi

RETICIUS of Autun (d. ca. 334). Reticius was certainly not the first bishop of *Autun, but he appears as such in the medieval lists of the city's earlier bishops. He authored one of the first Latin *commentaries on the *Scriptures and the *Song of Songs, and a document against *Novatian. *Jerome mentioned his commentary on the Song of Songs (Ep. 5,2; 37,1-4; Vir. ill. 82) but maintained that its style was its only redeeming feature. Its content seemed to him to be "ridiculous and absurd." The commentary on the Song of Songs, however, was still known in the 12th c. to Berengarius of Poitiers, who preserved a fragment of it (Liber apologeticus pro Petro Abaelardo: PL 178, 1864B). In the writings of St. *Augustine, a citation taken from Reticius's treatise against Novatian has been preserved. Augustine praised Reticius because he openly acknowledged the idea of original *sin (C. Iulian. 1,3,7 = C. Iulian. op. imperf. 1,55). The two treatises seem to have been lost. Reticius also enjoyed the esteem of *Constantine, who sent him along with a couple of other bishops of *Gaul to the Council of *Rome (313), then to the Council of *Arles (314). *Gregory of Tours delivered an enthusiastic elegy about his life (Glor. conf. 74). It seems that he died around 334. He was buried in the same sarcophagus as his wife in the cemetery of Autun. The Mart. hier. set his feast day on 15 July, although at Autun it was celebrated on 20 July, and the Bollandists placed it on the 19th.

CPL 77-78; Verzeichnis [4]1995, 730; Ch. Sapin, Les tombeaux des premiers évêques et l'occupation chrétienne du cimetière d'Autun, archéologie du site, in La Bourgogne. Actes du 109e Congrès national des Sociétés savantes (Dijon 1984), Archéologie I, Paris 1985, 113-129; R. Herzog - P.L. Schmidt (hrsg.), Handbuch der Lateinischen Literatur der Antike, V, Munich 1989, 419 (§ 576); BBKL 8, 57-58; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, Paris [2]1964, 188-190.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

REUSE. The term reuse (with its synonym reemployment) entered into the archaeological and historical-artistic lexicon in reference to the practice by which ancient architectural, sculptural, epigraphic materials, and also buildings, spaces and forms of the artistic lexicon become the subject of a total or partial recovery that places them in the context of a destination functionally different from their original ones, conferring on them new meanings. As such, it is a distinct phenomenon from their most elementary use as construction material, or for the calcination of whole or fragmentary architectural elements originating from demolitions and the different ways of occupying a site present in every context for the continuity of life. Reuse was not uncommon in the prevailing speculative perspective of the Roman age, and it was well known in the Middle Ages, when the reuse of Roman* sarcophagi for tombs of high ranking persons or for the burial of relics (and consequently as the bases of the altar), or in the walls, the visible presence of ancient elements (the Dome of Pisa, the cathedrals of Modena and Genoa; the collegiate church of St. Feliu at Gerona; the cathedral of *Tarragona) acquired precise ideological as well as aesthetic values (Esch 1969 and 1998; Greenhalgh 1989; Settis 1986; De Lachenal 1995). This was no less the case in Late Antiquity (3rd-6th c.), a period of the most significant examples of materials acquiring new uses and meanings that were from time to time practical, economic, ideological, cultural and bundled up into the term "spoils," from the Latin term spolia, that is, lot, plunder, etc., by which people would refer to reused materials.

The best known and most discussed example of reuse is the arch of *Constantine at *Rome (315), where sculptures and reliefs from the time of *Trajan, *Hadrian and the Antonian age were reused. However, recovered reliefs and architectonic elements were likewise used at Rome in the arcus novus and in the baths of *Diocletian (end of the 3rd–beginning of the 4th c.) and subsequently, between the 4th and 5th c., for the restoration of public buildings after the sack completed by the *Visigoths in 410, as well as a support for commemorative, celebrative or even imperial epigraphs. Nevertheless, it was in Christian artistic production that the practice of reuse became most apparent.

The attention of scholars was initially focused on the transformation of the temples into churches (Deichmann 1939) and the reuse of architectural materials in the buildings of the first and middle imperial age (Deichmann 1940), which was documented especially at Rome because of the conspicuous extent of the early Christian foundations and their state of conservation. Columns, foundations, capitals, lintels and decorative architectural elements from the 2nd-3rd c. were used in Constantine's chief constructions known today for their high standards (the basilica Lateranensis, S. Giovanni in Laterano, with the ancient baptistery of S. Giovanni in Fonte; St. *Peter's Basilica); in the mausoleum of S. Costanza, who was the emperor's daughter (today the church of S. Costanza); in the subsequent churches of S. Sabina (422–432), S. Maria Maggiore (432–440), S. Pietro in Vincoli, (432–440), S. Stefano Rotondo (3rd quarter of the 5th c.), in the remodeling, shortly after 441, of the basilica of St. *Paul's Outside the Walls. The presence of conspicuous reused materials in the church of S. Lorenzo of *Milan (during the middle decades of the 5th c.: the marble portal applied to the entryway of the chapel of St. Aquilino, from the 2nd half of the 1st c. AD, columns and capitals of the 1st-2nd c. in the church of St. *Hippolytus and in the colonnade facing the street) attests that the practice was not limited to Rome, given the fact that elsewhere it was confirmed by fragments of Roman architectural materials that were found in association with the remains of early Christian churches.

For a long time reuse was considered to be a sign of the decline of the Roman world that was no longer capable of assuring the preservation of its own monumental patrimony or of producing something ex novo, apart from exceptional cases. This understanding is no longer considered correct; rather, reuse is understood as the outcome of complex motives generated by the dynamics of transformation of the political, social, economic, religious and cultural order that marked Late Antiquity. Marble architectural materials (though not forgetting the reuse of bricks), moreover, were widely available because of the deterioration of Roman monuments that were no longer maintained following the loss of their functions; forums, basilicas, porticos and other public buildings no longer represented the centers for the gathering of communities whose lifestyle had changed. In addition, with respect to Rome, materials were available from the stocks of the storerooms, supplied until the 2nd-3rd c., with regularity and in a measure greater than what was needed, from the chief quarry zones (Alpi Apuane, the Aegean Islands and *Asia Minor). It is not always easy to specify whether it was from these deposits or the systematic stripping of the interiors of random public buildings that the homogenous conglomerates of columns and capitals (such as those reused at S. Sabina and part of that reused at S. Stefano Rotondo) emerged. The true and proper remains were generally characterized by putting together materials that were different in form, manufacturing and chronology; generally speaking, the layout was not haphazard, but followed criteria of symmetry, rhythmic correspondence—however conceived—frequently "hierarchical," in the sense that the materials of greatest value were placed in the most significant positions from the architectural and liturgical point of view (the colonnade within the mausoleum of Costanza, the area of the triumphal arch in St. Peter's Basilica, the presbytery of the basilica of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls). In a conception entirely different from the classical period, the multiplicity of forms and orders of the capitals (varietas) should be understood as a sign of ostentation and fastidious refinement. Although without undervaluing the economic aspect of reuse (though the disassembly, transference and reassembly of architectural materials demanded expenditures that cannot be ignored), it is evident that the reuse accompanied the prevailing of a new aesthetic dimension and that the appropriation of monumental signs of the past acquired a precise cultural and symbolic meaning: it is not by chance that the spolia were highlighted with respect to the materials manufactured ex novo.

The transformation of *pagan temples into churches should be situated in the prevailing ideological perspective, even if it is more nuanced than may appear at first sight. The imperial legislation, which in 391 imposed the closure of the temples (CTh 16,10,11), did not include provisions for their demolition, with the exception of the rural sanctuaries, where demolition was intended to prevent the celebration of pagan rites; rather, it required their safekeeping as a public good in the aesthetic sense as the contribution to the urban furnishing as well as the patrimonial furnishing, as the jurisdiction of the taxing authority (ius patrimonii or the ius publicum), which alone could make use of it, eventually even to the advantage of the church; this, obviously, did not exclude some abuses. In hagiographical texts, the construction of churches in the places of destroyed temples was a recurring motif, starting from the Life of St. Martin of Tours, which was written shortly after his death (397) by *Simplicius Severus. In fact, the destruction of pagan sanctuaries is attested starting from the official recognition of the church and with its gradual consolidation into the empire until the point that it became the official religion of the Roman state (380). However, for a rather long time it remained a transient fact, more frequent in the Eastern provinces of the Roman Empire and connected to specific situations (*Syria, *Egypt) and moments (as in the case of the dramatic end of the 4th c., when the pagan reaction was the strongest), and it was not always followed by the construction of a place for Christian worship. When this did occur, it involved a total substitution, as in *Jerusalem, where the structure of the Holy Sepulcher built by *Constantine (between 326 and 336) took the place of a temple attributed to the Greek goddess Aphrodite (Eusebius, Vita Constantini 3,26), the ruins of which had been removed, or at Gaza, for the church constructed by the Empress *Eudoxia on the site of the Marneion (which was destroyed in 402 by order of the emperor), which was purified with fire; the materials from the temple of Baal and Baalbek, however, were reused for the construction of the church; the significance of the substitution was emphasized at Gaza by the use of the temple's marble elements to pave the atrium facing the church, and at Baalbek by the placement of the nave over the pagan altar.

Despite the evidence of these and other similar occurrences, the very deep-rooted and traditional opinion, which has even been reaffirmed (Vaes 1984–1986 and 1989), that would maintain that the spread of Christianity brought with it a strong, and even violent, opposition to all signs of paganism and therefore in particular to the temples, with a precocious and generalized desecration of the pagan sanctuaries, is not confirmed by either the textual sources or by archaeological discoveries. In many cases referenced in the bibliography, the temple-church sequence is affirmed on the basis of the premise that considers this succession obvious; even the Constitution of 435 (CTh 16,10,25), which theoretically obligated the destruction of the temples, made provisions for their purification with the affixing of the text venerandae Christianae religionis signum, with a form of exorcism therefore and not a recasting of their use, as is usually affirmed. It was only between the 5th and the 6th c. that the practice of recovering sacred pagan buildings by consecrating them with fitting adaptations for Christian worship became more frequent, especially in Greece and in the West, often undertaken after a period of abandonment for a shorter or longer period (e.g., the transformation of the following buildings into churches: the Capitolium of Trieste; the temple of Athena at Syracuse; the temple of Concordia at Agrigento, Sicily, in the year 597; the temples of the Acropolis, the Erechtheum and the Parthenon, and the Hephaisteion of Athens, between the end of the 6th and the 7th c.; the temple of Apollo at Delphi; the Pantheon in 608 by Pope *Boniface IV, upon receiving authorization from the emperor Phocas). In the same chronological horizon, one should situate *Benedict's construction of the oratory of St. *Martin on the acropolis of Monte Cassino upon the temple of Apollo and the church of St. *John the Baptist on its peak near the altar of the pagan god, and *Gregory the Great's exhortation to Augustine of Canterbury, a missionary among the Angles, to convert the local pagan temples to places of Christian worship.

In fact, the archaeological documentation clearly attests that especially in the 4th-5th c., churches were preferably built on the sites of structures that were previously profane, public or private, from which they very often reused mortar elements in a varying amounts according to the type of building and its conformity to Christian liturgical demands: the basilicas were adapted (*Tipasa; *Sabratha; *Leptis Magna; *Bostra), public buildings of a certain function (Rome, Sts. Cosmas and Damian), thermal rooms (Rome, St. Pudentiana; Madauros; Cimiez; Albenga; but this was also the case even in the 16th c. of the Roman church of S. Maria degli Angeli, which was produced by Michelangelo in the cooling room of the baths of *Diocletian), storerooms (Aquileia), esp. residential buildings that were often homes (domi) of the aristocracy (Florence; Parentium; Luni; Martigny; *Narbonne; the Roman churches of St. *Chrysogonus; St. *Clement, Holy Cross in *Jerusalem, St. *Andrew in Catabarbara, which no longer exists) at times belonging to public officials (Aosta; Geneva), with rooms wide enough to supply a framework adequate for the construction of a church. Usually, the church's reuse of earlier buildings or the areas occupied by them had to occur within the framework of the current legislation on property, both public and private, which appears to have been especially attentive to safeguarding the monuments of each city, of which the temples were an integral part. The legistlation also aimed at preventing the abusive acquisition by private citizens of public lands and buildings, while retaining the ability to grant to private citizens public buildings lying in ruins or useless, or to transfer them—all to the advantage of the municipal coffers (Janvier 1969; Cantino Wataghin 1999, with an analysis especially of the Codex Theodosianus XV and XVI). The frequency with which the restrictive provisions were repeated is a likely indication of substantial abuses; this is no reason to think, however, that the church was responsible for them. Constantine's granting of the areas of the castra nova equitum singularium, the emperor's cavalry guard, for the construction of the Lateran basilica, and his turning over of the necropolis to the same military body to be used as the cemetery for the basilica of Sts. *Marcellinus and *Peter on the Via Labicana, opened the way for further concessions both by the emperor and the local administrations (e.g., for the conversion of the civil basilicas into places for Christian worship).

The building of early Christian churches over private homes—numerically very relevant, even apart from the reuse of their walls—testifies to the important role of private donations in the organization of the "material structure" and in the establishment of the church's real estate holdings, which is widely confirmed, moreover, by the textual sources. It is not by chance that the best known ancient building for Christian worship originated from an adaptation of a private home, that is, the domus ecclesiae of *Dura Europos (*Syria, around 240). The disbursement of public property and the generosity of the faithful can be assessed by the number of public and private buildings in high-density urban centers that were made available for reuse or despoiling, though regulated at least formally by legal norms. Multiple factors were in play, including the loss of functionality for the public buildings; various private demographic crises; multiple residences in the hands of an individual owner; and ascetic lifestyle choices with the ensuing renunciation of one's own goods.

The reuse of private or public buildings fits in the broadest context of reuse (or Christianization) of spaces, which occurred any time a building for Christian worship took the place of another structure with a different functional purpose, thus changing the connotation of the pertinent area (urban or rural, where, often upon the initiative of the landowners, sectors of large villas were transformed into places of worship for private use, but also open to neighboring groups of people) and its role in the life of the community. Even in this aspect, pragmatism and ideology intertwined in a nexus in which the position of *Gregory the Great appears very telling. Gregory justified the consecration of pagan temples by proposing to *Augustine of Canterbury that this practice would present an opportunity for some to convert because the custom of visiting places traditionally identified as sacred would bring pagans to the church.

A further and different aspect of reuse pertains to the subjects of Roman *iconography, taken into Christian iconography with a reassignment of their meanings (Grabar 1969; Prigent 1995): subjects such as the shepherd bearing a wounded lamb or the fisherman, which occur frequently in bucolic settings of the Hellenistic tradition. The figure of the orans is a sign of pietas (godliness), which from time to time becomes a representation of the afterlife and symbol of the deceased and Christ, although the mythological images are taken as models of Christian figures such as Endymion for Jonah at rest under the arbor tree, the Muses for the Virtues, Deucalion for *Moses in the ark. This process inserted itself with little disruption into the maturing of Christian language from the ancient figurative tradition and culture.

In the transition from Late Antiquity to the Middle Ages, the practice of reuse continued, but modified at least in part its own objects and their meanings. Monastic communities often took over rural Roman structures, which presumably had been abandoned and as such were not incompatible with the image of the "desert" in which the monastic spirituality recognized its own privileged place. Roman gems and precious stones present in the treasuries of cathedrals and abbeys were reused in the reliquaries (the Cross of "Desiderius": Brescia, S. Giulia-Museo della città) and book bindings; ivories were reused for liturgical ends, such as the Barberini ivory (Paris, Louvre Museum), depicting the triumph of the emperor, perhaps *Justinian (527–565), carved in the 7th c. on a leaf that has a list of names, among whom were those such as the king of Austrasia, to be remembered in prayers during the course of the liturgical celebrations. The use of ancient columns conferred a special prestige on the buildings: to the intrinsic value of the material was then added to their value as a sign of a past that was perceived, as such, to carry recognized auctoritas.

F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Kirchen in antiken Heiligtümern: JDAI 54 (1939) 105-136; Id., Säule und Ordnung in der frühchristlichen Architektur: Römische Mitteilungen 55 (1940) 114-130; Id., Chistianisierung (der Monumente): RAC II, 1128-1230; Y. Janvier, La législation du Bas-Empire romain sur les édifices publics, Aix-en-Provence 1969; A. Esch, Spolien. Zur Wiederverwendung antiker Baustücke und Skulpturen im mittelalterlichen Italien: Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 51 (1969) 1-64; F.W. Deichmann, Die Spolien in der spätantiken Architektur, Munich 1975; R.P.C. Hanson, The Transformation of Pagan Temples into Churches in the Early Christian Centuries: Journal of Semitic Studies 23 (1978) 257-267; A. Grabar, Les voies de la création en iconographie chrétienne. Antiquité et Moyen Âge, Paris 1979; L. De Giovanni, Chiesa e stato nel codice teodosiano. Saggio sul libro XVI, Naples 1980; Colloquio sul reimpiego dei sarcofagi romani nel medioevo (Pisa 5-12 settembre 1982), ed. B. Andreae - S. Settis, Marburger Winckelmann-Programm 1983, Marburg 1984; B. Ward Perkins, From Classical Antiquity to the Middle Ages. Urban Public Building in Northern and Central Italy AD 300–850, Oxford 1984; J. Vaes, Christliche Wiederverwendung antiker Bauten. Ein Forschungsbericht: Ancient Society 15-17 (1984–1986) 305-443; S. Settis, Continuità, distanza, conoscenza. Tre usi dell'antico, in Memoria dell'antico nell'arte italiana, III, Dalla tradizione all'archeologia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 1986, 375-486; J. Vaes, "Nova construere sed amplius vetusta servare." La réutilisation chrétienne d'édifices antiques (en Italie), in Actes du XI[e] Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon-Vienne-Grenoble-Genève-Aoste 1986), Vatican City 1989, 299-319; M. Greenhalgh, The Survival of Roman Antiquities in the Middle Ages, London 1989; L. Caballero Zoreda - J.C. Sánchez Santos, Reutilizaciones de material romano en edificios de culto cristiano, in Cristianismo y aculturación en tiempos del Imperio Romano: Antigüedad y Cristianismo (Murcia) 7 (1990) 431-485; Th. Mathews, The Clash of Gods. A Reinterpretation of Early Christian Art, Princeton, NJ 1993; P. Pensabene - C. Panella, Reimpiego e progettazione architettonica nei monumenti tardo-antichi di Roma: Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia 66 (1993–1994) 111-283; P. Prigent, L'art des premiers chrétiens. L'héritage culturel et la foi nouvelle, Paris 1995; L. De Lachenal, Spolia. Uso e reimpiego dell'antico dal III al XIV secolo, Milan 1995; J.-P. Caillet, La transformation en église d'édifices publics et de temples à la fin de l'Antiquité, in La fin de la cité antique et le début de la cité médiévale, de la fin du III[e] siècle à l'avènement de Charlemagne (Actes du colloque tenu à l'Université de Paris X – Nanterre les 1, 2, et 3 avril 1993), ed. Cl. Lepelley, Bari 1996, 191-211; G. Cantino Wataghin, La conversion de l'espace. Quelques remarques sur l'établissement matériel chrétien aux IV[e]-V[e] siècles, d'après l'exemple de l'Italie du Nord, in Clovis, Histoire et mémoire, ed. M. Rouche, Paris 1997, 127-139; EAM 9 (1998) s.v. Reimpiego, 876-883; G. Cantino Wataghin, " . . . ut haec aedes Christo Domino in ecclesiam consecretur." Il riuso cristiano di edifici antichi, in Ideologie e pratiche del reimpiego nell'alto medioevo, XLVI settimana CISAM, Spoleto 1999, 673-749; P. Barresi - P. Pensabene -D. Truccini, Materiali di reimpiego e progettazione nell'architettura delle chiese paleocristiane di Roma, in Ecclesiae urbis, ed. F. Guidobaldi - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Rome 2002, 799-842; P. Fancelli, Gli spolia tra architettura e restauro nelle chiese di Roma, ibid., 843-858; S. Ciranna, La lettura architettonica degli spolia nelle chiese di Roma, ibid., 859-874; Senso delle rovine e riuso dell'antico, ed. W. Cupperi (Annali della Scuola Normale Superiore di Pisa, Classe di Lettere e Filosofia, S. IV, Quaderni, 14, 2002), Pisa 2004; H. Brandenburg, Le prime chiese di Roma IV-VII secolo, Milan 2004.

G. Cantino Wataghin

REVELATION. It is rather difficult to present the various patristic ideas on God's revelation. Conditioned perhaps too much by the discussions in the last two centuries, provoked by the critical and rationalist outlooks, and which on the Catholic side has even brought a dogmatic solution in the First Vatican Council (DS 3004-3007), we run the risk of easily introducing into the writings of the *Fathers a set of problems that were foreign to them. They in fact did not summarize either the totality of God's salvific action nor the content of the *Bible with the global concept of revelation. In particular, they did not discuss the possibility of a gratuitous manifestation of the divine mystery that is accessible only to supernatural faith. Neither did they set a limit on public revelation upon the death of the last apostle (DS 2421), admitting instead that the fullness of times that occurred in Jesus Christ would be recognized by faith only in virtue of a continual revelation by Christ himself, who is always present in his church. Actually, because the milieu in which they lived was very open to celestial interventions, even they tended to trace every form of knowledge about God (θεολογία, θεογνωσία) to some divine manifestation. They were of the view, therefore, partly under the influence of *Stoicism, that all creation was a revelation of God (see Stockmeier 28-29, and especially Herms).

In addition, the investigation on this topic reveals itself to be difficult because of the complexity of the biblical premises. The horizon between which the writings of the OT and those of the NT spoke of a dialogue with which the living God communicates to humankind, first to the people of Israel, then to all those who believe in Jesus, was differently understood by various authors. It can be nomist (covenant or law of the people delivered from Egypt), prophetic (a word that recalls God's fidelity), sapiential (a search on the meaning of human existence), rabbinic (interpretation of the Torah, the unique manifestation of the divine will), apocalyptic (an explanation of the present in view of the future).

Lastly, patristic theology itself showed itself to be very complex. The vocabulary was far from uniform. It is therefore not enough to mention the terms ἀποκάλυψις, φανέρωσις, revelatio and similar terms. One must also consider εὐαγγέλιον, οἰκονομία, μυστήριον, γνῶσις, παιδεία, παράδοσις and other common images such as word, divine voice, vision, inspiration and others. The theological positions of the individual authors also diverge from one another because they correspond to the different conditions of their communities, the multifaceted objections of the Jews, *pagans and *heretics, and their various personal situations (the experience of conversion, culture, etc.). Moreover, the comprehensive monographs on this topic are rather sparse (Stockmeier, Offenbarung, 29-30; see now Herms).

As in other fields, in this one as well, the apostolic fathers did not abandon the early perspectives (Stockmeier, 30-37). Expectation of an imminent parousia did not cease to dominate their interests. They were therefore anticipating the final revelation of Christ. They also faced the question of the secundum scripturas of Jesus's destiny, by supposing that the events narrated by the biblical writings as well as these very writings themselves constituted a revelation from God. They also insisted that the Christian life be conformed to the commandments of Jesus, as well as to his example as a true teacher. Therefore they did not develop many of the teachings of the apostolic tradition, although we do find them inserted within various contexts of their religious context. 1 Clement, in fact, goes so far as to compare the oracles and divine manifestations in paganism to the biblical testimonies (25–26; 53), recalling the eternal origin of the divine actions that lead to peace (19,2) and seeing in the cosmic order the model of communal life (60–61). By harmonizing therefore the divine manifestations in the creation with those of salvation history, God makes himself known in the end solely through the work of Christ, which was begun at the beginning of creation and continued in the history of Israel (59,3). *Ignatius, for his part, was innovative. Opposing the adversaries who supported their claims unilaterally on the Hebrew Bible, he presented the mysteries of the life of Jesus, who was foretold by the prophets, as the true document of faith (Philad. 8,2; 9,2). The sacred Scriptures, therefore, belonged to Christians inasmuch as they proclaim the fullness of times and therefore obtain the true meaning of the gospel (Magnes. 8,2; Philad. 9,2). Along with other apostolic fathers (1 Clem. 7,2), he moreover understood the gospel as tradition. Lastly, the Shepherd of *Hermas delivered heavenly revelations to the church, which is symbolized by an old woman (Vis. 1–3). It thus expressed the conviction of the early Christians that God continued to manifest himself especially when they were gathered in prayer.

The 2nd c. was characterized by the intensified Christian confrontation with the Jewish and pagan worlds (Stockmeier, 37-45). The Jews contested the Christian use of the Bible and therefore the messiahship of Jesus (Just., Dial. 48-108). The Greco-Roman world, though being open to oracles and every form of heavenly manifestation, rejected the exclusivity of the Christian religion, which was based on the actual incarnation of a son of God (Just., 2 Apol. 13; 54-55; Orig., C. Cels. 5,2). Pagans especially called into question the late arrival of Christ, who Christians maintained was the savior of all people (Just., 1 Apol. 46; Diogn. 9). In this context, Christian authors were led to offer the first thematization of divine revelation. The question of the Bible, the primary source of revelation, found a radical response in the *Letter of Barnabas. As Christ reveals himself in the Christian community (6,14ff.; 16,9), the Holy Scriptures lose their value. These Scriptures were none other than the prophecy of the coming of Christ (7,1). *Marcion's response (d. ca. 160) was even more exclusive. Resorting to the Pauline antithesis of law and gospel, he not only rejected the Bible of the Jews but also, opposing creation and redemption, spoke only of a revelation of the Savior-God (Adv. M. I, 19,1). The reaction against him did not appear fully until the end of the 2nd c.

The pagan opposition, on the other hand, obligated the *Apologists to demonstrate the convergence of the Christian message with the learned thought of that time. The purpose of this was obviously to emphasize through philosophical categories the uniqueness of the subsequent revelation in Jesus Christ. But as the *Jewish-Hellenistic tradition had already done earlier, the defenders of the Christian religion were also busy with the completely spiritual knowledge of God, thus reinforcing the intellectual aspect of the divine revelation. The most effective response to the pagan objections and even those of the Jews was *Justin Martyr's theology of the Logos. He maintained more strongly than the other Apologists that Christians possessed the entirety of the truth in Jesus Christ. After having appeared to the ancient fathers and having spoken to them through the *prophets (Just., 1 Ap. 63,15-16; Dial. 127,4; Theoph., Autol. II, 22), as well as after having established every type of learning and just legislation in the pagan world (Just., 2 Apol. 10), the Logos of God, by becoming incarnate, made himself the definitive and complete word of God to the Christians (Just., 2 Apol. 7[8],3). The cosmic aspect, included in this theology of the Logos, was reinforced by other Apologists who insisted on the sense of Rom 1:19-20 regarding the revelation through creation (Theoph., Autol. I, 5; Aristides, Apol. 15,3).

The idea of the incarnation of the Logos, the supreme manifestation of God, was subsequently elaborated by antignostic authors (Stockmeier, 45-57). When confronting pretensions to a perfect *gnosis reserved only for the spiritual, who, thanks to the coming of the heavenly Savior, recognize their affinity to God without however seeing the transcendent God, as well as facing the rejection of the goodness of the visible creation and therefore the history of Israel as well, Irenaeus aimed to establish the unity of the salvific economy. Indeed, he located the dispositio libera of God, the creator of all things, in the incarnation of the Son of God (Adv. haer. III, 16,6). The *christological economy, in which the Son reveals the *Father and the Father reveals the Son (Adv. haer. IV, 6,1-7: on Mt 11:27), along with the other entirely gracious divine manifestations, would lead humankind in the second resurrection, through a wonderful pedagogy (Adv. haer. V, 1,1), to the vision of the immortal God (Adv. haer. IV, 20,5). He also demonstrated that Holy Scriptures—the four gospels and the apostolic letters, interpreted, however, only in accord with to the regula fidei maintained in the churches of apostolic origin (Adv. haer. III, 1,1; III, 24,1)—established the authentic testimony of revelation, which began in the kingdom of the Spirit and extended in the kingdom of the Son, but will be definitively completed in the kingdom of the Father (Adv. haer. IV, 20,1-2).

In similar conditions, but also in part new ones, *Tertullian adopted the theology of Irenaeus. He transplanted it, however, into the Latin world. He introduced the term revelare, which would enjoy great success. He adopted the Latin category of truth and with it the idea of its ancient origin, that is, the divine authority present in the Bible, Christ, the apostles and in the church's regula fidei (Praescr. 6; 32; 37; 44). Reacting against Marcion, he insisted more on the possibility of knowing God starting from creation, without however overlooking the rule of faith (Adv. Marc. I, 18,2: natura ex operibus—doctrina ex praedicationibus). Confronting paganism, he emphasized—and this was rather new—the testimony of the soul (Apol. 17,6; Test. 2). By defending his adherence to *Montanism, Tertullian, though compromising his principles of tradition, maintained in some way the ancient conviction that God never ceases to reveal himself, and most important expressed his own idea of the supremacy of faith (Monog. II, 4).

Shortly after, the Alexandrians *Clement and *Origen followed the same antignostic line (Stockmeier, 57-65). Nevertheless, they focused much more on the legitimate aspirations of the gnostics, without betraying the demands of ecclesiastical teaching. They therefore elaborated a Christian gnosis. By adapting not only the *Platonic vision of the world but also the mysterious language taken from Greek *philosophy to biblical teaching, Clement developed a theology of divine pedagogy. The Logos is the believers' mystagogue, illuminating them esp. in *baptism (Protr. X, 94,2) and leading them in a continuous education in the knowledge of God and of himself (Paed. I, 6; I, 55,2; Strom. I, 52,3; III, 44,3; VII, 6,1). Moreover, Clement expressed the educational function of the Logos by presenting him as a true and unique revealer of the all-transcendent God (Protr. I, 10,3, with Mt 11:27). He saw in the Logos the key of the biblical revelation (Paed. I, 57,2; Strom. V, 32; V, 34,1) and likewise the criteria of true philosophy (Paed. I, 20,2; Strom. VI, 44,1), established on various orders in the creation (Paed. III, 100,1) and on human natural openness to the knowledge of God (Protr. X, 100,3; Strom. V, 87,2ff.). Thus Clement makes it known that the true gnosis comes from God's initiative (Strom. V, 82,4 and 9) and in the final analysis consists in a salutary dialogue with the incarnate Logos (Protr. I, 8,4).

Origen, for his part, following Clement's philosophical path, but depending more on the Bible and more faithful to the regula fidei delineated in a grandiose summary the gnoseological mediation of the Logos (Studer, Rivelazione). Wisdom, inasmuch as it is directed toward the Father, that is, knowledge that God has of himself, and the Word, in relation to the world, that is, the manifestation of God, the Logos, being present in all created things through him and acting even in all history, everywhere reflects the glory of God (Princ. I, 2,2-3). By adapting himself to human capacities, both as creature and as sinner, he placed in the incarnation in which he announced himself (Comm. Ioh. XIII, 28,165-171) the bases of the faith without which one can not return to the perfect vision of God (C. Cels. 6,68). Identifying the written word with the Logos, Origen saw in the Bible an ever-present coming of the Logos that foretold the eternal gospel, without reducing, however, the entirety of revelation to Scripture (Philoc. XV, 19). Though thereby stamping a very intellectual character onto his theology of divine revelation, he did not entirely overlook its historical dimensions. Christ, in fact, manifests himself as the great witness that guarantees the credibility of those who recount the salvific economy of God (C. Cels. I, 45). Actually, Origen understood revelation as a dialogue between God and humankind. As in the case of the disciples, every believer converses with Christ, the Truth. He adopted this position on the basis of the words of Christ himself which were committed to the sacred Scriptures and preserved in the church (Studer, Geschichte und Glaube, and PA I, praef. 1-3).

This teaching of Origen on the mystery of the Logos survived in particular in the theology of *Eusebius of Caesarea (d. 339). He conferred upon it, however, a political orientation by emphasizing the triumph of divine revelation, achieved by *Constantine, the earthly vicar of the eternal Word in the victory over paganism (Farina, L'impero). Before elaborating this political theology, Eusebius had already tried on the apologetic level to demonstrate the superiority of the Jewish religion with respect to the "theologies" of the nations (Praep. ev.) and the superiority of Christianity over Judaism (Dem. ev.) and to thus introduce the gospel (Praep. ev. I, 1,2-8). In this regard, he developed the idea that the οἰκονομία, which culminated in the incarnation of the Logos (HE I, 2,6-13), reveals the θεολογία, the doctrine of the Trinity (HE I, 1,7-8; Dem. ev. III, pr.; IV, 1; C. Marc. II, 2ff.). In the later writings against *Marcellus he would even insist on the fact that neither Plato, nor even Moses nor any angel nor any other power, but only Jesus Christ has revealed that the Father, the Son and the *Holy Spirit is the only God (Eccl. theol. III, 5; Praep. ev. XI, 14,1-6).

During the 4th c., the dogmatic controversies, which were sparked above all by the misunderstanding of Origen's teaching on the mediation of the Logos, led to a further philosophical elaboration of the biblical premises in question (Stockmeier, 66-75). Although *Arius placed the Logos-Christ on the level of creatures, and even denied him full knowledge of the Father (Athan., Ar. II, 22), the Nicene theologians recognized in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the shining image of the Father. They therefore established in his true divinity the possibility of an authentic revelation of the Father. Thus, *Athanasius considered the incarnation of Christ, the true God, as a guarantee of the divinizing gnosis, which had been definitively reestablished in humankind. The incarnation of the Logos made much more possible the perfect knowledge of God, a knowledge in which the corruption of death had been conquered, and thus the root of every previously insurmountable obstacle to access to God (De incarn. 9-14.54). This revelation of Christ was confirmed in baptism in which the Holy Spirit, gift and true God, illuminates the believer (Ep. Serap. I, 20).

*Apollinaris of Laodicea in his doctrine on the λόγος ἔνσαρκος proposed in an even more stringent way this same theory of *divinization (Mühlenberg, Unendlichkeit). *Hilary of Poitiers, however, reinterpreting Origen's idea of the Logos, gloria Patris, in light of the faith of Nicaea concisely states: Summa dispensationis est Filio, ut noveris Patrem (Trin. III, 22). In this approach to the mystery of the Logos, two things appear clearer than before: the vivid interest concerning the internal relationship between the Father and the Son (and the Holy Spirit) and the preference for the historic revelation over the cosmic. In the second phase of the Arian controversy, Athanasius (Ep. Serap. I, 17.20), and even more so *Basil and the other Cappadocian Fathers, emphasized the role of the Holy Spirit, who is likewise sent by God for the illumination of humankind (Basil, De Spir. S. 24,55ff.; *Greg. Naz., Orat. 31,26; *Greg. Nyss., Vita Mos. 2,158-159 and already Eusebius, C. Marc. I, 1). Basil, who was very well studied in the doctrine of the knowledge of God from creation (Hexaem. 1,6), moreover, did not cease to affirm that the knowledge of the existence of the divinity preceded faith in God (Ep. 235,1; see Eus. Praep. ev. I, 1,11). He presented a very broad concept of paideia that included the entire universe, with its institutions, as its environment. Lastly, the discussion on the true humanity of Christ, which had been compromised in the *Origenist tradition, helped to clarify the way in which the intimate union between the full divinity and humanity in Christ constitutes the supreme revelation of the divine mystery. *Cyril of Alexandria in particular attested to it. Constrained by the Antiochene tradition, he recognized without doubt the integrity of the assumed humanity of Christ but nonetheless vehemently maintained that the incarnation is the manifestation in the flesh (1 Tim 3:16) of Christ himself, who according to his nature is invisible (Chr. un.: SCh 97, 324), and that therefore the illumination of the knowledge of God the Father shines in the very person of Christ (De recta fide 32: PG 76, 1181B).

In the West, at the same time, *Marius Victorinus, with his *Neoplatonic approach to the mediation of the Logos (Cand. 14; Ar. I, 19), *Ambrose, with his lex-evangelium antithesis (Psal. 61,33; Off. I, 48,238), *Jerome, with his philological analyses of the revelatio, considered as a Christian word (Gal 1:12), and *Augustine, with his wide use of the patristic heritage and esp. his linguistic finesse (De Veer, Revelare), were not slow to place new emphases on the theology of revelation. They especially praised the absolute value of God's manifestation in Christ.

Augustine, in particular, heavily involved in a broad debate with African *Manicheans and confronted with Milanese *Neoplatonism, noticeably developed the principal teachings of the Christian tradition. On the one hand, he emphasized even more that Christ revealed the true meaning hidden in the books of the OT (Wieland, Offenbarung, 263ff.). On the other hand, he bases all knowledge of truth on Christ, the magister interior (Mag. 37-38; Trin. IV, 2,4), without denying Christ divine auctoritas, which, present in the Bible, the incarnation and the church, leads to faith without which the illumination of the heart is not possible (Conf. XI, 8; Trin. VII, 4; Ciu. X, 32). Even if Augustine, in the framework of his *Platonist vision of the world, does not seem to attribute much importance to the historic revelation of God (Studer, Geschichte und Glaube), nonetheless, in part under the influence of Latin rhetoric, in part even more under the impression of the regula fidei was able to overcome the risks of his philosophical position. He insisted, in fact, on the faith that was based on the narratio rerum gestarum (Trin. XII, 14,22; XIV, 15,21) and united scientia and sapientia in Christ. Thanks to Christ, God and humanity, historic knowledge is able to lead to the contemplation of eternal things (Trin. XIII, 19,24). Indeed, in the wake of the 4th-c. tradition, Augustine elaborated the theme of the economy (dispensatio) that reveals the eternal reality of the *Trinity.

Although in the West the Augustinian doctrine on divine revelation dominated until the Scholastic age, in the East, two theologians introduced new emphases. Under the influence of Neoplatonism, ps.-*Dionysius, by closely uniting creation and revelation, presented the universe as a gradual communication of the intimate secret of God (Cael. hier. IV, 1-2). Confirmation, however, through the Scriptures is the norm of all knowledge of the truth (Eccl. hier. V, 3,7). He sees truth guaranteed especially by the theandric life of Jesus Christ (Ep. 4). Correcting this heavily unitarian perspective, thanks to his fidelity to the invidise-inconfuse of the faith of *Chalcedon, *Maximus the Confessor for his part distinguished clearly not only between the Creator and creation but also between the creations's symbolic function and the divine reality symbolized by it (Quaest. Thal. 59), as appears especially in the incarnation that reveals in the world more strikingly the love of God and at the same time attests the full freedom of the human response.

Observing all the patristic developments of the complex biblical teaching on revelation, one primarily observes the great openness of the ancient theologians toward different phenomena of the divine manifestation and the entirely natural presupposition that God communicates to human beings (see Herms, 146ff.). In their own way, the gnostics were an exception because they denied the possibility of seeing the transcendent divinity, as well as *Arius, who extended his negative theology even to Christ. The difficulties that the Fathers had to combat, with the exception of the two aforementioned cases, did not pertain to the possibility of the gracious revelation of the interior life of God but rather to its concrete form, that is, the manifestation of God through the incarnation of the true Son of God, which was rejected by both the Jews and the gnostics and the non-Christian philosophers. Justin, Irenaeus, Athanasius and Maximus the Confessor, therefore, defended the incarnation as the supreme theophany. But neither Origen, Augustine nor ps.-Dionysius failed to emphasize that the Word, by becoming incarnate through *Mary, revealed himself and therefore even God the Father. Augustine especially emphasized that by believing in and loving the incarnate Son, who died and rose again, the Christian will come to see his divinity and in it the divinity of the Father (Div. Quaes. 69; Trin. II, 16,27–17,29).

This Christo- or Logos-centrism, however, took different forms. Some, if not all, emphasized the revealing presence of Christ in the church. Justin especially emphasized the conquering force of the Logos. Augustine considered the Logos to be the magister interior. Some of the church's teachers, such as Origen, emphasized the twofold action of the Logos: first, by becoming incarnate he revealed God in the past, and second, he has spoken through the Scriptures to the believers of every age. All the authors, however, also look at the incarnation in a future perspective, whether by considering it to be the basis of the spiritual ascent toward the eternal vision of God, or by recalling the central affirmation of the angel that the Son of Man would appear as judge of the living and the dead to definitively reveal the glory of God.

M. Harl, Origène et la fonction révélatrice du Verbe incarné, Paris 1958; R. Latourelle, L'idée de révélation chez les Pères de l'Église: ScEc 11 (1959) 297-344; R. Braun, Deus christianorum. Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien, Paris 1962; A.C. De Veer, "Revelare – Revelatio": RecAug 2 (1962) 331-357; W. Pannenberg (ed.), Offenbarung als Geschichte, Göttingen [3]1965; R. Farina, L'impero e l'imperatore cristiano in Eusebio di Cesarea, Zürich 1966; E. Mühlenberg, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 1966; V. Hahn, Das wahre Gesetz. Eine Untersuchung der Auffassung des Ambrosius von Mailand vom Verhältnis der beiden Testamente, Münster 1969; P. Stockmeier, Offenbarung in der frühchristlichen Kirche, in HDG I/1a, Freiburg 1971, 27-87 (basic bibl.); M. Seybold, Die Offenbarungsthematik in der Spätpatristik und Frühscholastik, in ibid., 88-115; B. Studer, Soteriologie der Kirchenväter, in HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978, 55-225; R. Tremblay, La manifestation et la vision de Dieu selon s. Irénée de Lyon, Münster 1978; W. Wieland, Offenbarung bei Augustinus, Mainz 1978 (bibl.); H. Ziebritzki, Hl. Geist und Weltseele. Das Problem der dritten Hypostase bei Origenes, Plotin und ihren Vorläufern, Tübingen 1994; H. Herms, Offenbarung: TRE 25 (1995) 146-210 (bibl.); B. Studer, Theologia – Oikonomia: StudAns 124 (1997) 575-600; G. Sfameni Gasparro, La terminologia misterica nel linguaggio della rivelazione in Origene, in Id., Origene e la tradizione origeniana in Occidente, Rome 1998, 195-236; C. Reemts, Vernunftgemässer Glaube. Die Begründung des Christentums in der Schrift des Origenes gegen Celsus, Bonn 1998; B. Studer, History and Faith in Augustine's De Trinitate: StudAns 127 (1999) 329-373; A. Monaci Castagno, Esoterico/essoterico, in Origene. Dizionario, Rome 2000, 144-150; B. Studer, Rivelazione, in ibid., 409-414; B. Studer, Geschichte und Glaube bei Origenes und Augustinus, CSt 25 (2004) 1-24.

B. Studer

REVELATION, Book of. See *APOCALYPSE

REVERENTIUS. Lived in *Gaul between the 5th and 6th c. and can be placed in the context of Merovingian *hagiography for having written around 475 the *Life of Hilary of Arles (Vita S. Hilarii Arelatensis), an encomiastic work attributed in the past to *Honoratus of *Marseille (*Gennadius, Vir. ill. 99: PL 58, 1118-1120), which, among its various historical and antiquarian references, emphasizes the efficacy of the preaching and depth of the saint's teaching who was the head of the monastery of *Lérins.

CPL 506; BHL 3882; PL 50, 1219-1246; S. Cavallin, Vitae SS. Honorati et Hilarii, Lund 1952, 79-109; M. Corti, Studi sulla latinità merovingia in testi agiografici minori, Messina 1939, 11-14, 157-174; B. Axelson, In vitas Honorati et Hilarii marginalia critica: VChr 10 (1956) 157-159.

P. Marone

RHAETIA (Raetia). A Roman province between the Tridentine Alps and the Danube, lying in parts of modern-day Switzerland and the Bavarian highlands. As a result of *Diocletian's reorganization of the empire, Rhaetia was included among the regiones of *Italy and divided into Rhaetia prima and Rhaetia secunda. Few pieces of information remain on the spread of Christianity in this region, which had come from nearby *Noricum. One must conclude, however, that it was difficult for the religion to spread, since archaeological discoveries in the region have revealed the widespread attachment to the indigenous cults as well as cults from the East, esp. in Rhaetia prima (on this topic, see R. Degen, Liechtenstein, 202-222).

To date, we have definite information on three ancient episcopates: (a) Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg), where the martyrdom of St. Aphra occurred under Diocletian (MGH, Scr. rer. mer. 3,41-64; 7,192-204; and see the testimony of *Venantius Fortunatus, Vita Martini, vv. 640-644); (b) Curia (Chur), if at the Synod of Milan (451) Abundius, bishop of Como, signed in the name of the absent Asinius or Asimus, episcopus ecclesiae Curiensis (Mansi 6,144); (c) Sabiona (Säben), whose bishop, Ingenuus or Ingenuinus, took part at the synod of Marianus (590) (MGH, Scr. rer. lang. et it. saec. VI-IX, p. 393; and see Paul the Deacon, Hist. Lang. III, 26). Moreover, one can garner a general idea on the conditions of Rhaetia secunda during the mid-5th c. from *Eugippius's Vita s. Severini, esp. chs. 15, 19-20, 22 and 27, where we learn of the existence of some Christian communities at Quintanis (Künzing) and at Batavis (Passau), whose basilica, however, was near Boiotrus (Innstadt), beyond the river Inn and therefore in Noricum. A few doubts have been expressed concerning another testimony from the Vita (ch. 41,1), namely on the figure of a bishop of Rhaetia named Valentinus (M. Heuwieser, Geschichte des Bistums Passau, 37ff.).

Soon after, under the continual invasions of the Germanic populations, Rhaetia prima ceased to exist. Even Rhaetia secunda, after having been incorporated into the Italian kingdom of *Odoacer, came under the rule of the Alamanni and the Bavarii. During the Merovingian and Carolingian eras, the entire region maintained its adherence to Christianity.

R. Heuberger, Rätien im Altertum und Frühmittelalter, Innsbruck 1932; A. Bigelmair, Bavière: DHGE 6, 1524-1528; M. Heuwieser, Geschichte des Bistums Passau, I, Passau 1939; EC 10, 842-843; H.-J. Kellner, Augsburg, Provinzhauptstadt Raetiens: ANRW II, 5.2 (1976) 708-717 esp.; R. Degen, Liechtenstein zwischen Spätantike und Mittelalter: HA 9 (1978) 202-222; K. Gamber, Sarmannina. Studien zum Christentum in Bayern und Österreich während der Römerzeit, Regensburg 1982, 7-57; F. Lotter, Passau im Zeitalter Severins: Ostbairische Grenzmarken 24 (1982) 1-23; V. Bierbrauer, Arianische Kirchen in Noricum mediterraneum und Raetia II?: Bayerische Vorgeschichtsblätter 63 (1998) 205-226.

V. Pavan

RHETORIC. Rhetoric involves the same conception of life in the classical and the Christian world. In Greece, the people whom the Latins called "orators" they called "rhetoricians" or "rhetors." In common, everyday speech, the term rhetoric is often used in a pejorative sense, to refer to at most an ornate form of discourse apart from its content. In recent years, however, rhetoric has overcome the negative phase of identification with its vices and has been recovered as the nexus of content and determining form for evaluating the phenomena of artistic, literary and figurative expression. Well-known German scholars, starting from E.R. Curtius to L. Arbusow (Colores rhetorici, Göttingen 1963) and H. Lausberg, have uncovered the importance of theological and liturgical texts for literature and the importance of linguistic phenomena in the public life of antiquity. V. Florescu emphasized the dilemma that appeared during the early patristic era, "when the Word of God was considered to be so rich with intrinsic penetration as to be able to despise the subtle and complicated utterances of the verbal debate" (La retorica, p. 7).

For the ancients, besides the schooling immediately following grammar school that took its name from rhetoric, rhetoric was a constant relationship between form and content. Common to the classical-pagan and ancient Christian rhetoric was the condemnation of formal values without moral values. There was a universal rhetoric which human beings cannot escape, a rhetoric that does not obey the rigid norms of the textbooks. It was then generally the tendency to see in the figurative arts the norms of universal rhetoric suffused in various modes of artistic expression. This is particularly the case in *iconography which like a literary page cannot be seen in isolation from the natural patterns of semantics—that is, of signs that reveal the spontaneity of certain states of the mind. This was the line of the fathers of the church, well described by St. *Paulinus of Nola and *John of Damascus, to explain how there came to be such a wide-ranging appropriation of the *Bible, the so-called Bible of the poor.

The relationship between word and action was very close, indissoluble for the Christian. Gospel principles (Mt 12:36) affirm that human beings will render an account for every vain word on *Judgment Day. The fathers of the church seemed to say that if the truth of things depended on the ability of the speaker, the world would end in the triumph of lies. By insisting on the truthful word of the humble and simple spirit, the OT and the NT continually affirm that the perverse word expresses perverse customs. The central pivot of all patristic Christianity was the Holy *Scriptures, which from the spiritual point of view replaced the writings of Homer and Virgil. The ancient Christian authors thought and wrote biblically, a dimension that must not escape the scholars of ancient rhetoric. The church fathers are representative not of a decadent form of Christian *Greek and *Latin, but of a rich culture that generated new forms and new content.

Through biblical *exegesis, the Fathers followed more the idea of sapientia than eloquentia. They also used beautiful metaphors to refer to the immense sapientia found in the Bible. With Jesus Christ, a new world opened; the studia liberalia were not to be excluded, but they were not to be required. One could reach Christ from every walk of life, from manual labor to study. The humble slave, the farmer, the fisherman, the artisan, young and old, men and women, those from any social condition could live as did Christ, which is to understand Holy Scripture. The penetration into the biblical text by the fathers of the church and the community exerted great influence on the language that was undergoing gradual transformation to express another civilization. New forms and elements that the classical world had never known began to enter common speech. In rhetorical terms, one could say that there was an elocutio performing the function of the biblical inventio. It was the language of the biblical translations, the *liturgy and the *catechesis, in other words, the language of the community. The forms themselves also developed with the language. Christian sermons had to speak in everyday language. The proper characteristics of the various genera dicendi, which have their roots in gospel preaching, prevailed.

The biblical *commentaries, philologically speaking, were richer than the pagan commentaries on the classical works. In comparison to *Jerome, Servius was impoverished in elements of comparison and vocabulary and did not have a historical sense of language, nor Jerome's knowledge of Hebrew. In the writings of every Christian author, one can identify the skill learned at the school of rhetoric that was now moving in the direction of Scripture, finding further elements to develop there. Declamations in the form of controversia—speeches about legal cases—and suasoria—debates over historical topics, mythology and various aspects of culture—were presented as propaedeutic exercises for the moral life. Many aspects of declamations became themes for Christian authors. Even Christian readers went back to the use of declamations and reading aloud so that the sacred texts might be understood in order to be practiced. In the transformation of the Greek and Latin languages many new elements of meter quietly entered in that pertained to quantity and accent. *Augustine examined the phenomenon explaining many things on the modification of the accents in relation to the quantity, which was waning, and on melos. He would have written six books on melos if the circumstances had permitted. Instead, "the burden of church care on his shoulders," which as a bishop he had to bear, prevented him from so doing (Ep. 101,3).

The trivium (grammar, rhetoric and philosophy) began to undergo profound changes. Reading the Fourth Book of Augustine's De doctrina christiana makes this clear. The Fathers were the first to catch a glimpse of the elements that were common to all people naturaliter rhetorici—patterns such as antithesis, parallelism, gradatio, auxesis, etc., but these elements also became a means of scriptural exegesis. Even the quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, music and astronomy) enlarged and developed within the writings of ancient Christian authors.

The encyclopedism of *Isidore of Seville is certainly a separate case altogether. From the 3rd c., *Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, reached the height of mathematical knowledge (Eus., HE 7,32,6; ed. Schwartz). A few fragments have come down to us from his writings. He was in contact with Pappus, to whom we owe much if we know anything today about Euclid and Apollonius's works on higher geometry. Pappus was a convert, as one can deduce from the oath in which he affirmed that he believed in God the author of the OT and the NT. Anticipating the direction of analytic geometry, Augustine considered numbers to be the foundation of mathematics and the natural sciences. The theologian *John Philoponus was the author of well-known books on mathematics. The mathematics of the 5th and 6th c. follow the path of ancient Christianity. As an orator, *Boethius was induced to write on arithmetic, geometry, music and astronomy, which completes the quadrivium, the preparation for philosophy; his last book was the Consolatio Philosophiae. Ancient Christian rhetoric still needs to be explored for a deeper understanding of the evolution of the hard sciences, which also had their practical applications.

H. Lausberg, Elemente der literarischen Rhetorik, Munich ²1967 (Ital. trans. Bologna 1969); Id., Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik, 2 vols., Munich ²1973; V. Florescu, La Retorica nel suo sviluppo storico, Bologna 1971; J.J. Murphy, Rhetoric in the Middle Ages. A History of Rhetorical Theory from Saint Augustine to the Renaissance, London 1974; G.A. Kennedy, Classical Rhetoric and Its Christian and Secular Tradition from Ancient to Modern Times, London 1980 (extensive bibl.); A. Quacquarelli, Retorica e iconologia, Bari 1982; Retorica della Comunicazione nelle letterature classiche, ed. A. Pennacini, Bologna 1990; R.A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms, Berkeley, CA ²1991; S.M. Oberhelman, Rhetoric and Homilies in Fourth-Century Christian Literature, Atlanta 1991; A. Cameron, Christianity and the Rhetoric of Empire. The Development of Christian Discourse, Berkeley, CA 1991; Historische Wörterburch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Ueding, Darmstadt 1992–; Medieval Rhetoric. A Select Bibliography, Toronto ²1992; Dimostrazione, argomentazione dialettica e argomentazione retorica nel pensiero antico, ed. A.M. Battegazzore, Genoa 1993; A. Quacquarelli, Retorica patristica e sue istituzioni interdisciplinari, Rome 1995; L. Pernot, La rhétorique de l'éloge dans le monde gréco-romain, 2 vols., Paris 1993; M.L. Clarke, Rhetoric at Rome. A Historical Survey, New York ³1996; K. Demoen, Pagan and Biblical Exempla in Gregory Nazianzen. A Study in Rhetoric and Hermeneutics, Lingua Patrum 2, Turnhout 1996; O. Reboul, Introduzione alla retorica, Bologna 1996; V.K. Robbins, The Tapestry of Early Christians. Rhetoric, Society and Ideology, London-New York 1996; Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 B.C.–A.D. 400, ed. S.E. Porter, Leiden 1997; M. Meyer, La retorica, Bologna 1997; G.A. Kennedy, Classical Rhetoric and Its Christian and Secular Tradition from Ancient to Modern Times, Chapel Hill ²1999; L. Pernot, La rhétorique dans l'antiquité, Paris 2000; C.W. Wooten, The Orator in Action and Theory in Greece and Rome, Leiden 2001.

A. Quacquarelli

RHODANIUS of Toulouse. The sources that speak of Rhodanius, bishop of Toulouse, are unanimous in affirming that Rhodanius opposed the pro-Arian objectives of the emperor *Constantius II, who, upon becoming the sole emperor after 350, sought to obtain the signatures of the Western bishops to condemn *Athanasius, putting pressure on them, with the exception of six bishops: *Paulinus of Trier, *Eusebius of Vercelli, *Lucifer of Cagliari, *Dionysius of *Milan, Rhodanius of Toulouse and *Hilary of *Poitiers, who were exiled for this reason. Later, the sources provide us conflicting information about the council at which Rhodanius was exiled: *Jerome seems to identify it as the Council of *Arles (353), although *Rufinus (Eccl. Hist. Continuatio 10,20) and *Sozomen (HE 4,9), speak of just one synod (Milan) preceding that of *Rimini, where five bishops were exiled (among them Rhodanius), and add Hilary, as if he had been exiled on another occasion; the first five, however, were all at Milan (355). *Sulpicius Severus (Chron. 2,39), when mentioning three synods (at Arles, *Béziers and Milan, in that order), did not specify when Rhodanius opposed the emperor (it seems after Milan), but spoke of him along with Hilary, affirming that Rhodanius, who was of a weaker nature, owed to Hilary's example the strength he showed in opposition and said that, following the advice of Arbitio and Lollianus, they were exiled even though they were forced to sign the condemnation of Athanasius on the condition, however, that only the bishops had the right to examine the accusations. We also know from Sulpicius that Rhodanius died in exile in *Phrygia (Chron. 2,45,9).

Perhaps the information supplied by Hilary himself (Fragm. hist. 6,1-2; Contra Const. 2) is the most precise (Crouzel, Pietri); he identified the Council of Béziers (356) as Rhodanius's opportunity for opposition. Hilary, during the description of these events, called Rhodanius Christus: not in the sense that Rhodanius reproduced the passion of Christ, but that, just as those anointed by the Lord in the OT, he too was the victim of an ungodly king's aggression (Doignon). It was Hilary himself who described the sufferings that the church of Toulouse underwent, the echo of which is found in the Mass of the translation of the *martyr *Saturninus of Toulouse (1 Nov), which was preserved by the Mozarabic Sacramentary. Despite his death in exile, which was equivalent to martyrdom, Rhodanius did not appear as a saint on the list of the bishops of Toulouse: the church of this city, which 50 years later became the capital of the *Visigothic *Arian kings, was unable to commemorate him as a saint and an opponent of Arianism; as a result, Rhodanius was thus forgotten by his countrymen.

H. Crouzel, Un "résistant" toulousain à la politique de l'empereur Constance II. L'évêque Rhodanius: BLE 77 (1976) 173-190; J. Doignon, Christ ou oint? Un vocable biblique appliqué par Hilaire de Poitiers à l'évêque Rhodanius de Toulouse: RHE 72 (1977) 317-326; Ch. Pietri, De la partitio de l'empire chrétien à l'unité sous Constance, in Histoire du christianisme des origines à nos jours. Tome II. Naissance d'une chrétienté (250–430), ed. Ch. and L. Pietri, Paris 1995, ch. IV.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

RHODON. The only source we have on Rhodon and his work is *Eusebius (HE V, 13,1-8). Active during the time of the emperor *Commodus (180–192) and a native of *Asia Minor, Rhodon was a disciple of *Tatian at *Rome, as Tatian himself attests. *Eusebius says that he was the author of various works; he discusses at length, however, one of his works against *Marcion, providing extensive fragments from it. Rhodon there outlines the Macionite heresy of his day, illustrating how it had split into several differnt sects, each of which is individually analyzed and refuted by him (HE V, 13,2-4). It seems, in particular, that he had directed his polemic at *Apelles, whom he visited in person. Rhodon expounded his doctrine on the one principle regarding God and reported a disputation that he had with a heretic, which ended with an open derision of the deficiencies in his opponent's arguments (HE V, 13,5-7). Rhodon treated his discipleship under Tatian in this same anti-Marcionite work when he addressed Callistio, an otherwise unknown person. Rhodon, in particular, had promised to supply him from his own writings the solutions to Tatian's Problems, which concerned obscure passages in *Scripture that Tatian had exposed (HE V, 13,8). We do not know if he completed this project. Eusebius of Caesarea also mentioned Rhodon's commentary on the *Hexameron (HE V, 13,8), from which he was able to gather information on Apelles's lavish and impious exegetical work on the Mosaic law (HE V, 13,9). *Jerome's claim (Vir. ill. 37; 39) that Rhodon was active in the anti-Montanist controversy has no basis in fact.

CPG 1300; P. de Labriolle, Les sources de l'histoire du montanisme, Fribourg-Paris 1913, XX-XXI; A. Harnack, Rhodon und Apelles, in Geschichtliche Studien Albert Hauck zum 70. Geburtstage dargebracht, Leipzig 1916, 39-51; P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten. Untersuchungen zur Sozialgeschichte, 2 Auf., Tübingen 1989, 250-251; U. Neymeyr, Die christlichen Lehrer im zweiten Jahrhundert. Ihre Lehrtätigkeit, ihr Selbstverständnis und ihre Geschichte (Suppl. VChr 4), Leiden 1989, 35-36, 186; K. Greschat, Apelles und Hermogenes. Zwei theologische Lehrer des zweiten Jahrhunderts (Suppl. VChr 48), Leiden 2000, 17-20; Id., "Woher hast du den Beweis für deine Lehre?" Der altkirchliche Lehrer Rhodon und seine Auseinandersetzung mit den römischen Marcioniten, SP 34, ed. M.F. Wiles - E.J. Yarnold, Leuven 2001, 82-87.

V. Zangara

RICH – RICHES – PROPERTY. In the *Bible, riches are good per se and they are praised; like everything else, riches also belong to God and the availability of riches or goods to a person can be interpreted as a sign of divine protection and blessing (Gen 13:2; 26:12ff.; Deut 6:7-10; 28:1-11). If people are blessed by God for their faithfulness and this blessing-reward consists in having descendants and riches, health and prestige, the understanding of a link between reward and faithfulness has a long development in the history of Israel until it reaches the observation that this is not always the case; actually, the contrary is true: the one who is continually well is the ungodly person (Jer 16:1-4). The sapiential books reflect on wealth to show how, though it is a good, it is never the best good (Prov 15:15; 16:8; 22:1; Sir 30:14ff.; Job 28:15,19; Wis 7:8-11). The difficult existential equilibrium between *poverty and riches and the advantages of one and the other are summarized in Prov 30:7. The *prophets perceived a close connection that arose between riches and idolatry as the monarchy developed (Hos 10:1; Is 2:7-8; 7:20; Ezek 7:19-20). The king became the country's primary landowner, and society's weakest members were forced to sell their own landholdings, an inheritance that visibly expressed one's belonging to the people of God. In these circumstances, land ownership was not merely a social injustice, it led directly to the desacralization of Israel; it separated the people from the land, the place where the people and land were the two inseparable terms of the promise to Abraham (Mic 2:1-5; Hos 5:10; Is 5:8; 1 Kgs 21:2).

In the NT, we find all the reservations present in the OT concerning riches, although the connection between righteousness and earthly reward is absent. Even if goods are not considered evil in themselves, the idea of injustice is associated with the acquisition of riches (Lk 16:9-11), and the discourse is moved from goods to the one who possesses them, from riches to the rich (Lk 6:24-25; Jas 5:1-5; 1 Tim 6:17); it is difficult for rich people to enter the kingdom (Mt 19:23). The gospels also speak of the friendship between Jesus Christ and some rich people (Mt 27:57; Mk 2:3-17; 14:3; Lk 19:1-10; 14:1-12), but it is always considered in the light of salvation, and this is brought about through the divesting of riches in favor of the poor (Mt 19:21; Lk 12-33). *Luke especially insisted on the dangers deriving from riches (1:52-53; 6:20, 24, 25; 8:14; 12:13-21, 32-34; 14:12-14,15-24; 16,12-13, 19-31; 18:18-30; 19:1-10; 21:1-4).

The patristic reflection on the theme of the rich and riches took Scripture as its starting point. The first text that directly and fully treated the relationship between riches and the Christian life was *Clement of Alexandria's Quis dives salvetur? Keeping in mind the text of Mk 10:17-31, which interpreted literally appears to be a categorical condemnation of the rich, Clement, through an allegorical-spiritual exegesis, asked with respect to the rich who have become Christian, what is the deepest meaning of the passage from the gospel of *Mark: the invitation to purge the heart from riches without depriving oneself of everything (Quis div. 11; 14; 18)? The discussion thus moved from possession to use (Quis div. 11; 26) because Clement's preoccupation with antidualism led him to reaffirm the goodness of created things, which are praised because they allow one to come to the aid of those in need (Quis div. 13). But wealth retained for oneself is sinful (Quis div. 7). Riches are compared to a serpent: the person who does not know how to handle them properly is easily bitten and remains poisoned (Clem. of Alex., Paedag. III, 6,37). The remedy for cupidity is thriftiness (ibid.); to have true riches is to possess the immortal Logos (ibid. II, 3,35). Several currents of thought came together in Clement's thought: the tradition of Jewish wisdom (material goods are good and a sign of blessing), *Stoic ethics (riches are a danger) and the proclamation of the gospel (the distribution of goods is a sign of fraternal love). Material riches should be abandoned by those who desire to become followers of Christ (*Orig., In Mt XV, 25). The attachment of Christians to riches is identified as one of the primary causes for the denial of the faith during the Decian *persecution (*Cypr., De lapsis 11), and the danger of riches (Id., De op. et elem. 13), the more they are accumulated, is demonstrated through an explanation of Lk 12:16-21 (Cypr., De dom. orat. 20; *Ambr., Exp. Evang. sec. Luc. VII). But riches have a positive aspect: they can be distributed (*Hermas, Sim. 1,6,8), donated in alms (Cypr., De op. et elem. 8-11), given and shared (*Lact., Div. Instit. 5,15; *Greg. Naz., De pauper. amand. 22). *Basil's Homily VI (De avaritia) is an extensive commentary on the parable in Luke of the foolish rich man. In all of Basil's works, the reference to the just position of the rich man is constant: he is the administrator of divine goods (De avar. VI, 1-2; see also Ambr., De Nabut. VI-VIII). In Homily VII (In divites), Basil comments on a large portion of Mt 19:16-26, demonstrating how the possession of goods by the rich man must result in sharing, which changes the social condition of the poor person and reestablishes the justice desired by God in giving to all people.

The relationship between the right of possessing and the right of private property in the thought of *Ambrose of *Milan has drawn the attention of scholars, leading them to offer different interpretations (see Mara, Ricchezza e povertà, 70 n.121). It does not seem that Ambrose denied the right to private property, as long as this right is actualized for each person (De Nabut. 2; 11; 29). At the basis of Ambrose's thought are many motifs common to patristic literature: the goods of the earth were destined by God for people to enjoy; the rich person is only the administrator, not the lord, of them; the monopoly of goods by the few is not permissible—the refusal to give and share them is the refusal of eternal life; not only does death refute the enduring possession of earthly goods, but above all the eschatological vision of life unmasks their temporary state. In homily 63 on *Matthew, *John Chrysostom shows the rich the necessity of leaving riches to follow Christ; in homily 85, he invites the leaders of the church to give to the poor the church's own riches; in homily 34, he shows how the rich man who is such by God's gift should be useful to his neighbor. *Augustine continually shifted the discussion from goods to their use: for this reason, the rich man is in contradiction with himself if, by desiring to possess good things (goods possess this quality), he himself does not desire to be good by sharing (Serm. 85).

Patristic thought on the rich and riches (goods) is consistent on the following topics: the goodness of things, the equality of humankind, the duty of the rich to share to the point of changing the condition of the poor, the role of the rich as administrators and not lords of goods, the transference of every moral judgment from the possession of riches to the use that is made of it, the condemnation of the accumulation of riches, the demand for ordering everything that makes reference to the economic order (riches, goods, purchases, use, etc.) to the service of people. Patristic authors present different nuances due to historical circumstances (persecutions, breaches of political power toward social problems, moral decadence and therefore the faith of the Christian community, epidemics and famines), local circumstances (different economic situations of various cities or regions) and personal factors (the different economic situation of individual Fathers), when establishing whether riches, the product of inheritance, is permissible (Clem. of Alex., Quis div.) or whether there is always an injustice at the origin (Jn. Chrys., In 1 Tim. hom. 12) or usury. They also differ on whether selling everything and donating it in alms is a perfect virtue not required of all (Cyril of Alex., De adorat. et cult. in spirt. et ver. XIII, 462), not commanded (Jn Chrys.) or a necessary condition for possessing eternal life (Cypr., Greg. Naz.), the perfect duty of charity (Ambr.).

DB 5, 1093-1094; P. Christophe, Les devoirs moraux des riches. L'usage du droit de propriété dans l'Écriture et la Tradition patristique, Paris 1964; G. Barberi, I nuovi principi economico-sociali nella elaborazione dei Padri greci e latini: Grande Ant. Filos., Milan 1954, V, 1129-1174; Augustinianum 17 (1977); E. Marotta (ed.), Salviano di Marsiglia. Contro l'avarizia, Rome 1977; L.W. Countryman, The Rich Christian in the Church of the Early Empire. Contradictions and Accomodations, New York-Toronto 1980; G. Barbaglio, Rassegna di studi di storia sociale e di ricerche di sociologia delle origini cristiane, I/II: RivBib 36 (1988) 377-410, 495-520; M.G. Mara, Ricchezza e povertà nel cristianesimo primitivo, Rome 1991; C. Nardi, Clemente d'Alessandria. Quale ricco si salva? Il cristiano e l'economia, Rome 1991; L. Padovese, La dimensione sociale del pensiero patristico. Considerazioni generali: Studia Moralia 37 (1999) 273-293.

M.G. Mara

RIEZ, Council of. In this Alpine city (Reii) of Upper Provence in *Gaul, a council met on 29 November 439, under the presidency of *Hilary of *Arles, and resolved problems that had arisen following the irregular ordination of the layman Armentarius to the episcopal see of Embrun (Ebrodunum).

CCL 148, 61-75; Hfl-Lecl II, 423-430; Palazzini 4, 109-110.

Ch. Munier

RIGHTEOUSNESS (Justice). A very common word in the OT and rich in meaning. The privileged sense is that of moral rectitude, of imitation of God in his multiple manifestations and in adherence to the law. Since this adherence is modeled on the relationship between two people, it varies with the changes in the relationship, but presupposes equity as indispensable (Lev 19:15; Dt 16:18, 20). This understanding continues in the very ancient texts of the Proverbs (10; 22; 25–29), where the antithetical parallelism emphasizes contradictory terms: righteousness-perversity, truth-deception and where the word righteousness is applied to sincere speech and exact measures (Pr 12:17; 16:13; 25:5). These archaic concepts, received into the code of the covenant (Ex 23:6-8), gave rise to the identification of the righteous as innocent (cf. Ex 23:7; Dt 25:1-2; 1 Kgs 8:32; Susanna (Dan 13:53) and had a prolonged presence in the Wisdom literature (Ps 52:6-7; 58:10-11). In some prophetic passages the persecuted righteous person is the pious believer, the religious person. Prophecy tends to create the pair righteousness-judgment and assigns the meaning of the correct administration of judicial power (Amos 5:7; 6:12) in particular in disputes between two private individuals, where the condition of the one who suffered injustice is privileged. The typical formula "act according to righteousness and justice" (Jer 22:3-4; Ez 45:9-10; Hos 10:12) denounces a situation in which justice does not follow its normal course and proposes an ideal of equity valid for all (Is 9:6; 11:4-5; 16:5; 22:1; Jer 23:5; 33:15). In the prophets, the transcendent righteousness of the Messiah finds expression.

Gen 15:6 introduces a new concept detached from legal prescriptions. Considering the character of the account and its probable original autonomy, despite alluding to Abraham's conduct which pleased God, the righteousness credited to Abraham sounds like compensation, as if merited, for having believed in God in that particular moment, and it is made to depend on an act of confidence in the disconcerting divine promise. The faith that grounds the righteousness of Abraham is not an isolated act, but an attitude. *Paul discovered here not only a consistent moral behavior but also a new ontological condition. With Gen 15:6 righteousness in the OT reaches its acme, but it did not have later influence like that of Jer 31:23, which identifies the temple hill with the domicile of righteousness and free access to those who practice righteousness (cf. Ps 15:1-2; 24:3-4; 118:19).

In the OT righteousness is imbued with religious meaning when it designates God and the divine attributes of goodness and fidelity understood concretely as active in relation to humanity; when it is said of humanity, despite the nuances, it covers conduct toward God (acts of worship), toward oneself (distributive aspect), toward the neighbor (juridical-legal aspect). The Messiah takes on the most troubling of unfulfilled expectations (eschatological aspect).

In the NT, in Matthew righteousness indicates human conduct: correct, righteous and conformed to the will of God. It has this fundamental meaning in Mt 3:15, where Jesus presents the faithful observance and the fulfillment of the entire ancient legal righteousness as the essential object of his mission. In the Sermon on the Mount, the fourth and eighth beatitudes (Mt 5:6, 10) refer to the righteous of humanity which results from the observance of the law in the present world; in Mt 5:20 the righteousness to which the disciple is called is along the lines of that of the Pharisees, but surpasses it, because the law is represented in its original purity and in conformity to the divine exigencies of perfection; in Mt 6:1 it includes all duties, represented by almsgiving, prayer and fasting. The search for the kingdom of God and his righteousness (Mt 6:33) is an imperative for acquiring Christian perfection thanks to which the new community is already configured as a real anticipation of the eschatological kingdom. From Mt the link between the idea of perfection and that of Christian righteousness emerges clearly, which, despite being along Jewish lines, surpasses it through its more profound and radical demands. As is clear from Lk 1:75, Luke follows analogous paths: sanctity and righteousness are not extrinsic to humanity, but concretely reveal humanity's fulfillment of the divine will. The liturgical emphasis does not attenuate religious duty.

The religion of Paul before his conversion consisted in pursuing the righteousness of the law, according to which a person is righteous in proportion to his or her works (Rom 10:3; Phil 3:6). This righteousness, which comes from the law (Rom 10:5; Phil 3:9) or from the works of the law (Rom 3:20; Gal 2:16) or simply from works (Rom 4:2), gives humanity a sensation of rectitude and allows persons to advance certain pretences (Lk 18:9-14). After conversion, Paul denies that this is the condition of an authentically righteous person. In the realm of the law no one is just before God (Gal 3:11) and Christian righteousness is not conditioned by the law (Rom 3:21), nor by the works which it prescribes (Rom 4:6), but comes from *faith and is based on faith (Rom 3:26, 30; 5:1; 9:30; 10:6; Gal 2:16). Paul, who underlines the evolution between Christian righteousness and Jewish righteousness, passes over the aspects common to both, in particular that the role of faith, of pardon, of repentance and the great mercy of God were not unknown to rabbinical Judaism. In controversies he tries to show that the realm of the law was a transitory and propaedeutic regime to that of righteousness through faith. Examples of this are the choice of Abraham (Gen 15:6) which yielded righteousness for him and the antithetic parallelism of Christ with Adam (Rom 5:12-21): humankind, who at their origin received in Adam the state of sin, receives in Christ the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness which will lead them to the kingdom of God, where they will reign in life (Rom 5:16-17). Righteousness, which is communicated in baptism (Rom 6:1-4), creates a stable condition (Rom 5:2), grounds the hope of possessing the glory of God (Rom 5:2) and of being saved from his wrath (Rom 5:9-10). In this condition the law has no influence, as the experience of Abraham attests, who received the promise of inheriting the world, thanks to the righteousness of faith. This vast movement of ideas is the framework for the message of the "righteousness of God" which opens the letter to the Romans (1:16-17). The strong expression that "in the gospel the righteousness of God is revealed" allows a parallel with the phrase "kingdom of God." The righteousness of God, like the kingdom, is revealed and established on earth through the word of God. Just as the kingdom of God already exists in heaven and is realized on earth, so it is with the righteousness of God. The one and the other represent the celestial goods (L. Cerfaux, DBS IV, 1479). The expression "righteousness of God" accentuates the idea that the gift of God is given to us as an anticipation of eschatological salvation. This righteousness belongs originally to God since it is his salvation, his richness, his kingdom which are communicated to humanity because of his saving will which has shined in past centuries (Abraham, Christ-Adam). This interpretative line has a verification in 1 Cor 1:30, where the philosophy of the Greeks, which is human wisdom, just as the Jewish righteousness is a human righteousness opposed to Christian wisdom, which is the wisdom of God: "Through him you are in Christ Jesus, who became for us through God wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption." The message presents the wisdom of God to the Greeks and the righteousness of God to the Jews. Outside these lines but no less important are those notions which can be translated in terms of righteousness, a divine attribute operating in mercy (Rom 3:25-26), in the general judgment as a manifestation of the transcendence of the fundamental divine norm and of the fear of God (Rom 2:1-16; 1 Th 4:13–5:11; 1 Cor 15:12-34), as a grandiose vision of the celestial process when God will pronounce a favorable sentence and will proclaim the righteousness of the Christians, founded on the work of Christ, on his intercession and on the love which united them (Rom 8:31-39).

In patristic literature the word is subject to two interpretations: one, juridical, strictly linked to the judicial act carried out according to the reigning norms; the other, ethical, which designates the conduct of persons faced with the law in its different articulations. *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VII, 3) says that the *gnostic takes time to reflect on courage, prudence, temperance and righteousness, which is the perfect, tetragonal, virtue (Strom. VI, 12). The task demanded of it is to coordinate all the potentials of the soul in the moment when a sentence is issued (Strom. IV, 26). Its borders coincide with those of rectitude and integrity (Strom. IV, 25). The sources of the Christian's righteousness are as follows: God, who grants it in exchange for the sacrifice made to him of our human righteousness (Orig., Hom. 24,2 in Num.), the love of God (Clem. Al., Paed. I, 9) and Christ, who is the substance of righteousness itself, from which the righteousness was formed which is in each believer, so that there are many forms of righteousness in those who are saved (Orig., Com. Mt. 12,11; Com. Joh. 6,6). One enters into its possession with grace through faith, like Abraham (John Chrys., Hom. 17,2 in Rom., Hom. 11,2 in Phil.; Theodoret, Com. Rom. 5,21,10,3), through baptism (Orig., Hom. 13,4 in Gen.; Basil., De Bapt. 1,2,17), through the fear of God (Clem. Al., Strom. VII, 12). Righteousness, as a Christian virtue, begins with conversion (Barn., 1,4; Just., Dial. 93,3); its multiple paths all lead to the path of God (Clem. Al., Strom. I, 7). Fidelity and righteousness are not identified because righteousness is a road which leads to perfection (Clem. Al., Strom. VI, 12). This tension has eschatological implications: only he who has lived cleanly and is adorned with righteousness and the other virtues will see God (Just., Dial. 4,3), and become immortal (2 Clement 19,20).

The frequent references to the righteousness of God are reducible fundamentally to two: the emendatory and the remunerative (Basil., Hom. 12.8), both oriented toward distributive righteousness. The *Marcionite conception of the righteousness of God as negative, as punitive, is opposed to the positive one, obvious to all, which nourishes every living creature. (Orig., De Princ. II, 5,1; Hom. 9,4 in Num.; Clem. Al., Strom. II, 18; VI, 14).

DBS 4, 1417-1510; GLNT 2, 1202-1328 (TDNT 2, 174-210); Cath 6, 1289-1299; H. Cazelles, Études sur le code de l'alliance, Paris 1946; A. Descamps, Les justes et la justice dans les Évangiles et le christianisme primitif hormis la doctrine proprement paulinienne, Louvain-Gembloux 1950; A.H. van der Weijden, Die Gerechtigkeit in den Psalmen, Nijmegen 1952; B. Vawter, "Social Justice" in the Prophet Isaiah, Denver 1952; E. Peretto, La Giustizia. Ricerca sugli autori cristiani del secondo secolo, Rome 1977; Lampe 368-370 (Dikaios e dikaiosyne); S. Agostino, La giustizia, ed. by G. Catapano, Rome 2004.

E. Peretto

RIMINI, Council of. Convoked by the emperor *Constantius, in parallel with the Eastern Council of *Seleucia, to bring peace to the church, which had been deeply shaken by the events pertaining to the *Arian controversy of 357–358, the Council of Rimini began around the beginning of June 359 with ca. 400 bishops present. *Restitutus of *Carthage presided over the council, although *Liberius of *Rome, who was absent, does not seem to have been represented. The pro-Arians *Valens, Ursacius and *Germinius, who were leading ca. 80 bishops, insisted on the ratification of the preparatory formula of faith published at *Sirmium on 22 May 359 and reiterated the condemnation of the Council of Nicaea's term homoousios. But the greater majority at the council was decidedly opposed and, after prolonged discussions, reaffirmed the validity of Nicaea's formula of faith of 325 and included therein the term homoousios. Valens and his supporters abandoned the council's work and were condemned on 21 July 359; during that occasion the council Fathers reiterated the condemnation of the primary *Arian tenets, along with other *Sabellian and *Photinian beliefs.

At this point, following Constantius's order, a delegation of the council presided over by *Restitutus traveled to report to the emperor at *Constantinople, where he was preceded by Valens. By Constantius's order, who did not want to accept the term homoousios and demanded a theological formula characterized by a generic compromise, the council's delegation was stopped near Constantinople and transferred to Nike, a postal station in *Thrace. Here, Valens and his collaborators subjected the Westerners to a long series of trials and used threats and flattery so that they might weaken their resistance and convince them to sign a formula of faith in which the Son was only called "similar to the *Father according to the *Scriptures." Valens and the delegation returned to Rome, where the Western bishops were forced to remain by command of the emperor. Invoking the emperor's name, the Prefect Taurus announced that no one could leave the city without first signing, as the delegates had done. There was an initial resistance, but slowly their despair and discouragement overcame them and each one of the delegates signed the so-called Formula of Rimini, a brief text in which the Son was called "similar to the Father according to the Scriptures," while the term ousia (and consequently the two composite terms homoousios and homoiousios) was banned. The last bishop to sign, in late November, was *Phoebadius of Agen, who was given permission to add to the formula, in his own name, some anathemas that condemned the chief tenets of Arianism.

The Formula of Rimini was entirely generic and could thus also be interpreted in harmony with Arian teaching. For this reason, in all of Christianity this council was considered to have been a large victory for Arianism, and the Arians subsequently appealed to this body as a solemn conciliar decision.

Hfl-Lecl 1, 929-955; Simonetti 313-325; Y.M. Duval, La "manoeuvre frauduleuse" de Rimini, in Hilaire et son temps, Paris 1969, 51-103; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God. The Arian Controversy (318–381), Edinburgh 1988, 371-380; A. Miranda, Chiesa "orientale" ed "occidentale" nel sinodo di Seleucia-Rimini, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V, Rome 2002, 461-470.

M. Simonetti

RING. After coming to Rome from ancient Greece, rings were used for state recognition of military success. Initially iron, then gold, a ring was first given to ambassadorial senators, then to all senators, and finally to the equestrian rank of the military. Through the centuries various laws regulated the use of rings, which was always reserved to freemen. The emperor could also grant the use of a gold ring to freed slaves, until the Novella 78, ch. 1 (539) declared that with his freedom the slave acquired the right to wear a gold ring. As luxury increased, so did the use of rings, so much so that Tertullian (De cultu fem., 9) reproaches women who wear a ring on each finger. Clement of Alexandria (Paed. 3,11) encourages the engraving of Christian symbols on signet rings. It cannot be determined when the church began to use the ring not only as a seal, but also to indicate authority; its use was thus reserved to bishops, practically continuing the custom by which the flamines Dialis, dedicated to the cult of Jupiter in ancient Rome and considered equal to senators, like them had the right to wear a gold ring as a sign of honor. In the 7th c. the ring is included in episcopal insignia. We can deduce from Ambrose that there was the practice at his time, both at Milan and Rome, of giving a ring to Christian virgins on the day of their consecration, but only with the Pontificale Romano-Germanicum (10th c.) is there a definite reference to the ring for virgins, blessed with a formula similar to that used for the blessing of the wedding ring. The practice of giving an iron ring as a sign of marital commitment also goes back to the Romans and is attested by Plautus.

DACL 1, 2174-2223; LTK 8, 1192-1194; J. Braun, I paramenti sacri, loro uso, storia e simbolismo, Ital. tr. Turin 1914; P. Salmon, Étude sur les insignes du pontife dans le rite romain, Rome 1955; P. Jounel, La liturgie romaine du mariage: La MaisonD. 50 (1957) 30-57; I.H. Dalmais, La liturgie du mariage dans les Églises orientales: La MaisonD. 50 (1957) 58-69; A. Chavasse, Le sacramentaire gélasien, Tournai 1958, 5-27; V. Noè, Il matrimonio nella liturgia: Enciclopedia del matrimonio, Brescia 1959, 684-732; A.A. Fourlas, Der Ring in der Antike und im Christentum, Münster 1971; R. Metz, Le nouveau rituel de consécration des vierges, sa place dans l'histoire: La MaisonD. 110 (1972) 88-115; M. Sordi, Da Ambrogio al Boccaccio. L'anello simbolo della fede: Rendiconti dell'Istituto Lombardo Accademia di scienze e lettere 114 (1980) 116-122; P.C. Finney, Images on Finger Rings and Early Christian Art: DOP 41 (1987) 181-186; A.M. Piredda, Il simbolismo dell'anello episcopale da Ambrogio a Isidoro di Siviglia, Annals of the Archive of "Ferran Valls i Taberner's Library" 9-10 (1991) 39-54; G.-M. Oury, Anello: Dizionario Enciclopedico del Medioevo 1, Rome 1998, 80.

M.G. Bianco

ROGATION DAYS. At Rome, the feast of Robigalia was celebrated 25 April in honor of Robigus (other sources speak of Robigo) so that the mildew/mold (robigo) might not destroy the wheat. Led by the Flamen Quirinalis, a procession was held with people dressed in white. The Christian celebration with similar purposes was initiated as its substitute, using the celebration of the Mass, a procession and the singing of the Major Litany (*Gregory the Great, Reg. 9,167). Similarly, elsewhere in the West, there also appeared propitiatory rites for protecting the fields. In Gaul (470), Mamertus, bishop of *Vienne, formalized the rite (*Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. 2,34). The Council of Orléans (511) extended it to all of *Gaul, ordering that three days of fasting and abstinence be held and that the slaves not work (cans. 27-28: SC 353, 86-87) for the three days that preceded the Feast of the *Ascension. *Caesarius of *Arles wrote that the three days were celebrated everywhere (Sermo 173). Through the Middle Ages, the rogation days in the West interrupted the *Easter season with their penitential character. Today they have been abandoned in urban areas, but in certain cases they remain in the countryside.

D. de Bruyne, L'origine de la Chandeleur et des Rogations: RBen 34 (1922) 14-26; DACL 14, 2459-2461; EC 10, 1084-1086; Cath 12, 348-349; A. Nocent, Le rogazioni. Anamnesis VI, Genoa 1988, 267-269; D. Sabatucci, La religione di Roma antica, Milan 1988, 138-140; S. Rossi, Il segno del tempo nella liturgia, Turin 2002, 220-223.

A. Di Berardino

ROGATUS (d. before 408). *Donatist bishop of Cartenna (Ténès) from the 4th c. (Aug., Ep. 93,1,1). Around 370, he broke ties with his former coreligionists, that is, during the time of *Parmenian, and established an independent sect called the "Rogatists"

(Ep. 93,3,11; 93,8,24). This separation was due to the fact that the Donatists had turned to an apostate emperor, *Julian, and had recourse to violence (Optatus 2,17-19; Aug., Ep. 93,3,11). Rogatus considered his community Catholic because it observed the commandments (Aug., Ep. 93,7,23). The followers of Parmenian then turned to the imperial courts to reclaim their rights over their churches. Supported by Firmus, who would then rebel against the imperial power, they persecuted the Rogatists (pars Rogati), who had concentrated in the area of Cartenna, in *Mauretania (C. ep. Parmeniani 1,10,16-11,17; C. ep. Petiliani 2,83,184; Ep. 87,10). Rogatus died before 408, when the head of the Rogatists was Vincentius, one of *Augustine's schoolmates at *Carthage (Ep. 93,1,1), who died around 420/422. The Rogatists and various supporting groups were centered in Mauretania (In Ioh. ev. 10,6). Augustine judged them harshly (Ep. 93,6,20-21; 7,23; 8,24-25; 10,36; 11,49).

BA 31, 827-828; Monceaux 4, 253-254; 6, 316-317; E. Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken, Göteborg 1964, 79-82Z; PCBE 1, 990-991; J.-L. Maier, Le dossier donatiste, Berlin 1987, 44-45.

E. Romero Pose

ROMAN LAW and CHRISTIANITY

I. Christian doctrines and Roman law - II. Roman law and Christian institutions.

The problems that emerged from the encounter of Christianity with Roman law are numerous and complex, and were responded to in very different ways, some tending to increase the influence of Christian doctrines on Roman law during the late empire (I), others tending to reduce that influence to truer proposition. In effect, we are dealing with an evaluation of the influence of Roman law on the evolution of Christianity in general and on ecclesiastical institutions in particular (II).

I. Christian doctrines and Roman law. Christian influence on Roman law derived above all from the will of the ruler, the most direct expression of which was clearly imperial legislation: (a) The emperors accepted and imposed the new religion; they multiplied institutions favoring the church; they insured the triumph of the Christian faith, as defined by the church's authorities themselves, threatening a wide variety of sanctions where the religion was not accepted (exclusion from civil office, loss of the ability for succession, etc.). An abundant legislation suppressed heresy, paganism and the Jewish religion (CTh XVI). Emperors also concerned themselves with regulating the status of clergy and bishops, as well as the conditions required for accession to *orders; privileges and exemptions were lavished on the clergy. *Valentinian III formally recognized Roman primacy (Novella 18 of 19 June 448).

(b) A Christian influence should also be noted in legislation on the family and society. The church fought against abortion, abandonment of newborns, trafficking in children, abuses of the patria potestas, and would have also desired official restriction of the freedom to divorce (Counc. of Carthage, 13 June 407). It elicited sanctions against those who broke an engagement without a just reason (CTh 3,5,2; cf. Counc. of Elvira, can. 54) and obtained the interdiction of *marriage among relatives (CTh 3,12,2-4; cf. Counc. of Elvira, can. 61). The church supported slavery, but demanded abolition of the practice of branding slaves on the forehead and of keeping servants separate from their families; it promoted the liberation of slaves and obtained civil recognition for those who were freed in ecclesia. It opposed the gladiator games and succeeded in ending them. It was even able to have the civil calendar modified to accommodate its festivals and to replace the dies solis with the Christian Sunday. It attempted to preserve intact the sacred character of days reserved to God, having the games of theater and circus prohibited on those days.

(c) Christian doctrines had less impact in the area of economics. Some have seen this influence in legislation on damages or in the limitation of interest rates; in the expansion of the notion of fraud; in the reduction of formalism in favor of the obligatory character of a simple promise; in sanctions against unjust enrichment. However, Christian influence in each of these cases is difficult to evaluate, though it cannot be entirely rejected. (d) Criminal legislation in the late empire was marked by an increased severity, almost cruelty. Christianity had little influence on this, only sporadically, and completely at random. The church obtained an end to crucifixion and gained the possibility of participating in the supervision of prisons, so as to comfort the prisoners. (e) Historians have also discovered other traces of Christian influence on Roman legal technique, but these findings have been insignificant (Gaudemet, 512).

II. Roman law and Christian institutions. The influence of Roman law on ecclesiastical society occurred mainly in terminology, legal technique and institutions: essentially, in the transposition or adaptation of Roman rules to the church's own needs. (a) Of assumed terminology, that of ordo designating the members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy is among the most important, since this term from the beginning indicated the ruling structures of the civitas, including the municipal senate. It should also be recalled that the powers of the supreme pontiff were from the start defined with the technical terms auctoritas and potestas. The terminology of decretals depended heavily on that of imperial constitutions.

(b) Particularly notable was the influence of Roman law on legal procedure. The pope's legislative power was not a simple adaptation of Roman institutions (it remained founded on Scripture and derived from his primacy); but it was nonetheless quite dependent on them with respect to the elaboration of decretals, which imitated contemporary models. Moreover, the methods for appealing to the pope were clearly inspired by imperial law (relatio, provocatio); likewise for councils. This latter institution was not a simple adaptation from Roman public law and drew significantly on contemporary models for its organization (organization of sessions, voting procedures, redaction of the acts, etc.). Canon law drew widely on Roman models with respect to procedures: it took up the procedures of praescriptiones (de persona, de mandato, de tempore) and the contestatio litis; it also adopted details regarding means of proof and conditions concerning witnesses (e.g., exclusion of infames personae). It goes without saying that canon law owes to Roman law its entire understanding of the appeal process.

(c) The influence of Roman law on Christian institutions was varied, and especially clear in matters regarding marriage. The church in essence took up the Roman notion of matrimonium and the conditions for realizing it (dos, tabulae nuptiales); it adopted Roman doctrine on consensual marriage, but immediately improved it (Munier, 17); it maintained engagement according to the Roman laws, but soon made a clear distinction between engagement and marriage properly speaking. It was steadfast in its principles regarding fidelity and indissolubility. Many of the norms regarding the status of clergy were inspired by those regulating civil careers (prohibition of changing positions, promotion by degrees and at intervals). Also, the external signs of power (clothing and insignia) of Roman officials were used to indicate the various ranks of ecclesiastical dignitaries (pontificalia, dalmatic, pallium). Finally, the clear parallelism between administrative and ecclesiastical divisions should be noted.

B. Biondi, Il diritto romano cristiano, 3 vols., Milan 1952–1954; J. Gaudemet, La formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'Église aux IVe et Ve siècles, Paris 1957; Id., L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IVe-Ve siècles), Paris 1958; Ch. Munier, L'église dans l'Empire romain (IIe-IIIe siècles), Paris 1979; G. Crifò, Romanizzazione e cristianizzazione. Certezze e dubbi in tema di rapporto tra cristiani e istituzioni, in I Cristiani e l'Impero nel IV sec. Colloquio sul Cristianesimo nel mondo antico, ed. G. Bonamente - A. Nestori, Macerata 1988, 75-106; F. Amarelli, I problemi di metodo per lo studio delle fonti relative ai rapporti fra cristianesimo e diritto romano, in Metodologia della ricerca sulla tarda antichità, Naples 1989, 111-123; var. aus., Il diritto romano canonico quale diritto proprio delle comunità cristiane dell'Oriente Mediterraneo, Vatican City 1994; G.L. Falchi, Introduzione allo studio della ricezione del diritto romano nelle fonti del diritto canonico, Rome 1997.

CH. MUNIER

ROMANIANUS. A wealthy benefactor and fellow citizen of *Augustine, native of Thagaste, who helped him when his father passed away (371), assuring him the means necessary to move to *Carthage so that he might study (C. Acad. 2,2,3-4; a work dedicated to Romanianus, ibid. 1,1). When they found each other at Milan (385), "it was he [Romanianus], who insisted more than anyone on carrying out the project" (Conf. 6,14,24) of a common life lived among friends (386). Romanianus had a son named *Licentius (see De ord. 1,2,5), who defended the teaching of the Academics in the book De ord. (1,4,10); he was a relative of *Alypius (Ep. 27,5). Augustine wrote the treatise Contra Academicos to lead Romanianus to the study of philosophy (C. Acad. 2,8; Conf. 6,24). A few years later (390), he sent him the book De vera religione to convince him to embrace the Christian faith as the true religion (C. Acad. 2,8; De ver. rel. 12; Ep. 15,1; 27,4). Romanianus became a Christian (396) and remained Augustine's disciple (Ep. 27,4; Ep. 32: *Paulinus of Nola at Rome and Licentius). The name Romanianus appears on an inscription at Thagaste (CIL 8 suppl. 17226), which also bears the name Cornelius.

DCB 4, 550-551; PCBE 1, 994-997; A. Gabillons, Alias Cornelius. Du nouveau sur le bienfaiteur et l'ami de saint Augustin: REAug 24 (1978) 58-70; F. della Corte, Il mecenatismo di Romaniano: Maia 38 (1986) 3-12; J. Doignon, La baroque invitation au ciel d'Augustin à Romanianus (C. Acad. II 1, 2). Thèmes de Sénèque et ornements virgiliens: Maia 43 (1991) 221-224; G. Catapano, Il concetto di filosofia nei primi scritti di Agostino. Analisi dei passi metafilosofici dal Contra Academicos al De uera religione, Rome 2001.

R. DE SIMONE

ROMANUS, martyr. An exorcist and deacon of the clergy of *Caesarea Maritime (Palestine), passing through *Antioch during the time of the *persecution of *Galerius or *Diocletian. He was put under arrest because of his zeal in exhorting Christians brought before the judge. He was sentenced to having his tongue cut out, and after a long time, on the occasion of the emperor's vicennalia in 303, he was strangled to death in prison (*Eusebius of Caesarea, Mart. Pal. 2). Among the later panegyrics, *John Chrysostom's remains faithful to Eusebius on the essential points: he only adds the detail about the doctor's intervention (CPG 4353). The following sources, however, indulge in legends: *Eusebius of Emesa's eulogy (É.M. Buytaert, Eusèbe d'Émèse: Discours conservés en Latin 2, Louvain 1957, 52-57, where it is erroneously attributed to *Eusebius of Caesarea), the poem of *Prudentius (Perist. 10), the homilies of Severus, delivered in a church dedicated to Romanus at Antioch (Hom. 1, 35 and 80: PO 38, 254-269; 36, 438-457; 20, 324-343). Starting from the Middle Ages, the Passiones of the saint multiplied. Romanus was commemorated on 17 November in Caesarea (Eusebius; Mart. hier.), the 18th in Antioch by the Mart. hier., and only on the 18th in the Byzantine synaxaria (Synax. Eccl. CP). The Passiones and martyrologies make him out to be the companion of Barule, a name that is a distortion of Barlaam.

BHG 1193, 1600-1602; BHL 7297-7304; BHO 45-46, 1028; BS 11, 338-342; LCI 8, 281; M. Simonetti, Nuovi studi agiografici: RivAC 31 (1955) 223-233; R. Henke, Studien zum Romanushymnus des Prudentius, Frankfurt a.M. 1983; F. Halkin, Hagiographica inedita decem, Turnhout 1989, 33-54.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

ROMANUS MELODUS (d. after 555). For some time, there was a dispute over whether Romanus, the most famous Byzantine hymnographer, lived during the time of the emperor *Anastasius I (491–518) or Anastasius II (713–716); the issue was definitively resolved in 1905 when the original Greek text of the miracles of St. Artemius was discovered, in which he spoke of a miracle that occurred during the time of the emperor *Heraclius (610–641) to the benefit of a young man who sang Romanus's hymns: therefore, if at that time Melodus's poems were known and sung, he could not have lived during the time of Anastasius II. There are bits of biographical information on the life of Romanus: Born at *Emesa in *Syria toward the end of the 5th c. to a Jewish family, he became a deacon when he moved to *Constantinople at the end of the reign of Anastasius I. It seems that Romanus's death should be dated before *Justinian's (565) and after 555.

Romanus composed a large number of sacred hymns, the kontakia; we have about 100 of them, but not all are authentic. The kontakion, whose origin has been much debated, can be considered a metric *homily; introduced by a proemium, it consists of several strophes, called troparia, the first of which, the irmo, is the model for the subsequent strophes. Each troparion has a refrain at the end called the ephymnion; the various strophes of the kontakion follow the laws of isosyllabism and homotony and are connected through an acrostic that generally provides the name of the author, at times even the subject, and more rarely the subject without the name of the author. The meter of the kontakion has no relation to that of classical poetry inasmuch as it is purely tonal and syllabic. The melodic recitation of the kontakion is indicated in the superscription with the specification for the tone. The contents of Romanus's hymns are connected to various themes of the liturgical celebration; they have as their subject the major feasts of the church, persons and events from the OT and NT, martyrs and saints, as well as various other topics. In addition to Scripture, the sources of Romanus's poems are to be found in the ancient passions of the martyrs, Greek homiletical literature and, in particular, the poems of *Ephrem. The poetry of Romanus, who was, without exaggeration, called the "Christian Pindar," often reached moments of high lyricism and intense participation as, for example, in the hymns on Christmas and *Mary's lament at the foot of the cross, in which the dialogue between the Virgin and the suffering Son is elevated with tones of sharp and vibrant dramaticism and reveals the depth of Melodus's inspiration.

CPG III,7570. The most complete critical edition of Romanus's hymns is that of P. Maas - C.A. Trypanis, Sancti Romani Melodi Cantica. Cantica genuina, Oxford 1963; Cantica dubia, Berlin 1970. Partial editions: J.B. Pitra, Analecta Sacra, I, Paris 1876, 1-241 (29 hymns); G. Cammelli, Romano il Melode. Inni, Florence 1930 (8 hymns, with Ital. trans.); N.B. Tomadakis, Ῥωμανοῦ τοῦ Μελῳδοῦ Ὕμνοι, Athens, I, 1952 (14 hymns); II, 1954 (14 hymns); III, 1957 (8 hymns); IV, 1959–1961 (13 hymns); J. Grosdidier de Matons, SC 99 (Hymns I-VIII), 110 (Hymns IX-XX), 114 (Hymns XXI-XXXI), 128 (Hymns XXXII-XLV), 283 (Hymns XLVI-LVI) (with Fr. trans.). In addition to the aforementioned translations, we should also mention the following works in French: R.R. Khawam, Romanos le Mélode. Le Christ Rédempteur. Célébrations liturgiques, Paris 1956; Id., Hymne sur la résurrection, in Le grec chrétien, Paris 1965, 175-185; in German: G.H. Bultmann, Romanus der Melode. Festgesänge, Zürich-Munich-Paderborn-Vienna 1960; translation of 19 hymns ed. J. Koder, Romanos der Melode, Hymnen des orthodoxen Kirchenjahres, Mit der Seele Augen sah er deines Lichtes Zeichen Herr, Vienna 1996; in English: M. Carpenter, Kontakia of Romanos, Byzantine Melodist I. On the Person of Christ, Columbia: Univ. of Missouri Press 1970; II. On Christian Life, ibid. 1973; Ital. trans. by G. Gharib, Rome 1981 (63 hymns).

Among various studies, one should note the following: E. Mioni, Romano il Melode. Saggio critico e dieci inni inediti, Turin 1937; C. Chevalier, Mariologie de Romanos (490–550 environ), le roi des Mélodes: RecSR 28 (1938) 48-71; G. Zuntz, Probleme des Romanos-Textes: Byzantion 34 (1964) 469-534; C.A. Trypanis, The Metres of Romanos: Byzantion 36 (1966) 560-623; K. Mitsakis, The Language of Romanos the Melodist, Munich 1967; E. Salvaneschi, Adattamento interlinguistico come mezzo espressivo in Romano Melodo: AATC 39 (1974) 21-68; J. Grosdidier de Matons, Romanos le Mélode et les origines de la poésie religieuse à Byzance, Paris 1977; E. Follieri, La catechesi ecclesiologica di Romano il Melode, Ecclesiologia e catechesi patristica, Biblioteca di Scienze religiose 46, Rome 1982; H. Hunger, Romano il Melode – poeta, predicatore, retore – e il suo pubblico: Römische Historische Mitteilungen 25 (1983) 305-332; R.J. Schork, Sacred Song from the Byzantine Pulpit. Romanos the Melodist, Gainesville 1995; J. Koder, Romanos Melodos und sein Publikum. Überlegungen zur Beeinflussung des kirchlichen Auditoriums durch das Kontakion: AAWW 134 (1997-99) 63-94; Romano il Melodo, ed. R. Maisano, Turin 2002; R. Maisano, Le fonti patristiche greche di Romano il Melodo: Nea Rome 3 (2006) 89-113; L. Mari Peltomaa, Herodias in the Poetry of Romanos the Melodist: JOEByz 56 (2006) 79-99.

S. Zincone

ROMANUS of Roso (6th c.). Bishop of Roso (or Rosi on the Gulf of Issus, N of *Antioch and Seleucia Pieria, in Syria Secunda), contemporary of the Antiochene Patriarch *Severus (512–518), of whom he was an opponent. He is only known by references and citations to his works. In 516, Severus, in a Letter to Antiochus, abbot of the monastery of Beth Mar, rebuked the abbot for having defended Romanus's *orthodoxy. From the Letter, it appears that Romanus was already dead. In the Letter and in the Cathedral Homilies 119 and 124, Severus cited numerous passages from one of Romanus's writings titled Scala (seblatha, that is, κλῖμαξ) harshly refuting his absurd exegesis. Romanus indeed interpreted *Mary at the wedding of Cana as a symbol of concupiscence and in this context affirmed the distinction of *sins into the following categories: natural sins, voluntary sins and sins against nature (Hom. 119,390ff.); he saw in the variety of the synoptic accounts of *Peter's confession an image of future heresies (Hom. 124, 222-223). Severus had come to know the contents of the Scala at *Constantinople (503–511) and wrote a refutation in a book. From the Letter, we discover another one of Romanus's writings against the *Theopaschites, from which he cited a sentence. Lastly, he mentions that Romanus was condemned by a council of bishops, first at Antioch then (shortly after 518) at Alexandria: Romanus was likened to *Nestorius, the *Manicheans and the *Borboriani.

CPG III, 7117-7121; PO 26, 375-379; 29, 222-223; Cod. Harvard (Houghton Library) Syr. 22, f. 68a. 75a. 76a.; R. Draguet, Julien d'Halicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche sur l'incorruptibilté du corps du Christ, Louvain 1924, 80-81; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e siècle: CSCO 127, Subsidia 12, Louvain 1951, 82-83; S.P. Brock, Some New Letters of the Patriarch Severus: (TU 115 = SP 12) Berlin 1975, 22ff.

A. De Nicola

ROME

I. History and archaeology - II. Councils - III. Liturgy.

I. History and archaeology.

1. The first three centuries. 1.1. The existence of a small community at Rome before the arrival of the apostle *Paul (and without a doubt, *Peter) is attested by the epistle to the Romans (ca. 57–58), which the apostle sent to those who had preceded him in the city: the small group came from a Jewish background, as the letter explicitly attests (2; 4:1) and as the list of the names of the faithful suggests (Rom 16, whose manuscript tradition is less certain). These early converts, who gathered in private homes (Prisca: Rom 16:5), received from Paul a deacon who carried the apostolic letter, but it is not known how this early community was organized, gathered together as it was by missionaries, whose identity remains unknown to us. Some evidence suggests a state of tension between these *Jewish Christians and the powerful urban synagogues: Paul in fact met Aquila at *Corinth, a Jew originally from *Pontus, who had come from *Italy with his wife Priscilla (Acts 18:3). Without a doubt, we must connect this exile to Suetonius's statement (Vita Claudii 18,2) that the emperor in the year 49 expelled some Jews from Rome who had been incited "by a certain Chrestus"; the historian perhaps alludes to some Christians who were poorly identified by the police. In any case, Paul, who also knew of another Jewish Christian, Epaenetus, who had come to Rome from *Asia Minor, certainly some years after his appeal to Caesar, was detained there in prison for two years, which did not quell his missionary zeal, because he had contact with Jewish Christians (Mark, Aristarchus) or with converts from *paganism (as perhaps Timothy: Acts 28:30). One cannot date with certainty the period of Paul's martyrdom, which certainly took place under the reign of the emperor *Nero; nevertheless, no one has ever contested his Roman mission.

In the case of Peter, an entire series of controversies has worked to keep the apostle far from Rome in order to weaken papal primacy and jurisdiction. In fact, as has been demonstrated by Lietzmann, this debate has been settled: the testimonies of patristic literature (1 Pet 5:13; *Clement of Rome, Ep. Cor.; *Irenaeus of Lyons; etc.), the evidence brought to light by archaeology (Fasola) and the local cult of the two apostles are sufficient to establish that Peter came to Rome and underwent martyrdom there. A tradition insists—for symbolic and ecclesiological reasons—to date the martyrdom of Peter and Paul to the same day (29 June) and the same year (often AD 67). It is difficult to concretely define the scope of this twofold mission even though later traditions at times attributed to the community evangelized by the two apostles a special importance for the transformation of the good news into written gospels (*Mark, *Luke). In any case, certain pieces of information suggest that one can perceive the influence, in Clement of Rome's Epistle, of Jewish Christian themes for the elaboration at Rome of an entire theology of apostolic tradition.

1.2. This church in fact was almost unknown for the first two centuries: *Tacitus barely includes it in the history of Rome (Annali 15,44), when he mentions the slaughter of Christians who were martyred after the fire of Rome AD 64 upon the order of the emperor Nero, who sought scapegoats to placate the public's indignation after the disaster that had devastated the center of the city (from that moment onward, Christians were singled out by the police and Roman public opinion). But one must wait for the testimony of Clement of Rome at the end of the 1st c. (Ep. Cor.) to catch a glimpse of this community's organization: it was already aware of belonging to a postapostolic age; they had established some permanent ministries that Clement mentioned using the entire vocabulary of the Jewish sacerdotal traditions as well as the image of the military of Christ (militia Christi). At the head of the church, guided by a college of ministers who guaranteed the episcopate and the diakonia* (as a still imprecise vocabulary indicates), was Clement, the leading member of the college, spokesman and leader of the mission. In the mid-2nd c., a small apocalypse written by *Hermas, a former slave, brother of Bishop *Pius, leads one to suppose the persistence at Rome of charismatic ministries, but he also mentioned priests and their college, attributing duties of assistance to the deacons and the bishops. This testimony must be supplemented with that of *Irenaeus of Lyons, who demonstrated the existence of a unitary organization entrusted to a leader, even if he did not bear, in the first local use, the title "bishop." In effect, Irenaeus provided the list of those men who transmitted the apostolic tradition after Peter and Paul: Linus, Cletus, Clement to the end of the 1st c., *Evaristus, *Alexander, *Sixtus, *Telesphorus, *Hyginus, *Pius, *Anicetus, *Soter, *Eleutherus and *Victor (189–199). He describes an *episcopal list ante litteram, that is, the succession of those who have in turn secured the cohesion of the local church's ministry.

Moreover, during the 2nd c. we see more clearly than during Clement's time the personal intervention of the Roman bishops in the name of their church: that of Soter, for example, who had been called upon in the mid-2nd c. by Bishop *Dionysius of Corinth, and later that of Anicetus, who received *Polycarp of Smyrna at Rome, Eleutherus, and finally Victor—all on the *Easter question. This question on the celebration of Easter divided the Christians living within the heart of the city, pitting the churches of Asia Minor against those of Rome and *Alexandria on a question concerning not only the calculation of Easter, but especially the choice of the date of the feast, that of the passion or the Sunday of the *resurrection. These interventions (and especially that of Victor, who broke *communion with the Asiatic episcopate) already reflect the authority "in the Latin sense of the term" of this church, which was doubly apostolic, to which Irenaeus assigned the concrete function of being, in the West, the privileged center of reference for ecclesial unity (Adv. haer. 3,3,2). The spread of Rome's role as the political and economic capital of the Roman world assisted this special mission; but the Roman Church claimed this responsibility because of its two apostolic titles. It was probably at the same time the missionary metropolis for *Gaul and perhaps *Africa, and certainly for *Italy. Moreover, the Roman Church offered numerous examples (see *Justin Martyr's testimony concerning the organization of the *liturgy; the celebration of Easter); it witnessed the debates on apologetics and a theology that, with Justin, began to use *philosophy as a conceptual instrument. In this manner, one explains the attraction exercised by Rome on many itinerant preachers and theologians who sought to establish themselves there or, at least, to make disciples there: *Marcion as well as the *gnostic *Valentinus, but also *Theodotus of Byzantium, an adoptionist who was expelled in 198; *Praxeas, who, however, defended a *Monarchian theology and was condemned by Eleutherus; and the disciples of *Montanus, who experienced the same lack of success around 177.

1.3. The 3rd c. was a period of great organization dominated by some prestigious bishops: after *Zephyrinus (199–217), one must mention *Callistus, a former slave (217–222), who was succeeded by *Urban (221–230), *Pontianus (230–235), *Anterus (235–236). These last two were victims of the *persecution. *Fabian (236–250), according to *Eusebius (HE VI, 29), enjoyed much spiritual prestige; *Cornelius, who died in exile (251–253), took action when *Novatian's schism threatened the Roman Church; after *Lucius (253–254), *Stephen (254–257) displayed with an authoritarian decisiveness the rights of his primacy. *Sixtus II (257–258) was overcome by the *Valerian persecution, but *Dionysius occupied the see from 259 to 268 and, after him, *Felix (269–274), *Eutychianus (275–283) and *Caius (283–296), for whom we do not have much information. Until *Miltiades (311–314), the chronology is uncertain because of the massive *Diocletian persecution and the gap that it caused: *Marcellinus until 304, then *Marcellus and *Eusebius (309 or rather 310).

For this entire period, the testimony of the Apostolic Tradition*, a small treatise on missionary organization, illustrates the organization of its synaxis; it testifies that the priests during the course of the century were able to preside in the absence of the bishop and his delegate. The precautions taken for the acceptance of candidates for *baptism and the institution of the *catechumenate attest the progress made in attempts to convert the city. At the same time, the work describes the system of assistance for the needy, the *agape meals and the special forms of collective charity for burial (the deacon Callistus was commissioned to administer the church's cemetery, a catacomb near the Appian Way). This was also the period in which the seven deacons received the charge for the collection and the multiple actions of charity, for each one to oversee one of the seven zones approximately limited to the urban area. This community did not use churches (in the sense that we now assign to this term, as a specialized place for gathering and permanently intended for the liturgy)—in any case, we do not know of any—but for these numerous services, Rome made better use of a specialized clergy than anywhere else in the empire: in 251, the clergy numbered at least 46 priests and 7 subdeacons with the same number of deacons, 42 acolytes, 56 electors, exorcists and doorkeepers and, according to the same testimony, the church nourished 1,500 widows and poor people (Eus., HE 6, 43,11). This last figure indicates the important following of converts, who were a notable minority in the large city (2-5% of the entire population?).

Pope Callistus demonstrated pastoral insight in this new situation by organizing with greater benevolence the penitential system for the faithful who had fallen into sin after baptism and by striving to facilitate the union of aristocratic Christians with spouses who shared their faith, even if they were not of the same social class. This last bit of legislation reflects the sociology of this early church: the aristocracy, notwithstanding some notable examples (*Domitilla at the end of the 1st c.; *Apollonius in the 2nd c), was still less penetrated by Christianity, but conversion touched different areas: members of the Palatine service (Prosenes, for example, whose epitaph is one of the most ancient Latin Christian inscriptions, in 217) and the entire Greek-speaking population of soldiers and artisans.

With respect to this early Christian community during the 3rd c., we know primarily of the *cemeteries and the epitaphs that attest the appearance of a Christian formulary, expressing, as in Jewish epigraphy, the hope of victory over death with a conviction entirely unknown to pagan texts. In the decorations of the catacombs the first images of figurative Christian art appear. Certainly, many trials shook this community: localized persecution struck from the reign of the emperor *Maximinus Thrax in 235 (the deportation of the Roman bishops Pontianus and *Hippolytus); but it became more widespread with the edict of *Decius in 250 (martyrdom of Bishop Fabian), the laws of Valerian (257 and 258) that led Pope Sixtus and his deacon *Lawrence to martyrdom, and, finally, with the edicts of Diocletian (303–304), who acted cruelly (see, e.g., *Agnes).

The church after these trials was divided on how to judge the numerous cases of apostasy; in 251, the priest Novatian gathered around himself a rigorous faction that he led until he and his group were in open schism against Bishop Cornelius, who had been elected by a more moderate majority. This latter figure gathered against his rival, who had become an antipope, a council of Italian bishops, which numbered around sixty. This assembly attests the expansion of the Roman primacy in the peninsula. In 254, Bishop Stephen received an appeal from two Spanish bishops; he was also invited by *Cyprian of Carthage to depose the bishop of *Arles. The bishop of Rome made known to Christian Africa the rules of his discipline that prohibited the practice of rebaptizing converted heretics: even if this discipline was in contrast to Cyprian's uncompromising resistance, this event was significant, exactly like that of Bishop Dionysius who took a stance, at the request of the Alexandrian clergy, against the overly subordinationist preaching of the Alexandrian bishop. These interventions made explicit the primacy of a church that intended to protect and maintain the apostolic tradition, the church of the cathedra Petri.

2. The 4th and the 5th c. After the victory won by *Constantine in October 312, N of Rome, near the Milvian Bridge, the attitude of the authorities toward the church radically changed, and it transitioned from privileged support during the period of the first "Christian" emperor (312–337) to the point of exclusive backing under *Theodosius (379–395). The evolution of the political union, but also of the social and economic conditions, certainly exercised a notable role in the development of the Roman Church during the time of the Christian Empire (4th and 5th c.).

2.1. Especially in the great movement of conversion that esp. affected urban populations during this period Rome provided an example of an exceedingly fruitful missionary activity, to which the imperial favor gave only indirect and secondary assistance. As concrete proof of this, we have the numerous churches (to be understood, by this point, as specialized buildings) constructed for the Christian assemblies within the walls of the city as well as in the suburban areas. In the 1st half of the 4th c., Rome owed to Constantine the establishment of the bishop's church with its baptistery (basilica constantiniana, then basilica of St. John Lateran): a grandiose basilica in which, for the first time, the bishop was able to gather his people. Also to the imperial benevolence of Constantine and his successors it owed the construction of the basilica near the tombs of the Roman *martyrs: St. Peter in the Vatican, St. Lawrence near the Via Tiburtina, an early construction near the tomb of St. Paul, and at the end of the century, a large basilica near the Via Labicana, where Constantine at first thought of building his own tomb, as well as other martyria near the Appian Way (S. *Sebastian) or near the Via Nomentana (S. Agnes).

In all this activity, a few urban foundations were financed by the emperor (with the exception of the Palatine church near the residence of the Empress *Helena: Holy Cross in Jerusalem); esp. during this period the construction of the urban churches was indeed the duty of the bishops (*Sylvester, *Mark, *Julius and *Liberius), although private patronage was already evident (Lucina), a practice that dominated from the mid-4th to the mid-5th c. In some decades Christian construction erected more than 20 buildings (see *Titulus), constructed according to the intention of the donors, which resulted in a dense network in the urban space. In the 5th c., the bishops always participated with munificence in the building initiatives, as the foundation from the large basilica on the Esquiline (S. Maria Maggiore) indicates on the part of *Sixtus III. Nonetheless, after Sixtus (d. 440), the rhythm of the new constructions noticeably slowed down (just note the intervention of Pope Simplicius in reagrd to S. Stefano on the Caelian); still the embellishment of buildings and restorations continued, which became necessary after the two sacks of Rome, which had been devastated for three days in 410 by the *Visigoths and for three weeks in 455 by the *Vandals. Moreover, bishops, clergy and even the faithful took care of the catacombs for the cult of their martyrs and the visitation of pilgrims. Dating to the beginning of the 4th c., this activity developed esp. during the time of Pope *Damasus, *Siricius and, again in the 5th c., under *Innocent and *Boniface. Under Pope *Leo, an aristocracy financed the construction of a basilica in honor of St. *Stephen near the Via Latina.

In the meantime, the church was enriched with donations that, added to the imperial and private donations, allowed it to maintain the buildings and their clergy. If in the mid-4th c., this patrimony represented moderate sums of assets, such that the bishop appeared to be tied to the foundation charters (that constituted the tituli), in the 5th c., the economic power of the church was affirmed when the pope assumed, despite the resistance of the donors, the power of capitalizing on the revenue and organizing a common property. This material institution permitted a more efficient organization of the mission: the episcopal liturgy was enriched with large communal assemblies at the large basilicas (the bishop's palace, S. Maria Maggiore's and also St. Peter's, etc.), used by the bishop, over the course of the year, from station to station. Thus, the period of Lent, ranging from three to six weeks, united catechumens and penitents in gatherings of instruction or reconciliation held in the presence of all the people until Easter. One must also take into account the celebration of Christmas, the institution of periods for fasting and monetary offerings (see section III below, Liturgy). A local pastoral staff was organized in the titular churches that began at the end of the 5th c. to be furnished with baptisteries. Entrusted to priests (numbering near a hundred in the 5th c.), who celebrated the *Eucharist in unity with the bishop thanks to the rite of fermentum, these churches possessed a fixed clergy (acolytes, lectors).

In the 5th c., these churches became centers of local life, which could accommodate gatherings for the collections (since the period of Pope Leo), as well as accommodate the now public ceremonies of Christian marriages. The system of assistance, always entrusted to the deacons who had been divided into seven sectors, received the support of the "titulars" and also of charitable foundations helped by the generous faithful (xenodochia), while the gravediggers (fossores) assured, in the catacombs, the service of the burials. Moreover, the organization of the sanctorale (the Depositio martyrum from 336, then the Hieronymian martyrology for a later testimony) permitted a true conquest of time and established, in competition with the pagan feast days, the celebration of the martyrs who were buried in suburban areas and likewise the celebration of the relics present in the city (the chains of Peter in the church of S. Pietro in Vin-coli). Monastic communities were established near the large martyria (Ad catacumbas; the basilica of St. Peter; the basilica of St. Lawrence, etc.).

The organization of the clergy by then had a rigorously established discipline (see the decretals of Siricius, Innocent, etc.) and controlled recruitment. The practice outlined two types of careers: that which led from the office of exorcist or lector to that of acolyte and eventually to the priesthood; and that which led to the *diaconate, from which bishops were usually chosen. In this organization, clergy stand out as a small learned élite (of priests and deacons) often recruited from a Christian family tied to the service of the church: this was the case, for example, with Pope Damasus. It was precisely from this élite that there emerged bishops, among whom were some with very strong personalities: after Miltiades (311–314), there were Sylvester (314–335), Mark (336), Julius (337–352), Liberius (352–366) and Damasus (366–384). Siricius (384–399) seems to have had a dull personality in comparison to his predecessor, who was a poet and diplomat, but he was also an inflexible administrator. After *Anastasius (399–401), the political situation disturbed the episcopate of a great pope, Innocent (401–417), who was succeeded by the heavy-handed and blundering *Zosimus (417–418), then Boniface (418–422), *Celestine (422–432), a distinguished spirit, and finally *Sixtus III (432–440). *Leo the Great's pontificate marked a decisive moment, all the more that the bishop of Rome ascended toward the height of the great Eastern theologians (440–461). Subsequently, *Hilary (461–468) and, even more so, *Simplicius (468–483) seem less colorful. *Felix II (III) was the first bishop produced by the Roman aristocracy (483–492).

At the end of the century, *Gelasius, inflexible on account of his natural disposition and the then current situation, already belonged to another age, that is, one in which the emperor of the West had definitively disappeared. He measured the effectiveness of this pastoral ministry by the number of conversions. If, at the beginning of the 4th c., only some aristocratic families were Christian (the Anici and the Probi) and if, at the end of the same century, they organized a pagan resistance around *Symmachus and Nicomachus *Flavianus, at the end of the 5th c. they were no longer open defenders of the old idols, but simply faithful inclined to maintain, either through tradition or precaution, some ancient rituals such as those of the Lupercalia. The crises that separated the Roman community always created some Christian factions: thus the conflicts caused by *Ursinus against the election of Damasus (366–370) or by *Eulalius against Boniface (418).

2.2. During this new time for the church, in response to numerous requests, the Roman see exercised more fully the influence of its primacy: (a) In the traditional dependence on Rome, limited to suburbicarian Italy after the mid-4th c., the pope exercised a metropolitan authority, which is cited as an example at the Council of *Nicaea (can. 6, in 325). He controlled the elections of bishops, judged ecclesiastical affairs and rigorously imposed the canons of Roman discipline. In the northern provinces of the peninsula, this intervention was curtailed through the influence of the bishop of imperial residence, *Milan, especially during the time of *Ambrose (374–397) and then, in the 5th c., with that of *Ravenna, although with less importance.

(b) In the western provinces of the mission, *Spain and, even more, *Gaul, where the ecclesiastical organization was still rudimentary at the beginning of the 4th c., Rome exercised a sort of patriarchate. From these regions came the appeals of some bishops: that of *Himerius of *Tarragona to Siricius, *Exuperius of Toulouse or *Victricius of Rouen to Innocent. Most of the time, they sought counsel for the organization of their clergy and their liturgy; they received decretals, that is, small treatises on discipline that subsequently circulated in the form of collections and thus constituted a code of religious law. These requests less frequently required the pope in theological conflicts: Damasus refused to accept *Priscillian's appeal, but Innocent responded to the Council of *Toledo, which consulted him on the resistance of the heresiarch's partisans (404), and Leo, on the same problem of Priscillianism, gave some indications to *Turibius of Astorga bishop of Gallaecia. In sum, the Roman see treated the causae maiores and intervened in the affairs of bishops; when communication risked being interrupted by the barbarian invasions, *Zosimus entrusted the functions of vicar to the bishop of *Arles (418). But this system functioned poorly; Boniface restricted the scope, and Leo finally reduced the rights of *Hilary the bishop of Arles to that of a simple metropolitan.

(c) The same system was adopted with the bishops of the Illyricum Prefecture, passed in the 5th c. under the authority of the Eastern emperor. Preoccupied with escaping the influence of a nascent patriarch and the "second Rome," that is, *Constantinople, the episcopate accepted Innocent's establishment of a vicariate at *Thessalonica; the latter disappeared in the 2nd half of the 5th c.

(d) Africa, which had a Christian metropolis, *Carthage, as a support and an organized episcopal college, did not tolerate this type of practice: *Constantine in 323 had charged the Roman Bishop Miltiades with adjudicating the controversy between *Caecilian of Carthage and his rigorist adversary. The failure of this intervention, at the beginning of the *Donatist schism, deterred Rome's intervention for some time. But, in the 5th c., Aurelius of Carthage and *Augustine of *Hippo sought the authority of communion with Rome to overcome the Pelagian danger (417): with much more force they praised Innocent's sentence, which his successor Zosimus seemed, for a certain time, bent on reopening for discussion. Thanks to imperial support, they were able to make Zosimus relent, who decided (summer 418) to condemn in no uncertain terms *Pelagius and his disciple *Celestius. Thus, Christian Africa recognized the prestige of the Roman primacy and ceded more and more to the authority of its communion, esp. when the invasion of the *Arian *Vandals created the threat of a persecution.

(e) For the Christian East, the Roman primacy more and more represented an authority for guaranteeing a certain ecclesiastical freedom so that the pope was no longer directly involved in the conflicts of the Eastern parties: at the great councils convoked by the emperor at *Nicaea (325), *Serdica (343), *Ephesus (431 and 447) and *Chalcedon (451), the pope sent some of his delegates. Analogously, the bishops persecuted by the imperial politics sought support from the apostolic see: this was the case with *Athanasius, who had been removed from *Alexandria through the work of the Arians in 339 and vindicated in 340 by a Roman council. When the emperor *Valens again favored Arianism, *Basil of Caesarea sought to obtain Roman support (372–379), despite the misunderstandings of theological vocabulary and the differences of ecclesiastical politics that separated him from Damasus. These requests led the bishop of Rome to intervene both in disciplinary questions and in problems of faith. In a council held at Rome in 377, Damasus formulated a strong condemnation of the *pneumatomachi, which was adopted in 381 by the Council of Constantinople. To fight against *Nestorius, bishop of *Constantinople, *Cyril of Alexandria sought the alliance of the Roman see, which, in the person of Celestine, embraced the decisions of the Council of Ephesus, and Celestine was greeted "as a new Paul" (431). With Leo the Great, the Roman intervention in theological debates became truly decisive, because the pope's legates at Chalcedon were able to bring about the conciliar definition that assumed the Christology expounded by the pope in his Tomus ad Flavianum (451). The letters of the popes illustrate the ecclesiology that explains this exercise of the primacy: Damasus was the first to justify the powers of Peter's successors by making reference to Mt 16:18. Leo and Gelasius put together a definitive theological synthesis for explaining the role of the apostolic see, where the successor and vicar of the apostle, who is invested with a special responsibility and an eminent authority regarding discipline and faith, exercises his ministry in a city renewed by the intervention of the two new founders, Peter and Paul.

3. The 6th and the 7th c. The political climate changed when Rome came under *Gothic rule for half a century, even though the *Byzantine reconquest, which was completed in 554, decreed that there be a vicarius in urbe to represent the emperor.

3.1. The architectural heritage was enriched not only with churches restricted to the ancient network of titular churches: SS. Apostoli (mid-6th c.), S. Agata recovered by *Gregory the Great from the *Arian *Goths and, on the periphery of the city, S. Pancrazio, which was built under Pope Symmachus, S. Giovanni near the Porta Latina; yet another quarter was occupied, the Roman Forum, where Christians established themselves in some public buildings (in the 7th c., the curia, under *Honorius I?) and buildings adjoined to the imperial palace (S. Maria Antiqua). In the 6th c., *Felix III (IV) established a church in honor of *Cosmas and Damian within what was once a library of Vespasian's Forum of Peace. Two new types of buildings were repeatedly built: the *monasteries (some 15 foundations for the 6th c., among which was Gregory's monastery on the Caelian; some 10 odd monasteries in the 7th c., among which was S. Saba) and also the diaconiae, which served as liturgical annexes for charitable institutions created in the 7th c.

The ties of the clergy with the aristocracy appeared to strengthen after the Gothic period, even if the popes' relationship with the senators often degenerated into conflicts (over the administration of the patrimony, over the regulation of the succession of bishops: in particular, during the period of Pope Symmachus [498–514]). In any case, there were now more prelates who had come from powerful families: after the humble Symmachus, the rich *Hormisdas (514–523), perhaps *John I (523–526); then, after *Felix IV (526–530), *Boniface II (530–532) and *John II (533–535), *Agapetus, who belonged to a clerical family (535–536) and, especially, after *Silverius (536–537), *Vigilius, who was the son of a prefect (537–555). We do not know anything about the provenance of Pope *Pelagius (556–561), *John III (561–574), *Benedict (575–579) and *Pelagius II (579–590), but it is well known that Gregory the Great (590–604) came from a noble family. Some great bishops appear on the 7th-c. list of popes: after *Sabinian (604–606) and the two *Bonifaces (III [607] and IV [608-615]), *Adeodatus, who was the son of the subdeacon (615–618), *Boniface V (619–625), *Honorius (625–638); *Severinus and *John IV, *Theodore (642–649), an Easterner, and *Martin (649–655) and, after *Eugenius and *Vitalian, *Adeodatus II and *Donus, *Agatho (678–681), *Leo II, *Benedict II, *John V, an Antiochene (685–686), who preceded the Thracian *Conon and another Antiochene, *Sergius (687–701).

3.2. When facing the barbarians, the bishop was the city's defender, the protector who sought to remove the threat, as did Pope Leo during the time of Attila the Hun. Gregory illustrated this role in a special way when the *Longobards made good on their threats, and he received on his epitaph the nickname "God's consul."

(a) The bishop of Rome always exerted a jurisdiction of direct administration over suburbicarian Italy: Gregory governed the succession of bishops (e.g., that of *Naples); he organized provincial councils (for Sicily), and he conferred real authority on Roman clerics who administrated the patrimony of St. Peter. The N provinces were for a long time disturbed by the schism organized by an episcopate that made the see of *Aquileia its head, an episcopate that was hostile to the condemnation of the *Three Chapters, a condemnation that was then ratified by Pope Vigilius (553). But in 649, the Lateran council gathered a considerable number of Italian bishops to condemn *monothelitism, which was declared by a typos of Constantinople and rejected by Pope Martin.

(b) The relationship with Africa, renewed during the time of the Byzantine reconquest, slackened after the Muslim conquest: in the 5th c., Rome received the bishops who had been persecuted by the Vandals; in the 6th c., Gregory intervened in *Numidia against a Donatist revival and the last manifestations of an organized African episcopate supported Rome against monothelitism.

(c) The political unification with Spain, in contrast, became more favorable thanks to the conversion of the Gothic kings, so much so that the ties between Gregory the Great and *Leander of Seville became stronger. However, to establish the rules of its pastoral ministry and its mission, the Iberian Peninsula used a conciliar organization that afforded less justification for Roman intervention: *Braulio of *Saragossa noted this after an intervention of Pope Hormisdas (638), considered inopportune, on the question of Judaism.

(d) Gaul had an increasingly important role, esp. after the establishment of the Catholic monarchy of the Franks; the episcopate generally maintained the Roman positions during the theological conflicts that pitted the pope against the emperor (such as the Three Chapters, monothelitism). Certainly the proxy granted to the bishop of Arles during the time of *Caesarius (503–543) lost all force over the course of the 6th c.; but despite the organization of provincial councils, the apostolic see remained a model that was often imitated.

(e) After Celestine, who supported *Patrick's mission among the Scotti (431), Gregory organized a mission for *Britain, which was headed by a monk from the Caelian monastery, *Augustine of Canterbury (597); in 668, moreover, Vitalian appointed a bishop for Canterbury.

(f) With respect to the East, the politics of Emperors *Zeno and *Anastasius (476–518) had caused a definitive break between East and West with the excommunication of *Acacius of Constantinople due to the work of Felix III in 487. However, in 518, the emperor *Justinian imposed submission on John who was forced in the "Second Rome" to accept communion with Rome; the primacy of Rome seems to have been better established when Pope Agapetus, who had come with a delegation, deposed the patriarch and set up *Menas in his place. Nevertheless, since the age of Justinian, the popes battled against the system of the imperial church: Vigilius, after a botched attempt at resistance, was forced to accept the condemnation of the Three Chapters, a condemnation that was desired by the sovereign (553); with Gregory the Great, who contested the bishop of Constantinople having the title of "ecumenical patriarch," Rome reacquired its authority. Despite the capitulation of Pope Honorius, Rome combated monothelist theology through Popes John IV, Theodore and Martin (Lateran Council 649), a theology that the Byzantine sovereign wished to impose on Rome. Despite the acts of retaliation by the emperor (execution and martyrdom of Pope Martin in 655), the Roman position was imposed at the Council of Constantinople (681).

Situated on the margins of an empire that was crumbling in Italy, Rome dealt with ever increasing difficulty the bothersome interference of the Byzantine authorities in the elections of the popes. Rome was concerned with finding a close and effective means to protect itself against the direct threats of the Longobards. The iconoclastic politics of the emperor *Leo the Isaurian exacerbated the alienation between Rome and the East and increasingly pushed the bishop of Rome toward France.

H. Lietzmann, Petrus und Paulus, Berlin 1927; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, I and II, Tübingen 1930; H. Grisar, Roma alla fine del mondo antico (Ital. trans. by A. Mercati and revision by A. Bartoli, 2 vols.), Rome 1930; R. Krautheimer, Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae, 5 vols., Rome 1937-80 (Eng. and Ital. trans.); P. Batiffol, Cathedra Petri, Paris 1938; B.M. Apollonj Ghetti - A. Ferrua - E. Josi - E. Kirschbaum, Esplorazioni sotto la confessione di S. Pietro in Vaticano, 2 vols., Rome 1951; L. Duchesne, Le Liber Pontificalis, text, intr. and comm., I and II (III additions and appendix by C. Vogel), Paris ²1957 (bibl.); G. Ferrari, Early Roman Monasteries, Rome 1957; Y.M. Congar, L'ecclésiologie du Haut Moyen Âge, Paris 1968; D.W.M. O'Connor, Peter in Rome, The Literary, Liturgical, and Archaeological Evidence, New York 1969; W. Marshall, Kartago und Rom (Päpste und Papsttum 1), Stuttgart 1971; P. Joannou, Die Ostkirche und die Kathedra Petri (Päpste und Papsttum 3), Stuttgart 1972; L. Duchesne, Scripta minora. Études de topographie romaine et de géographie ecclésiastique, Rome 1973; H.I. Marrou, Patristique et Humanisme ("L'origine orientale des diaconies," pp. 81ff.), Paris 1975; C. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius . . . (Päpste und Papsttum 7), Stuttgart 1975; M. Maccarrone, Apostolicità, episcopato e primato di Pietro, Lateranum 42, Rome 1976; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana, Recherches sur l'Église de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie de Miltiade à Sixte III (311–340), 2 vols., (bibl.), Rome 1976; H.I. Marrou, Christiana tempora, Rome 1977; U.M. Fasola, Pietro e Paolo a Roma, Rome 1980; Ch. Pietri, Aristocratie et société cléricale en Italie au temps d'Odoacre et de Théodoric: MEFRA 93 (1981) 418-473; H. Geertman, L'illuminazione della basilica paleocristiana secondo il Liber Pontificalis: RivAC 64 (1988) 135-160; P.G. Caron, La proprietà ecclesiastica nel diritto del tardo impero, in Atti dell'Accademia Romanistica Costantiniana. IX Congr. Int., Perugia 1989, 217-230; E. dal Covolo, I Severi e il cristianesimo. Ricerche sull'ambiente storico-istituzionale delle origini cristiane tra il secondo e il terzo secolo, Rome 1989; F. Guidobaldi, L'inserimento delle chiese titolari di Roma nel tessuto urbano preesistente. Osservazioni ed implicazioni, in Quaeritur Inventus Colitur. Miscellanea in onore di padre Umberto Maria Fasola, B., Vatican City 1989, 381-396; M. Mazza, Deposita Pietatis. Problemi dell'organizzazione economica in comunità cristiane tra II e III secolo, in Atti dell'Accademia Romanistica Costantiniana. IX Congr. Int., Perugia 1989, 187-216; Ch. Pietri, Régions ecclésiastiques et paroisses romaines, in Actes du XI^e Congrès Int. d'Archéologie Chrétienne, Lyon-Vienne-Grenoble-Genève-Aoste, 21-28 Septembre 1986, Vatican City 1989, 1035-1062; L. Reekmans, L'implantation monumentale chrétienne dans le paysage urbain de Rome de 300 à 850, in ibid., 861-915; V. Saxer, L'utilisation par la liturgie de l'espace urbain et suburbain. L'exemple de Rome dans l'Antiquité et le Haut Moyen Âge, in ibid., 917-1033; Gregorio Magno e il suo tempo, XIX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma 9-12 maggio 1990, Rome 1991; L. Pani Ermini, Roma tra la fine del IV e gli inizi del V secolo, in Felix Temporis Reparatio. Atti del Conv. archeologico int. "Milano Capitale dell'Impero Romano," Milano 8-11 marzo 1990, Milan 1992, 193-202; L. Gatto, Ancora sull'edilizia e l'urbanistica nella Roma di Teodorico: RomBarb 12 (1992–1993) 311-380; L. Paroli - P. Delogu (ed.), La storia economica di Roma nell'alto Medioevo alla luce dei recenti scavi archeologici, Atti del Seminario, Roma, 2-3 aprile 1992, Florence 1993; Ch. Pietri, La Roma cristiana, in A. Carandini - L. Cracco Ruggini - A. Giardina (ed.), Storia di Roma. III. L'età tardoantica. I. Crisi e trasformazioni, Turin 1993, 697-721; S. de Blaauw, Cultus et decor. Liturgia e architettura nella Roma tardoantica e medievale. Basilica Salvatoris, Sanctae Mariae, Sancti Petri, III, Vatican City 1994; L. Pani Ermini, Forma urbis e renovatio murorum in età teodericiana, in A. Carile (ed.), Teoderico e i Goti tra Oriente e Occidente, Ravenna 1995, 171-225; R. Coates- Stephens, Dark Age Architecture in Rome: PBSR 65 (1997) 177-232; F. Guidobaldi, Transformations urbaines, sociales et religieuses à Rome au IV^e siècle, in H.W. Pleket - A.M.F.W. Verhoogt (eds.), Aspects of the Fourth Century A.D., Leiden 1997, 53-65; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane. Storia e topografia, catalogo ed. P.M. Barbini, Rome 1997; É. Rebillard, L'Église de Rome et le développement des catacombes. À propos de l'origine des cimetières chrétiens: MEFRA 109 (1997) 741-763; V. Fiocchi Nicolai - F. Bisconti - D. Mazzoleni, Le catacombe cristiane di Roma. Origini, sviluppo, apparati decorativi, documentazione epigrafica, Regensburg 1998; F. Guidobaldi, Spazio urbano e organizzazione ecclesiastica a Roma nel VI e VII secolo, in N. Cambi - E. Marin (ed.), Acta XIII Congressus Int. Archaeologiae Christianae, I-III, Split-Poreč, 25 settembre-1 ottobre 1994, Vatican City 1998, II, 29-54; A. Fraschetti, La conversione. Da Roma pagana a Roma cristiana, Rome-Bari 1999; F. Guidobaldi, s.v. Roma. Storia, architettura, urbanistica (sec. VI-XI): EAM 10 (1999) 63-77; W.V. Harris (ed.), The Transformations of Urbs Roma in Late Antiquity (Journal of Roman Archaeology supplementary series 33), Portsmouth, RI 1999; Riscoperta di Roma antica, Rome 1999 (collections of entries devoted to Rome in 13 volumes of the Enciclopedia dell'Arte Antica Classica Orientale; P. Delogu, Solium imperii – urbs ecclesiae. Roma fra la tarda antichità e l'alto medioevo, in G. Ripoll - J.M. Gurt (ed.), Sedes regiae (ann. 400–800), Barcelona 2000, 83-108; S. Ensoli - E. La Rocca (ed.), Aurea Roma. Dalla città pagana alla città cristiana, Rome 2000; A. Giardina (ed.), Roma antica, Rome-Bari 2000; E. Lo Cascio (ed.), Roma imperiale, Rome 2000; F. Marazzi, Rome in Transition. Economic and Political Change in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries, in J.M.H. Smith - T.S. Brown (eds.), Early Rome and the Christian West, Leiden 2000, 21-42; L. Pani Ermini (ed.), Christiana Loca. Lo spazio cristiano nella Roma del primo millennio, Rome 2000; L. Pani Ermini - P. Siniscalco (ed.), La comunità cristiana di Roma. La sua vita e la sua cultura dalle origini all'alto medioevo, Atti del I Congresso di studio, Roma, 12-14 novembre 1998, Vatican City 2000; M. Cecchelli (ed.), Materiali e tecniche dell'edilizia paleocristiana a Roma, Rome 2001; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Strutture funerarie ed edifici di culto paleocristiani di Roma dal IV al VI secolo, Vatican City 2001; F. Marazzi, Roma in transizione o Roma tardoantica? Spunti di riflessione su un problema di "quasi longue-durée," in G. Barone - L. Capo - S. Gaspari (ed.), Studi sul Medioevo per Girolamo Arnaldi, Rome 2001, 317-354; Pietro e Paolo. Il loro rapporto con Roma nelle testimonianze antiche, XXIX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma, 4-6 maggio 2000, Rome 2001; M.S. Arena, et al. (ed.), Roma dall'antichità al medioevo. Archeologia e storia nel Museo Nazionale Romano Crypta Balbi, Milan 2001; A. Vauchez (ed.), Roma medievale, Rome-Bari 2001; F. Guidobaldi - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi (ed.), Ecclesiae Urbis. Congr. Int. di Studi sulle Chiese di Roma (IV-X secolo), Roma, 4-10 settembre 2000, Vatican City 2002.

Ch. Pietri – M. Ghilardi

II. Councils.

193. Apart from some councils mentioned by the Libellus Synodicus, a source that cannot be entirely trusted, the first Roman council concerning which scholars have any certain knowledge was the one held under Pope *Victor I, which condemned the *quartodeciman practice concerning the day of the celebration of *Easter. The bishops of *Asia Minor, led by *Polycrates of Ephesus, stated that they did not want to follow the Roman practice. Victor intended to exclude them from *communion with Rome but was dissuaded from doing so by the intervention of some bishops, among whom was *Irenaeus of Lyons.

231. A council held during the pontificate of Pope *Pontianus to ratify the measures taken by Bishop *Alexander of *Alexandria against *Origen because of his irregular ordination and teachings. Origin subsequently sent a profession of faith to Pope *Fabian (Eus., HE 6, 36,4).

251. Following the Novatian schism, Pope *Cornelius called a council in which 60 bishops and a large number of priests and deacons participated (Eus., HE 6, 43,2). At this council, *Novatian and his followers were condemned; they accepted the decisions reached at the Council of *Carthage (251) concerning the *lapsed (lapsi), further specifying the course of action to be taken; they examined the case of Bishop *Trophimus.

260. Some members of the churches of the Libyan Pentapolis brought to Rome's attention the case of *Dionysius, the bishop of Alexandria, accusing him of subordinationist *trinitarian teachings and of affirming that the Son was a creature (ποίημα). At Rome, a council was held in which *Dionysius of Rome condemned both *Sabellianism and *tritheism (see Athanasius, Ep. de decr. Nic. Syn. 26). Dionysius of Alexandria retracted and subsequently clarified some extreme positions of his theology.

313. The council pertaining to the rise of the Donatist controversy. The Donatists, in fact, persisting in the division of the African church in two parts—the part that made *Donatus its leader and the other that made *Caecilian its leader—turned to the emperor *Constantine and asked him for arbitration from the bishops of *Gaul. The emperor agreed and a council was held at Rome, presided over by Pope *Miltiades, at which three bishops of Gaul participated, 15 Italian bishops and representatives from the two conflicting parties, among whom were Donatus and Caecilian. The council confirmed the legitimacy of Caecilian's election.

341. *Athanasius, who had been deposed for the second time from the see of Alexandria (338), went to Rome to plead his case. Here, Pope Julius I had the idea of calling a council to attempt to resolve the problems caused by the Council of Nicaea. He also summoned the *Arians, who were led by *Eusebius of Nicomedia. Eusebius then delayed because he did not want to acknowledge that the bishop of Rome had the right to interfere in Eastern matters. Finally, Julius I held a council in the spring of 341: he reexamined Athanasius's case and declared him the legitimate bishop of Alexandria; he reexamined the case of *Marcellus of Ancyra, who had been accused of Sabellianism, and after having heard his profession of faith, which was considered adequate, this pope nullified his deposition and *excommunication.

370. A council held under Pope *Damasus concerning which we have information thanks to the conciliar letter Confidimus quidem, which was sent to the bishops of Illyricum, in which he reaffirmed the validity of the Nicene Creed and signed the formula according to which the three persons of the *Trinity were unius substantiae. *Auxentius, the Arian bishop of *Milan, was condemned.

374. This council condemned *Eustathius of Sebaste for his doctrine on the *Holy Spirit and *Apollinaris of Laodicea for his *christological teaching.

378. A council held at Rome following the case brought against Damasus by *Isaac, a Jewish convert who, when instigated by *Ursinus, the schismatic pope of 366, had accused the pontiff of serious crimes; to avoid the repetition of such cases, the conciliar bishops sent the council's decisions to the emperor *Gratian with the letter Et hoc gloriae, which asked that he intervene in this regard. Gratian responded with the rescript Ordinariorum, in which he specified the bishop of Rome's powers and spheres of intervention and in fact increased the scope of his jurisdiction.

380. The council examined the case of Bishop *Maximus the Cynic. He was irregularly elected to the see of Constantinople; he was therefore deposed and *Gregory of Nazianzus succeeded him. Maximus came to Rome to plead his case and the conciliar Fathers, who were poorly informed on the matter, sided with him.

382. This council was caused by the need to affirm once and for all the primacy of the see of the apostle Peter over all the Eastern churches. The Council of Constantinople (381) had seriously questioned the position of the Roman church and had overturned the hierarchical order of the apostolic sees, by placing the church of Constantinople ahead of the churches of *Alexandria and *Antioch. The Roman Bishop Damasus affirmed the prestige and the authority of the apostolic see (apostolica sedes) and confirmed the prestige and authority of that tradition; in an unmistakable way the order of the preeminence of the various apostolic sees and the position of the prima sedes (Decretum Gelasianum III). Among those who participated at this council were *Ambrose of Milan, *Jerome, *Epiphanius of Salamis, *Acholius of Thessalonica, *Paulinus of Antioch and three representatives of Constantinople. Jerome drafted a profession of faith for those *Apollinarians who desired to reenter into communion with the church. *Flavian of Antioch, *Acacius of Beroea and *Diodore of Tarsus were excommunicated (see G. Pilara, Problemi ancora aperti nel pontificato damasiano. Lo scisma ursiniano e i concili romani nel pontificato di Damaso: Clio 28/1 [2002] 115-133).

390. Pope *Siricius condemned the monk *Jovinian and his supporters concerning the inability to sin after baptism, the denial of *Mary's virginity and the rejection of penitential practices (Jer., Ad Iovinianum).

417. Pope *Innocent gathered a council to receive the requests formulated by the African clergy to condemn *Pelagius and *Celestius. The decisions against the two heretics reached at the councils of *Carthage and Milevis (416) had been overturned by the Council of *Diospolis, where *John of Jerusalem had received Pelagius and Celestius into the church's communion. The African episcopate turned to the bishop of Rome as the one to whom alone belonged the right, as a last resort, to resolve the question. Innocent confirmed the condemnation of the two heretics and left an opening for the two heretics' repentance and reconciliation with the church.

417. *Zosimus, Pope Innocent's successor, reexamined Celestius's teaching, present at Rome, and that of Pelagius, who had sent a libellus fidei, and was convinced of their *orthodoxy and reinstated them into communion. A year later (418), when he had become aware of the hastiness with which he had absolved the heretics, in light of the clear position taken by the emperor *Honorius and the African clergy, Zosimus issued the Epistola Tractoria in which he condemned Pelagianism.

430. Following the christological controversy that had broken out between *Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, and Cyril of Alexandria, esp. regarding the conferring of the title Theotokos on the Virgin Mary, Pope *Celestine I intervened with a council. Previously in 429, Nestorius had written to the pope and made known his position. Cyril also wrote to Rome, and added to his letter a true and proper dossier on the event: some of Nestorius's sermons, the letters that Cyril had sent him, a list of Nestorius's errors compiled by Cyril and the collection of patristic testimonies on the incarnation, all of which had been translated already into Latin—a very important service for Latin speakers that Nestorius had failed to provide. On the basis of all these documents, the pope condemned Nestorius and gave him ten days to retract his position and entrusted to Cyril the execution of his judgment. The bishop of Rome sent letters to *John of Antioch, *Juvenal of Jerusalem, *Rufus of Thessalonica, *Flavian of Philippi and the clergy and the faithful of Constantinople (L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, 166-176).

443 or 444. Council led by *Leo I in which the *Manicheans and their doctrines were condemned.

445. This council examined the situation in Gaul, where *Hilary, bishop of *Arles, had given displayed excessive zeal and excessive concentration of authority in his hands. Two controversial cases were reexamined, and Leo revoked the measures taken by Hilary, who, even in person, had vociferously defended his reasons. No specific measures were taken against him, with the exception of the limiting of his authority to the diocese of Arles alone. In the letter Divinae cultum religionis (Ep. 10), sent to the bishops of the province of *Vienne, Leo affirmed the primacy of Rome over all the churches.

449. Condemnation of the decisions taken at the Council of *Ephesus (August 449). Leo I sent letters to the emperor *Theodosius II, to his sister *Pulcheria and to the clergy and the faithful of Constantinople. He asked the emperor to nullify the decisions of the synod and to convoke an ecumenical council to be held in Italy.

484. In 482, the emperor Zeno had promulgated the Henoticon* or the Edict of Union, in which he attempted to settle the *monophysite crisis. However, in the attempt at reconciliation, the edict had a clear monophysite tendency. To clarify the situation, Pope Felix III sent two legates to Constantinople, Bishops Vitalis and Misenus, bearers of letters for the emperor and *Acacius, bishop of Constantinople. The legates disregarded the pope's instructions and ended up restoring communion with Acacius and *Peter Mongus. As a result, in July 484, Felix called a council in which he deposed Acacius, excommunicating him from communion with Rome. Following the reaction of the bishop of Constantinople, the so-called Acacian schism had begun, which lasted until the year 519.

499. Following the Laurentian schism, which had paralyzed the activity of the Roman see, Pope *Symmachus convoked a council to take measures to prevent the repetition of similar events. For this council, he established a series of canons, among which one stated that the pope could appoint his successor. Even *Laurentius, his antagonist, signed the council's decisions and was appointed bishop of Nocera in Campania.

501. Despite legitimization of Symmachus's election, the party favorable to Laurentius appointed as their head the Roman Senator Festus and continued to scheme against the pope by accusing him of serious moral crimes, namely, changing the date of Easter and squandering ecclesiastical property. Symma-chus convoked a council at Rome to answer the charges raised against him and to condemn those responsible for the disorder caused during the papal election.

502. The bishops of the opposing factions, to resolve the grave situation that occurred at Rome, had recourse to the Gothic King *Theodoric; he convoked a Roman council and sent a visitator, Peter, bishop of Altinus. The synod, called with the purpose of judging the conduct of the Roman pontiff, was long and tempestuous, and added more sessions because of the pope's reluctance to present himself before a judgment and because of the continual unrest that put his life at risk. The fourth session of the synod (23 October 502) introduced for the first time the legal principle of the pope's unjudgeable status. The conciliar bishops decided in favor of Pope Symmachus's reinstatement to the pontifical throne and for the excommunication of Peter and Laurentius from Rome. The schism continued, however, until 506, even if in fact it only ended with the death of Symmachus in 514 (see T. Sardella, Società, Chiesa e Stato nell'età di Teoderico. Papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Messina 1996).

531. This council examined the appeal made by *Stephen, bishop of Larissa, to Rome. Stephen had been deposed by *Epiphanius of Constantinople. Stephen made his appeal on the basis that he was under the jurisdiction of the metropolitan of *Thessalonica, vicar of the apostolic see, and that only the pope, and not the bishop of Constantinople, had the right to judge him. Pope *Boniface II, having listened to Stephen's suffragans and having examined the evidence in his possession, reconfirmed Rome's jurisdiction over Illyricum, and affirmed, moreover, the legitimacy of the Thessalonican metropolitan's position toward the apostolic Roman see. The acts of the council have not survived.

600. A council held under the pontificate of Pope *Gregory the Great, in the presence of 23 other bishops, 23 presbyters of the Roman titular churches, deacons and the clergy; by popular acclamation, approval was obtained for the pontiff's proposals, which were sanctioned in six different disciplinary canons pertaining to the *liturgy, the administration of ecclesiastical goods and common norms of religious life.

600. Gregory the Great convoked a second Roman council to decide the condemnation of the monk Andrew, who had been accused of professing monophysite teachings, and to decide the case of Probus, the abbot of St. Andrew.

601. A council celebrated at the basilica of St. John Lateran. This council was also closely tied to the reforming work of Gregory I. In this particular conciliar forum, the pontiff made sure to address the questions pertaining to monasticism and, in all likelihood, along with 24 bishops and various deacons of the Roman Church signed the constitutum in favor of monasticism, by which the bishop of Rome intervened in favor of the autonomy of the monasteries and prohibited any interference from the clergy or the local bishops in the internal affairs of the individual communities, both with respect to the administration of property and with respect to the election of the abbots.

P. Coustant, Pontificum Romanorum Epistulae, Paris 1721 (letters before the year 440); A. Thiel, Epistulae Pontificum Romanorum genuinae, Braunsbergae 1868 (repr. 1974); Regesta Pontificum Romanorum a condita Ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 2ª ed. (augmented), Berlin 1885–1888, repr. Graz 1956 (catalog of pontifical letters from Popes Julius I to Symmachus, 337-498), ed. Ph. Jaffé - G. Wattenbach - S. Löwenfeld - F. Kaltenbrunnen - P. Ewald; MGH AA 12, ed. Th. Mommsen - L. Traube, Berolini 1894, 395-455; Collectio Avellana (Epistolae imperatorum pontificum et aliorum), ed. O. Günther, CSEL 35, 2 vols., Vienna 1895–1896; C.H. Turner, Ecclesiae occidentalis monumenta iuris antiquissima, 2 vols., Oxford 1899–1939; E. Schwartz, Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum, 431-879, Strasbourg-Berlin 1914–1974; Mansi 1-9; Palazzini 4, 119-180; Fliche-Martin I-IV; Hfl-Lecl 1-3; DACL, s.v. Rome, 3099. F. Maassen, Geschichte der Quellen und Literatur des canonischen Rechts im Abendlande bis zum Ausgang des Mittelalters, I, Graz 1870 (repr. Graz 1956); L. Duchesne, La première collection romaine de décrétales, in Atti del II Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1902, 159-163; R. Massigli, La plus ancienne collection de décrétales: RHL 5 (1914) 402-424; C. Silva Tarouca, Beiträge zur Überlieferungsgeschichte der Papstbriefe der 4. 5. und 6. Jahrh.: ZKTh 43 (1919) 467-481, 657-692; E. Schwartz, Die Kanonensammlungen der alten Reichskirche: ZRG KA 25 (1936) 1-114; G. Röthe, Geschichte der römischen Synoden im 3. und 4. Jahrhundert, Stuttgart 1937; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain (IV^e-V^e siècles), Paris 1958; Id., La Formation du droit séculier et du droit de l'Église aux IV^e et V^e siècles, Paris ²1979, 159-166; Id., Les sources du droit de l'Église en Occident du II^e au VII^e siècle, Paris 1985; A.M. Stickler, Historia iuris canonici, I, Historia Fontium, Turin 1950; P. Paschini - V. Monachino, I Papi nella storia, I, Rome 1961; P.R. Coleman-Norton, Roman State and Christian Church, 3 vols., London 1966; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana. Recherches sur l'Église de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie de Miltiade à Sixte III (311–440), 2 vols., Rome 1976; A. Faivre, La Documentation canonico-liturgique de l'église ancienne: RSR 54 (1980) 204-215, 279-295; M. Wojtewytsch, Papsttum und Konzile von den Anfängen bis zu Leo I. (440–461), Stuttgart 1981; EPapi I, Rome 2000; D. Jasper - H. Fuhrmann, Papal Letters in the Early Middle Ages, Ann Arbor, MI 2001.

G. Pilara

III. Liturgy. At Rome, as elsewhere, one should distinguish two periods in the history of the *liturgy: before and after the recognition of the church by the empire (314).

1. For the first three centuries, we know about the liturgy celebrated at Rome through two primary documents: *Justin Martyr's Apology (written around 150) and the Apostolic Tradition* (written around 215). Every Sunday, Christians gathered for *Mass, during which "the memories of the *apostles (the gospels) and the writings of the *prophets were publicly read, as much as time would permit." After the homily of the presider and a prayer offered on behalf of all the faithful, "some bread and wine with water was brought forward. The one who presided lifted up prayers and thanksgiving to heaven, as much as he could, and all the people responded with the acclamation Amen" (1 Apol. 67). Afterward, the distribution and division of these Eucharistic elements took place, which were also taken by the deacons to those who were absent (1 Apol. 67). One should note that it was the presider's prerogative specifically to improvise the Eucharistic prayer, "as much as he could," holding to a schema supplied by the tradition. Sixty years later, the Apostolic Tradition attests the same freedom; after having presented an example of a Eucharistic prayer, it added this observation: "that the bishop give thanks, as we said above. It is not necessary, therefore, that he say the same words which we have mentioned, as if forcing them to say them by memory . . . but each one should pray according to his ability" (Apost. Trad. 10).

Besides this Sunday *Eucharist, every year the Christians celebrated the feast of Easter: the memory of the passion and the *resurrection of the Lord, but also the birth of a new generation of believers, who received *baptism at the dawn of the Sunday morning of Easter. Baptism was usually conferred on adults, after a long *catechumenate, but it could also happen that adolescents or even babies were baptized along with their parents (ibid. 20-21). For the entire community, the feast of Easter was preceded by two days of *fasting and followed by 50 days of celebration (ibid. 33). The liturgical year did not include other feasts. Every year, however, the community celebrated the anniversary of its martyrs: thereafter would arise the sanctorale. According to the testimony of the Apost. Trad., Christians gathered during the week to pray together, to listen to "instruction from the word" set forth by the deacons, priests or by some itinerant teacher (ibid. 39,41). This liturgical practice corresponded to a situation in which the Christians of Rome consisted of a few communities: they gathered by neighborhood, in one of their homes (domus ecclesiae), and the teaching, as in their worship service, was handled by qualified ministers.

2. Starting from the 4th c., the transformation of the relationship between the empire and the church had numerous repercussions on the liturgy. From the time of *Constantine, large basilicas were built (the Lateran, St. Peter's at the Vatican, St. Paul Outside the Walls) and other churches, which received an ever-increasing number of Christians. The Eucharist was, therefore, no longer celebrated in the domestic context of a home but inside the sacred context of the church; Christians no longer gathered around a table, but around an altar, which emphasized the sacrificial character of the Mass; the importance of the assembly necessitated greater organization; the increased number of ministers hastily trained made necessary the publication of booklets for preaching and worship. They thus passed from an oral liturgy to a written one, from a flexible to an established liturgy.

The collections of *prayers (sacramentari) and *homilies (*homiliaries) were written in Latin, because between 360 and 380 the church of Rome ceased to celebrate the liturgy in Greek, a language that many of the faithful no longer understood. This was done in order to adapt to the popular language of the day: Latin.

The Roman Canon of the Mass, which has been used even to our own time, dates back to the pontificate of St. *Damasus (366–384); it insisted heavily on the sacrificial character of the Mass, the presentation of the offerings by the priest and the assembly and God's acceptance of these sacrificial offerings.

From the 4th to the 6th c., numerous formularies were composed at Rome for the Mass and the *sacraments, which had first been gathered into anonymous libelli and then into *sacramentaries attributed to the popes, who were not their actual authors, but these literary works had an important role in the development of the Roman liturgy. One should mention the Leonine Sacramentary, which was compiled in the 6th c. (generally called the "Sacramentary of Verona," because it was transmitted by a manuscript from that city), the Gelasian Sacramentary, which was compiled at the end of the 7th c., which gathered formularies used in the titular churches (tituli) or the parishes of Rome; the Gregorian Sacramentary, which had as its basis the personal sacramentary used by Pope Gregory the Great (590–604), but was later enlarged and imposed by Charlemagne on the entire Western empire.

The 6th and the 7th c. likewise witnessed the composition of lectionaries for the Mass, epistolaries, evangelaries and comes (*books with specified references for reading), books of *chants for the Mass and Office: antiphonals, and lastly, directions for the celebration of the Mass, baptism and *ordination, the reconciliation of penitents, funerals: ordines romani.

With respect to the sacraments, the ecclesial and social evolution likewise caused some of the more or less rapid transformations. Candidates for baptism in the 4th and 5th c. were still primarily adults coming from *paganism: they prepared themselves at the beginning through a catechumenate of three years, which was completed by a period of more intense doctrinal and liturgical preparation during Lent that preceded their baptism. At the end of the 5th c., the situation changed because of the virtually complete Christianization of Roman society: by then the catechumens came from every walk of life, so that the preparation for their baptism was reduced to the scrutinies and rites of Lent. The baptism of adults became uncommon, and the baptism of babies became the norm; they were the children of Christian parents: the catechumenate had no reason to exist and the rites of initiation and baptism were simplified and adapted, for better or for worse, to the condition of the candidates, who were incapable of professing their faith. Nevertheless, Rome resisted this transformation of the baptismal rite more than other churches: only in 726, at the time of Pope *Gregory II, does one find a substitution of the traditional threefold question "Credis in Deum . . ." with the formula "Ego te baptizo . . ." that was pronounced by the priest (Ep. 15 ad Bonifacium 8: PL 89, 929).

The sacrament of *penance or reconciliation was closely connected to baptism, which antiquity considered a second baptism. At Rome, as elsewhere, penance was given only once in a lifetime. From the 4th to the 6th c., the Roman Church lived with a penitential legislation whose severity was justified at the time of the *persecutions, but no longer corresponded to the situation of a large and moderately fervent community. Christians guilty of grievous sins tended to delay to the last moment their request for reconciliation. To obtain it, they had to confess their faults to the bishop, then enter the ordo poenitentium; on Sunday, they attended Mass, but did not partake of the Eucharist; they were reintegrated during the public rite of reconciliation, which, from the 4th c., was celebrated on Holy Saturday to admit them to Easter communion (see Sacram. Gelas. 352-363).

Rites for the death and burial of Christians were precisely presecribed in the Ordo romanus 49 (ed. Andrieu IV, 523-530), which dates to the end of the 7th c. The Christian transitus is presented as a Paschal exodus, an entrance into the promised land with the welcome of angels and saints.

The Roman liturgy was therefore formed roughly between 350 and 680: Popes Leo I, Gelasius I and Gregory I were its inspirers and chief organizers. In its totality, this liturgy left great space for the word, biblical readings, *psalms, prayers and prefaces. The language of prayer united Roman sobriety with a controlled, but rich, lyricism. Chant occupied an important place in the Eucharistic celebrations, but musical instruments were not permitted. The gestural and symbolic language was also very discreet: the attitudes of prayer, the gestures of offering or the *laying on of hands, the processions were characterized by a sobriety, which could not have been preserved when, in Charlemagne's time, the Roman liturgy was widespread and imposed on the entire Western world: there then emerged a Romano-Frankish liturgy, which we have inherited.

Sources: Justin, Apol. I, II: PG 6, 327-470; Apost. Trad. (ed. and Fr. trans.): SC 11 bis, Paris 1968; Sacram. Veronense, ed. L.C. Mohlberg, Rome 1966; Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Ecclesiae – Sacram. Gelas., ed. L.C. Mohlberg, Rome ²1968; Le Sacramentaire Grégorien, ed. J. Deshusses, Fribourg 1971–1982; Les ordines romani du haut moyen âge, 5 vols., ed. M. Andrieu, Louvain 1931–1961.

Studies: T. Klauser, Das römische Capitulare evangeliorum, Liturgiewissenschaftliche Quellen und Forschungen 28, Münster 1935; E. Bourque, Études sur les sacramentaires romains, I, Rome 1949; A. Chavasse, Les plus anciens types du lectionnaire et de l'antiphonaire romains de la messe: RBen 62 (1952) 3-94; E. Dekkers, Autour de l'oeuvre liturgique de S. Léon le Grand: SE 10 (1958) 363-398; A. Chavasse, Le Sacramentaire gélasien, Tournai 1958; J.M. Hanssens, La liturgie d'Hippolyte, OCA 155, Rome 1959; G. Pomarès, Gélase Ier. Lettre contre les Lupercales et dix-huit messes du Sacramentaire léonien, SC 65, Paris 1959 (intro.); H. Ashworth, The Liturgical Prayer of Gregory the Great: Traditio 15 (1959) 107-161; J.A. Jungmann, La liturgie des premiers siècles, Paris 1962; K. Gamber, Codices liturgici latini antiquiores. I-II, Fribourg 1968; E. Cattaneo, Introduzione alla storia della liturgia occidentale, Rome ²1969; Quasten I, 177-180, 190-194 (studies and bibl. on the Apologies of St. Justin); 437-448 (studies and bibl. on the Trad. Apost.); A. Nocent, Storia dei libri liturgici romani: Anamnesis II, Turin 1978, 147-165; A. Chavasse, La liturgie de la ville de Rome du Ve au VIIIe siècle (SA 112), Rome 1993.

Ph. Rouillard

ROTHARI. King of the *Longobards (636–652). He distinguished himself by restoring his people, who were being torn to pieces by the internal wars of the dukes, and by continuing the war against the Greeks. Under the governance of Rothari, the Longobards extended their conquest to the demise of *Byzantine territories. Rothari's most significant feat was a promulgation of the edict (643) that bore his name, the foundation of subsequent Longobard legislation. The legal material, which was transmitted until that time in oral form, was substantially Germanic. In an ungrammatical Latin construction, the edict is subdivided into 388 chapters not always arranged according to a recognizable order; it has similar characteristics to those of other barbarian leges, as a written redaction of the ancient laws of the people drawn through various inquiries posed to the elders. They treat primarily the suppression of crimes against the state, the safety of persons and things, hereditary law, family law, existing rights, obligatory rights, responsibilities toward servants, damages and obligations.

CPL 1808; N. Tamassia, Le fonti dell'Editto di Rotari, Pisa 1889, now in Scritti di storia giuridica, II, Padova 1967, 181-260; Fr. Beyerle, Die Gesetze der Langobarden, Witzenhausen 1962; A. Cavanna, Nuovi problemi intorno alle fonti dell'Editto di Rotari: SDHI 34 (1968) 269-361; B. Paradisi, Il prologo e l'epilogo dell'Editto di Rotari, ibid., 1-31; C.G. Mor, Il diritto romano nel sistema giuridico longobardo del secolo VIII: RAL 27 (1973) 1-16; P. Delogu - A. Giullou - G. Ortalli, Longobardi e Bizantini, in Storia d'Italia, ed. P. Delogu, Turin 1980; Langobardia, ed. S Gasparri, Testi di P. Cammarosano, Udine 1990; N. Christie, The Lombards: The Ancient Longobards, Oxford 1995; B. Luiselli, La formazione della cultura europea occidentale, Rome 2002.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

RUFINUS (Friend of Prosper of Aquitaine) (d. after 429). Information about Rufinus exists only in a *letter by Prosper of Aquitaine Ad Rufinum de gratia et libero arbitrio (PL 51, 77-79; 45, 1793-1802). From this document one learns that, having come to the knowledge that some people, enemies of the Augustinian doctrine of *grace, also accused his friend Prosper of having fallen into heresy, Rufinus sent him a letter. Prosper responded by explaining and defending Augustinian thought and refuting the *Pelagian theses: this response seems to have been written around 429, because it considers *Augustine as still alive, but in the last phase of his life.

CPL 516; DCB 4, 562; F. Vinel, Une étape vers l'affirmation du salut universel. Prosper d'Aquitaine. Lettre à Rufin sur la grâce et le libre arbitre. Introduction et traduction: RHE 90 (1995) 367-395.

A. Pollastri

RUFINUS FLAVIUS (ca. 335–395). The information on Rufinus Flavius contained in the writings of *Ambrose (Ep. 52,1), *Symmachus (Ep. III, 81-91), *Jerome (Ep. 60,16), *Zosimus (Hist. nova IV, 57,4; V, 1,1.3) and *Theodoret (HE V, 18,6-12) makes him out to be a famous person of great learning. According to Jerome and Theodoret, Rufinus Flavius was astute, cruel, politically capable and especially a persecutor of heretics. A native of southern *Gaul, where he was born around 335, he was able to utilize his abilities with trickery and politics first under *Theodosius then *Arcadius. At first, with Theodosius, he was head of the imperial house; he became consul in 392, and he was shortly thereafter prefect of the praetorian for the East, a post he held also under Arcadius until 395. According to Theodoret, whose narration, however, leaves a few quandaries, Rufinus Flavius was responsible for the massacre at *Thessalonica. Rufinus was then commissioned to try to persuade Ambrose to rescind the condemnation leveled against Theodosius. After the death of Theodosius, the rivalry between *Stilicho and Rufinus Flavius resulted in the latter's death at *Constantinople in 395.

A. de Broglie, L'Église et l'Empire romain au IV^e siècle, 3^e p.: Valentinien et Théodose, 2 vols., Paris 1869; G. Rauschen, Jährbucher der christlichen Kirche unter dem Kaiser Theodosius dem Grossen, Freiburg i. Br. 1897, 439ff.; J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire romain, Paris 1933; PLRE 1, 778-781; E. Potz, Claudians in Rufinum. Invektive und Laudatio: Philologus 134 (1990) 66-81; K. Fitschen, Der Praefectus Praetorio Flavius Rufinus. Ein hoher Reichsbeamter als Gestalt der Kirchengeschichte zur Zeit der "Theodosianischen Wende": ZAC 5 (2001) 86-103.

M.G. Mara

RUFINUS of Aquileia (345–410). Tyrannius Rufinus, student of letters at *Rome around 368, friend of *Jerome, he took part with him in an *ascetic group, which in the years around 370, tried to recreate in his home town of Concordia the monastic and intellectual life of the East. After a long stay in *Egypt (373–380), where he also visited *Didymus, he saw *Melania at the monastery of the Mount of Olives, at *Jerusalem, which was closely tied to Bishop *John II and *Origenist circles (*Palladius, *Evagrius). After the painful controversies with Jerome on the translation of *Origen's writings (and on that of the *Bible from the Hebrew or the Septuagint), he reentered the West in 397, and was persecuted, at Rome, then at *Aquileia, due to the animosity of his old friend. He escaped from the *Goths during the invasion of *Italy and went to die in *Sicily. He was the friend and confidant of leading individuals in Christian Italy. His work, though modest, consisted primarily of translation into Latin, and he preserved for us the chief part of what remains of Origen's works. His goal was not to preserve Eastern texts that were unfortunately lost but to enlighten the Latin world that was suffering from an immense cultural lag with respect to the East; his translations were not designed to preserve the detail of the original, but rather to be useful to 4th-c. readers. He had more piety than critical sense. His original work (esp. the prefaces to his translations) were published in CCL 20.

His first translation was that of *Basil's Asceticon (397). In 398, he published Origen's On First Principles, which started a controversy. Rufinus then translated or summarized the Apology for Origen by the martyr *Pamphilus and *Eusebius of Caesarea; he defended himself before Pope *Anastasius with a personal Apology consisting of four pages. Then he was supposed to publish two books against Jerome, but he refused to pursue this controversy. He devoted himself to translating Origen's wonderful homilies on *Genesis, *Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, the *Song of Songs and the Epistle to the Romans; various homilies by Basil and *Gregory of Nazianzus; the ascetic sentences of *Evagrius and *Sextus (the Pythagorean, whom he mixed up with Pope *Sixtus); the Dialogue of *Adamantius, confused with Origen; Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia ecclesiastica, which was extended to the death of Emperor *Theodosius the Great; the Historia monachorum in Aegypto; the ps.-*Clementine Recognitiones. Two short and more personal compositions, a Commentary on the Apostles' Creed and the Blessings of the Patriarchs, were also inspired by Eastern models.

His work made a decisive contribution to the biblical and nonbiblical culture of the Latin Middle Ages.

CPL 195-198; PL 21; CCL 20 (1961); Patrologia III, 234-240; F.X. Murphy. Rufinus of Aquileia, Washington, DC 1945; C.P. Hammond, The Last Ten Years of Rufinus' Life: JTS 28 (1977) 372-429; For an extensive bibliography, see H.R. Drobner, Rufinus, Tyrannius: BBKL 8, 959-972; G. Fedalto, Rufino di Concordia (345 c.–410/411). Tra Oriente e Occidente, Rome 1990; Rufino di Concordia, Storia di monaci, ed. G. Trettel, Rome 1991; Rufino di Concordia, Storia della chiesa, ed. L. Dattrino, Rome 1986; Rufino di Concordia, Le benedizioni dei patriarchi, ed. M. Veronese, Rome 1995; G. Fedalto, Rufino di Concordia tra Oriente e Occidente, Rome 2005.

J. Gribomont

RUFINUS the Syrian (d. after 415). We know of a Rufinus, disciple of *Jerome, priest of his monastery at *Bethlehem, who was sent to *Rome in 399 to carry letters 81 and 84 and Jerome's translation of *Origen's On First Principles (Ep. 81,2; Contra Ruf. 3,24). According to B. Fischer (in K. Aland, Die alten Übersetzungen des NT, Berlin 1972, 73) and the editors of the Vetus Latina Institute Beuron, Rufinus corrected the Latin translation of *Paul's epistles and the remainder of the NT in the text that became the Vulgate. This Rufinus is identified by many scholars as Rufinus the Syrian, who, according to *Marius Mercator (ACO I, V, 5), introduced *Pelagian ideas at Rome during the time of Pope *Anastasius I (399–402) and whose teaching was promulgated by *Celestius and *Pelagius. At *Carthage, in 411, Celestius mentioned a Rufinus, whom he had heard at Rome in the home of *Pammachius (d. ca. 410), as the source of his teaching (*Augustine, De gratia Chr. 2,3,3). The Liber de fide (so named by the the first editor Sirmond on the basis of its explicit in the MSS attributed to Rufinus of *Palestine) in which one finds a defense of Pelagian ideas should be considered his work. The Liber reveals a familiarity with Greek theological texts (esp. those of the Cappadocians) and, with respect to *anthropology, the school of *Antioch. Moreover, a Libellus de fide containing twelve *anathemas is also at times attributed to the same Rufinus.

CPL 199-200; PL 21, 1123-1154; PL 48, 451-491; DSp 12, 2890-2891; M.W. Miller, Rufini presbyteri Liber de Fide, Washington, DC 1964; The Libellus: PL 21, 1123-1124; PL 48, 239-254; ACO I, V, 4-5; B. Altaner, Der Liber de fide, ein Werk des Pelagianers Rufinus des "Syrers": ThQ 130 (1950) 432-449 (= TU 83, 467-482); F. Refoulé, Datation du premier concile de Carthage contre les Pélagiens et du libellus fidei de Rufin: REAug 10 (1963) 41-49; H.I. Marrou, Les attaches orientales du Pélagianisme: CRAI (1968) 459-472; G. Bonner, Rufinus of Syria and African Pelagianism: August. Studies 1 (1970) 31-47; E. TeSelle, Rufinus the Syrian, Caelestius . . . : ibid. 3 (1972) 61-95; W. Dunphy, Rufinus the Syrian's "Books": Augustinianum 23 (1983) 523-529; L.J. van der Lof, The Man in the Shadow Behind Pelagius: SP 15, 247-254; W. Dunphy, Marius Mercator on Rufinus the Syrian. Was Schwartz Mistaken? Augustinianum 32 (1992) 279-288; Id., The Lost Manuscript of Pseudo-Rufinus "De fide": Augustinianum 40 (2000) 89-103; Id., An Unlisted Profession of Faith. (Pseudo-Rufinus, "De Fide"): SE 39 (2000) 37-53.

J. Gribomont

RUFUS of Octodurum. Bishop of Octodurum (today Martigny, in Switzerland), who died probably before 565. At Orléans, he took part at the council of 541 and at the one called by Childebert I in 549, which saw the reunion of more than 50 bishops and delegates from various cities, among whom was *Nicetius of Trier. A certain Rufus wrote him a letter, included in the Austrian collection (Ep. 21), which Gundlach dates to the time of Chlothar I (ca. 550).

In this letter, the writer confirms that he sent Italian artifices requested by Nicetius (whom Rufus addressed by referring to him as dominus semper meus and meus peculiaris dominus), probably for the reconstruction of the churches of Trier and the building of a castle on the Moselle River (see Ven. Fort., Carm. 3,11 and 3,12). Rufus, who refers to himself as an episcopus in the superscriptio of the letter, addresses Nicetius with a tone altogether affectionate and humble, an implicit recognition of a devoted friendship, witnessed to, in the same epistolary context, by the memory of peaceful moments of mutual sharing. In the letter, other individuals are also named: the priest Amabilis, frater meus, and the deacons Sunnoveus and Catellion, conservi mei.

Duchesne and Gundlach identified the sender of the letter with Rufus, bishop of Turin, who was mentioned by *Gregory of Tours (Glor. mart. 13), although Lanzoni and Kentenich—followed by Malaspina—proposed that he should be identified with the bishop of Octodurum.

CPL 1065; CCL 117 (1957) 439-440 [Rufus Octodurensis] = MGH, Epistolae, III, ed. W. Gundlach, Berlin 1892, 133-134 [Rufus Taurinensis]; Concilia Galliae. A. 511 – A. 695, ed. C. de Clercq, CCL 148 A (1963), 143 and 158; Il Liber epistolarum della cancelleria austrasica (sec. V-VI), ed. E. Malaspina, Rome 2001, 139-141 (text and trans.) and 266-267 (notes). F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, II, Faenza 1927, 1048; G. Kentenich, Der Kult der Thebäer am Niederrhein. Ein Beitrag zur Heiligengeographie: Rheinische Vierteljahrsblätter 8 (1931) 339-350; N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle. La province romaine de Première Belgique entre Antiquité et Moyen-Âge (III^e^-VIII^e^ siècles), Paris 1980, 172-207; E. Ewig, The Merowinger und das Imperium, Opladen 1990; Patrologia IV, 301-302 (Y. Hen); I.W. Wood, Administration, Law and Culture in Merovingian Gaul, in The Uses of Literacy in Early Medieval Europe, ed. R. McKitterick, Cambridge 1990, 63-81.

B. Clausi

RUFUS of Shotep (6th–7th c.). An author of various *commentaries on the NT in *Coptic, who lived between the end of the 6th c. and the beginning of the 7th c. From the few sources on his life, one concludes that after a period of living as a monk and after having undertaken a *pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he was consecrated as bishop of Shotep (Hypsele, city of Upper Egypt, 7 km [4.3 mi] SE of Lycopolis-Siout) by the Patriarch *Damian (578–604). He was the driving force of a significant literary renaissance in the Coptic Church, in which he was also one of the most eminent figures. Fragments from four codices containing a commentary on the gospel of *Matthew and one on the gospel of *Luke have survived. The texts were published by M. Sheridan, and even in their rather fragmentary state, they bear witness to us of his vast theological learning for his time and made their author a worthy example in the Alexandrian exegetical tradition. The exegesis is of course allegorical, although that does not rule out the author's philological attention to the text. Rufus insisted on the harmony of the OT and the NT in the context of the *economy of salvation; here and there he inserted controversies with heretical teachings (there are a significant number of references to *Marcion and *Manicheism); but his interest was focused primarily on the moral teaching of *Scripture, which was directed to a diverse public, but esp. to a monastic audience.

G. Garitte, Rufus évêque de Shotep et ses commentaires des Évangiles: Muséon 69 (1956) 11-33; J.M. Sheridan, Rufus of Shotep, Homilies on the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. Introduction, Text, Translation, Commentary, Rome 1998.

T. Orlandi

RUFUS of Thessalonica. Bishop of Thessalonica, who in 412 was appointed the vicar of Pope *Innocent in the provinces of Illyricum (*Achaia, *Thessaly, Old *Epirus, New Epirus, *Crete, Mediterranean *Dacia, Dacia Ripensis, *Moesia and Dardania Prevalitana). Always maintaining a close connection to the church of *Rome, during his episcopate Rufus first turned to Innocent concerning a series of disciplinary questions (Innocent, Ep. 17: PL 20, 526-537) and with regard to the case of the two bishops Bubalius and Taurianus, who had recourse to Rome after being pronounced guilty by the Macedonian bishops of Illyricum (Innocent, Ep. 18: PL 20, 538-539). Rufus then cited Pope *Boniface concerning the election of *Perigenes at Corinth (Boniface, Ep. 4: PL 20, 760-761).

Having become involved in the doctrinal controversies of the 5th c. (*Cyril of Alexandria, Ep. 42 and 43: PG 77, 221-224) after the Council of *Ephesus (431), Rufus received from Pope *Celestine (Ep. 12: PL 50, 465-470) information about the condemnation of *Nestorius, and during the time of the Council of *Chalcedon (451) the Eastern Fathers wrote to him to make known their adherence to the faith of the Council of *Nicaea (*Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Ep. 170: PG 83, 1476-1481).

CPG 5342-5343, 6319, 8641; DCB IV, 562; Storia della Chiesa, ed. P. De Labriolle - G. Bardy - L. Bréhier - G. De Plinval, IV, Turin 1972, 216, 232-233, 236, 306-307, 319-320.

P. Marone

RULES, MONASTIC. The rule, that is, the constitutional document of a given religious order, is an idea that was born in the West, among jurists and the curia of the 12th c. as a result of a long evolution. In the first centuries, the virgins that were inscribed on the lists (canon) of the local church—and who received subsidies and collaborated in its *liturgy and works of charity—were naturally subject to a certain unwritten discipline. Even male ascetics, who were more free because they were not dependent upon subsidies, had to render an account to the bishops for their activity. When the documents of the period sought to justify the *traditions of the church, they generally referred to the authority of the *apostles; this ps.-*apostolicity expressed an immemorial custom.

When *monasticism appeared, during the era in which the Constantinian church was secularizing and lowering its moral standards, contrasts and the distortions were not rare. The best monks served as models; when *Athanasius wrote the Life of Anthony (d. 356) he understood well on which points it was necessary to insist and proposed a rule of life for all, without naturally obligating anyone to reproduce *Anthony's miracles nor even the feats of the saint's austerity. It was the *cenobitic communities who imposed on themselves a certain number of conditions so that *prayer, *asceticism and work would be carried out in harmony, taking certain measures in the meantime against the possible abuses of power by the strongest: episcopal authority did not intervene here except for a tacit nihil obstat. *Pachomius's Precepts, perhaps written after his death (347) to maintain the customs that he began, based upon experience and not at all upon a theoretical system, tended to preserve the canon of the early church; these were so well conceived that, through *Jerome's translation, they exercised a great influence on the West. They willingly used the standard of right measure, but even more, that of the common good. In the Cappadocian context, where a revolutionary and social movement came up against a court episcopate, *Basil was able to impose mediation thanks to his Moral Rules (ὅροι), taken literally from the NT, that define God's will over all his disciples of the gospel. The commentary on these rules, the Asceticon, responded to the brothers' questions and came down to the concrete particular; it is that which, in a more evolved perspective, the Latins called the Instituta (*Rufinus) or Regula (*Benedict). All of these documents were translated into Latin (and other languages) and were foundational for the insertion of monasticism into the episcopal church.

In the East, councils and emperors slowly established some canons and laws to remedy abuses as well as for disciplining the monastic movement's relationships to the world. With respect to the internal life of the monasteries, the Typica, written by the founders, specified their demands toward the beneficiaries of their donations. But the essential thing remained the living tradition, the example the saints, especially in the case of the solitaries, who were often the most characteristic phenomenon. In the West, in addition to Basil's Rule (translated in 397) and that of Pachomius (translated in 404), and *John Cassian's Institutions (416–424)—a long text that refers to the (pseudo-)Egyptian traditions, not to mention the Life of Martin to bring about the reform of the monks of *Gaul—one must note, around the year 397, the libellus (the title "Rule" is late) that St. *Augustine gave to the (lay) African monks and which is founded on a brief earlier document known as the ordo monasterii, written perhaps by *Alypius. This would subsequently become the basis of the canonical life, organically integrated into the worship of the basilicas and the pastoral ministry, according to a typical tendency of the West, which is also found, mutatis mutandis, in its monastic communities.

The Rule of the Four Fathers belongs to a second generation, which one should situate probably at *Lérins, around the years 400–410; a second Rule of the Fathers, at Lérins, around 427 (?), brings completion to the first, and both left traces in subsequent texts. Likewise in S Gaul, before the year 500, the Eastern rule and that of *Macarius appeared; in 534 that of *Caesarius of *Arles for virgins and, along the same lines, another of the same author for monks; around 550 the two Aurelians' Rules. The tradition that arose from the Rule written by Caesarius of Arles bore a heavy Augustinian stamp. In the meantime, in Italy the Regula magistri (written before 530) claimed its charismatic authority. The cento rule written by *Eugippius, at Lucullanum (near *Naples) around the year 530, reused Augustine, the Regula magistri, Basil, etc. Around the year 550, at Montecassino, the Rule of St. Benedict preserved the doctrinal part of the Regula magistri (summarized and adapted to the needs of the Church of *Rome), but it adjusted the practices for some of the most important and hard-working monasteries.

The third Rule of the Fathers, which was written by Tarnant and St. Ferreolus, dates back to the second half of the 6th c.; in Italy we have that of Paul and Stephen. From *Ireland, the Regula monachorum and the Regola coenobialis of St. *Colombanus's (d. 615;) came to Gaul; in *Spain, in addition to the (lost) rule of John of Biclaro, we know of Leander of Seville's De institutione virginum, the Rules of *Isidore and *Fructuosus, the Regula communis, The Pact of St. Fructuosus and the Consensoria monachorum. But the Rule of St. Benedict, due to the strength inherent in its understanding of moderation and St. *Gregory the Great's recommendations of it, was adopted in Gaul and England, at first under a mixed form (with St. Columbanus's Rule), then by itself. All these texts, which have much in common, demonstrate that each leader patterned his own rule according to his own circumstances (even if he adopted, without modification, a document that was composed elsewhere). Only during the Carolingian period would the imperial authority (or that of the synods of abbots that depended upon it) see in the Rule (Benedict's or, for the canons, that of Chrode-gang) a precise law, the monitoring of which the appropriate visitors enforced.

CPL 1838-1876; PL 103; DIP 7, 1410-1617; A. de Vogüé, La Règle du Maître, 3 vols., Paris 1964-65; Id., La Règle de s. Benoît, 7 vols., Paris 1972-77; G. Turbessi, Regole monastiche antiche, Rome 1974; V. Desprez, Règles monastiques d'Occident, Bellefontaine 1980; Id., Les Règles des saints Pères, 2 vols., Paris 1982; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, Paris 1991–2006; Id., Le regole monastiche antiche, Salerno 1995; M. Bozzi - A. Grilli, La Regola del Maestro, 2 vols., Brescia 1995; J. Thomas - A.C. Hero, Byzantine Monastic Foundation Documents. A Complete Translation of the Surviving Founders' Typika and Testaments, 5 vols., Washington, DC 2001; Regole monastiche d'Occidente, ed. E. Bianchi, Turin 2004.

J. Gribomont

RUNIC. From the ancient Nordic term runar, "writing (secret)," the plural of run, Gothic runa, "mystery, secret." Special graphic characters from the Germanic world that made their appearance among the Scythian Goths on the Black Sea around AD 300, reaching their maximum circulation in the Scandinavian countries between the end of antiquity and the beginning of the Middle Ages (400–1100). Finally, the use of Runic remained in vogue in an isolated region of the Swedish countryside until at the end of the 19th c. the letters of this language were transformed, supplanted by the progressive establishment of the Latin alphabet. The word runic, which was closely connected to the ideas of "secret" and "mystery," alluded both to the silent characteristic of communication (writing in itself), and the magic use that was made of it (as *Tacitus observed in Germania; priests, tribal heads or the paterfamilias practiced divination by reading the pattern on pieces of wood, upon which were inscribed runes, randomly scattered on a white sheet).

The runic alphabet also called "futhark," from the sequence of the first six letters that constitute it (Fehu, Ur, Thurs, Ansuz, Raido and Ken), was the alphabet used by the ancient Germanic peoples such as the Angli and the Juti. The runic alphabet "futhark" was initially formed by 24 individual characters called "runes." We know of the subsequent developments of futhark, which were differentiated by the number and form of the runes. The straight-oline composition of the individual runes is due to the fact that the marks were often made upon stone, wood and hard surfaces.

The Germanic runes probably derived from a script belonging to the group of the five primary varieties of the Northern Italian alphabet, which derived from the Etruscan alphabet. This alphabet is known only through some inscriptions that were discovered in the Alpine and Prealpine area. Similar scripts were used for Lepontic, Rhaetic and Venetic.

The most ancient runic documents had their origin from the areas to the S of the Scandinavian territory, the fruit of a civilization that was pushed from more S regions toward N Europe around the beginning of the Christian era. Runic inscriptions discovered in Romania, Volhynia and Brandenburg testify to the presence that this civilization left in history. It seems that the Goths were the ones to bring the runic script into Scandinavia around the 3rd c. After 380, the runes appeared in Denmark and in S Norway. Historians documented numerous examples of this script from the entire 4th c., and then, after 500, from Denmark it went to the W Germanic lands and England, at least according to the archaeological attestations as well as the forms of the runes themselves. There are about 20 German inscriptions spread out in a territory from Westphalia in the N to Switzerland in the S, from Burgundy in the W to Hungary in the E. At the beginning of the 20th c., an isolated graffito was found in Bosnia. They are usually very brief and generally contain the names of individuals; for the most part they are inscribed on belt buckles. Among the Germanic peoples, however, it seems that the runes fell into disuse as early as the 7th c. The continental runes corresponded to the Danish runes of the 6th c. with respect to number, form and phonetic value, and they also presupposed the slight transformation into external forms of certain signs that previously took place in Denmark. One can say the same thing with respect to the English runes from the quantity of the inscriptions that we know of; they had a much wider use than the German runes. In England, in fact, runic inscriptions not only characterized ornaments, arms and other mobile objects, but they were also inscribed on stone, and inscriptions of noteworthy dimensions have even survived to our day. Moreover, the Anglo-Saxon runic alphabet was adapted to the local language with a subsequent increase in the number of characters to the point that in order to find something similar we have to return to N Scandinavia, at a much later historical period. The result of this adaptation was the transference of the runic alphabet from 28 signs to 33, which indicates the phonetic richness of the Anglo-Saxon language. Such English runes were used until AD 1000.

From the script which Ulfilas used to write his translation of the *Bible, some have concluded that he knew the runes, and from these, in addition to the Greek alphabet, he derived his new signs. If, however, one examines the sole three possible sources of the runic script, it seems that one must conclude that for historical reasons the Greek alphabet must be eliminated, although it is impossible not to put some runes in relation to the Latin alphabet, but this alphabet is insufficient to explain everything. A heavily Latinized sub-Alpine alphabet would probably appear as the ideal prototype, but unfortunately it has not yet been found: one can only say that some scholars, comparing the runes with the form of the N Italian inscriptions from the Alpine territory (4th and 1st c. BC), have noted that around twenty characters have a perfect correspondence in that graphic system; nevertheless, for the remaining four runes it is not possible to find the source in any other graphic system of S Europe. The bivalence of each sign is characteristic of the runic script. This sign can be used with a phonetic or rather ideographic value, at times for the same inscription. Therefore, documented since the 9th c., each rune has its own name, whose initial letter (for the rune that equals z, the last letter) indicates the phonetic value although the meaning is the ideographic value. For example, the rune that carries a semantic value of o has the ideographic value of "possession, patrimony," which is precisely the meaning of its name odal.

Like the prerunic symbols, the runes were at first used not as a means of communication but as an instrument of worship and, as Tacitus says, of prophecy. And certainly the so-called magia runica (runic magic) constitutes the most characteristic and highest aspect of the magical practices of the N Germans. An Eddic poem recounts that the god Freir fell in love with a young giant girl, Gerdhr, and sent her the messenger Skirnir who, when faced with Gerdhr's resistance, threatened to use runic magic; this shows that the runes were believed to possess magical powers. Once erased, their effect instantaneously ceased. One day Egil Skallagrimsson visited a sick girl; in order to heal her he inscribed runes. They were poorly applied and thus aggravated the illness. Egil erased them, tossed them into the fire and etched them in again, but this time placing them under the sick girl's pillow. This time the runes brought about her healing. (See the Eddic Poem of Sigurd.) Each sign of the runic alphabet had a special value and thus generated the various combinations of runes.

Nordisk Kultur, VI, Rune, ed. O. v. Friesen, Stoccolma, Oslo, Copenaghen 1933; M. Meli, Alemannia runica. Rune e cultura nell'Alto Medioevo, Verona 1988; M. Polia, Le Rune e gli dèi del nord, Rimini 1999.

L. Montecchio

RUPERT of Salzburg (d. after 716). Born near Worms, he belonged to the family of the Robertini, who were Franko-Rhenish counts, and was related to the Carolingians. Rupert was perhaps the bishop of Worms. After being trained in the missionary methods of the Irish, he set out to evangelize, according to legend, Ratisbon and Lorsch, and with certainty, Salzburg. He arrived in the area of Salzach not after 696 and founded the Abbey of St. *Peter (the oldest in Austria) in the ancient Roman city Iuvavum, and another abbey, for women, at Nonnberg, where his niece Erentrude was the abbess. Theodbertus, son of and coregent with Theodo, the Bavarian Duke of the Agilolfings, gave him the city as a gift, and this assured him a stable basis from which he could depart for his missions. Rupert was a reformer of the Christian church that existed on the border with the Slavs and the Avars. The establishment of Seekirchen (Wallersee) and Maximilianszelle (Bischofshofen of Pongau) remain as a testimony to his missionary activity. He died around 27 March after 716 at Worms. His cult began with the translation of his relics to the new cathedral of Salzburg by his successor Virgil (24 September 774), who ordered that the first Life of Rupert be written, which has been substantially preserved in the 9th-c. Gesta Hrodberti (BHL 7390).

BHL 7390-7403; BS 11, 506-508; LCI 8, 293-294; J. Jahn, Ducatus Baiuvariorum, Stuttgart 1991, 48-97; H. Wolfram, Österreichische Geschichte 378–907, Vienna 1995, 105-110; P. Eder (ed.), Hl. Rupert von Salzburg 696–1996, Salzburg 1996.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

RURICIUS of Limoges (5th–6th c.). Of a high family position and the friend of *Sidonius and *Faustus of Riez but a bit younger than they, he was active in the 2nd half of the 5th c. and the beginning of the 6th c. Like Sidonius, he spent his adult life in the church. In 485, he was elected bishop of Limoges. From his writings, there remains an important epistolary collection of 80 letters. These writings from his time as a layman treat the usual, generally trivial, topics typical of this literary genre. Nor are such themes lacking in his writings after his entrance into the religious life, but the topics are primarily more engaged with moral and ecclesiological issues and scriptural citations occur more frequently. The form is very elaborate in each set of writings.

CPL 985; PL 58, 57-123; CSEL 21, 351-450; DTC 14, 205-206; H. Hagendahl, La correspondance de Ruricius, Göteborg 1952; R. Demeulenaere, CCL 64 (1985) 311-394; R.W. Mathisen, Epistolography, Literary Circles and Family Ties in Late Roman Gaul, Transactions of the American Philological Association 111 (1981) 95-109; Patrologia IV, 263-264.

M. Simonetti

RUSTICUS, deacon (6th c.). Roman deacon, son of the brother of Pope *Vigilius (ACO VI, 1, 188), whom he accompanied to *Constantinople in 547. Rusticus first accepted then rejected Vigilius's Iudicatum, published at Constantinople 11 April 548, with which the pope condemned the *Three Chapters, although he defended the authority of the four ecumenical councils and especially that of *Chalcedon. Rusticus was excommunicated by his uncle in 550 (PL 69, 51-53; Epistle to Rusticus 41-51; ACO IV, 1, 193-194); for his criticisms of the condemnation of the Three Chapters by the Council of Chalcedon (553), along with others, he was exiled to Thebaid (Victor of Thebaid, Chron. ad annum 553). Here he wrote the Disputatio contra Acephalos and a work in defense of the Three Chapters and against *monophysitism (PL 67, 1167-1254), a work which has come down to us incomplete and corrupted (PL 77, 1167-1170). The work is presented in the form of a dialogue between Rusticus himself (Orthodoxus) and a monophysite (Haereticus), and treats the complex *christological problems on the duality of the nature and the unity of the person. Moreover, the discussion also turned on the divine maternity of Mary, and why she is the Theotokos. He was also acquainted with the teachings of Severus of Antioch. No less important was the terminological discussion. He translated the term hypostasis (which, as he observed, could mean both persona* and substantia) with subsistentia with the meaning of persona, although substantia meant natura (PL 77, 1191). In this regard, he explicitly corrected the definition for the term "person" offered by *Boethius (PL 77, 1196).

After the death of *Justinian (565), Rusticus reentered Constantinople and devoted himself to the revision of the preceding and poor translation of the Councils of *Ephesus and *Chalcedon on the basis of the Greek text; he also added other documents that he translated into Latin, among which was a large portion of *Irenaeus of Tyre's Tragedia (PG 84, 548-814; DCT 7, 2533-2536), written in defense of his friend *Nestorius and himself. These works contained an abundance of details concerning the Council of Ephesus. Rusticus called this group of works the Synodicon (also called the Synodicon casinense; the last word was owed to the location of the manuscript). The work intends to be a defense of the two councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon and the Three Chapters, and it especially intends to demonstrate the orthodoxy of *Theodoret.

CPL 946-947; CPPM 2A, 1540; PL 67, 1167-1254; Mansi 5, 731-1022, cf. 6, 938; 7, 79.118.183; Synodicon: CPG 8611 B 3-4; 8937; ACO I, 3; I, 4; II, 3; Scholia, distinctiones et collationes in Acta Concilii Chalcedonesis: E. Schwartz ACO II, 3, 1-3, in the apparatus (PLS 4, 546-596); ACO I, 4, VIII-XX (on the translations); DTC 14, 371-372; Moricca, III, 2, 1556-1558; CGG 2, 816-822; M. Simonetti, La Disputatio contra acephalos del diacono Rustico: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 259-289; A. Milano, Persona in teologia, Naples 1984, 327-328; 373-374; EPapi 1, 522ff.; LTK³ 8, 1390; U.M. Lamg, Christological Themes in Rusticus Diaconus's Contra Acephalos disputatio: SP 38 (2001) 429-234; R. Spataro, Il contributo del diacono Rustico al dibattito teologico postcalcedonese, Rome 2006; Id., Il diacono Rustico, Rome 2007.

A. Di Berardino

RUSTICUS, poet (5th c.). A. Wilmart (Miscellanea Agostiniani 2, 271-272) has transmitted to us four distichs, with the title Versus Rustici defensoris sancti Augustini. The first of these distichs goes as follows: Ter quinos animo suadente per ardua libros / Augustine trahens nobile condis opus. The allusion to Augustine's treatise De Trinitate is evident. The name of the author, which is almost unknown, has often been confused because other authors had his name such as the poet Rusticus Helpidius, author of the Carmen de Iesu Christi beneficiis and the Tristicha historiarum Testamenti Veteris et Novi (CPL 1506-1507; see W. Baeherens, RhM 31 [1876] 94 n.1). We should not fail to note that a letter of thanks is also attributed to him, sent to *Eucherius of Lyons, and sent along with two of his works; although with respect to the CPPM, it belongs to a Roman deacon who lived after the year 565.

CPL 1506; CPPM 2, 1540; PLS 3, 1163; ICL 16246; 12358; Anthologia latina (ed. Riese) I, 2, p. 264, #785 (a defective edition corrected by Wilmart); (for the Epistola Rustici ad Eucherium: PLS 11, 46-47); S. Cavallin, Le poète Domnulus. Étude prosopographique: SE 7 (1955) 49-66, esp. p. 50 n.2; Patrologia III, 499.

L. Dattrino

RUSTICUS, presbyter. With respect to this little-known person, we possess a letter written to *Eucherius of Lyons to thank him for having sent him a copy of his two books (perhaps Instructionum ad Salonium libri duo or the Formulae). He should probably be identified with the Rusticus to whom *Sidonius Apollinaris wrote (Ep. II, 11). It has also been thought that he was Rusticus of Bordeaux (see Sidon., Ep. VIII, 11,3, vers. 36) or Rusticus the bishop of Narbonne from 427, but this last hypothesis has some problems.

CPL 496; CPL³ 177; PL 58, 489-490; CSEL 31, 198-199; PLS 3, 46-47; C. Wotke, CSEL 31, XXIII-XXIV; Bardenhewer IV, 570-571; Patrologia III, 499; LTK³ 8, 1390.

A. Pollastri

RUSTICUS of Narbonne (d. 26 October 461). Perhaps to be identified with the monk of *Marseille of the same name, an epistolary correspondent of *Jerome (Ep. 125: PL 22, 1072-1085). Although Rusticus lost his father at a young age, he obtained an excellent education from his mother. He then completed his studies at *Rome, where he earned a reputation as a good orator. Wishing to dedicate himself to the contemplative life, he went to *Lérins; in 427 he was consecrated bishop of *Narbonne. He was present at the Council of *Ephesus (431). From 441 to 445, he reconstructed the Cathedral of Narbonne, which had been destroyed by fire; he then built the church of Santa Maria and a basilica in honor of the martyr Felix of Gerona. Against the Gothic *Arians, he fortified the *Catholic faith in his diocese. In 451, he approved Pope *Leo's letter to *Flavian concerning *Nestorianism. One of *Ravennius of Arles's letters ranks him among "the most skilled physicians" to be consulted in a time of crisis (inter Leonis ep. 99). In 458/459, he sent his archdeacon Hermes (then his successor) to pose a series of disciplinary questions to Pope Leo (see PL 54, 1199-1209). The pope encouraged him to remain at his post and to not isolate himself "in silence." He died 26 October 461, the day on which his feast is celebrated. Three of his letters remain: one to Jerome and two others to Pope Leo I.

The Catholic Encyclopedia 13 (1912) 275-276; Vies des SS. 10 (1952) 890-893; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine II, Paris [2]1966, 265-266, H.I. Marrou, Le dossier épigraphique de l'évêque Rusticus de Narbonne: RivAC 3-4 (1970) 331-349; BS 11 (1968) 513-514; J. Michaud - A. Cabanis (eds.), Histoire de Narbonne, Toulouse 1981, 84-86; Martyrologium Romanum (2001 edition), 559; BBKL 23 (2004) 1262.

M. Maritano

S

SABAS (439–532)
I. Abbot, founder of the Great Laura - II. Archaeology.

I. Abbot, founder of the Great Laura. The life of Sabas, written by *Cyril of Scythopolis, allows us to know with some precision this monk who remained famous in the monastic history of *Palestine, although one must keep in mind that Cyril, a Sabaite monk, wrote around the year 550, projecting the convictions of his era upon the history of the movement's origins. Sabas was born in *Cappadocia, in the village of Mutalaska (439), in the diocese of Caesarea. After an initial experience in the nearby *monastery (Flavianae), led by the desire to visit the holy places, he set out for *Palestine. At that time he was 17 years old. At *Jerusalem, Sabas decided to live in the nearby desert the monastic ideal that he had already experienced in his own country. After an attempt in the monastery of Passarion, directed by *Elpidius, he stayed with *Euthymius, the only monk of the area (acc. to the hagiographer), whom he had chosen because of his adherence to the faith of *Chalcedon. From him, acc. to Cyril, Sabas learned the distinction between the celibate life adapted to the novices, directed by *Theoctistus, and the eremitic life adapted to those who are more advanced, a community presided by Euthymius himself. After the death of Euthymius (473), he went to the desert and settled there in a grotto (478), on the left bank of the River Cedron. This was, in fact, the beginning of a foundation called to perform an important role in the development of *monasticism in this region, both on account of the quality of the ascetic life that was led there and the number of monks: it was, moreover, immediately called "the Great Laura."

The severity of the teacher provoked dissatisfaction and protests. Despite the support of the patriarchs of Jerusalem, Sabas encountered numerous difficulties and even exile. Far from his monastery, he established another at Gardara, E of the Lake of Tiberias. Shortly thereafter, however, the patriarch *Elias ordered Sabas to return to direct the Great Laura, around which their continued to emerge other monasteries and lauras. For the governance of his own monastery, Sabas united all the hermits of Palestine. One should also note the activity of the Great Laura in favor of Chalcedonian orthodoxy, during the time of the *Origenist and *monophysite controversies. In 530, following a bloody revolt of the *Samaritans, Sabas, despite his advanced age, did not hesitate—and it was the second time—to go to *Constantinople to petition before the emperor *Justinian the cause of the Christians. Sabas died on Sunday 5 Dec 532. The Byzantine synaxaria commemorate him on that day from an early date, although his memory was introduced in the West in modern times.

Without entering into the history of the Great Laura after the life of Sabas, one should at least mention that in the 8th and 9th c. there came from the monastery a series of monks who remained famous in the Byzantine church for their literary activity (theology, liturgical and ascetic poetry, and the Greek language): *John of Damascus, *Cosmas of Maiuma, Stephen Melodus, Stephen the Thaumaturge, Michael Syncellus, the two Graptos brothers (Theodore and Theophanes), as well as Theodore of Edessa. One should also emphasize that shortly after the Arab invasion, Sabas's Laura very soon became an active center for the translation of Greek texts into Arabic, whose influence extended beyond Palestine to Mount Sinai.

B. Flusin, Miracle et histoire dans l'oeuvre de Cyrille de Scytopolis, Paris 1983; J. Patrich, Sabas, Leader of Palestinian Monasticism, Fourth to Seventh Centuries, Washington, DC 1995; Id. (ed.), The Sabaite Heritage in the Orthodox Church from the Fifth Century to the Present. Monastic Life, Liturgy, Theology, Literature, Art, Archaeology, Leuven 2001; L. Perrone, Il deserto e l'orizzonte della città. Le "Storie monastiche" di Cirillo di Scitopoli, introduction to: Cirillo di Scitopoli, Storie monastiche del deserto di Gerusalemme, ed. R. Balzelli - L. Mortari - L. Perrone (Scritti monastici, 15), Abbazia di Praglia 1990, 9-90; B. Flusin, Saint Sabas: un leader monastique à l'autorité contestée, in Foundations of Power and Conflis of Authoriry in Late-Antique Monasticism, ed. A. Camplani - G. Filoramo, Leuven-Paris-Dudley, MA 2007, 195-216.

J.-M. Sauget - A. Camplani

II. Archaeology. The great reputation that St. Sabas reached even in the West earned it the recognition as an important monastic center at *Rome situated on the lower Aventine Hill. The dedication to the founder of the Great Laura began in the 2nd half of the 8th c. in an already-existing monastery, which was called in the sources Cella Nova and should be similarly traced back to the monastic experience of *Sylvia, the mother of *Gregory the Great. As *John of Damascus in the 9th c. and the Vita Gregorii (I, 9) attest, already during his time there indeed existed a place called the Cella Nova, an oratory dedicated to Sylvia, where she had resided, occupying herself by the daily support of her son, who lived in the nearby monastery of St. Andrew on the ancient Roman street called the Clivus Scauri. The Latin origins of what would become the most famous Eastern *cenobium in Rome are confirmed by the Syriac version of the Life of St. Maximus the Confessor, written in the 2nd half of the 7th c., where it is said that some students from *Nisibis came to Rome, who were probably put to flight by the Arab invasions, and they were entrusted with the monastery of the Cella Nova by Pope *Martin I, who was ignorant of their heretical positions. Initially this did not lead to any change, at least with respect to the naming of the site: a certain Leontius from the monastery of Cella Nova, in fact, participated at the Council of *Constantinople in 680 (Mansi XI,213), although in 768 at the monastery called Cellanovas, he was imprisoned by order of Pope Stephen III, the antipope Constantine (LP I,471). The new dedication supplanted the old at an undetermined date, but it occurred between this last event and 785, when Peter, who was the *abbot of the "monastery of St. Sabas, which had been called Cella Nova," was sent by Pope Hadrian I as a legate to *Constantinople (LP I,511). From this moment onward, the official dedication would remain tied to the name of the famous monk, as attested to by the subsequent documents, among which the life of *Gregory of Agrigento stands out (PG 98,615), edited by *Leontius, hegumen at St. Sabas, which in the past had generated confusion, but whose dating, which had been fixed by that point between the end of the 8th c. and the beginning of the subsequent century, is perfectly compatible with the reconstruction of the phases of the cenobium's life.

The archaeological evidence below the present church, which can be dated to the 2nd half of the 10th or the 12th c., documents the presence of an apse likely belonging to a Late Antique domus; it was this environment that was subsequently adapted for Christian worship, becoming an oratory through the implementation of a few modifications between the end of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th c. Below the floor, then, was a cemetery, progressively modified and expanded over the course of time to meet the demands of the monastic community. The funerary inscriptions preserved there, which can be dated to the 7th c., constitute a further element of confirmation for the reconstruction of the history of the monastery: the most ancient inscriptions, outlined with red lead in Latin, in fact, correspond to the first monastic establishment, followed by Greek epigraphs in charcoal, to be considered in conjunction with the arrival of a Greek-speaking community.

In addition to the succession of the phases of occupation, moreover, it also records the superimposition of frescoes on the walls of the oratory: at the moment of the monastery's institution one can surmise that saints were initially painted on the walls, replaced in the second phase by a christological cycle whose scenes, significantly, bear Greek subtitles; a last layer, finally, marked the return of a Latin monastic Benedictine community. From this phase are preserved, along the curve of the oratory's apse, lower portions of the figures of saints, and near the façade, some clypeate images, although particularly expressive are the fragments detached and exposed in the modern monastery depicting the head of an angel and a group of hooded monks.

R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae IV, Vatican City 1976, 51-68; M. Delle Rose, "Crudis leguminibus pascebatur." Cellae Novae e S. Saba, fonti e riscontri archeologici: RomBarb 9 (1986-87) 65-113; C. La Bella, S. Saba (Le chiese di Rome illustrate, n.s. 35), Rome 2003.

A. Milella

SABBATH. Throughout history the question has continually been posed to the Christian churches (by the Jews, as early as Trypho in his dialogue with *Justin Martyr, Dial. 10,3; and by the Seventh-day Adventists: S. Bacchiocchi, Divine Rest for Human Restlessness, Rome 1980) why they no longer celebrate the sabbath, the sanctification of which is required in the Decalogue and which has played, and still plays, a central role in Jewish tradition. Historically speaking, how did the churches come to abandon the observance of the sabbath?

By healing those with chronic illnesses on the sabbath (Mk 3:1-6 and parallel texts; Lk 13:10-17; Jn

5:2-9) and by his provocative transgressions of the sabbath (Mk 2:23-28 and parallel texts; Jn 5:10-11), Jesus so enraged the Pharisees to convince them that he, by behaving in this manner, was worthy of the death penalty (Mk 3:6 and parallel texts; Jn 5:16-18). Jesus' attitude, therefore, was not only an expression of his philanthropy, but even an indirect indication of his messiahship (Mk 2:28 and parallel texts): with his coming, the definitive sabbath had arrived (Lk 4:16-21), inasmuch as he offered people not only physical healing but also the "sabbath of the heart," the forgiveness of *sins (Mt 11:28-30). Initially the first Christians hesitated to also claim for themselves the liberties Jesus took with regard to the commandment concerning the sabbath (Mt 24:20-21; Lk 6:5, cod. Bezae). Our sources on the Jewish Christians testify in perfect agreement that they still observed the sabbath (*Just., Dial. 47,1-4; *Iren., Adv. haer. I, 26,2; Eus., HE III, 27,2-5). It was probably the "Hellenists" around *Stephen who were the first, among other things, not to observe the sabbath, and they thus brought upon themselves violent persecution (Acts 6:13-14).

The Gentile Christian communities established by *Paul certainly no longer observed the sabbath (Gal 4:8-11; Col 2:8, 16-17), which became a general tradition for the mainstream church starting from the 2nd c. (Ign., Magn. 9,1; Barn. 15,1-9; Just., Dial. 12,3; 18,2; 19,5-6; 27,5; 29,3; Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 8,1-3; 16,1). Naturally, here and there, even within the mainstream church, leaders had to put the faithful on guard against a renewed "Judaizing" (*Tertull., Orat. 23,1-2; *Cyril Jer., Cat. 4,37; Council of *Laodicea, can. 29; *John Chrys., Adv. Iudaeos; ps.-Ign., Magn. 9 [PG 5, 768]; ps.-Athan., De semente hom.).

What was the theological motivation of the mainstream church's attitude? There are three frequent motifs: (1) The sabbath was unknown to the patriarchs of the OT; Moses—with other ceremonial laws—gave it to the Jewish people as a punishment for their disobedience or as a preparation (see the shadow symbol of Col 2:17) for the fulfillment that would be accomplished in Christ (see the aforementioned texts of Justin Martyr and Irenaeus: in addition, *Ptolemy the Gnostic, Epist. ad Floram 5,8-9.12; *Ambrosiaster, Com. Col. 2,16-17; *Ambr., Exp. Ev. Lc. V, 31-33; 39-40; VII, 173-175; etc.). (2) With the coming of Christ, the fact of remaining outwardly idle for 24 hours became secondary; what mattered was to cease from serving sin, and this for the entirety of one's life; the true sabbath is observed by following Christ, honoring God with priestly service, and loving our neighbors (Iren., Adv. haer. IV, 16,1 and Dem. 96; Tertull., Adv. Iud. 4,1-5 and Adv. Marc. IV, 12,9-11; *Orig., In Num. hom. 23,4 and In Ev. Mt. comm. XII, 36; Eus., In Ps. 91 [92]; *Epiph., Pan. 30,32,6-9; Aug., Ep. 55,18-19, 22). (3) Christians await the definitive sabbath, in which they will become participants of the perfect peace in God (Heb 3–4; Barn. 15,1-9; Just., Dial. 80,1-2.5; Iren., Adv. haer. V, 28,3; 30,4; Hipp., In Dan. comm. IV, 23,1–24,6; Tertull., Adv. Marc. III, 24,3-6; *Victorinus Pet., Fabr. mundi 5; Lact., Div. inst. epit. 67 [72], 3 [13]–5 [15]; Aug., Civ. Dei XX, 7,9). Often—as these citations show—before *Augustine, this hope of the definitive sabbath was connected to the representation of a millennium. Sunday, in this context, was then understood as an "eighth day."

From the 3rd c. onward a difference with respect to the sabbath fast came to be established between the churches of the East and the West: because all Christians fasted on Holy Saturday, the Latin churches began, here and there, in analogy to the fast for Holy Saturday, to also fast every sabbath (Tertull., Ieiun. 14,3; *Hipp., In Dan. comm. IV,20,3; LP 17,2; Council of *Elvira, can. 26; Aug., Ep. 36,31). The Eastern Churches always rejected this custom (Const. Apost. VIII, 47,67; ps.-Ign., Phil. 13 [PG 5, 938]), even during *Lent (Athan., Ep. fest. 6,13; Eger., Peregr. 27). This diversity later became one of the reasons for the schism between East and West. The sabbath fast, as well as a eucharistic celebration in memory of the completion of the creation, was introduced in individual Eastern churches—at first, it seems, in *gnostic circles (Vita Pachomii 28; Pall., Hist. Laus. 32,3; *Greg. Nyss., Adv. eos qui castigationes aegre ferunt; Epiph., De fide 24,7; Const. Apost. II, 59,3; VII, 23,3-4; VIII, 33,1-2; *Timothy of Alex., Responsa can. 13). A direct relationship between these celebrations on the sabbath and the Jewish Christian practice cannot, in my opinion, be proven (contra C.S. Mosna and R.A. Kraft). Sunday, after *Constantine, became an ever-increasing "replacement" for the sabbath (see *Sunday).

C.W. Dugmore, The Influence of the Synagoga upon the Divine Office, London 1944, 26-37; H. Huber, Geist und Buchstabe der Sonntagsruhe. Eine historischtheologische Untersuchung über das Verbot der knechtlichen Arbeit von der Urkirche bis auf Thomas von Aquin, Studia Theologiae moralis et pastoralis, 5, Salzburg 1958; K. Hruby, La célébration du sabbat d'après les sources juives: OrSyr 7 (1962) 435-463; 8 (1963) 55-86; Y.B. Tremel, Du sabbat au jour du Seigneur: Lumière et Vie 11 (1962) 29-49; C. Floristán, El sábado judío. Del sábado al domingo. El domingo, día del Señor: Salmanticensis 10 (1964) 429-444; E. Lohse, Sabbaton: TWNT 7, 1-30; R.A. Kraft, Some Notes on Sabbath Observance in Early Christianity: Andrews University Seminary Studies 3 (1965) 18-33; Ph. Delhaye - J.L. Leclat, Dimanche et Sabbat: MSR 23, 2 (1966) 3-14, 73-93; C.S. Mosna, Storia della domenica dalle origini fino agli inizi del V secolo. Problema delle origini e sviluppo. Culto e riposo. Aspetti pastorali e liturgici, AG 170, Rome 1969; A. Verheul, Du sabbat au jour du Seigneur: Quest. Lit. et Par. 51 (1970) 3-27; F. Mathys, Sabbatruhe und Sabbatfest: ThZ 28 (1972) 242-262; W. Rordorf, Sabbat und Sonntag in der Alten Kirche, Traditio Christiana 2, Zürich 1972 (It. tr. Turin 1979); K.H. Strand, Essays on the Sabbath in Early Christianity, Ann Arbor, MI 1972; P. Grelot, Du sabbat juif au dimanche chrétien: La MaisonD. 123 (1975) 79-104; J. Kaiser, Sabbat: TRE 29, 518-533 (bibl.); DBS 10, 1132-1170; D.A. Carson (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord's Day: A Biblical, Historical, and Theological Investigation, Eugene, OR 1999; H. Weiss, A Day of Gladness: The Sabbath Among the Jews and Christians in Antiquity, Columbia, SC 2003.

W. Rordorf

SABELLIUS – SABELLIANISM. We know that Sabellius was condemned at *Rome by Pope *Callistus as a proponent of patripassian *monarchianism. His Libyan origins remain uncertain. After the condemnation either he himself or his disciples spread the monarchian teaching in *Libya and *Egypt and developed it in opposition to the theology of the Logos of *Origen and his school. With respect to original *patripassianism, the Sabellians expanded the teaching by including within it the *Holy Spirit: only one God is manifested as *Father in the OT, as Son in the *incarnation, as Holy Spirit when he poured himself upon the *apostles at *Pentecost. In this manner, they avoided, at least formally, Noetus's position, which had met much opposition and acc. to which the Father himself had become incarnate and suffered and died. Moreover, against Origen's teaching, which affirmed the three distinct hypostases in the Trinity, they maintained that the Father, Son and Holy Spirit make up one sole prosōpon and one sole hypostasis. The few testimonies acc. to which the Sabellians affirmed three prosōpa of the Trinity should be traced back to the more moderate monarchians. In fact, over the course of the 4th c., the Logos theologians set forth every form of monarchianism as Sabellianism: even *Marcellus of Ancyra was called a "Sabellian"; his monarchianism was radical, but different from that of Sabellius. Due to the lack of documentation, we cannot specify the spread and duration of Sabellianism: it is certain, however, that it represented a noteworthy obstacle for the Logos theologians in the 2nd half of the 3rd c. and the beginning of the 4th c. *Epiphanius (Pan. 62,1) stated that the Sabellians were still active around 375 in *Rome and *Mesopotamia.

M. Simonetti, Sabellio e il sabellianismo: SSR 4 (1980) 7-28; BBKL VIII, 1145-1146; A. Soler Merenciano, El Sabelianismo en el concilio romano del año 263: la acusación contra Dionisio Alejandrino, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V. XXX Incontro di Studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma 3-5 maggio 2001: SEA 78 (2002) 411-420.

M. Simonetti

SABINA
I. Saint - II. Archaeology.

I. Saint. Sabina can serve as an example, over the course of the 6th c., of how a founder or foundress of the churches at *Rome became saints. In the Roman Synod of 499, the church on the Aventine Hill that bears her name was called the titulus Sabinae; in the council of 595, one finds the title titulus sanctae Sabinae. Sabina does not appear either in the Mart. hier. (with the exception of a few additions by a second hand in MS S) or in the Sacramentarium Leonianum. Her feast day, which was set for 29 August, appears only in the Capitulare evangeliorum of Würzburg) around 740, in the Gelasian Sacramentaries of the 8th c., in the Gregorian Sacramentary and in the historical *martyrologies starting from *Bede's second redaction. It seems that these mentions of Sabina depend on a Passio (BHL 7407 and 7586) created in the 6th c. on the basis of pure fantasy.

BHL 7407, 7586; BS 11, 540-543; LCI 8, 301-302; BBKL 8, 1146-1148; R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus basilicarum christianarum Romae 4, Vatican City 1976, 69-94; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

II. Archaeology. The construction of the Aventine basilica of S. Sabina should certainly be assigned to a chronological arc between 422 and 440, i.e., between the pontificates of *Celestine I and *Sixtus III, as the dedicatory inscription on the building in fact records in the golden-lettered mosaic with a blue background, placed on the back wall of the building. The work was undertaken by the presbyter Peter of Illyria while Celestine was pope, although the Liber pontificalis (I, 235) inserts information about the dedication of this church in the biography of his successor Sixtus III, remembering Peter, who was owed the honor of the episcopal office.

The basilica, which was constructed on a place previously occupied by a sanctuary, perhaps to be identified with the sanctuary of the Roman goddess Libertas, by an insula and by a domus, whose remains were incorporated into the new construction. It was laid out with three aisles and an apse: a portico furnished with five entry marks was placed in front of the façade. Archaeological excavations carried out in the garden of the convent, moreover, have demonstrated that the church was also originally preceded by a quadriporticus. No archaeological element, however, has been preserved with respect to a baptistery, the construction of which, however, has been attested to by the Liber pontificalis at the time of the birth of the early Christian titular church. Still visible from the original building, in addition to the aforementioned mosaic inscription, are decorative remains in marble crustae preserved above the columns of the center aisle and a wooden door decorated with panels displaying OT and NT scenes.

One can attribute the construction of the decorated marble plutei to Pope Eugenius II's intervention in the 9th c. These were done to fence off the area for the basilica's priests. Today this area is repositioned in the central aisle acc. to a layout conceived by A. Muñoz on the occasion of the full restoration of the building completed at the beginning of the 20th c.

F. Darsy, Santa Sabina (Le chiese di Rome illustrate, 63-64), Rome 1961; L. Pani Ermini, Recenti scoperte nel complesso di Santa Sabina sull'Aventino, in Archeologia Laziale, VI (Quaderni del centro di studio per l'archeologia etrusco-italica, 8), Rome 1984, 294-299.

A. Milella

SABINIAN (Sabinianus), pope (604–606). Native of Blera, a small village of S Tuscia, he was a deacon at *Rome already in 593, when he was sent by *Gregory the Great as his *apocrisarius (legate) at the imperial court of *Constantinople. He returned to Rome in 597. On 13 November 604 he was consecrated as the successor of Gregory the Great. Little information remains on Sabinian. During his pontificate, *Italy was ruled by the *Longobards (Lombards) and left to its own fate by the *Byzantines. The situation became worse by the famine, which the pope sought to face by selling a part of the church's goods, amid the protests of the high-ranking conservative circles within the Roman Church. Despite the difficulties, Sabinian entered into peaceful relations with the Byzantines and the Longobards. He died on 23 February 606 and was buried in St. *Peter's Basilica.

Jaffé I, 220; LP I, 315; Paul the Deacon, Vita Gregorii, PL 75, 29 and 58; ICUR II, 1, 6, 127; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums II, Tübingen 1933, 404 n. 5, 405, 433, 450 n. 9, 451, 452 n. 7, 453, 456 n. 1, 493, 503 n. 1 and 515-518; O. Bertolini, Roma e i Longobardi, Rome 1972, 23-24, 26 and 32; T.S. Brown, Gentlemen and Officers: Imperial Administration and Aristocratic Power in Byzantine Italy A.D. 554-800, Rome 1984, 12 and 42; Dizionario storico del Papato (Ph. Levillain) II, Milan 1996, 1293-1294; LTK³ 8, 1410; EPapi 1, 574-577.

M. Spinelli

SABINUS of Canosa (d. ca. 566). Bishop of Canosa in Apulia, probably from 514 to 566. The certain dates about his life are as follows: his presence at the Roman Synod of 531, in the acts of which he appears alongside *Boniface II as one who assisted in the investigation for the case of *Stephen of Larissa, who had been deposed and detained in *Constantinople; he participated, as the leader, for the delegation sent by Pope *Agapitus (22 April 536) at the court of the emperor *Justinian to remove *Anthimus, the *monophysite patriarch of Constantinople in 536; at a council at Constantinople, after the death of Pope Agapitus (22 April 536), he participated as the second bishop and the first of the Italians; *Gregory the Great relates in the Dialogues (II,15; III,5) his familiarity with *Benedict at Monte Cassino and his meeting with *Totila at Canosa. It does not seem that one can identify him with the Sabinus who accompanied the unfortunate Pope *John I and the delegation sent to *Byzantium by *Theodoric (525–526) to plead, without success, the cause of the *Arians. The anonymous acts of Sabinus of Canosa (AASS febr. II, 323-328; 3ª ed. 324-329) speak of his holiness and refer to him as the restaurator ecclesiarum. This detail was confirmed by the excavations of the baptistery of St. John at Canosa, where his monogram was inscribed (Puglia paleocristiana, I, Bari 1970, 137-138); it is also likely that he constructed the basilica dedicated to *Cosmas and Damian.

BHL 7443-7445; A.A. Tortora, Relatio status sanctae primatialis ecclesiae Canusinae, Rome 1758 (It. tr. A. Paulicelli, Andria 1982); R. Cessi, Un vescovo pugliese del sec. VI (S. Sabino di Canosa): Atti del R. Istituto Veneto di Scienze Lettere ed Arti 73 (1912–1913) 1141-1157; V. Recchia, Reminiscenze bibliche e "topoi" agiografici negli "Atti" anonimi di S. Sabino Vescovo di Canosa: VetChr 4 (1967) 151-184; R. Moreno Cassano, Il Battistero di S. Giovanni a Canosa: VetChr 5 (1968) 163-204; G. Bertelli - M. Falla Castelfranchi, Canosa di Puglia fra tardo-antico e medioevo, Rome 1981; J.M. Martin, Note sur la Vie de saint Sabin de Canosa et le prince de Bénévent Grimoald IV: VetChr 24 (1987) 399-405; A. Campione, Note sulla Vita di Sabino di Canosa, inventio e translatio: VetChr 25 (1988) 617-639; Principi, imperatori, vescovi: duemila anni di storia a Canosa, ed. R. Cassano, Venezia 1992; C. Flick, Die Kathedrale San Sabino in Canosa di Puglia: Versuch einer neuen zeitlichen Einordnung: JbAC 41 (1998) 193-205; Germano di Capua, ed. F. Carcione, Venafro 1999; PCBE 2, 1975-1977.

V. Recchia

SABINUS of Heraclea. A bishop of the sect of *Macedonius; around 375, he put together a collection of the acts of the various councils that were held during the *Arian controversy, with anti-Nicene aims. The work has been lost. It was heavily used by *Socrates and even more so by *Sozomen, who took from it very important pieces of information.

W.D. Hauschild, Die antinizänische Synodalaktensammlung des Sabinus von Heraklea: VChr 24 (1970) 105-126; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988, see the Index; P. Van Nuffelen, Un héritage de paix et de piété: étude sur les histoires ecclésiastiques de Socrate et de Sozomène, Leuven 2004, 448-454.

M. Simonetti

SABINUS of Piacenza (4th c.). Saint. Feast day 11 Dec. We know of a Sabinus, a Milanese deacon (Mansi 3, 460), an envoy of Pope *Damasus, before the year 373, in the East, through the schism of *Antioch, who was greatly esteemed even by *Basil of Caesarea (Ep. 89 and 92). During this trip, he brought with him a synodal letter of the Roman council on the case of the Arian *Auxentius of Milan and on the condemnation of the Council of *Rimini, and also other letters of Western bishops. The first important step of the mission was *Cappadocia with Basil of Caesarea. Sabinus could have been the bishop of Piacenza, who was elected ca. 376 and who took part in the Councils of *Aquileia (381), *Rome (390) and *Milan (392). He was a greatly esteemed friend of *Ambrose, who sent six letters to him (45-49 and 58) that are still preserved. Ambrose even submitted his literary works to Sabinus for his judgment (Ambr., Ep. 48,1 and 3). None of Sabinus's letters to Ambrose, however, have survived. Sabinus also ordered the construction of the basilica Duodecim apostolorum at Piacenza.

EC 10, 1521; BS 11, 701-704; G.F. Rossi, S. Savino vescovo di Piacenza, Rome 1955; Id., S. Savino diacono milanese, poi vescovo di Piacenza: Divus Thomas (Piacenza) 59 (1956) 125-142; PCBE 2, 1969-1973.

A. Di Berardino

SABRATHA. In Tripolitania, 70 km (43.5 mi) W of Tripoli, established by the Phoenicians, an important commercial center due to its caravan roads and port. Under the influence of *Carthage during the Numidian kingdom, from 46 BC it was incorporated into the province of *Africa. It esp. flourished under the Antonine and the Severan dynasty. Sabratha fully adhered to the traditions of early Christianity in opposition to the widespread heretical tendencies in *Africa. From the 3rd c. onward, however, the city diminished in importance. It was first sacked by the Austurians (4th c.), then the *Vandals (in the 5th c.); it flourished again under the *Byzantines (6th c.). The city was conquered by the Arabs (643), then destroyed again by new Arab incursions; it was thereafter abandoned and disappeared as an inhabited center. Important archaeological discoveries from Sabratha have been preserved (pagan temples, a theater, an amphitheater, baths, private dwellings and buildings, Roman and Byzantine walls, necropolises and Christian cemeteries, in addition to sculptures, mosaics, grave-goods, and coins from the *Punic, Roman and Christian era).

E.M. Ruprechtsberger, Sabratha: eine antike Stadt in Tripolitanien: Antike Welt 32 (2001) 35-46; R.M. Carra Bonacasa, Il cristianesimo a Sabratha alla luce delle più recenti indagini: Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia di Archeologia 76 (2003–2004) 3-77.

T. Sardella

SACERDOTIO CHRISTI, De (apocryphal text). De sacerdotio Christi (Conversio Theodosii Judaei) is a Greek work preserved in two Greek versions (Dictionary of Suidas [ca. 950], s.v. Iesous ho Christos; ed. Adler, 1, 2, 620-625) and in Arabic, *Georgian, *Latin and *Paleoslavonic versions. According to this apocryphal text, Jesus is set forth as a priest, and the Jews, doing genealogical research by asking *Mary of the divine conception as a virgin, discover the truth of what was narrated and finally arrive at the conclusion that Jesus did not have an earthly father. All of this was put in writing by the priests, and the book was saved from the destruction of *Jerusalem and found at Tiberias. The work was a response to the attacks of the Jews and, if need be, the Muslims.

CANT 53; BHG 810-812; longer version: G. Ziffer, in Studi per Ricardo Ribuoli, Rome 1986, 141-173. French tr. J.P. Migne, Dictionnaire des apocryphes, 2, 382-387; R. Eisler, IHSOUS BASILEUS OU BASILEUSAS, 2, Heidelberg 1930, 478-479; G. Gerö: ANRW II, 25, 5 (1988) 3979-3980.

M. Starowieyski

SACRAMENT (Sacramentum). The important term sacramentum made its appearance in the Christian Latin of the most ancient versions of the *Bible as the equivalent of the Greek term μυστήριον and in the writings of *Tertullian, with a broad spectrum of meanings; modern scholars have not entirely agreed on the origin and the reasons behind the choice of this term. According to the authoritative judgment of Christine Mohrmann, who was followed by René Braun and esp. Vincenzo Loi, the introduction of the term sacramentum over mysterium, which is also attested in Classical Latin, is explained by the common tendencies of Christian Latin in its formative phase, which on the one hand privileged native terms to express abstract concepts (μυστήριον in *Scripture basically indicates a divine truth hidden that is knowable through revelation) and on the other hand tended to avoid words that had been compromised by their connection to *pagan religion, as indeed in the case of mysterium, esp. in its plural form.

The affirmation of the term sacramentum would be owed not to the translators of the Bible and nor even to Tertullian but to the use of the Latin communities over the course of the 2nd c., which was favored by the fact that the Greek term tended to acquire an ever-increasing liturgical-ritual meaning, as attested, e.g., in the writings of *Justin Martyr: by that point, it had been taken over by the Latin translations of the Bible as an equivalent term for μυστήριον, acc. to the customary technique of those first translators. For Mohrmann, the term sacramentum in the secular use primarily indicated initiation confirmed by an oath and, as derivative meanings, the military oath, the military service itself, a sacred bond and at the same time legal and lastly "sacred things"; this latter meaning is connoted by the term sacrum with the generic nominal suffix -mentum.

The affinity of the term with μυστήριον, as it was evolving, even consisted in the idea of the bond between the faithful and Jesus Christ, in the destination for those initiated into the doctrine of the kingdom, and esp. of the necessity of expressing a liturgical action rather than the concept of hidden truth. The fact that Christians in the 2nd c. began to attribute a ritual value to the term μυστήριον has a possible explanation in its competition with a legal use brought to light by Melchior Verheijen and attested in the biblical versions of *Symmachus and *Theodotion, in which the Greek word translates the Hebrew term sôd, which properly means "assembly" and by metonymy "the decision of the assembly," therefore "a secret teaching" and "secrecy, seal"; it was used by the rabbis in the sense of "seal" to refer to circumcision, to which the Christians opposed the baptismal signaculum, which was interpreted as spiritual circumcision. Christianity preferred, however, to use the term sacramentum because it was expressive of the resultant "sacred bond." Other authors have formulated different hypotheses by making reference esp. to the secular meaning of sacramentum as an oath in the technical sense: J. de Ghellinck - E. de Backer, following the path of Adolf von Harnack, suggested that there was a relationship to the military oath, which by analogy could be connected to baptism, because that commitment began the Christian life, which was understood as militia Christi. Vincenzo Loi suggested an early reference to the baptismal rites as sacramentum because of the affinity to the military pledge and Jewish *circumcision and the subsequent expansion of the semantic field to the doctrinal meanings of μυστήριον, given that baptism implied initiation and the biblical mysteries. Dimitri Michaélidès, who attributed to Tertullian all responsibility for the affirmation of the term in Christian Latin to the exclusion of any direct relationship to μυστήριον, took into consideration above all the legal action of the remote sacramental origin (and consecratory) called sacramentum by Roman law, which Tertullian introduced as a legal argument with antiheretical objectives, as he had done, moreover, in the case of the praescriptio. The legal action included an oath and a deposit: upon this basis Michaélidès systematically organized all the various meanings of the term sacramentum that one can find in the writings of Tertullian. Enrico Mazza hypothesized the existence of a true and proper oath within the rite of baptism that was delivered between the renunciation of Satan and the profession of faith, and this took place already at the beginning of the 2nd c., given that the first Latin source in which the term sacramentum appeared to refer to Christians is *Pliny the Younger's Ep. X,96 to *Trajan. With that term the governor of Bithynia indicated the Christians' commitment to leading a very upright life. Mazza found some indication of this hypothetical rite in the testimonies from the Syro-Antiochene area from the end of the 4th c. Marta Sordi, who assigned greater importance to the context in which the term was found, saw in Pliny's use of the term sacramentum an allusion not to baptism but to the Eucharist, esp. because for her, the sacramentum/oath in the Roman mind was connected to a sacrifice in view of a sacred foedus.

The multiplicity of the theories formulated certainly bears witness not only to the scarcity of the available documentation but also to the difficulty of specifying the semantic value of the term sacramentum already in use in secular speech, in which evidently the word was evocative of multiple shades of meaning. Its own ambiguity must have already favored the encounter with the term μυστήριον, which belonged to Christian parlance and was in the process of quick development and therefore was also characterized by rather nuanced features. The common element in all the attempts to explain the relationship between the two terms is the individuation of a common conceptual context embracing the doctrinal and ritual aspects, in which by the term doctrine one should understand both the revealed dogmatic aspect as well as the moral consequence, and by the term rite a series of symbolic actions expressive of the divine and human will to enter into an obligatory relationship, each in its own context.

The history of the term sacramentum in the subsequent centuries is a history of the slow specification of the semantic content of the term. In the writings of Tertullian, one finds more than 130 occurrences of the term, which can be reduced to 14 categories of meaning acc. to the Latin dictionary edited by Albert Blaise. From the meanings connected to revealed truth, it became more specific acc. to the context as revelation of the OT and the NT, typological interpretation, the entirety of revealed truths, the divine disposition, or rather the doctrine of the *Trinity or the *resurrection, although in the plural it tends to signify the truths of the faith concerning *eschatology. By the term sacramentum *Tertullian also referred to the reception of doctrine; i.e., to the Christian's profession of faith, to the ecclesial bond that this profession involves and to the rites of initiation in which it is made concrete, namely *baptism and the *Eucharist. In this context the Christian's moral obligation is likened to the military oath.

The meanings of this term in *Cyprian's writings can in part be reduced to those identified in Tertullian's works, but one should add the characteristic expression unitatis sacramentum (De Eccl. Cath. Un. 7) to refer to the ecclesial bonds which Christians are obligated to preserve. The literary appearance of the competing term mysterium, attested to significantly by Lactantius and the "European" biblical versions, although not initially marked by a difference of content, seems to have contributed with time to the restricting of the semantic field of these two terms as least in part in different contexts. Although mysterium could evidently better cover the semantic field of abstract concepts, sacramentum was rather adapted to refer to the concrete reality of the liturgical rites and the feasts.

The differentiation, however, remained common until the time of St. *Augustine, in whose writings one finds their simultaneous use, and it is not clear what the difference was for him between mysterium and sacramentum, the latter containing a semantic breadth comparable to Tertullian's use of the term; nevertheless, his theological elaboration of sacramentum in the sense of the sacred sign (sacrificium ergo visibile invisibilis sacrificii sacramentum, id est sacrum signum est: De Civ. Dei X,5) directly connected to the action of grace (sacramentum as opposed to exemplum) contributed in a decisive way to narrow the meaning of the term into the present-day use. Augustine, however, also used it with respect to marriage and holy orders. From the reception of Augustine's theology by *Leo the Great came the designation of the term sacramentum even in a technical sense in the liturgical language of the great Roman *sacramentaries; the medieval elaboration of this Augustinian line would lead to the definitions given by the Councils of Florence (1439–1445) and Trent (1545–1563), in which the term acquired the meaning used in the present day.

A. Harnack, Militia Christi, Tübingen 1905; H.F. von Soden, Μυστήριον und Sacramentum in den ersten zwei Jahrunderten der Kirche: ZNTW 12 (1911) 188-227: J. de Gellinck - E. de Backer - J. Poukens - G. Lebacqz, Pour l'histoire du mot "Sacramentum," I, Les Anténicéens, Louvain 1924; O. Casel, Zum Worte sacramentum: Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 8 (1928) 225-232; M.A. Sainio, Semasiologische Untersuchungen über die Entstehung der christlichen Latinität, Helsinki 1940, 75-86; A. Kolping, Sacramentum Tertullianeum, Münster 1948; C. Couturier, "Sacramentum" et "Mysterium" dans l'oeuvre de S. Augustin: REAug (Coll. Théol. 28), Paris 1953, 161-332; Ch. Mohrmann, Sacramentum dans les plus anciens textes chrétiens: HTR 47 (1954) 141-152; reprinted in Études sur le latin des Chrétiens, I, Rome 1958, 233-244; J. Doignon, Le Sacramentum dans les anciennes versions latines de la Bible: REL 32 (1954) 51-52; J. Doignon, Sacrum, Sacramentum, Sacrificium dans le texte latin du Livre de la Sagesse: REL 34 (1956) 240-253; T. Camelot, "Sacramentum." Notes de théologie sacramentaire augustinienne: REThom 57 (1957) 429-449; M. Verheijen, Μυστήριον, Sacramentum et la Synagogue: RSR 45 (1957) 321-337; A. Mandouze, À propos de "Sacramentum" chez S. Augustin. Polyvalence lexicologique et foisonnement théologique, in Mélanges offertes à Mademoiselle Christine Mohrmann, Utrecht-Anvers 1963, 222-232; V. Loi, Per la storia del vocabolo "Sacramentum": "Sacramentum" in Lattanzio: VChr 18 (1964) 85-107; V. Loi, Il termine "Mysterium" nella letteratura cristiana prenicena: VChr 19 (1965) 210-232; 20 (1966) 25-44; V. Loi, "Scripturae Sacramentum": RivBib 14 (1966) 261-278; J. Morán, "Mysterium" y "Sacramentum" hasta San Augustín: Estudio Augustiniano 4 (1969) 79-107; D. Michaélidès, Sacramentum chez Tertullien, Paris 1970; Ch. Mohrmann, Quelques observations sur "Sacramentum" chez Tertullien, in Romanitas et Christianitas. Studia I.H. Waszink . . . oblata, Amsterdam 1973, 233-242; B. Studer, "Sacramentum" et "Exemplum" chez S. Augustin: RecAug 10 (1975) 87-141; M. Garrido Bonaño, Uso y significación del término "Sacramentum" en la liturgia romana: Burgense 18 (1977) 9-71; R. Braun, Deus Christianorum. Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de Tertullien, Paris [2]1977; M. Sordi, Sacramentum in Plin. Ep. X, 96, 7: VetChr 19 (1982) 97-103; E. Ruffini - E. Lodi, "Mysterion" e "Sacramentum." La Sacramentalità negli scritti dei Padri e nei testi liturgici primitivi, Bologna 1987; E. Mazza, L'uso di "Sacramentum" nella lettera 10, 96 di Plinio il Giovane. Un confronto con la liturgia battesimale: EphLit 113 (1999) 466-480; M. Sordi, Da mysterion a sacramentum, in Il mistero della carne. Contributi su mysterion e sacramentum nei primi secoli cristiani, Castel Bolognese 2003, 65-74.

A. Grappone

SACRAMENTAL SECRECY. The development of the sacrament of penance in the early church soon led to an understanding of the necessity of secrecy in the confession of secret sins. *Origen (beginning of the 3rd c.) spoke of the confession of secret faults which does not automatically require a subsequent public confession (Hom. 2 in Psalmum 37: PG 12,1386). At the beginning of the 4th c., *Aphraates, in his seventh treatise, prohibited priests from making known the sins revealed to them by penitents (Dem. 7,3: PS I,318). *Paulinus of Milan in the Vita s. Ambrosii 39 (PL 14,43) reveals that the bishop of *Milan spoke only with God of the sins confessed to him, thus leaving to his successors a good example. It is also clear from the same *Ambrose (De poen. 2,10: CSEL 73, 199) that not all sins need to be publicly revealed, which implied a confession that remained secret. *Augustine of Hippo bore witness to the practice of the N African church at the beginning of the 5th c. (Serm. 82,11: PL 38,511) stating that if he does not publicly chastise some sinners then he does so because he desires to take care of them rather than accuse them. In the Historia Ecclesiae (7,16: PG 67,1458-1463) *Sozomen (beginning of the 5th c.) affirmed that the office of penitentiary priest at *Constantinople was established in such a way as to allow the sinner to make a secret confession as well as a public one and that the penitentiary was chosen precisely because of his reservedness and discretion. Pope *Leo the Great (440–461) took the occasion to rebuke the bishops of Campania, because contrary to the rule received from apostolic times, they made public the sins of their penitents (Ep. 168: PL 54, 1211). The legislation of the Council of Tovina (Armenia, ca. 527) against the priests who violated the sacramental seal (Hfl-Lecl II, 1079, 20) seems to be the first legislation in this respect, which indicates that at the beginning of 6th c. the fact that the sacramental seal had by that time acquired the force of law. The subsequent development of the practice of private confession in the church confirmed what had already become law.

DTC 3, 960-974; EC 11, 256-257; E. Vacandard, La confession sacramentelle dans l'église primitive, Paris 1903; L. Honoré, Le secret de la confession. Étude historique-canonique, Brussells 1924; C.F. Savio, Ad sigillum sacramentale animadversiones, Turin 1936; Dictionnaire Apologétique de la foi catholique 3, 1861-1865.

P. Fahey

SACRAMENTARY. During the first centuries of the church the celebrant improvised the important liturgical prayers under the guidance of an outline (see *Justin, 1 Apol. 65,3; 67,5). Slowly the celebrants used written texts as a guide and therefore fixed texts for euchological prayers that were approved by the bishop. Over the course of the 4th c., for the celebration of the *Mass, the libellus Missae was born, a small work that contained a formulary for the celebrant's part of the Mass or rather for different Masses; it could range from just one page to many pages; the text of only one celebration or many. In the 6th-7th c., the sacramentaries appeared as a book reserved for the celebrant (called sacramentarium, sacramentorum liber, volumen or similar expressions); the other participants prepared books (e.g., lectionaries, the ordines, from the 8th c. the antiphonaries). The collection of texts in the sacramentaries was not closed, but subject to additions and influences from other sacramentaries. Each collection (each codex) had a local character in the sense that it was adapted to the demands of a specific ecclesial community.

A. Bouley, From Freedom to Formula, Washington, DC 1981; E. Bourque, Étude sur les sacramentaires romains, 3 vols., Rome 1948-1958; J. Deshusses, Les sacramentaires: Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 24 (1982) 19-46; J. Deshusses - B. Darragon, Concordances et tableaux pour l'étude des grands sacramentaires, 6 vols., Fribourg 1982–1983; C. Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, Washington, DC 1986, 61-134; A. Chavasse, La liturgie de la ville de Rome du V^{e} au VIII^{e} siècle, Rome 1993; E. Palazzo, Histoire des livres liturgiques: le moyen âge des origines au XIII^{e} siècle, Paris 1993; M. Metzger, Les sacramentaires, Turnhout 1994; E. Palazzo, Liturgie et société au Moyen Âge, Paris 2000; see the entry Liturgy, V: Improvvisazione eucologica; IX: Libri liturgici; LACL 617-619.

1. The first great collection was the so-called Sacramentarium Veronense, a mutilated MS of the Biblioteca Capitolare of Verona (85 [80]), a collection of authentic books that were preserved in the Lateran archives. The MS dates to the years 600–625. Because it was attributed to Pope *Leo the Great at the moment of its discovery, it was also called "Leonine." It actually did contain some of that pope's formularies and was composed during the time of Pope *John III (561–574) with texts from the Roman archives and therefore more ancient than the time of its final redaction. It reflects the Roman milieu and is organized by months.

CPL 1897-1898; PL 55,21-156; L.C. Mohberg, Sacramentarium Veronense, Rome 1956, [3]1978; A. Chavasse, Le Sacramentaire dit "Léonien" conservé par le Veronensis LXXXV (80): SE 27 (1984) 151-190.

2. The ancient Gelasian Sacramentary (Vat. Reg. lat. 316), likewise of Roman origin but not by Pope *Gelasius (492-496). It was composed before the time of Pope *Gregory II (715–731). A presbyteral type of sacramentary, it is subdivided into three sections (or books): (1) the feasts from *Christmas to *Pentecost, (2) the sanctorale, (3) ordinary *Sundays. This sacramentary contains clear Gallican elements; moreover, it was a combination of papal and presby-teral elements. Some Frankish monks during the time of Pepin the Short sought to unite the ancient Gelasian Sacramentary with a Gregorian model; the Gelasian Sacramentary of the 8th c. was thus born (Frankish Gelasian or Pepin the Short) and enjoyed immediate diffusion in Gaul, but was then replaced by the Gregorian-type sacramentary.

CPL 1899; PL 74, 1055-1905; A. Chavasse, Le sacramentaire gélasien, Paris-Tournai 1958; W. Ullmann, Gelasius I (492-496). Das Papsttum an der Wende des Spätantike zum Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1981 (the last part of the work is also dedicated to the Gelasian Sacramentary); A. Chavasse, Textes liturgiques de l'église de Rome. Le cycle liturgique romain annuel selon le sacramentaire du Vat. Reg. 316, Paris 1997; Sacramentario gelasiano dell'VIII sec.: CPL 1905 (for the editions, see R. Cabié, DHGE 20 [1984] 305-306); A. Dumas - J. Deshusses (eds.), Liber sacramentorum Gellonesis, CCL 159-159A, Turnhout 1981; P. Saint-Roch (ed.), Liber sacramentorum Engolismensis (ms. B.N. Lat 816). Le Sacramentaire gélasien d'Angoulême, Turnhout 1987 (= CCL 159C).

3. *Egbert of York (PL 89,441-442) considered Gregory the Great (590–604) the author of a sacramentary; upon the request of Charlemagne, Pope Hadrian (784–791) sent a copy of a sacramentary, the author of which, he said, was Pope Gregory. It has come down to us through three types: Hadrianum (from the model sent to Charlemagne, composed on a text from 731/735, but revised and adapted in France with a full supplement); Paduense (Paduensis D. 47), a revision in the presbyteral sense of the Gregorian Sacramentary made between 659 and 681; on the basis of the ancient Gregorian Sacramentary, it seems that another sacramentary was written at Trent. The Gregorian Sacramentary was imposed and as a result obtained much respect; it established the basis for later missals.

CPL 1902ff.; J. Deshusses, Le sacramentaire grégorien. Ses principales formes d'après les plus anciens manuscrits, 3 vols., Fribourg 1971–1979. Bibl. in R. Godding, Bibliografia di Gregorio Magno (1890–1989), Rome 1990, 179-182, nn.1657-1698; A. Heinz, Gregorio Magno e la liturgia romana, in Gregorio Magno nel XIV centenario della morte, Rome 2004, 281-290 (285-286).

A. Di Berardino

SACRAMENTS

I. A liturgical-typological approach - II. A symbolic-liturgical approach - III. Elaboration in the writings of the Fathers.

We should not expect to find in Greek or Latin patristic texts, esp. before St. *Augustine, a theology of the sacraments constructed acc. to our criteria. We cannot reconstruct their teaching by beginning from our categories. This would be to gravely misrepresent their thought. The brevity of this entry will explain some of the choices made for handling a vast amount of material on this subject.

I. A liturgical-typological approach. Until St. Augustine, who attempted to develop an already rather conceptual theology, the Fathers did not for a moment think of a logical demonstration of what the sacraments were. In their assessment, they placed them within the history of salvation—indeed, today they are "a stage" of the journey toward the eschaton. Thus the Fathers avoided what could lead one to a kind of sacramental "magic" and signified what the institution of the sacraments by Christ meant: a new content in forms, which preexisted and were prepared for centuries. Starting from the tangible and visible of the sacramental celebration (*water, *oil, *bread, *wine and rites), they go back to their announcement in the OT and the NT (ἀντίτυπος), to then arrive at the sacrament itself, which thus found its true root (τύπος). The Fathers then drew conclusions for the concrete life of the Christian.

1. In so doing, they followed the same method as the NT. In 1 Pet 3:19-21 the flood is understood as a type of *baptism, as is the rock at Horeb in 1 Cor 10:1-5 (see Col 2:17). St. *Paul wrote that the Jewish worship was a shadow of the true worship which was still to come, Christ being the reality. The vocabulary used in the NT, which included celestial reality (Jn 3:12; 1 Cor 15:40-48), shadow, image (e.g., Rom 1:23; 8:29; 1 Cor 11:7; 15:49), provided them frequently used examples.

2. The Fathers also continually used the NT because it offered important types, like the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5), in which they saw one of the specific types of baptism. *Tertullian (Bapt. 5: CCL 1, 281) made the same connection by insisting on the action of the angel. In this regard he was followed by *Ambrose of Milan (De sacramentis II, 3,7: SC 25bis, 115). The Fathers also used the NT with respect to the *Eucharist, as in Mt 22:3: e.g., the parable of the banquet and the guests, which *Cyril of Jerusalem commented on in his Procatechesis (PG 33,336-341). In the same way, the parable of the virgins (Mt 25:1), with its eschatological meaning, applied to the sacraments of Christian initiation: *Gregory of Nazianzus saw therein the point of departure and the road toward the eschatological banquet (Oratio XL in sanctum baptismum 46: PG 36,426). Tertullian (Bapt. 9: CCL 1, 284), *Cyprian (Ep. 63,12: CSEL 3/2, 711), and Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. Myst. IV, 2: SC 76, 136) all used the account of the wedding at Cana (Jn 2) as a type of the Eucharist.

3. The OT esp. supplied the Fathers the types they needed for their catechesis. Tertullian offers us a list of OT types which, along with those of the NT, would be used in later ages. (a) In particular, the type of water was used to much advantage in many biblical commentaries; from a liturgical point of view, this type was developed at the blessing of the baptismal water in the Gelasian Sacramentary, which was attributed to *Peter Chrysologus (Sacram. Gel. 445-446). Tertullian used the water of the creation as a type (Bapt. 3: CCL 1, 278). Ambrose of Milan drew attention to many of the creational aspects, like that of the ἰχθύς and pisciculi ("little fish"), i.e., Christians (De sacramentis 3,3: SC 25bis, 72). (b) The Fathers understood the flood in Genesis as a type, established, as noted above, on 1 Pet 3:3-10. In the eight persons who were saved, Justin saw the *Ogdoad, the eighth day, the day of *Easter and the *resurrection (Dial. 138: PG 6, 793). Tertullian developed the symbolism of the dove and that of the ark-church (Bapt. 8: CCL 1,283; De idol. 24: CCL 2,1924), followed in this regard by Cyprian (De unit. 6: CCL 3, 253). (c) Even the Red Sea, as a type, drew the attention of the Fathers, who were confirmed in this regard by 1 Cor 10:2-6. So Tertullian (Bapt. 9: CCL 1,283-284), Cyprian (Ep. 68,15: CSEL 3/2,764), *Basil (De Spir. Sancto 14: SC 17bis,163), *Gregory of Nyssa (Vita Moysis 50,2: PG 44,361), Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. Myst. I,2-3: SC 126,83-84) and Ambrose all referred to this type often (De sacr. I,12: SC 25bis,57-58; 61; De myst. 12: PL 16,409; 13: PL 16,410). (d) The water of the Jordan River offered the Fathers another type, esp. the crossing of the Red Sea as a type of baptism: in this regard, see Gregory of Nyssa (De iis qui baptismum differunt: PG 46,420-421; In bapt. Christi: PG 46,592-593), Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. Myst. 3,3: SC 126,121.123.129). Even the type of the healing of Naaman in the Jordan River drew their interest: Gregory of Nyssa (In bapt. Christi: PG 46, 593), Ambrose (Exp. in Lc. IV,50-51: CSEL 32/4,165-179; De sacr. I, 13-14; SC 25bis, 164). (e) The following Fathers likewise used the types of bread and *Melchizedek: *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. IV,25: SC 30,62), Cyprian (Ep. 63,4: CSEL 3/2,703), Ambrose (De sacr. V,1: SC 25bis,88; IV,10: SC 25bis,80). Of course, they could not forget the manna in the desert; one must simply look at, e.g., Ambrose (De myst. 46: SC 25bis, 182) and *Augustine (Tr. in Jo. 26,12: CCL 36, 265). (f) The Fathers also sought a typology of the meal and found it in the OT (Is 55:1-3) and the NT (Lk 22:29): thus *Origen (Com. in Cant. hom. 2,3: PG 13, 155), Gregory of Nyssa (In Cant. Cant. hom. 5: PG 44,873), Ambrose (De Cain et Abel I, 5: CSEL 32/1, 356). (g) Likewise establishing their claims on 1 Cor 10:4, as noted above, the Fathers saw in the rock at Horeb a type of baptismal water or even a type of the *blood of Christ: Cyprian (Ep. 63,8: CSEL 3/2,705ff.), Ambrose (De sacr. V,3-4: SC 25bis,89; De myst. 48: SC 25bis,123).

We have heavily insisted, but not yet exhaustively, on this patristic method, the most characteristic method of the Fathers, who did not intend to offer a true concept of sacrament but to "show it." Beginning from sign, they explained its origin and insertion within the history of salvation, of which the sacraments are today "a stage" and, at the same time, a prefiguration of eschatology.

II. A symbolic-liturgical approach. Not all the Fathers, however, followed this line in their catechesis. *Theodore of Mopsuestia, e.g., was never very fond of types; instead, he tried to outline a parallel between the visible and the invisible liturgy. In his homily 12,2 (Tonneau, ST 145,325), e.g., he worked from the epistle to the Hebrews (8:5; 10:1) and saw in the sacraments a ritual imitation of the historical actions of Christ. Neither did he stop at the general level, but he attempted to connect the sacramental rites to the gospel stories (Hom. 15, 25-27: ST 145, 503-509). Ps.-*Dionysius, who clearly had a bent toward symbolism, also placed himself within the same line: the sensible realities are the images of the intelligible realities (De divinis nominibus: PG 3,525-1120). The Eastern liturgy supplied a vast amount of symbolic material, upon which he drew heavily. This method was not without its dangers and prepared the way for the dubious symbolism of Amalarius of Metz. As one can see, the Fathers were esp. concerned with two fundamental sacraments: baptism and Eucharist; they were not ignorant, however, of the other sacraments, and they did discuss them: one merely has to think of Ambrose and his treatise on *penance.

III. Elaboration in the writings of the Fathers. With all this, the Fathers, even before St. Augustine, were not content with a presentation of the sacraments that was restricted to typology or symbolism. They also sought to express, in their own way, what we might call a certain sacramental "mechanism."

1. They were drawn to pre-Christian terminology. The use of the word μυστήριον in the writings of St. *Paul certainly does not imply a connection to the pagan mysteries; the term provided him the means for referring to the plan of salvation eternally hidden in God and revealed in and by Christ. Nevertheless, the pagan term μυστήριον increasingly became St. *Justin's key term (1 Apol. 66: PG 4, 429), who, however, did not use the expression; and *Tertullian (De praescr. 40: CCL 1, 221; Bapt. 2: CCL 1, 227), who in these cases and to refer to some of the Christian celebrations did not privilege the word sacramentum, saw in the pagan mysteries an imitation of the Christian sacraments: the mysteries attempted to incite an active presence of the divinity. The Fathers, however, combated the pagan mysteries, by opposing them with the true mysteries, namely those of Christianity. Thus, in opposition to the solar cults, they saw Christianity as the true possessor of the true sun. In this regard, *Clement of Alexandria offered us a very precise text of great importance, in which he asked the adherents of the cults of the pagan gods to come and celebrate the true mysteries. He used the then-current vocabulary of the pagan cults, which he intended to reject, by imitating it (Protrepticus XII: PG 9,778). At the time of the decline of the mystery religions, starting from the 4th c., the Fathers were not afraid of the possible misunderstandings and heavily used vocabulary that was specific to contemporary cults; thus Basil used this method in his treatise De Spiritu Sancto (27: SC 17,155). So, in this regard, the title Cyril of Jerusalem assigned to his work Mystagogical Catecheses was typical for his time. In the writings of ps.-*Dionysius, one finds many examples of these borrowings, esp. with respect to Christian initiation. This is not at all a theological "borrowing." In the ancient church, some thought that the mystery cults were a providential preparation for Christian worship, and esp. the theology of the implementation of the salvific acts of Christ. But it is not necessary to think of the ἀνάμνησις of *Hellenism, neither of the memoria of Latin civilization but rather of the Palestinian zikkaron: an implementation of the past in the present before the eyes of God (and not primarily before humans), because he remembers, acts and causes his people to walk in the covenant toward the end of time.

In the Latin-African text of the *Bible, the word was continually translated as sacramentum; the Itala offered many similar examples. The Vulgate, however, always preferred the word mysterium; nevertheless, in the letters to the Ephesians and Colossians, it uses both words interchangeably, without it being possible to determine the reason.

The military meaning of sacramentum—the promise of the soldier's fidelity—did not translate the term mysterium per se. Nevertheless Tertullian, who was followed by many others, by using it in a military sense influenced the use of the term among Christians to refer to the credo, i.e., the regula fidei* professed at baptism. With Tertullian, therefore, this term ended up having a specific meaning that designated a precise content: the faith. This also allowed him to better compare the pagan and Christian cults: the pagan mysteries only have the "apparent matter" of the sacrament (Ad nationes I,16: CCL 1,36), and the pagan cult is called non sacramenta.

In the writings of Ambrose, one finds a definition for the sacrament of baptism, which applies to all the sacraments: the neophyte has seen everything he can see with human eyes, but he has been unable to see everything that has been made. Now, what is not seen is far greater than what is seen and what is temporal, because what is not seen is eternal (De sacr. I,4: SC 25bis,66). When Ambrose discussed the *Eucharist, he used both the terms mysterium and sacramentum (Exp. in ps. 118,13,20: CSEL 62, 294). And, nevertheless, to further clarify his thought, Ambrose used the term mysteria for the Eucharist, which was tied to the term sacramenta: sacramenta mysteriorum or mysteria sacramentorum (Apologia David 12,58: CSEL 32/2,339). Despite all that, however, the difficulty remains in specifying the meaning of the two terms. At times, mysterium indicated a sacramental rite (De myst. I,1: SC 25bis,156), but also *prayer itself was called mysterium (De fide IV,10,24: CSEL 73,90; De sacr. V,3,12: SC 25bis,124). The Fathers did, however, provide some clarification: sacramentum refers to what one sees, i.e., the exterior; mysterium, however, refers to the content, what is interior. The sacramenta introduce us to the mysteria, and in turn, the mysteria make us understand the exterior sign, the sacramenta (De myst. 2: PL 16, 406).

We cannot, however, ignore that the use of the word sacramentum in the writings of *Leo the Great is at times precise and extensive. In his literary corpus, we find the word sacramentum 128 times in the Sermons and 93 times in the Letters. Of all the meanings of this term in Leo's writings, we consider the two chief ones here: (1) a reality, a sign of another, a figure or symbol (e.g., Serm. 55,3: CCL 138A,325); (2) an efficacious sacred sign (the examples are very numerous; we only cite a few: Serm. 3,1: CCL 138,10-11; Serm. 21,3: CCL 138,88; Serm. 70,4: CCL 138A,429). St. Leo, however, also used the word mysterium or mysteria with the same meaning. We also provide here some texts where he primarily discusses the figure, a reality, the sign of another reality (Serm. 23,4: CCL 138,106; Serm. 51,7: CCL 138A,302); in the other texts, however, he discusses an efficacious sign (Serm. 16,1: CCL 138,61).

2. The Fathers also studied how the sacraments "work." Tertullian heavily emphasized the rite and its effect (De resur. 8: CCL 2,931; De praescr. 40: CCL 1,220; Bapt. 1; 4; 9: CCL 1,277.279.283). He applied the same treatment of baptism to the other sacraments (see the entries on the individual sacraments).

Tertullian did not recognize any efficacy of the sacramental signs practiced outside the church (Bapt. 15: CCL 1,290). Cyprian the bishop of *Carthage not only applied this thesis to *baptism but to all the sacraments, as e.g. to ordination (Ep. 69,1: CSEL 3,760). Ambrose was also interested in this "action" of the sacraments and, in an entirely special way, the sacrament of initiation. In this regard, he was in close connection to Paul's doctrine of baptism in the similitudo of the death and resurrection of Christ (Rom 6:5), and he sought to explain how the rite of baptism was a similitudo that encloses the reality (De sacr. II,23: SC 25bis,88). He did the same for the Eucharist; in this respect, he used the word figura, sign, a symbol that contains the reality (De sacr. IV,5,21: SC 25bis,114). We should mention here a very close connection with the way in which *Serapion of Thmuis explained this concept in the Euchologion, a work attributed to him (Euchol. 3: F.X. Funk, Didascalia et Const. Apost. II, Sacramentarium Serapionis 174). Ambrose also explained that there was a rite whose symbolism corresponded to human nature (In Lc. I,2,79: PL 15,1663). He also attributed a considerable importance to the word; word and symbolic rite are for him two indispensable elements (De sacr. IV,19: SC 25bis,112). With respect to the Eucharist, Ambrose attributed to the word the expression: sermones Christi, verba caelestia etc. (De sacr. IV,5,21: SC 25bis,114); and elsewhere he calls it sermo operatorius Christi (De sacr. IV,4,1: SC 25bis,110). The intervention of the *Holy Spirit is part of Ambrose's theology (De sacr. I,5,15.17: PL 16,440; SC 25bis,68; De myst. 4; 19; 20; 24; 59: SC 25bis,164, 166, 168, 190-191; De Spir. sancto 3,16: CSEL 79,167). Neither did Ambrose forget the intervention of the church in the sacrament: it is precisely the church that is fertile in the Spirit (De virginibus I,6,31: PL 16,197; Exp. in ps. 118, 19,23: CSEL 62,433-434). We have primarily cited from the writings of Ambrose because his teaching is very representative of Latin patristic thought.

In the writings of the Eastern fathers, the teaching is just as strong. *Clement of Alexandria placed the efficacy of the rite at the base of his sacramental theology, and the texts that must be cited are numerous. We cite one of them that pertains to *confirmation, which he calls a sigillum (Quis dives 42: PG 9,48). The notion of an efficacious symbol was used by all, esp. for baptism and the Eucharist. *Origen drew on *Neoplatonist philosophy for both for his sacramental doctrine and the symbolism that he preferred, sometimes risking the typology with exaggeration. In the baptismal rite, Origen saw a symbol that confers the gifts (In Jo. VI, 17: PG 14, 257). Nevertheless, despite what has sometimes been written, his theological symbolism applied to the Eucharist does not overshadow the real presence (C. Celsum VIII,33: PG 11,1565).

The baptismal ritual of the Didascalia*, just as that of the Apostolic Constitutions*, incorporates the Pauline symbolism. Present here is the theology of the symbol stamped on the one baptized (Didascalia et Constitutiones Apostolorum III,12,3; 16,4: Funk 210, 211). *Sins are forgiven and the person enters a new life (e.g., Didasc. II,39,4: Funk 216; V,9,1: Funk 262; VI,12,2: Funk 326). If Origen saw the effect of baptism in the invocation of the *Trinity, the Greek fathers saw therein primarily the active presence of the Holy Spirit (see Jn 3:5). For *John Chrysostom it is God who baptizes and not the minister (In Mt. hom. 50,3: PG 57,507: In Act. apost. hom. 14,3: PG 60,116). *Basil recalls that the *water per se does not produce anything: the presence of the Holy Spirit is necessary (De Spir. sancto 15,35: SC 17, 171). For *Cyril of Jerusalem, the invocation of the Trinity consecrates the oil and confers on it its efficacious power (Cat. myst. III,3-4: SC 126,124-126).

St. *Augustine occupies a special place because of his exposition on the sacraments: his theology was far more developed. Through the use of symbols, he prepared what would become the widely accepted theology of the 12th c. and the Council of Trent. Augustine did not ignore typology but transcended it and studied the sign in itself, independent of its relations with this or that sacrament. Just as some Fathers who had preceded him, he distinguished in the sacrament the visible (sacramentum) from the invisible (virtus sacramenti; see In Io. tract. 26,11: CCL 36,263). Without being evidently conditioned by our number seven in his understanding of the sacraments, Augustine affirmed that everything that speaks order onto sacred things is a sacrament. Therefore, in the rites of the catechumenate he called the blessed salt given to the catechumen sacramentum salis (De cat. rud. 26,50: CCL 46,173-174; the possible textual variants sane or salis is irrelevant here because Augustine later treated salt as a "sacrament"). Even the Gelasian Sacramentary applied the word "sacrament" to blessed salt (ed. Mohlberg, 288, p. 43, 26), and this is found in later rituals until the reform of the Vatican II, which suppressed this rite. In the two treatises De doctrina christiana (PL 34,15,122) and the De magistro (PL 32,1021-1034), Augustine explained a kind of philosophy of signs in which one can easily perceive his dependence on the Alexandrian theologians. On the one hand, the sacraments are material subjects that fall under the senses but which indicate a spiritual content. For example, in baptism, the water is the visible element: it washes the body, but this signifies what is being produced in the soul (In I Ep. Jo. VI,11: SC 75,300-304). The signs are not simply conventional, but there is a relationship between the signifier and the thing signified (Ep. 98,9: CSEL 34, 530-531). There is within the sacraments a force that produces the effect signified. On the other hand, it would be to betray Augustine's thought to wish to reduce the virtus sacramenti to its effects alone, but the virtus also signifies the grace received (In Io. tract. 26,11-13: CCL 36,264-267). Christ acts through his church and his minister, and the word is this virtus, which brings the gift of grace, and that occurs independent of the minister's personal integrity (Ep. 98,2: CSEL 34,521-523). Augustine's statement accedit verbum et fit sacramentum (In Jo. tract. 53,3: CCL 36,529) thus echoes what we have already heard in the writings of the other Fathers, esp. Ambrose of Milan's. But there would be no need to limit the verbum to what we now call, acc. to the tradition of scholasticism, the forma. The verbum in the baptismal questioning is also the response given by the catechumen (In Jo. tract. 53,3: CCL 36,529). Augustine applied all this to different sacraments. After him, some Fathers such as *Maximus of Turin (Serm. 13: CCL 23,44) adopted the same thought and opened the possibilities for the theologians of the 11th and 12th c.

DTC 14, 498-527; LTK 9, 218-225; J. de Ghellinck et al., Pour l'histoire du mot "sacramentum," Louvain-Paris 1924; O. Casel, Zum Wort Sacramentum: JLW 8 (1928) 225-232; E. Neveut, La théologie sacramentelle de saint Augustin: Divus Thomas (Piacenza) 34 (1931) 3-27; J. Daniélou, Bible et Liturgie, Paris 1951; B. de Soos, Le mystère liturgique d'après saint Léon le Grand, LQF 34, Münster 1958; W. van Roo, De sacramentis in genere, Rome 1966; K. Johanny, L'eucharistie, centre de l'histoire du salut chez saint Ambroise de Milan, Paris 1968; G. Francesconi, Storia e simbolo. "Mysterium in figura": la simbolica storico-sacramentale nel linguaggio e nella teologia di Ambrogio di Milano, Brescia 1981; E. Ruffini - E. Lodi, "Mysterion" e "sacramentum." La sacramentalità negli scritti dei Padri e nei testi liturgici primitivi, Bologna 1987; C. Rocchetta, Sacramentaria fondamentale, Bologna 1989, 246-277: "Mysterion" e "sacramentum" nella patristica; V. Grossi, Cristo autore dei sacramenti nella patristica: Riv. lit. 81 (1994) 21-59; B. Sesboüé, Le témoignage de l'Église ancienne: des institutions sacramentelles, in H. Bourgeois - B. Sesboüé, Les signes du salut, Paris 1995, 56-107; B. Studer, La teologia sacramentaria nell'età patristica, in var. aus., Corso di teologia sacramentaria, I, Brescia 2000, 62-84.

A. NOCENT

SACRIFICE. *Augustine of Hippo offered an explicit treatment on the characteristics and the function of sacrifice. He maintained that in every sacrifice one must consider four aspects: (1) the one to whom sacrifice is offered (God), (2) the one who performs the offering (a holy and righteous priest), (3) what is offered (the material used) and (4) for whom it is offered (for imperfect beings who have need of *purification; for this reason the matter of the offering must be without defect). Augustine also noted how these aspects find full expression in the sacrifice of Christ, the one true mediator (De Trin. IV,14,19). Augustine emphasized, moreover, that the visible sacrifice is the *sacrament, i.e., a sacred sign of an invisible sacrifice: for him, in fact, the true sacrifice is "every work with which we undertake to unite ourselves in holy Communion with God, in such a way that it is attributed to the ultimate good through which we can be truly happy" (Civ. Dei X,5-6; see de Broglie, 135-165).

Ancient Christian authors took various positions toward pre-Christian sacrifices. Augustine observed how since antiquity worship toward God was expressed in the form of sacrifice (Civ. Dei X,4). The sacrifices of the *pagans were in error because they were directed to the *demons; they emphasized the powers of created beings rather than the power of the Creator (Aug., Ep. 102,16-21). Jewish sacrifices, however, were seen by Christian authors as a remedy for idolatry (Justin Martyr, Dial. 19,6; Greg. Naz. Or. 31,25; Epiph., Pan. 66,71). God was pleased with these sacrifices not because they benefited him personally but rather because of the intention with which they were completed, i.e., the desire for honoring God, who expressed himself in them; he rejected the sacrifices, however, when they were carried out for personal gain and not to render him worship (Tertull., Marc. II, 22). Jewish sacrifices had a typological value (Clem. Alex., Strom. VII,6,32,7; Orig., C. Cels. IV,31; John Chrysostom, Hom. 17,3 in Hebr.; Aug., In ps. 39,12; 74,12; C. Faust. VI,5; C. adv. leg. I,18,37)—esp. that of the sacrifice of Isaac (see J. Gribomont, Isaac le patriarche: DSp 7, 1922-2005) and that of *Melchizedek (see Ska, 967-972)—and gave way to the sacrifice of Christ (John Chrysostom, Hom. 18,1 in Hebr.; Aug., Civ. Dei X,20).

Ancient Christian authors used sacrificial terminology to interpret the death of Christ. They emphasized the voluntary character of his offering, which had an expiatory value by effecting reconciliation with God. In this offering, Christ is a victim and a priest. (For the interpretation of Christ in terms of the sacrifice offered to the Father, which was esp. present in the 4th-c. West, see *expiation.)

The sacrifice was called the "*Eucharist" since the early days of the church (Did. 14; Justin Martyr, Dial. 41 and 117; Iren., Adv. haer. IV,17,5; Tertull., De orat. 19,4; Trad. Apost. 4 and 21), often in connection with the prophecy of Malachi (1:10ff.) with respect to the

"pure sacrifice." *Cyprian of Carthage (Ep. 63,17) held that we should remember the passion of Christ because "it is in the passion of the Lord that our sacrifice consists." If in fact the Eucharist is a sacrifice (Ambr., In psalm. 38,25; John Chrysostom, In prod. Jud. I, 6), true (Aug., De spir. et litt. 11,18; Civ. Dei X,20), spiritual and unbloody (Cyril Jer., Cat. 23,8), and an immolation (Ambr., Exp. in Lc. I,28), it is also, however, a sacramental or "relational" sacrifice, which is, namely, in relation to the sacrifice of the cross (Cyp., Ep. 63,14; Ambr., De fid. IV,10,124; Sacr. V,4,25; Chrom., Serm. 17A,2; Greg. the Great, Dial. 4,58). The identity between the sacrifice of the cross and the sacrifice offered on the altar, which is its memorial, is known by the fact that, in the first and in the latter case, the priest is unique and the victim is unique (John Chrysostom, Hom. 17,3 in Hebr.), who today as then is the only eternal priest (Ambr., In psalm. 38,25; Aug., De div. quaest. 61,2). The eucharistic sacrifice is an antitype (Greg. Naz., Or. 2,95) or the homoiōma ("a likeness, something similar, similarity, a copy") of the death of Christ (Serap., Euchol. XIII,13); a memorial of the true oblation (Aug., C. Faust. VI,5; XX,18; Theodoret of Cyrrhus, In Hebr. 8,4-5), an image of the eternal *liturgy, which Christ now celebrates in heaven (Theodore of Mopsuestia, Hom. catech. 15,15-16). This is the sacrifice acc. to the order of Melchizedek, which has replaced the sacrifice of Aaron (Aug., In ps. 33, serm. 1,5-6). The eucharistic sacrifice is a sacrifice of thanksgiving (Justin Martyr, Dial. 41,1; Iren., Adv. haer. IV,17,5) and praise (Aug., C. adv. leg. I,20,39), intercession (Cyril Jer. 23,8) and expiation (Ambr., Sacr. IV,6,28; Aug., De anim. II,15,21; Quaest. Hept. III,57); the sacrifice is also offered for the deceased (Tertull., Coron. 3,3; Cyril Jer., Cat. 23,9,10).

With the term sacrifice, in addition to the sacrifice of the cross and the Eucharist, the Fathers also made reference to the offering of Christians, who participate at the eucharistic sacrifice: their offering and their sacrifice must correspond to the sacrifice of the Lord (Cyprian, Ep. 63,9); the church, the body of Christ, every day offers itself through him (Aug., Civ. Dei X,6; XIX,23,5), who is the head of those who offer, and through the church, he exercises his priesthood as man, while as God he receives what is offered (Aug., Civ. Dei X,20; Theodoret of Cyrrhus, In ps. 109,4).

DTC 10, 795-993, 1317-1332; 14, 662-692; EC 8, 757-778; 10, 1585-1597; R.J. Daly, Christian Sacrifice: The Judaeo-Christian Background Before Origen, Washington, DC 1978; Id., The Origins of the Christian Doctrine of Sacrifice, London 1978; TRE 25, 233-278 (esp. 273-278) (bibl.); G. de Broglie, La notion augustinienne du sacrifice "invisible" et "vrai": RecSR 48 (1960); J.L. Ska, Melchisédech: DSp 10, 967-972. For the sacrifice of the Mass, see M. Lepin, L'idée du sacrifice de la Messe d'après les théologiens depuis l'origine jusqu'à nos jours, Paris 1926; J. Solano, Textos eucarísticos primitivos: BAC 88 and 118, Madrid 1962 and 1964 (esp. the index of vol. II, 880-908); J. Betz, Sacrifice et action de graces: La MaisonD. 87 (1966) 78-96; J. de Watteville, Le sacrifice dans les textes eucharistiques des premiers siècles, Neuchâtel 1966; F.M. Young, The Use of Sacrificial Ideas in Greek Christian Writers from the New Testament to John Chrysostom, Macon, GA 1990; J. Betz, Eucharistie in der Schrift und Patristik: HDG IV/4a; var. aus., L'Eucaristia nei Padri della Chiesa: Dizionario di spiritualità biblico patristica, Rome 1998. For the presence of the term "sacrifice" (and some related terms) in the writings of ancient Christian authors, see A. Blaise - H. Chirat, Dictionnaire latin-français des auteurs chrétiens, Strasbourg 1954, 395, 409, 564, 731-732; Lampe 658-660; 671; 1184-1185.

A. Pollastri

SACRILEGIUM (Gk. ἱεροσυλεῖν = sacra legere, rapere, auferre, clepere). The term sacrilege, acc. to the dictionary of Zingarelli (Lo Zingarelli, 2004, 1585), is defined as "desecration, with acts or words, of people, things or sacred or consecrated places." According to the Roman understanding, sacrilege was primarily "an undue subtraction or theft" (furtum) of movable objects, res, which were sacrae or came from a sacred place (aedes, templum; see Quintilian, Inst. 7,3,10: the robbing of a temple came to be seen as an act of high treason because the well-being of the state depended on the goodwill of the gods). Moreover, the occupation of the temple's private property (see Cicero, Leg. 2.21.41) or the property of a third person considered sacred came to be considered a sacrilege (see Cicero, Inv. 1,11). In this case it was a desecration of things that entered into the divine sphere so that the gods were indirectly offended by it. An exception was made for the objects that were preserved in the temple for security reasons. Such objects were not considered the true property of the temple so that their removal was often legally prosecuted as a grave crime of robbery but not as a crime of sacrilege. Nevertheless, the profit obtained by this exemption was a sacrilege, inasmuch as it was done with the intent of monetary gain. As much as this term initially referred to res sacrae it was also subsequently extended, over the course of the broadening of Roman law, to individuals consecrated to God (see Seneca, De benef. 7,7: the violation of a religious vow, whether it occurred through one's own faults or another person's, as could have occurred, e.g., in the case of the vestal virgins, was punished with the death penalty), and to the Roman gods, the local titular deities, the Roman emperors and, last, the heroes of the state. Here we are now dealing with a true and proper "act of impiety" (see Daremberg - Saglio, 980-987). Not sacrificing to the gods was, within this framework, a grave crime (crimen laesae romanae religionis), for which the first Christians were considered guilty (sacrilegii). Moreover, the following were considered to be sacrilegious: adultery, the falsification of coins and fiscal fraud (CTh XI, 36,4; IX, 38,6; XIII, 11,1).

1. The legal position among the Greeks and Romans. In order for sacrilege to be committed, the object first had to be dedicated to the gods in a ritual act (dedicatio). For this reason a sacrilege came to be seen in strict connection to the temple. Objects of value were contained in it that were consecrated to the temple. The desecration of funerary decorations at that time was not considered to be a sacrilege, as long as it did not pertain to such individual figures as heroes, emperors, etc. A key factor in determining if something was sacrilegious was the attitude of the one who stole (animus furandi), i.e., the personal disposition with which the objects consecrated to the gods were profaned, whether the theft, i.e., was committed to obtain a benefit from the subsequent selling of the objects or whether it was committed through simple carelessness toward such objects. The punitive measures for this reason could vary each time acc. to the interpretation of the existing laws. When it pertained to the emperor, even the refusal, however, to recognize the emperor's genius was considered sacrilegious—genius being a characteristic trait of the deities as was the subsequent disregard for his laws (CTh 1,6,9; CI 9,29,2). Only in exceptional cases was it licit for temple priests to sell objects dedicated to the temple, if by such earnings there was an intent to bring about a decoration or an improvement of the temple. The price paid for the acquisition was itself considered an act of dedicatio.

2. Legislation and punitive measures. As already mentioned, the punitive measures for sacrilege could vary considerably acc. to different interpretations and modes of action. For this reason, sacrilege, if it fell under the category of ungodliness (impium), was punished with the death penalty (exsecratio capitis), exile (aqua et igni interdictio), deportation, branding or confiscation of property. In the lighter cases, desecration could be purified through a sacrifice to the gods. Plato, however, made no such distinction in this case. For him, there can only be just one punishment for sacrilege: the distancing from the city of the ungodly person who, stripped of his or her clothes, had to be sent away, or the cadaver had to be buried outside the city. To the contrary, Cleinias of Tarentum maintained a differentiation of the punitive measures acc. to the action committed. It was important that the execution of the punishment (hierosylias graphē) be public, during the course of which the priests indicated the time of the crime and requested the punishment prescribed for it. There was also at times the idea that the gods punished the ungodly person with death, in the event in which the religious authorities did not notice the sacrilege committed.

3. The Bible and sacrilege. Sacrilege was committed, acc. to the Bible, when the sacredness of God was offended. The ancient covenant between God and humans was its foundation. Thus, acc. to Dt 7:25ff., on the basis of this covenant, the exclusion of all idols was required, and likewise indicated the holiness of God was not to be contaminated through the gold with which the idols were made. The mere possession of this gold would have led to the annihilation of the actual building and would have damaged the covenant. In the book of Leviticus (10:1-2) the author spoke of the offering of an "unauthorized fire" which the Lord had not commanded. As a result of this sacrilege, the Lord punished with death the sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu. Their corpses were then taken away from the camp (see also 1 Sam 2:17). In the NT the authors focused on the manifestation of faith in Christ as a decisive sign of God's faithfulness and the salvation that is effected by it. This can be seen, e.g., in the gospel of *Matthew and esp. in *Paul's epistles. In connection to the scene of the purification of the temple recorded in Mt 21:12-13 there followed the curse of the fig tree, a symbol of the disobedient people of *Israel. In this way, lack of faith was seen as a sacrilege. In Rom 2:2, Paul spoke of the condemnation of those who had exalted themselves to the role of judge. Such individuals, acc. to Paul's statements, were proud and obstinate and not ready to convert and with their own behavior condemned themselves. Justification, in fact, acc. to Paul came only from faith.

The Acts of the Apostles (19:21-40) supplies us with important information on the development of the process until the time of the apostle to the Gentiles. As it seems, the popular assembly (ekklēsia) was not present here for the ἱερόσυλοι, who were equivalent to the βλασφημοῦντες τὸν θεόν, but the advocates (ἀγοραῖοι), an expert or proconsul (ἀνθύπατοι) were present.

4. Ancient Christian authors and sacrilege. With the acceptance of Christianity by the Roman Empire, the Christians of the first generations after this event witnessed a broadening of the meaning applied to the term sacrilege. This was related to the fact that the emperors now saw in the Christian God the foundation for the well-being of the state. For this reason, Christianity enjoyed special protection. Crimes against the cult were now considered sacrilegious and condemned with the punishment pertaining to the crimes against the cult (desecration or improper use of a building of worship, of the rites, the *sacraments, disturbance of the religious function, etc.; see *Cypr., De eccl. cath. unitate 17; De lapsis 2) and against the ecclesiastical patrimony (an illicit possession of an ecclesiastical property through an illicit contract; see Cypr., Ep. 52,1), to which were added violations to the privileges of clerics (e.g., the immunity of priests and bishops [CTh X,1,31], the desecration of Sunday, the neglect of episcopal duties, therefore apostasy and, last but not least, schism or heresy (haeresis sacrilega, decreta sacrilega, sacrilegae animae, mentes pectores, Arrius sacrilegus, voces sacrilegae). The false interpretation of sacred *Scripture also fell under the crime of heresy (*Tertull., Adv. Marc. 4: sacrilegium Marcionis). Subsequent mention was made how even an unauthorized second baptism was the crime of sacrilege, which rendered the priest who administered it sacrilegus and peccator (Cyprian, Ep. 70,2; Conc. Carth. LXXXVII [de haereticis baptizandis]: sic enim scriptum est: una fides, una spes, unum baptismum, non apud haereticos, ubi spes nulla est et fides falsa, ubi omnia per mendacium geruntur, ubi exorcizat daemoniacus, sacramentum interrogat, cuius os et verba cancerem mittunt, fidem dat infidelis, veniam delictorum tribuit sceleratus et in nomine Christi tingit antichristus, benedicit a deo maledictus, vitam pollicetur mortuus, pacem dat inpacificus, deum invocat blasphemus, sacerdotium administrat profanus, ponit altare sacrilegus). Even the desecration of the consecrated life was considered a sacrilege (Tertull., De virg. vel. 3; De pud. 20). The desecration of Christian tombs was then subjected to punishment because of the Christian belief in the *resurrection, a crime that was also called homicidium. Moreover, even the immoral behavior of the one who took part in a religious celebration was considered a sacrilege.

DAGR 4, 980-987; PWK 20/2, 1678-1682; Lexikon der christlichen Antike, 325 (Sakrileg); Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament 3, 254-256 (ἱεροσυλέω); F. Gnoli, see Sacrilegio (dir. romano): Enciclopedia del diritto 39, 212-215; R.A. Bauman, Tertullian and the Crime of Sacrilegium: JRH 4 (1967) 175-183; O. Robinson, Blasphemy and Sacrilege in Roman Law: Irish Jurist 8(1973) 356-371; J. Barlow, Cicero's Sacrilege in 63 B.C., in Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, ed. Carl Deroux, VII, Brussels 1994, 180-189; R. Maceratini, Ricerche sullo stato giuridico dell'eretico nel diritto romano-cristiano e nel diritto canonico classico: da Graziano ad Uguccione, Padua 1994; H. Petersmann, L'homélie pseudo-augustinienne "sur le sacrilege." Un document gallo-romain concernant la lutte des chrétiens contre le paganisme, in Culture antique et fanatisme, ed. J. Dion, Nancy-Paris 1996, 141-149; N. Zeddies, "Religio et sacrilegium." Studien zur Inkriminierung von Magie, Häresie und Heidentum (4.-7. Jahrhundert), Frankfurt a.M. 2003.

J. Lam Cong Quy

SAECULUM (world/age). The most ancient translators of the sacred books generally adopted term saeculum to translate Greek term αἰών, which in turn was the equivalent of the Hebrew term ʿôlām in its various meanings: "the duration of world," "world," "human world" fallen and ephemeral with respect to the divine world. But in the Afra tradition of the Vetus Latina, esp. in the gospel of John, the term saeculum also appears as the normal equivalent of the Greek term κόσμος, likewise adopted by the Hellenistic Jewish linguistic tradition as the equivalent of ʿôlām. Perhaps the Latin mentality resisted assigning a negative semantic meaning to the term mundus (which until that time etymologically recalled the idea of the order and the beauty of the world); but the preference accorded to the term saeculum is likely explained by the fact that this term, already existing in secular Latin, could be used with a negative ethical meaning in reference to the fall of the human generations (see Virg., Georg. I,468; Horace, Carm. III,6,17; Cic., Parad. 50; Quintil., Inst. II, 5; Tac., Germ. 19,9). One can thus explain the clear preference given to the term saeculum with respect to mundus by writers who had a classical education, such as Tertullian, Cyprian and Lactantius. In patristic language, the term saeculum, continuing the classical meanings of saeculum (the space of one hundred years), "the temporal world," "humanity living in time," can therefore refer to "the present time," "the present life," without any specific negative meaning (see Tertull., Spect. 2,9, acc. to which God is the author of the world auctor saeculi; Val. 15,5; Cypr., Dom. orat. 13); analogously, it can refer to the temporal duration of the world (see Cypr., Ep. 58,7; Hilar., Myst. 1,1; August., Serm. 239,6). But more often, behind the suggestion of the linguistic biblical condition, it can have a negative semantic meaning of an ethic-religious force so that the term saeculum can refer to the human world in its vanity and fallenness (see Tertull., Res. 19,7; Apol. 21,6; An. 1,6; Mart. 2,5; Cypr., Mort. 21; Lact., Div. inst. V,1,19). At times it even emphasizes the sinful aspect of human life (see Tertull., Spect. 8,10; 15,8; Cypr., Hab. virg. 7; Commod., Instr. II,18,1; II,25,2). In the context of the persecutory disposition of the pagan world toward Christianity, the term saeculum can specifically refer to the pagan persecutor (see Tertull., Pud. 1,1; 1,4; Cypr., Laps. 2; Lact., Div. inst. V,1,26; VI,17,25; Epit. 61,6; Mort. pers. 16,5). In the connection of the two terms saecula saeculorum or rather saeculum saeculi, which is of biblical origin and which was affirmed in the Christian doxologies, the term saeculum serves to refer to an indefinite duration, eternity.

H. von Soden, Das lateinische Neue Testament in Afrika zur Zeit Cyprians, Leipzig 1909, 63-71, 147; DB 5, 1707-1708; GLNT 1, 535-565; H. Helbling, Saeculum humanum: Ansätze zu einem Versuch über Spätmittelalterliches Geschichtsdenken, Naples 1953; G. Lettieri, A proposito del concetto di saeculum nel De civitate Dei: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 481-498; Id., Il senso della storia in Agostino d'Ippona: il "saeculum" e la gloria nel "De civitate dei," Rome 1988; R.A. Markus, Saeculum*: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine*, Cambridge 1988; P. Bellini, Saeculum christianum*: sui modi di presenza della Chiesa nella vicenda politica degli uomini*, Turin 1995.

V. Loi - B. Amata

SAHAK the Great (Isaac; Armenian catholicos, 387–438). Born around 350, he was the last descendant from the line of St. *Gregory the Illuminator. When he became *catholicos, he actively intervened in the political life of *Armenia, which at that time was divided between the *Byzantine Empire and the Persian Empire. Among other things, thanks to his intercession, the Persian king *Yazdegerd ended the persecution against Christians. Deposed around the year 425 for political reasons, Sahak preserved a strong moral authority over the Armenian church. He had a very important role in the creation of the Armenian alphabet with his full support for the work of *Mesrob, and he himself undertook the translation of parts of *Scripture into *Armenian (the Pentateuch, Isaiah and the *Wisdom books), as well as "explanations of Scripture" (probably homiletic *commentaries). His literary production, if it ever existed, has been lost with the exception of a few letters he sent to the emperor *Theodosius II, to *Atticus of Constantinople and to the prefect *Anatolius of Constantinople. Of special interest was his correspondence with *Proclus of Constantinople, who at this time returned his Tomus ad armenos. The Armenian tradition attributes to Sahak a spurious *liturgy and some doubtful canons.

BS 7, 916-918; EC 10, 1616; Bardenhewer 5, 195-197; V. Hakobyan (ed.), Kanonagirk' Hayoc' [Armenian law]. I, Erevan 1964, 363-421 (Canons).

S.J. Voicu

SAHDONA. See *MARTYRIUS

SAINT and HOLINESS

I. Saint and holiness in the OT and in Second Temple Judaism - II. Saint and holiness in the NT - III. Evolution of two concepts in the patristic age - IV. The criticisms of the cult of the saints.

The concepts of saint and holiness seem closely connected, but at first sight these terms are not so easy to define. This is the case because the human perception of holiness changes with the vicissitudes of time and culture, being heavily determined by historical-geographical contingencies. Therefore, to understand in which manner these concepts were understood in the patristic age, it is necessary above all to focus one's attention on the historical context in which Christianity was born and developed.

I. Saint and holiness in the OT and in Second Temple Judaism. In the ancient religion of Israel, as is described to us from the OT, the terminology of sanctity was drawn from the Semitic root qdš. With this term and the other various words derived from it Israelites in the first place referred to God and, therefore, to everything that is in one way or another connected to him: places, temples, objects, priests and people. Now, given that acc. to an uncertain but widely held etymology, this root would suggest in the first place an idea of "separation" or even "rift"; if it referred to God, it would indicate his inaccessibility and transcendence (from which would follow religious fear), although, if it referred to men and things, it would essentially designate everything that remains separate from everything else, which is reserved for a special place, distinct from everyday use (Procksch), thus conveying the notion of "purity," esp. in a ritual sense.

Some scholars, however, have expressed some reservations and perplexity with respect to such an interpretation (Kornfeld, Costecalde and Cazelles), esp. in light of some new linguistic and cultural data. These scholars have indeed observed on the one hand that when the biblical authors used the derivatives from the root qdš to qualify the divine name YHWH, they demonstrate continuity with its usage in other Semitic languages to refer to Ba'al, El or any other divinity; on the other hand, they indicate that in the *Bible, as in other Semitic texts, the derivatives of the root qdš seem to express not so much the idea of interdiction or separation as much as they express the idea of belonging and relation. The formula "God qâdosh," which is very ancient and frequently used in the Bible, seems in fact generally to refer to God who is above all deserving that the thing or person who draws near to him be consecrated objects, places and individuals; in return God consecrates them (Ringgren: qâdosh ist ein Relationsbegriff). In conclusion, keeping in mind also that the equivalent Greek and Latin terms of qâdosh, i.e., ἅγιος and sanctus, appear in corresponding cultural contexts, one can conclude that the term "holy," if used in reference to God, acquires the value of "divine," "God's being" (also in relation to the idea of mysterium tremendum), and, if used in reference to the human being or to things, it acquires the meaning of "belonging to God," "in relationship with God." But if this is the case, what is the relationship between these meanings and ideas with the aforementioned concepts of separation and exclusion marked by the theoretical etymology of qdš?

To understand this relationship, it is necessary to reconstruct the context of the calling to holiness, which many times, with slight variations, finds expression in the book of Leviticus: "Be holy because I the Lord your God am holy" (see Lev 11:44-45; 19:1-4; 20:6-8; 25-26; 22:31-33). Here, and esp. in the section referred to as Heiligkeitsgesetz (Lev 17–26), the emergence of this calling clearly established an ineliminable divine-human bond of reciprocity. The horizon upon which the relationship is designed is not put off to an ethereal mysticism but is found in human action on the level of history. It is God himself, in fact, who enters into human time and takes the initiative: in the first place, by choosing the people and thereby making the first step by delivering them from the slavery of *Egypt (see esp. Lev 11:45 and 22:33), and in the second place by setting down norms that govern the covenant. If the determination of the past, on the one hand, had established the terms of belonging, then, on the other, it will lead to the people's separateness and exclusion. If in fact it is the reciprocal belonging between God and the people that brings about the people's holiness (Lev 20:7-8 and esp. Lev 20:26) and that makes God the God of this particular people (see esp. Lev 22:33), then the same binding force of their relationship implies separation from everything that remains outside this union. Israel, in fact, is not only the elect people—i.e., the only group that God has chosen for themselves—but also the people "set apart" (see Lev 20:25-26). Having come to share with its God such an essential characteristic like holiness, Israel can no longer keep the idolatrous practices of former times nor maintain a coexistence with those people whom God has rejected. "Separation" or "rift," therefore, do not seem to present themselves as the constituent element of holiness but more simply as its corollary, a necessary consequence, but not a necessitating consequence.

In the same way the question must be asked with respect to the other two elements that played an important role in the OT definition of "holiness": the fulfillment of the precepts and the norms pertaining to ritual purity. Both are certainly explicitly requested by Leviticus and even seemed to present themselves as instruments of holiness through which it can and must be expressed; nevertheless, they are not the constituent element, nor did they assert themselves in such an unmistakable way that they have in and of themselves the ability to acquire or lose holiness (Lev 26:44-45).

The holiness proposed by the book of Leviticus is therefore portrayed as an ineliminable bond established once and for all between God and his people, a bond that leads one into a special condition, which in turn leads to the obligation of adapting oneself to specific norms that have a heavy ritual connotation and do not necessarily imply ethical components (Ringgren). Nevertheless, the prophetic movement, by recovering the awareness of so extraordinary and intense a relationship between God and humanity as that described in Leviticus, initiated a process that would gradually lead, at least as proposed, to the unshackling of holiness from the rigidities of ritualism in order to introduce an emphasis on an ever more intense spiritualization with a heavy emphasis on ethical behavior (Bardy). Already in the text of First Isaiah, in considering the prohibitions, there emerges in fact an obvious transition from the physical to the moral plane (Is 6:7), although, esp. during the postexilic period, the cult itself seems to be perceived as the crowning of faith, sacrifice as an act of reconciliation with God, and the Holy Spirit (rûah haqqōdeš) as the interior author of such a reconciliation (Ps 51:13; see Ezek 36:26-27).

Finally, to complete the picture on the Jewish "roots" of Christian holiness, it would perhaps be opportune to mention that in the later books of the OT, as well as in such authors as Flavius Josephus or *Philo of *Alexandria, the heavy influence of Hellenistic culture and the ethical demands imposed by Greek philosophy made its presence felt. Such an influence would have evidently conditioned both their perception of the human being and that of God, leading them to reconsider the ways and the ends of this reciprocal way of relating to each other.

II. Saint and holiness in the NT. The writings that converge together into the NT corpus demonstrate a very strong dependence on the OT conception of holiness, but they also present significant variants and original aspects on this topic. Even here the "holy one" par excellence is still God (although the attribution of the title, even though generally pre-supposed, appears relatively infrequently: Jn 17:12; 1 Pet 2:9; Rev 4:8; 6:10). Alongside God the following figures enjoyed this name: Christ, who at times is referred to in the line of the prophetic tradition as "the holy one of God" (see Mk 1:24; Lk 4:34; Jn 6:69; Rev 3:7), and esp. the Spirit. In both cases the title would seem to be an indication of divinity, but this is not the only attested meaning. In relation to the Son, e.g., the expression ὁ ἅγιος παῖς (see Acts 3:14; 4:27, 30) would seem rather to refer to the sacrificial mission to which he was called; although, with respect to the Spirit, one must keep in mind that the Spirit is mentioned in its role of sanctifying power, a power that was initially expressed at *Pentecost (see Acts 20:22), and therefore in the sacraments Christ has left to his church.

*Baptism and *Eucharist certainly establish the distinctive sign of the new worshiping community; through them Christians enters into mystical communion with the death of Christ, and they do that "in the Spirit." It will therefore be the (Holy) Spirit who will effect regeneration, the new creation, which transforms the old person into a totally renewed person (see 1 Cor 12:13; 2 Cor 5:17; Rom 6:3-8; Col 2:12; Tit 3), and the Christian community will thus be able to obtain the status of ἁγιασμός, πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον (see 1 Th 4:8; 2 Tim 1:14). Precisely in relation to the work of the Spirit and the consequences that this has for the ends of human sanctification, one notices with particular vividness the long road already traveled by that process of interiorization and spiritualization that began with the prophetic movement.

If in fact the NT inherited from the OT the connection between belonging to God and holiness, and therefore between holiness and worship, this connection is already on a different level. 1 *Peter, e.g., seems to allow the emergence of the same injunctions from the book of Leviticus both in renewing the call to holiness (1 Pet 1:15-16, with a citation of Lev 19:2), and in defining Christians as "a chosen race" and a "holy nation" (1 Pet 2:9, Is 43:20-21; Ex 19:6). But with respect to the first case, in the gospel saying, the ancient legalistic establishment seems to be definitively replaced by a more intimate call to perfection and mercy as the heavenly Father is perfect and merciful (see Mt 5:48; and for the abandonment of every type of formalism Mt 15:11-20); while, with respect to the second, it works a true and proper "transformation of belonging," which must now identify the "holy people" no longer with the old Israel but with the church of Christ, which has been unshackled from national limitations and gathered from different peoples but all sanctified from the root from which Christ drew his origin and from the vital lymph that flows from there (the Spirit of sanctification; see Rom 11:16ff, but also Eph 2:12; 5:26; 1 Cor 1:2; Rom 15:16).

With that in mind, it is not surprising that Paul frequently used the term ἅγιοι to refer to Christians (see, e.g., Rom 1:7; 15:25-26; 1 Cor 1:2; 16:1.15; 2 Cor 8:4; Eph 5:27); Christians, acc. to his view, are not "saints" by nature but receive this privilege, or to be more exact enter into this condition, by virtue of the call of divine grace. As ἅγιοι, they belong to a worshiping community which is established upon the sacrifice of Christ (Col 3:12), and for this reason they themselves are called to become a living sacrifice: θυσία ζῶσα ἁγία εὐάρεστος τῷ θεῷ (Rom 12:1; see 15:16, but also Phil 2:17). The sacrifice thus accomplishes a complete identification between victim and offerer, and the sacrificial dimension comes to consume the Christian's entire life (and not only its own possible, violent conclusion). This involves, despite the process of spiritualization mentioned many times and the undeniable changing of perspective, the preservation of a cultic element even within the new community: "purity." It is necessary, however, to specify that the type of purity to which Jesus referred—take the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:8)—is quite different from the ritual purity prescribed for priests, offerers and victims in the book of Leviticus because it possesses a clear and unmistakable ethical connotation, which is consistently echoed, moreover, in other NT writings (see 1 Tim 1:5; 2 Tim 2:22; Tit 1:15; Jas 1:27).

Nevertheless, the injunction certainly remains. At least in the first case, this does not pertain to a new way of acting as much as it pertains to a new way of being; a specific moral "action" is certainly not requested (which could be defined as δικαιοσύνη), even though a special "condition," the condition precisely of the person who finds himself in a state of perfect innocence (ἁγιασμός). The "perfect innocence" must in any case find confirmation in a coherent form of behavior, and here once again we are brought back to a level of practice at a higher and different level; in fact, whatever human action is taken, it must be controlled and directed by love (see Eph 1:15; Philem 5; 1 Cor 16:1ff.). The Christian communities, esp. in the texts that can be attributed to Paul or his influence, are precisely characterized by being established on the close unity of those who have been reconciled in Christ and who, regarding themselves as siblings on account of this (it is not by chance that it was precisely the term "siblings" that was Paul's favorite expression to refer to the members of the first communities; see Destro - Pesce), they love one another with a reciprocal love. The "holy kiss" that the Christians exchanged is therefore not a banal form of greeting but is the very seal of the community to which they belong (see 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Th 5:26), a seal that, nonetheless, once again, has a ritual and liturgical character.

In conclusion we have to say that, for as much as the progress toward a spiritualized and interiorized dimension has been emphasized, the NT's concept of holiness cannot be reduced to a mere ethical connotation without always insisting on a religious interpretation, not to mention the place of worship.

III. Evolution of two concepts in the patristic age. The followers of the new faith, as has been seen, received the title of "saints" only inasmuch as they were members of the ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν Χριστῷ. It follows that Christian holiness in the first centuries had, and could not but have, an essentially collective dimension. Nonetheless, with the passing of time, what seemed to be a shared possession seems to have been reduced to a few, select individuals who began to be considered saints par excellence, those who alone were "saints" in the full sense of the term. The phenomenon at times was presented as unforeseen, determined by the indiscriminate admission of a mass of faithful who were religiously inferior and hardly motivated, the poisoned fruit of the peace of the church. In reality, this was a very gradual process that witnessed different developments in various geographical regions, the details of which we do not know with precision to this day. To obtain an adequate understanding of this we would need to have access to much more precise information on the evolution of the individual figures who became the object of veneration (the mechanical replacement of martyr with monk, which was brought about only through the cessation of the persecutions, today appears to be historiographically naive and unfeasible), on the various levels of the formation of the cult and, esp., on the evolution of what one could call the perception of holiness.

Of the three areas just mentioned what appears to be the most known is certainly the second. Already studies done by Delehaye at the beginning of the 20th c. had in fact brought to light how the cult of the saints had a direct connection to the cult of the martyrs, which in turn derived, recta via, from that of the dead. But cult and veneration, as Van Uytfanghe, among others, noted are not the same thing; veneration "begins" much earlier than the cult, which is in turn preceded by admiration, from the attention directed toward persons (who were not yet noted personages!) who are set forth as ideal models of behavior in difficult, if not dramatic, situations. Cyprian's Letters (as well as Lucian's De morte Peregrini) attest with a certain precision to the first state of the process: the communities surrounded the martyrs (designati) with minute care while they were still alive and then adorned their memory after death (the Dies natalis, with a significant semantic inversion) during the eucharistic celebration. As Cyprian clarifies, however, the sacrifice is still held for the martyrs, i.e., in their favor (Ep. 12,2; 39,3; so too in the liturgy of *John Chrysostom it appears as an ancient survival). Not until almost two centuries later, at least in *Africa, was the cult fully attested and consciously assumed by the Catholic hierarchy; it was then Augustine who explicitly affirmed that no longer did the faithful pray for the martyrs but rather that the latter, having been established in God's glory, intercede for them (Serm. 285 and Civ. Dei VIII,27).

The portraits of these recipients of liturgical practices are now stabilized, delineated, however, by the bishop with different features than the most ancient martyrial images, and seem to embody a new model or ideal of holiness. One in fact does not notice substantial differences of approach between their celebrations and those of other figures who with ever-increasing frequency emerge in Augustine's work. Augustine in his homilies and treatises in fact began to mention, alongside those more established glorious Africans such as Perpetua, Felicity and others, an entire series of noted individuals, primarily illustrious bishops of proven faith and doctrine, to whom he assigned the same virtues that were praised in the martyrs (esp. charity, humility and love for peace), and to whom he referred with the honorable title of sancti, which by that time was used in a technical sense (Zocca). If we then turn our gaze from this famous African father to other contemporary authors, we realize that more or less during the same period (shortly before or shortly after) other famous bishops adopted this approach.

And it is not by chance that likewise between the 4th and 5th c. a rich hagiographical production dedicated to monks, ascetics and bishops (thus *Athanasius, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Jerome, *Sulpicius Severus, *Paulinus of Milan, *Possidius etc.) was joined to the martyrial literature. This extraordinary literary production led Peter Brown to speak of "the entrepreneurs of sanctity." This expression has raised numerous debates (Pietri: le villain mot), but one certainly cannot ignore what Brown so vividly emphasized. Whether it was a shrewd political-ecclesiastical promotion or sincere devotion or both, the fact of the matter is that from that time onward the cult of the saints seems to have received an extraordinary push, spreading itself almost everywhere.

Having considered the portrait just reconstructed, to speak of the simple passage of witness from "martyr" to "saint," of the succession of one "model" to another, certainly seems to be improper. It was not a replacement but was something else that perhaps calls to mind more closely the phenomenon of pseudomorphosis (Pietri); a new perception of holiness in fact seems, at one given moment, to become external both in the elaboration of new figures and in the "revisitation" of types already known, giving life to original forms that become bearers of values and changed demands. It has been said that "the proclaimed saint defines himself, but also the social and ecclesial group that produces the saint and, in a certain way, desires him" (Grégoire). This means that between the "saint" and the community that venerates him or her as such an exchange takes place, in virtue of which the former is made out to be an ideal example for his devotees, although the latter, for their part, "model" his or her image, attributing to it worries, desires and needs that were not otherwise expressed by that saint. In other words, society—to use a classic formula—produces the saints it needs: it produces the images in which it recognizes itself and by which it allows itself to be conditioned (Delooz).

It is evident then that the key point of the discourse remains the idea of holiness, or better yet the changes that this idea underwent over the course of time. It was a long and complex journey that cannot be outlined here in detail, because of notable variations both geographically and chronologically. There exist, however, some macroscopic factors at work in almost the entirety of the empire that could have certainly played a role in determining the passage from a widespread holiness to more individualized and codified forms.

We can quickly lay out a brief outline of the historical process: the progressive increase of the Christian communities, which led to the admission of an ever-growing number of new adherents to the faith coming from different social and cultural levels (even the highest levels of society and therefore philosophically trained); the advent of the religious peace which, with the end of the persecutions, provoked a sort of identity crisis (Markus) among those who had found a gravitational center in the ancient martyrial saying christianus sum (think of the marvelous text in Passio Perpetuae 3,1-2); the beginning of an ever more clear-cut distinction between clergy and laity, which led the latter to view themselves almost at the margins of an all-encompassing Christian commitment (= holiness?), which by then had been perceived as irreconcilable with normal daily activities and therefore delegated to "specialists" who were dedicated to it full-time (Singles, Brown); the progress and deepening of the theological debate which, emphasizing above all the divinity of Christ against *Arianism, perhaps invited the faithful to seek more humble and closer mediators (although the philosophical religious culture of the time set forth with ever-increasing conviction the necessity of an intermediation between heaven and earth). Last, even the evolution of *eschatology could have had a further effect so that Christians turned to the "saints" as the ideal intercessors before God (Van Uytfanghe). One certainly cannot ignore some psychological and social components of the time mentioned by Brown: in a world that had become uncertain and insecure, it must have seemed natural to seek an invisible patron who in virtue of his status as an amicus dei knew how to accompany and protect the existence of individuals whose life had become gradually more difficult. All these factors certainly contributed to the emergence of the "saint," as in the establishment and differentiation of ever-renewed typologies. Nevertheless, as was said, for a proper and exhaustive explanation of the phenomenon, it would be necessary to examine case by case the different geographical-cultural contexts and to reconstruct, due to the ordered composition of endless details, a single history made of many individual stories.

IV. The criticisms of the cult of the saints. When one speaks of the cult of the saints, one immediately thinks of the Protestant Reformation and, as a result, the Catholic response. In reality, accusations and complaints were raised almost from the very beginning and came from outside and inside Christianity. With respect to the outside, the existence of problems in this regard are recorded for us by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VIII, 6,7) and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (Graecorum affectionum cur. VIII), but above all in the person of the emperor *Julian, who rebuked Christians for having abandoned OT monotheism for the cult of their martyrs (C. Galileos 201E). Other critiques came, however, as was said, from closer regions. Due to Augustine's testimony (C. Faust. 20,21), we have come to know that the Manichean *Faustus stigmatized the Christian practice in terms very similar to those of the emperor Julian, while *Jerome (C. Vigil. Ep. 61 and 109) mentioned the concerned reservations expressed by *Vigilantius, a Christian priest who discerned idolatrous practice in the cult of the relics and esp. in the belief in their thaumaturgic power. The Catholic clergy always responded by vociferously defending the cult of the saints, but not without introducing cautions and needed corrections. Bishops and presbyters indeed strained to emphasize how the one true mediator between God and man was still Christ Jesus (1 Tim 2:5), and how even the miracles obtained through the intercession of the saints, or which occurred near their bodies, or from their relics, were nothing other than a manifestation of divine power.

E. Lucius - G. Anrich, Die Anfängen des Heiligenkultus in der christilichen Kirche, Tübingen 1904; E. Vacandard, Les origines du culte des saints, in Études de critique et d'histoire religieuse, Paris ²1912, 59-211; H. Delehaye, Sanctus. Essai sur le culte des saints dans l'antiquité (Subsidia hagiographica 17), Brussels 1927; Id., Les origines du culte des martyrs (Subsidia hagiographica 20), Brussels ²1933; A. Michel, La sainteté: DTC 14, 2 (1939) 841-870; P. Séjourné, Saints (cult de): ibid., 870-900; A.J. Festugière, La sainteté, Paris 1949; B. Kötting, Heiligkeit u. Heiligentypen in der ersten Christlichen Jahrhunderts: Diözesanpriester 1 (1949) 12-27 (= Ecclesia peregrinans. Gesammelte Aufsätze. Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie 54,2, Münster 1988, 43-60); H. Leclercq, Saints: DACL 15 (1950) 373-462; E. Malone, The Monk and the Martyr: The Monk as the Successor of the Martyr, Washington, DC 1950; Heilig, das Heilige, ed. var. aus.: LTK² 5, 84-92; T. Klauser, Christlicher Märtyrerkult, haidnischer Heroenkult und spätjüdischen Heiligenverehrung. Neue Einsischten und neue Probleme, Cologne-Opladen 1960; P. Delooz, Pour une étude sociologique de la sainteté canonisée dans l'Église catholique: Archives de sociologie des religions 13 (1962) 17-43; Ph. Rouillard, Le culte des saints au temps des Pères: Assemblée du Seigneur 89 (1963) 62-85; A.M. Orselli, L'idea e il culto del santo patrono cittadino nella letteratura latina cristiana, Bologna 1965; O. Procksch, ἅγιος, ἁγιάζω, ἁγιασμός, ἁγιότης, ἁγιωσύνη: GLNT I (1965) 234-310; P. Van Bergen, La vie quotidienne vécue comme culte et sacrifice spirituel, in Sainteté et vie dans le siècle (Laïcat et Sainteté 2), Rome 1965, 83-107; A. Di Nola, Santi e santità: Enciclopedia delle Religioni (Vallecchi) 5 (1973) 816-825; A. Goldberg, Der Heilige u. die Heiligen, in F.V. Lilienfeld (ed.), Aspekte frühchristlicher Heiligkeit, Lehrstühl für Gesch. & Theol. des christl. Ostens an der Univ. Erlangen 1977 (Oikonomia 6), 16-34; 142-149; N. Hermann-Mascard, Les reliques des saints. Formation coutumière d'un droit (Societé d'histoire du droit. Collection d'histoire institutionelle et sociale 6), Paris 1975; C. Duquoc, Modelli di santità: Concilium 15,9 (1979) 13-23; C. Leonardi, Dalla santità monastica alla santità politica: Concilium 9 (1979) 85-97; Id., I modelli dell'agiografia latina dall'epoca antica al Medioevo, in Passaggio dal mondo antico al Medio Evo da Teodosio a San Gregorio Magno. Roma, 25-28 maggio 1977 (Atti dei Convegni Lincei 45), Rome 1980, 435-476; G. Bardy, La conversione al cristianesimo nei primi secoli, Milan ²1981; A.M. Orselli, Il santo patrono cittadino fra tardoantico e altomedioevo. Atti del Convegno tenuto a Roma dal 12 al 16 novembre 1979, II, Rome 1981, 771-784; M. Van Uytfanghe, La controverse biblique et patristique autour du miracle, et ses répercussions sur l'hagiographie dans l'Antiquité tardive et le haut Moyen Âge latin, in Hagiographie, cultures et sociétés, IVᵉ-XIIᵉ siècles. Actes du Colloque organisée à Nanterre et à Paris (2-5 mai 1979), Paris, Études Augustiniennes, 1981, 205-231; A. Vauchez, La sainteté en Occident aux derniers siècles du moyen âge d'après les procés de canonisation et les documents hagiographiques, École Française de Rome, Rome 1981; Id., Santità: Enciclopedia Einaudi 12 (1981) 441-453; J. Fontaine, Le cult des saints et ses implications sociologiques: AB 100 (1982) 17-41; H.P. Müller, qdš, Santo, in E. Jenni - C. Westermann, Dizionario teologico dell'Antico Testamento, It. tr., Casale Monf. 1982, 530-549; S. Boesch Gajano, Il culto dei santi: filologia, antropologia e storia: Studi storici 1 (1982) 119-136; P. Brown, The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity, Chicago 1981; Saints and Their Cults, ed. S. Wilson, Cambridge 1983; R. Kirschner, The Vocation of Holiness in Late Antiquity: VChr 38 (1984) 105-124; Ch. Pietri, Les origines du culte de martyr (d'après un ouvrage récent): RivAC 60 (1984) 293-319; H. Cazelles, Le développement des notions de "sacré" et de "sainteté" dans l'Ancien Testament: DBS 10 (1985) 1415-1432; K. Hausberger, Heilige/Heiligeverehrung III-IV: TRE 14 (1985) 646-655; D. Kellermann, Heiligkeit II: ibid., 700-701; C.B. Costecalde, Sacré (et sainteté): DBS 10 (1985) 1346-1415; Id., Aux origines du sacré biblique, Paris 1986; G.L. Müller, Gemeinschaft und Verehrung der Heiligen. Geschichtlich-systematische Grundlegung der Hagiologie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1986; R. Grégoire, Manuale di agiologia. Introduzione alla letteratura agiografica, Fabriano 1987; J. Guillet, Sainteté de Dieu: DSp 14, Paris 1988, 184-192; A. Dihle, Heilig: RAC 14 (1988) 1-63; T. Baumeister, Heiligenverehrung I: ibid., 96-150; M. Van Uytfanghe, Heiligenverehrung II (Hagiographie): ibid., 150-184; Id., La typologie de la sainteté en Occident vers la fin de l'Antiquité, in Scrivere di Santi. Atti del II Conv. di Studio dell'Ass. It. per lo Studio della Santità, dei culti e dell'Agiografia. Naples 22-25 ottobre 1997, ed. G. Luongo, Rome 1998, 17-47; Histoire des saints et de la sainteté chrétienne, ed. F. Chiovaro et al., 11 vols., Paris 1986-88 (It. tr. Milan 1991); W. Kornfeld - H. Ringgren, qdš, in Theologische Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament, VI, Stuttgart-Berlin-Cologne 1989, 1179-1204; C. Leonardi, Modelli di santità tra secolo V e VII, in Santi e demoni nell'alto medioevo occidentale (secoli V-XI), Atti della XXXVI Settimana di studio sull'alto medioevo, Spoleto 7-13 aprile 1988, Spoleto 1989, 261-283; Ch. Pietri, Saints et démons. L'héritage de l'hagiographie antique, ibid., 15-90; P. Dinzelbacher - E.R. Bauer (eds.), Heiligenverehrung in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Ostfildern 1990; Ch. Pietri, L'évolution du culte des saints aux premiers siècles chrétiens: du témoin à l'intercesseur, in Les fonctions des saints dans le monde occidental (IIIᵉ-XIIIᵉ siècle), Rome 1991, 15-36; M. Van Uytfanghe, L'essor du culte des saints et la question de l'eschatologie, ibid., 91-107; P. Brown, The Body and Society, New York 1988; M. Forlin Patrucco, Modelli di santità e santità episcopale nel IV secolo: l'elaborazione de Padri cappadoci, in Modelli di santità e modelli di comportamento, Turin 1994, 65-77; F. Scorza Barcellona, Dal Modello ai modelli, ibid., 9-17; A. Destro - M. Pesce, Identità nella comunità paolina: santi e fratelli, in Atti del IV simposio di Tarso su S. Paolo Apostolo, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 1996, 107-124; R.A. Markus, La fine della cristianità antica, It. tr., Rome 1996; M. Van Uytfanghe, L'origine, l'essor et les fonctions du culte des saints. Quelques repères pour un débat rouvert: Cassiodorus 2 (1966) 143-196; A. Angenendt, Heilige und Reliquien. Die Geschichte ihres Kultes von frühen Christentum bis zur Gegenwart, Munich ²1997; Santità, culti, agiografia. Temi e prospettive, ed. S. Boesch Gajano, Rome 1997; E. Zocca, La figura del santo vescovo in Africa: da Ponzio a Possidio, in Vescovi e Pastori in epoca teodosiana. XXV Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana. Roma 8-11 maggio 1996 (SEA 58), Rome 1997, I, 469-492; Il grande libro dei santi. Dizionario Enciclopedico, ed. C. Leonardi - A. Ricciardi - G. Zarri, 3 vols., Cinisello Balsamo 1998; S. Boesch Gajano, La santità, Bari 1999; A.M. Orselli, Modelli di santità e modelli agiografici nell'Occidente latino: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 168-185; The Cult of Saints in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages: Essays on the Contribution of Peter Brown, ed. J. Howard-Johnston - P.A. Hayward, Oxford 1999; D. Singles, Un "peuple saint" sous le poids du sacré, in Anthropos laikos. Mélanges Alexandre Faivre à l'occasion de ses 30 ans d'enseignement, (eds.) M.-A. Vannier - O. Wermelinger - G. Wurst (Paradosis 44), Fribourg 2000, 304-314; P. Delooz, Sainteté et martyre, in Deux mille ans d'histoire de l'Église. Bilan et perspectives historiographiques, (eds.) J. Pirotte - E. Louchez, (= RHE 95/3, 2000), Leuven 2000, 34-47; F. Scorza Barcellona, Le origini, in Storia della santità nel cristianesimo occidentale, Rome 2005, 19-89; P. Siniscalco, Modèles de sainteté dans le christianisme ancien (Ier-IVe siècle): le baptisé, le martyr, l'empereur, in Séminaires internationaux d'études historiques "De Rome à la troisième Rome." Rome-Mosca, settembre 2000; E. Zocca, Dai "santi" al "Santo": un percorso storico linguistico intorno all'idea di santità (Africa Romana secc. II-V) (Verba seniorum 13), Rome 2003.

E. Zocca

SAINTS, FOOLISH (Holy Fools)

I. History and literature - II. Spirituality - III. Social-political context.

In an ideal history of ancient sanctity for individuals, the foolish saint succeeded the monk just as the monk had succeeded the *martyr. Starting from the 3rd c., historians and hagiographers wrote of a very rare form of asceticism practiced by monks who, with a bizarre and chosen form of behavior, outside every form of rationality in social and ecclesiastical relations, unmasked hypocritical behaviors and led many to conversion, often only moral, sometimes to Christianity, and occasionally to *Chalcedonian orthodoxy. Their holiness was recognized only after their death, when through the divine will it appeared evident to all that their folly was actually a fiction lived for (love of) Jesus Christ.

I. History and literature. In the Eastern church, the foolish saints (σαλοί) are found esp. in three periods of the history of its spirituality: (1) in Late Antiquity, (2) during the Macedonian dynasty of the Byzantine Empire (9th-11th c.) and (3) in Russia, where this expression of holiness was very widespread and highly regarded in a broad historical stretch that began from the 9th c., culminated in the 16th, then continuing until the last decade of the 20th, when even some diocesan canonizations were blocked (A. Sivak, 35). In the West there were no recorded cases of saloi (T. Baconsky, 267), but there existed an analogous type of christocentric holy madness, which is expressed in the perfect joy drawn from the disregard for oneself and for the disregard received from the world (F. Vandenbroucke, 767). After heterogeneous expressions of extreme asceticism present in early Irish *monasticism and cases of uncommon humiliation in the tradition of Benedictine and Camaldolese monasticism, there followed the "golden age" of the Western perfect fools for Christ, which began in the 13th c. by Francis of Assisi and continued then with other famous historical figures of sanctity such as Raymond Lull, Thomas More and Philip Neri. Mistaken at times for a fool, Ignatius of Loyola codified the Pauline theme of folly for Christ in the Constitutions for his society and in the Spiritual Exercises (J. Saward, 82-103). With regard to the literary genre of the sources that narrate the asceticism of the saloi, it is impossible to reconstruct a "real" history of the foolish saints of Late Antiquity nor a precise geographical map of the places in which the first ascetics practiced holy folly. Although on the one hand the first three stories of foolish saints, situated in Egypt, lead one to think of this region as a native country for this type of sanctity (J. Grosdidier de Matons, 279), on the other hand, the authors who told them collected stories that circulated widely in the entire E basin of the Byzantine Empire.

It is also possible that this extraordinary form of Christian spirituality was derived from *Syria, a traditional melting pot of extreme forms of asceticism which were then exported elsewhere (D. Krueger, 62). Conversely, we can review with a certain precision the Late Antique hagiographical literary tradition of the foolish saints, which reaches its highest stylistically elevated expression in the 7th c. Before that time, stories of foolish ascetics were incorporated into *Palladius's Lausiac History (34; 37); in an anonymous account, from the beginning of the 5th c., about a monk who "pretended to be mad" with the objective of inappropriate laughter (published by F. Nau in PO 8, 178-179); in the Apophthegmata Patrum (8; 9); in the cycle of 5th-c. stories that pertain to the Life of Daniel of Scetis (Vie [et récits]) de l'abbé Daniel le Scétiote, ed. L. Clugnet, Paris 1901); in the History of Theophilus and Mary, preserved as the 52nd history in the Lives of the Eastern Saints (PO 19,164-179) of the *monophysite bishop *John of Ephesus (507–586); in the Pleroforiae by John Rufus (redacted in the years 512–518); in The Spiritual Meadow by *John Moschus (6th–7th c.). Finally, during the time immediately before the devastating Islamic invasion of the island (649), in a Cyprus still firmly tied to the Late Antique Greco-Roman tradition and populated by various types of exiles from Egypt and Syria, *Leontius of Neapolis (ca. 590–650), drawing on previous historical sources, among which was the Ecclesiastical History of *Evagrius Scholasticus (PG 86, 2, 2415-2886), codified this genre of sanctity with the Life of Saint Simeon the Fool (A.J. Festugière), which was destined to become a successful hagiographic model in the Slavic-Orthodox tradition.

After centuries of literary silence, at the turn to the 2nd millennium, borrowing the language and a few examples from the work of Leontius, an anonymous Byzantine hagiographer who presented himself as a priest of *Constantinople's Hagia Sophia and who used the name Nicephorus, wrote the Life of Andrew the Fool (PG 111, 621-888), a fictitious story situated in an improbable 5th-c. Constantinople. Subsequently, at Byzantium, a great devotion and public cult of the saints even to the point of the dedication of monasteries became equally widespread (G.P. Majeska, 314-316), although the hagiography of St. Andrew gave decisive impulse to the fortunes of the saloi in Russian spirituality and culture. Between Nicephorus and Leontius there is not only a separation of centuries: even the typology of holy folly, a theme developed in their Lives, noticeably distances Andrew, who is centered on moralizing themes, from Simeon, who is moved by ecclesiastical motives. Moreover, the hagiographical differences derived from the history of holy Byzantine folly, because The Life of Andrew leads one to suppose that during the time of the priest of the Hagia Sophia, the authentic saloi only lived in the collective memory of a past of glorious asceticism (L. Rydén, 16-31). In the Byzantine Empire, in fact, the medieval promotion of the cult of the holy fools is related, perhaps through a growing cultural influence of Hellenistic humanism, to a certain suspicion toward those who liked to practice it. In the Life of Saint Gregory the Decapolite (9th c.), the saloi are indirectly associated with the devil, although in the 11th c. the notable Byzantine of Armenian origin Kekaumenos counsels people to keep themselves at a distance from charlatans who pass themselves off as saloi (Strategikon, p. 63, 18-30, in J. Grosdidier de Matons, 300), and in the 12th c., the canonist Theodore Balsamon applied to them the 60th canon of the Quinisext Council *in Trullo (692), which condemned those who faked demonic possession. In the Greek East, however, cases of saloi were also noted through the centuries, even until the 20th c. (T. Baconsky, 321-325).

II. Spirituality. To justify this style of life, the hagiographical texts that describe the deeds of these saints often appealed to *Paul (1 Cor 3:18), who was the theologian and the apostolic preacher of folly (μωρία) of the cross of Christ (1 Cor 1:18ff.), which was the heart of the act of faith (A. Derville, 639). Even if it is true, however, that only in one passage of his letters Paul seems to allude to a foolish behavior (μωροί) of the *apostles, it was antithetical to the conventional behavior of 1st-c. society (1 Cor 4:10); nevertheless, in all these cases in which the apostle spoke of the "folly" of the faithful, this theme was contrasted to worldly wisdom, the term commonly used was μωρός, an insult acc. to OT writings, and was usually used in classical antiquity to refer to deplorable cases of psychic-intellectual incapacity (G. Bertram). In the Late Antique accounts of foolish saints, the concept of holy folly, which was rather fluid, is not mediated by a uniform vocabulary; and the term salos, which is derived from the Syriac word sakla (agitation) which passed into the Orthodox Church as a technical term for the "foolish saint" (T. Špidlík, 753), was not used univocally, indicating even cases of folly that were not associated with holiness. Recalling Paul's language (1 Cor 4:10), Leontius of Neapolis referred to Simeon, the protagonist of his story, as a salos dia Christon ("a fool for Christ"), an expression whose particular novelty resides not in the first term (which alternates in the Life of the saint with mōros) but in the second, because folly was received and embraced as a charism for love of Christ (dia Christon). The hagiographic account is precisely constructed in such a way as to show the saint who pretends foolishness for Christ and identifies himself with him through a paradoxical imitation of the life of Jesus. The christocentricity off the salos, which is moreover the most important theological element of this type of holiness, funnels into self-abasement almost to the point of embodying the extreme humiliation of Christ in the various instances of contempt to which he subjects himself (Phil 2:7).

In the hagiographies of the saloi, the identification with Christ is expressed esp. with the term of "hidden holiness," a typology of holiness widespread in Late Antiquity. No one, with the exception of a cleric here or there, through great spiritual prominence or through divine revelation, knew the true identity of the foolish saint, who willingly hid his sanctity behind foolishness and by disrupting the canons of a sanctity founded upon the Aristotelian doctrine of the just mean. In the Life of Saint Simeon the Fool, the hagiographer develops this theme because the hiding of Christ acc. to the gospel of *Mark emerges as the literary thread (D. Krueger, 66-71). To characterize the spirituality of the saloi, however, other elements of holiness converged such as the xenia of the salos to the world; the eschatological tension in which their life is fulfilled; the gift of the discernment of spirits; spiritual childlikeness (J. Saward, 25-30). Last, wherever he was to be found, the foolish saint lived his relationships with utmost freedom above the social and ecclesial structures, shaking them from the norm with prophetic gestures that were full of humor, to show their injustices and immoral behaviors. In the 6th c., the historian *Evagrius of Epiphania (Scholasticus) described the conduct of some of them by focusing his attention on their apatheia (absence of injury, immunity and freedom from emotion), because of their indifference toward food and because of their spiritual androgyny, which allowed them to undergo every discouragement of social-cultural discrimination. Devoid of every human intimidation, they bathed with the women at the baths; they touched and embraced them without risking any sexual involvement; "they are men with men and women with women, because they want to share life with both genders without belonging to just one" (HE I, 21: Bidez-Parmentier, p. 31).

The freedom from the soul's passions, esp. toward food and sex, should be regarded not only as a charism but also as the fruit of a preceding asceticism. In the first hagiographical accounts, the calling to "divine folly" is in fact presented as a "second vocation," which the ascetic achieves who has already been proven in the *cenobium or in the desert, which he leaves "for the salvation of souls." The first case of holy folly that was described was that of the nun Tabennisi, who has come down through history with the name Isidora. She lived in her convent as a mentally disturbed woman (σαλή) and as such was despised by all the other nuns, until through divine revelation a priest uncovered her true identity and sanctity. But Isidora withdrew from the honors of her monastery and ended her days in the anonymity of a hermitage (Palladius, Lausiac History 34). When he became aware of the divine calling to holy folly, St. Simeon of Emesa had already lived for 39 years as a hermit in the Transjordan. He became "perfect" at the divine impulse and, after having been moved by love for the "souls" of sinners, he left his companion who assisted him in the desert "to play games in the world" and to enter the city, at *Emesa, where he made his triumphal entry, dragging behind him a dead dog, which he had found in the dung heap, and was followed by a train of aggressive and vociferous children who cried out: Abbas, mōros! He spoke in parables, but he was also a thaumaturge, a diviner and a prophet. He converted the city from its sins. St. Simeon accompanied his deeds of folly with an unconditioned love toward the lowliest in society, to the point of not defending himself from accusations of stupidity and immorality, even to the point of assuming responsibility for a sexual act he did not commit, which he did to save a pregnant servant girl from punishment. He died in a papyrus hut among beggars, who carried him "without songs, nor ashes nor incense" to the cemetery of the vagabonds. When the city became aware that the saint was buried ignominiously, the people wanted to exhume the body for a more worthy burial. But they did not find it because the Lord had taken it away (Leontius of Neapolis, The Life of Saint Simeon the Fool).

Similar to Christ, the apatheia of the saloi far surpassed that of the philosophers. In the hagiography of Leontius, the saint was frequently placed alongside Diogenes of Sinope, the famous cynic on whom a worldly Christian approval was assigned; Leontius, however, demonstrated the limit of his spiritual "liberty." As in the case of the cynic, the salos dia Christon gorged himself on lupines, ate raw meat and defecated in public, not only to subvert the hypocritical conventions of the city, but also because through these gestures he revealed the superior perfection of an ascetic who had reached "angelic" impassability. Simeon, living in accord with God (kata Theon), infinitely transcended the cynic virtue derived from a life kata physin (see D. Krueger, 29; 36-56; 107).

III. Social-political context. In structured societies, the foolish saints willingly chose to be marginalized. They always aligned themselves with those who lived in poverty, whatever gender they might be, and they denounced the abuses and the injustices of those in power with bold and clean humor. The hagiographers did not overlook the development of this theme that won over the masses. Leontius described St. Simeon as a chastiser of the merchants, but not with the objective of destroying the ancient social structures in which the hagiographer believed, but to teach the value of the poor for the salvation of the world and to teach rich Christians the duty of giving alms as they await the day of judgment (D. Krueger, 120-122). The eschatological value of the life of the saloi reiterates the necessity for continual conversion of the ancient social order. It is not by mere chance that in the ancient Eastern tradition there occurred cases of vocations to become a salos dia Christon during periods of economic prosperity or the exaltation of the "autocratic" ideology, as in the Justinian empire and that of *Heraclius and in the 16th-c. Russia of Ivan the Terrible (O. Clément, 165-166).

The vocation to holy folly, with all its social implications, was not restricted to Christianity. In the Jewish tradition, one should recall similar phenomenon in Hasidic *Judaism (M. Buber). The cult of Muslim saints in North Africa included cases of folly analogous to those in Christianity (E. Dermenghem).

E. Benz, Heilige Narrheit: Kyrios 3 (1938) 1-55; P. Hauptmann, Die "Narren um Christi Willen" in der Ostkirche: Kirche im

Osten 2 (1959) 27-49; E. Dermenghem, Le culte des saints dans l'Islam maghrébin, Paris 1954; A. Derville, Folie de la croix: DSp 5 (1964) 635-650; T. Špidlík - F. Vandenbroucke, Fous pour le Christ: DSp 5 (1964) 752-770; J. Grosdidier de Matons, Les thèmes d'édification dans la Vie d'André Salos: Travaux et Mémoires 4 (1970) 277-328; G. Bertram, μωρός κτλ: TDNT 4 (1967) 832-847; A.J. Festugière (tr. and ed.), Vie de Syméon le Fou et Vie de Jean de Chypre, Bibliothèque archéologique et historique 95, Paris 1974, 257-637; N. Challis - H.W. Dewey, Byzantine Models for Russia's Literature of Divine Folly (Jurodstvo), in Papers in Slavic Philology in Honor of James Ferrel, I, ed. B. Stolz, Ann Arbor, MI 1977, 36-48; J. Saward, Perfect Fools: Folly for Christ's Sake in Catholic and Orthodox Spirituality, Oxford 1980; M. Molé, Les mystiques musulmans, Paris 1982; G. Guidorizzi, Motivi fiabeschi nell'agiografia bizantina: Studi bizantini e neogreci. Atti del IV congr. naz. di studi bizantini, ed. P.L. Leone, Galatina 1983, 457-467; G.P. Majeska, Russian Travellers to Constantinople in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, Washington, DC 1984; L. Rydén, I santi folli di Bisanzio, ed. P. Cesaretti, Milan 1990, 5-32; I. Goraïnoff, Les fols en Christ dans la tradition orthodoxe, Paris 1983; M. Buber, I racconti dei chassidim, Parma 1992; T. Baconsky, Le rire des Pères. Essai sur le rire dans la patristique grecque, Paris 1996; D. Krueger, Symeon the Holy Fool: Leontius's Life and the Late Antique City, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1996; F. Maspero (ed.), Santi Folli della Chiesa d'Oriente, Casale Monf. 1999; G. Fedotov, I santi dell'antica Russia, ed. M.P. Pagani, Milan 2000; O. Clément, Follia e santità. Qualche nota sui "folli in Cristo" nella Chiesa d'Oriente, in M.P. Pagani (ed.), Starec Afanasij. Un folle in Cristo dei nostri giorni, Milan 2005, 155-168; L. Coco - A. Sivak, Le sante stolte della Chiesa russa, Rome 2006.

V. Lombino

SAINTS, INTERCESSION of. Scholars have not sufficiently examined the possible dependence of the idea of the intercession of the saints on Jewish and pagan thought, e.g., the intercession of the *patriarchs (see Donahue) and the intercession of a *patron (see Orselli), i.e., before the presence of the Roman emperor (see Ernesti, 273-278).

Belief in the intercession of the saints is a corollary to belief in the *communion of saints. Since antiquity it was presented in various forms, acc. to who practiced it and whether it was in relation to the living or the dead.

1. The intercession of the martyrs. The early church recognized that because of their profession of faith, the *martyrs had the power to intervene in favor of sinners to obtain the lightening, if not the remission, of the punishments sanctioned by the church, which they had incurred as a result of their *sins. The first example of this practice is testified to by the martyrs of *Lyons of 177 (Eus., HE 5,2,3). *Tertullian also mentioned the sinners who were at the knees of the "friends of God," who intervened before the bishops (Ad mart. 1; De pud. 1). *Cyprian regulated the intervention of the martyrs by subordinating it to the *penance of those who were guilty, without leaving the chance that the first act of the martyrs could replace the latter (De lap. 36; Ep. 15-16; 18). Because "only God can forgive, even if we can see that before his tribunal the merits of the martyrs are of great weight" (De lap. 17).

2. The intercession of the saints with prayer. The power of the intercession of saints through the confession of faith presupposes that the *confessors (confessores) were alive. This power disappeared with the end of the *persecutions, but the martyrs continued to exercise it through prayer after their death. Therefore, by that time the intercession of the saints worked directly before the presence of God to lighten the eternal punishments and obtain their remission. Even though since the beginning the martyrs were considered participants in the eternal beatitude after their death, there survived ancient attitudes and forms of prayer toward them that were typical for the dead. The *Eucharist was offered "for" (pro, ὑπέρ) the martyrs as "for" the dead (Cypr., Ep. 1,2; 12,2; 39,3; Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, ed. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, Oxford 1896, p. 131, 12ff.). Moreover, it was the general conviction that the martyrs and the saints prayed for their living and deceased brethren. In the year 203, *Perpetua of Carthage prayed for her deceased brother Dinocrates (Pass. Perp. 7-8). Around the same period at *Alexandria, *Potamiaena promised the soldier Basilides to pray for him when he was in God's presence (Eus., HE 6,5,3 and 6). At *Tarragona, on 21 January 259, the faithful asked Bishop *Fructuosus "to keep them in mind" (ut illos in mente haberet), and he answered that he must pray "for the Catholic Church, spread from East to West" (BHL 319f, nn. 1.7). At *Carthage, a few months later, the faithful committed themselves to the prayers of the martyr Lucius (BHL 6009, n. 13). At Tyre, in 310, Theodosia besought the confessors who were awaiting condemnation to remember her when they received their heavenly reward (Eus., De mart. Pal. 7,1). Similarly, the same role of intercessor was also attributed to nonmartyr saints: *Sulpicius Severus saw *Martin of Tours "among the *apostles and *prophets" and near the faithful to pray to bless them on God's behalf (Ep. 2,4 and 16: SC 135, 1196, 1251).

3. Prayers addressed to the martyrs and saints. The invocation of the martyrs was a current practice in ancient Christianity, as attested primarily by the inscriptions, starting from the 3rd c. The characteristic expressions of supplicatory prayer insistently returned to the concept: in mente habete, orate, petite pro, subvenite, in orationes vestras nos in mente habete. Analogous forms can be read in literary texts (Hippolytus, In Dan. 2,30; *Origen, Orat. 14,6; Exh.

mart. 37). One could multiply examples by drawing on the Cappadocian fathers, *John Chrysostom, *Augustine, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and others. The intercession of the saints is all the more efficacious if prayer is done near their tomb: the one who touches their tomb directly or through some other means obtains grace; the dead were buried near the saints to benefit in the afterlife through their salvific intercession; some miracles were accomplished over their tombs as a sensible sign that the prayer was heard. In this way, the saint, though in a subordinate position, was associated to Jesus Christ, who intercedes, inasmuch as he is a mediator before God.

LCI 2, 346-352; DTC 14, 886-939; RAC 9, 1-36; Delehaye OC 100-140; Id., Sanctus. Essai sur le culte des saints dans l'antiquité, Brussels 1927, 122-161; J. Camarero Cuñado, La figura del santo en la liturgia hispánica, Salamanca-Madrid 1982, 295-327; A. Angenendt, Heilige und Reliquien, Munich [2]1997; Les miracles de saint Étienne, ed. J. Meyers, Turnhout 2006; P.J. Donahue, Jewish-Christian Controversy in the Second Century: A Study in the "Dialogue" of Justin Martyr, Yale Univ. diss. 1973; A.M. Orselli, L'idea e il culto del santo patrono cittadino nella letteratura latina cristiana, Bologna 1965; J. Ernesti, Princeps christianus und Kaiser aller Römer, Paderborn 1998.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

SALLUSTIUS the Neoplatonist (d. 378/379?). Sallustius (or Salustius), the author of the treatise On the Gods and the World, was for a long time a difficult person to identify. Only in the 18th c. was Tillemont (see Histoire des empereurs, IV,696) able to narrow him down to two possible figures: Flavius Sallustius and Secundus Sallustius, who were both imperial administrators in service of the emperor *Julian. Today, in gratitude as well to G. Rochefort's critical study (see below), scholars have agreed in identifying the author of the treatise on the gods and the world with Secundus Sallustius (Saturninus). With respect to this person we know with certainty that he was born in *Gaul toward the beginning of the 4th c. In Gaul he followed a course of studies marked by the traditional principles of *paganism, obtaining a deep knowledge of classical literature and Roman law. In 355 he was appointed by the Emperor *Constantius as the quaestor of Gaul, and he entered into close contact with the future emperor Julian; he heavily influenced Julian in his choice to return to the values of paganism. After falling into disfavor with Constantius, in 361 he was appointed prefect of the East by the emperor Julian, who had just ascended to the imperial throne. Although he was inevitably involved in the disorder that followed Julian's death, he was able to maintain his irreprehensible conduct and to preserve his career as prefect even under the emperor *Valens. The exact date of his death remains unknown; it probably dates between the years 378/379.

The only work that has come down to us from Sallustius's writings is the treatise On the Gods and the World, which was most likely composed at the request of the emperor Julian immediately after 362. In this work, the author was able to focus and present in a harmonious way all the instances of that neopagan religiosity that Julian sought to import or introduce during his brief reign. Sallustius adopted the traditional themes and the figures of pagan religion and established and harmonized them with Eastern mysticism and all philosophical teachings, even if his attention was then directed in a special way to *Neoplatonist teachings. Most noteworthy was his effort at synthesis and syncretism, which certainly made his work attractive. Even ethics were fundamental in Sallustius's writings, and it is clear how his religious interests were directed to a search and knowledge of the gods that led men to a natural goodness and wisdom.

J.C. Orelli, Sallustii philosophi libellus de Diis et Mundo, Zürich 1821; A.D. Nock, Sallustius – Concerning the Gods and the Universe, Cambridge 1926; G. Rochefort, Saloustious: Des Dieux et du Monde, Paris 1960; Salustio, Gli dei e il mondo, ed. V. Vacanti, Turin 1998; Salustio, Sugli dei e il mondo, ed. R. Di Giuseppe, Milan 2000; R. Di Giuseppe, Male nell'entourage di Giuliano e nel monoteismo, in Il Tardoantico alle soglie del duemila: diritto, religione, società. Atti del V conv. naz. dell'Associazione di Studi Tardoantichi, ed. G. Lanata, Pisa 2000, 43-58; A. Saggioro, Il sacrificio pagano nella reazione al Cristianesimo: Giuliano e Macrobio: AnSE 19 (2002) 237-254.

M. Conti

SALONA. According to Strabo, Salona was the port of the Illyrian Delmatae, a people who lived in the Dalmatian hinterland, and in the 3rd c. BC they conquered an area limited to the coast. At the time of Julius Caesar, Salona became the capital of the province of Illyricum and remained so even for the province of Dalmatia. As early as the 1st c. BC it was a developed and rather large city. Christianity began to spread perhaps as early as the 1st c. AD, but it did not take much root before the 3rd c. At that time, acc. to tradition, Salona had its organized church (see *Dalmatia). Toward the end of the 3rd c., Bishop Domnius organized the Christian community and the ecclesiastical province; but the church must have already been constructed. In the 1st half of the 5th c., Salona became the metropolis of Dalmatia under the archbishop *Hesychius. A century later, the see of the vicariate of W Illyricum was established at Salona. At the beginning of the 7th c., the city was sacked and destroyed by the Avars and the Slavs.

Numerous remains and monuments in the early Christian period have been discovered at Salona. The oldest buildings of this sort emerged from the NW corner of the so-called urbs nova, where the episcopal center was constructed much later. It was considered a domus ecclesiasiae, organized into a private home, but the building was not completely excavated. In recent years the excavations have continued, but they have not yet been finished, and the results have not yet been published. The main room was located to the S and had an elevated presbytery with a step above the nave. No trace of the gate has been found because it was most likely made of wood. In the presbytery there was a semicircular bench for the clergy that was detached from the W wall that had a rather large door. Just S was another building fortified with a raised square apse with many steps. Its Christian character is likely but not certain. The two pillars adorned with an inscribed cross are from a later age. Shortly after the mid-4th c., next to these two oratories the first Christian basilica of Salona was constructed. The shape of the basilica is hard to determine, but it was certainly laid out on a longitudinal axis. At the beginning of the 5th c., to the N of this building another basilica was built containing a square baptistery and a hexagonal pool. The mosaic on the apse recalls the construction of the church. There thus arose a large Christian center consisting of two basilicas with additional rooms and the episcopal palace. The cathedral underwent remodeling on the occasion of the first and second Councils of Salona (530 and 533). During this era the S basilica was transformed into a cross-like layout with equilateral arms, and the baptistery was remodeled in the form of an octagon and with a cross-shaped basin. Both basilicas were connected with a long narthex, which came to the N by means of steps to the space for the catechumens. In front of the narthex, an atrium, which was not accessible from the basilicas and the narthex, finished on the N side with an oratory.

Other Christian buildings existed within the walls of Salona. Of special importance was the three-aisled basilica with an octoganal baptistery and a cross-shaped basin, considered by E. Dyggve to be the cathedral of the *Arian *Goths and therefore connected to the Arian cathedral of *Ravenna (but this relationship has not been confirmed). One should note that the paintings of the basilica published by E. Dyggve (History of Salonitan Christianity) are imprecise because he did not completely excavate them but only performed short explorations.

For the *cemeteries, the most important area is that of Manastirine, 100 meters N of the wall, which developed within the small *pagan sepulcher in which, at the beginning of the 4th c., the body of the martyr Domnius was interred. Around his tomb there arose memorial buildings built with apses. The cemetery was destroyed around the end of the 4th c., but at the beginning of the 5th c. or perhaps shortly thereafter the basilica with three aisles was erected, which enclosed the memoria of Domnius in his presbytery. The martyr Septimus was certainly buried here and many other illustrious persons from the Salonitan church (bishops, priests, nuns etc.). At Manastirine the (false?) relics of the apostle Peter were also buried. In the 6th c., a narthex was added to the church. In the first decade of the 7th c., the basilica was destroyed and the Salonitans were unable to reconstruct it entirely. The research that has been performed in recent decades has brought to light some important elements from which scholars will be able to better date the constructive phases of the necropolises.

A second important cemetery, that of Marusinac, is found approximately 1 km (.62 mi) NW of the city and developed around the tomb of the martyr Anastasius, who had been buried in the mausoleum of a certain matron Asclapia. The mausoleum is composed of a crypt with a dome-shaped ceiling and an upper floor. The two floors contained an inscribed apse. The walls were very strong and were fortified by solid buttresses. To the E, a basilica was built acc. to a longitudinal schema with sumptuous mosaics on the floors, in which, under the altar, there was a tomb with a fenestella confessionis. According to Dyggve, the relics of the martyr Anastasius were transferred here, but this could be the tomb of another saint because the mausoleum was certainly located on that site even during the period preceding the destruction of Salona. To the N of the aforementioned basilica, one finds a courtyard enclosed within porticoes, which ends to the E with a group of three mausoleums. Dyggve called this part of the structure "the discovered basilica"; but his very contested thesis lacks substance. At the beginning of this century, the entire structure including the mausoleum was closed within an atrium with porticoes. An inscription that mentions St. Menas perhaps indicates that his relics were deposited at Marusinac.

The third cemetery, at Kapljuc, near the amphitheater, developed around the tombs of the martyrs Asterius (presbyter) and the four soldiers from *Diocletian's court (acc. to tradition): Paulinianus, Antiochianus, Gaianus and Telius. The martyrs were buried in a mausoleum, which was then expanded toward the W and was thus transformed into a basilica with three aisles, around which a vast cemetery formed. All the martyrs of Salona (Venantius, Domnius, Anastasius, Septimus, Asterius, Paulinianus, Antiochianus, Gaianus and Telius), including Maurus of Parentium, were depicted on a mosaic in the oratory near the baptistery, near St. John Lateran Basilica.

Numerous Christian monuments have been discovered at Salona: figured and nonfigured sarcophagi, numerous inscriptions, decorations of churches, mensae, paintings, mosaics, pottery, glass, lamps etc.

F. Carrara, Topografia e scavi di Salona, Trieste 1850; J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans la province Dalmatie, Paris 1906; W. Gerber, Altchristliche Kultbauten Istriens und Dalmatiens, Dresden 1912; W. Gerber, Forschungen in Salona, I, Vienna 1917; R. Egger, Forschungen in Salona, II, Vienna 1926; R. Egger - E. Dyggve, Forschungen in Salona, III, Vienna 1939; J. Brondsted - Fr. Weilbach - E. Dyggve, Recherches à Salone, Copenhagen 1928; E. Dyggve, History of Salonitan Christianity, Oslo 1951; Disputationes Salonitanae I, 1970, Split 1975; N. Cambi, Krist i njegova simbolika u likovnoj umjetnosti starokršćanskog perioda u Dalmaciji, Vjesnik za arh i hist. Dalm. 70-71, 1968-69, Split 1977, 56ff.; N. Cambi, Starokršćanska crkvena arhitektura na podrucju salonitanske metropolije: Arheološki vestnik 29 (1978) 606ff.; H. Kähler, Die Frühe Kirche. Kult und Kultraum, Frankfurt-Berlin-Vienna [2]1982; Disputationes Salonitanae, Vjesnik za arh. i hist. Dalm. 77, Split 1984; N. Cambi, Salona und seine Nekropole. Colloquium in München vom 28. bis 30. Oktober 1985 in München, Munich 1987, 25ff.; V. Saxer, Les saints de Salone. Examen critique de leur dossier, in Uslužbi covjeka. Zbornik nadbiskupa metropolite Dr. Frane Franica, Split 1987, 293ff.; Anticka Salona, Split 1991 (ed. N. Cambi); N. Cambi, Sarkofag Dobrog pastira i njegova grupa - The Good Shepherd and Its Group, Split 1994; Salona I. Recherches archéologiques franco-croates à Salona. Catalogue de la sculpture architecturale paléochrétienne de Salone, ed. N. Duval - E. Marin - C. Metzger, Rome-Split 1994; Salona Christiana, ed. E. Marin, Split 1994; E. Marin, Nova istraživanja na Marusincu u Saloni: Diadora 15 (1994) 259ff.; Acta Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae Split-Poreč 1994, ed. N. Cambi - E. Marin, II, Vatican City-Split 1998; J. Dresken Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, II, Mainz 1998; Salona III. Recherches archéologiques franco-croates à Salona. Manastirine. Etablissement préromain, nécropole et basilique paléochrétienne à Salona, ed. D. Duval - E. Marin; N. Cambi, Povijest umjetnosti u Hrvatskoj. Antika, Zagreb 2002; N. Cambi, Sarcofagi con la croce nel centro della cassa, Akten des Symposiums "Frühchristliche Sarkophage," Marburg 1999, Sarkophag Studien II, Mainz 2002, 47ff.; N. Cambi, O "bazilici bez krova" u episkopalnom kompleksu u Saloni, in Zbornik Tomislava Marasovića, Split 2003, 249ff.

N. Cambi

SALONIUS of Geneva (ca. 400–after 500). The son of *Eucherius bishop of *Lyons, he was born around the year AD 400. He and his brother *Veranus received a solid spiritual and doctrinal formation in the monastery of *Lérins, where their father, following the custom that had arisen in *Gaul between the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th, went with his wife Galla and their children to flee from the world. In addition to his own father, the following men were his teachers: *Honoratus, the founder of the *monastery, *Hilary, *Salvian and *Vincentius. *Gennadius, although not devoting a specific entry to Salonius in his De viris illustribus, mentioned him on two separate occasions: first, in the chapter in which he referred to Eucherius (disseruit [sc. Eucherius] etiam ad personam filiorum Salonii et Verani postea episcoporum obscura quaeque sanctarum capitula scripturarum: PL 58,1097), openly alluding to the two exegetical works, the Instructiones and the Formulae spiritalis intellegentiae, which the bishop of Lyons dedicated respectively to his sons Salonius and Veranus; the second mention is found in the chapter pertaining to Salvian, where Salonius appears as the dedicatee of the book of Salvian's Epistles (ad Salonium episcopum liber unus: PL 58,1099). Salvian also dedicated to him the De gubernatione Dei and sent him the last letter of the aforementioned Liber epistolarum, the ninth, being a response in which he explained to his decus atque subsidium (this is how he referred to Salonius) the reasons for which he published the treatise Ad ecclesiam under the pseudonym Timothy.

In 441, Salonius was already bishop—he was raised to the episcopal see of Geneva most likely at a date very close to 441—because his name appears among those bishops who signed the *acts of the Council of *Orange, which was held that year. In 442, he took part in the Council of *Vaison and, in 450, along with his brother Veranus, who was also by that time a bishop, and with Ceretius (Cérat), the bishop of Grenoble, wrote a letter to Leo the Great (PL 54,887-890) to thank the pontiff for the copy of the Tomus ad Flavianum, which had been sent to them.

J.A. Brassicanus published in 1532 under the name of Salonius the Interpretatio in Parabolas Salomonis and In Ecclesiasten. Scholars are uncertain why the humanist attributed these two short exegetical works to Eucherius's son. In Codex 1278 from the National Library of Vienna, from which he created his edition, these have been transmitted anonymously, marked only by the "inscriptiones" Glose Parabolarum and the De nominibus Salomonis. (The inscription which identifies Salonius as the author is of another hand, most likely of Brassicanus himself.) The first critical edition was owed to the work of C. Curti, who in 1964 republished the two texts preserving their traditional attribution and using, in addition to the MS from Vienna, another twelve MSS; even in these MSS, the two short treatises are attested to without the name of the author, with the exception of Codex 2689 from the Munich National Library, where, however, the marginal annotation that assigns the authorship to Salonius dates back to more recent times. In 1968 Curti also provided the editio princeps of other exegetical writings, De evangelio Iohannis and De evangelio Matthaei, which, even these two documents without the identification of the author, are attested to by 5 of the 13 MSS that have preserved the commentaries on the two books of the OT. The editor has demonstrated that the two short treatises on the gospels belong to the same author of those treatises on the OT.

On several occasions J.P. Weiss showed interest in the author of these four writings. He concentrated primarily on the commentary on the Parabole (Proverbs), for which Curti had not identified any literary source and explained the similarities between this work and *Bede's Expositio in Parabolas Salomonis by considering Salonius the source for Bede. Curti, however, did not exclude the possibility that the bishop of Geneva heavily used a work that is now lost, and in a similar way maintained that, to interpret the other three texts, he plagiarized *Jerome's commentaries on Ecclesiastes and *Matthew and *Augustine's commentary on *John. Weiss has the undeniable credit of having discovered *Gregory the Great's and Bede's dependence on this work, for which reason the short treatise on the Parabole, as a result, and the other three texts cannot be attributed to Salonius but must have been the work of an unknown author who lived between AD 800 and 1000; Bede, in fact, died in 735, and the most ancient MS that contains the author's four short treatises seems to date back to 10th c. Valerie I.J. Flint has returned to the question of the author's identity and has reached the conclusion that our author repeatedly plagiarized Bede's work (for the Parabole), Alcuin (for Ecclesiastes and the Gospel of John) and Hrbanus Maurus (for the Gospel of Matthew). For this reason, Flint suggested Honorius of Autun as a probable author, to whom through a mechanical mistake M. Denis had already assigned the short treatises when describing, in a catalog of the Vienna Palatine Library, the Codex Vienna 807, one of the five codices that transmits all four.

The documents under discussion belonged to the exegetical genre of quaestiones et responsiones*, and none of these, as such, constitute a continuous commentary, in which the entire biblical text is explained, but from these only verses or specific lemma are chosen. His discussion develops into a fictitious chain of questions and answers. The INT. asks for clarifications; the RESP. answers by interpreting the verse or the lines in question and almost always adduces other passages from *Scripture. The question is very brief: it is introduced by a limited number of formulas, recurrent with tiresome monotony as is usual for this exegetical genre but even less diversified. The response is framed with the same uniformity: either it begins with a causal conjunction (quod, quia etc.) in immediate connection with the interrogative adverb (cur, quare, etc.) of the question, or it axiomatically elucidates the passage or the biblical term, which is the object of exegesis (INT. Qui sunt isti pennati? RESP. Sancti et electi viri . . .). But what is most surprising about these short works is their uniform structure and language. From these two facets, one draws the clear conclusion that they cannot be other than the work of the same writer: a writer who was always the same, void of creativity with respect to formulaic variations, who does not know how to elevate himself to the level of basic exegetical discourse, which is presented moreover in a slipshod and unadorned style, and is, at times, downright sloppy. The exegetical criterion followed is that of allegorical interpretation, but this is well-researched and constructed with much diligence and a truly exceptional effort, and this method of interpretation is even applied to passages in which the literal sense seems to be more obvious and in which it seems difficult to impose *allegory upon the texts.

CPL 499. Parabole and Ecclesiastes: J.A. Brassicanus, Haganoae 1532 (editio princeps) (= PL 53, 993-1012); C. Curti, Catania 1964; Vangeli di Giovanni e di Matteo: C. Curti, Turin 1968 (editio princeps); M. Besson, Un évêque exégète de Genève au milieu du Ve siècle: Saint Salone: Anzeiger für schweizerische Geschichte 9 (1902-1905) 252-265; J.A. Endres, Honorius Augustodunensis, Kempten 1906, 73-75; G. Bardy, La littérature patristique des "Quaestiones et Responsiones" sur l'Écriture sainte: RBi 42 (1933) 20-22; C. Curti, Vienna, Nationalbibliothek, Latino 807, ff. 66v-110r è di Salonio, non di Onorio d'Autun: Orpheus 11 (1964) 167-184; Id., Osservazioni sul testo di Salonio, in Studi in memoria di Carmelo Sgroi, Turin 1965, 549-559; Id., Due Commentarii inediti di Salonio ai Vangeli di Giovanni e di Matteo. Tradizione manoscritta, fonti, autore, Turin 1968; J.P. Weiss, L'authenticité de l'oeuvre de Salonius de Genève: SP 10 (1970) 161-167; Id., Essai de datation du Commentaire sur les Proverbes attribué abusivement à Salonius: SE 19 (1969-1970) 77-114; Valerie I.J. Flint, The True Author of the Salonii Commentarii in Parabolas Salomonis et in Ecclesiasten: RTAM 37 (1970) 174-186; J.P. Weiss, Les sources du Commentaire sur l'Ecclésiaste du Pseudo-Salonius: SP 12 (1975) 178-183; Formulae spiritalis intelligentiae, cura et studio C. Mandolfo, Turnhout 2004 (CCL 66).

C. Curti

SALSA of Tipasa (4th c.). This female *martyr had an extraordinary cult only at *Tipasa, in Mauretania Caesariensis (see *Caesarea in Mauretania), a colony around AD 145 on the coast, 70 km (43.5 mi) W of Icosium (Algeria) and to the E of *Caesarea (Cherchell), which was replete with Roman and Christian ruins. The discovery at *Paris of two MSS of her passion account (BHL 7467) and that of her basilica, at the end of the 17th c., allow us to better understand this martyr. The passion, written at the end of the 4th or the beginning of the 5th c., mentions that when there were few Christians in the city (rara fides), a girl of 14 years committed the sacrilege of tossing into the sea the head, then the body of the serpent idol that was considered the protector of the city; she was then seized and tossed into the sea. Her body, which was discovered by seaman from Gaul three days later, was buried along the ocean shore; a chapel was built upon the tomb (a brevum tabernaculum), already existing at the time of Firmus's rebellion (in the year 372), who saw it and thereafter desecrated it. The events narrated in the passion are after the year 312, when by that time Christians enjoyed religious freedom. Two MSS do not coincide on this martyr's dies natalis ("*birthday): one dates it to 26 August, the other to the beginning of summer; the Hieronymian Martyrology to 20 May and 10 October. Salsa's feast was not recorded in the Carthaginian calendar. Close to the funerary chapel, to the E of the city, a large basilica was built, around which a Christian necropolis developed, "the most numerous concentration of Christian tombs ad sanctos known throughout Africa" (Duval, 698).

The discovery of the inscription in a *pagan memorial of a certain Fabia Salsa, a matron who died at the age of 63, around the Christian basilica has given rise to recent doubts on the historical identity of this Christian martyr. Thus the proposed solution, acc. to the archaeological finds and epigraphic evidence, is that the memorial of the pagan Fabia is from the 3rd c. and was later taken into the basilica and placed alongside the martyr's supposed sarcophagus as a cenotaph due to the similarity in name. In the mid-5th c., a certain Potentius enlarged and redecorated the basilica ad sanctam; an inscription commemorates this martyr's *deposition: martyr hic est Salsa (DACL 15, 2382-2383; Y. Duval, 361).

DACL 15, 2338-2406; BS 11, 596-597; LTK[3] 8, 1496f.; H. Leclercq, Les martyrs, III, Paris 1904, 59-70 (Fr. tr. of the Passio); P. Monceaux, La vraie légende dorée, Paris 1928, 299-326 (Fr. tr. of the Passio); H. Grégoire, Sainte Salsa, roman épigraphique: Byzantion 12 (1937) 213-224; J. Christern, Basilika und Memoria der hl. Salsa in Tipasa: Bulletin d'Archéologie Algérienne 3 (1968) 193-258; Chr. Courtois, Victorinus et Salsa. Note d'hagiographie tipasienne: Recueil des notices et mémoires de la Société Arc. de Constantine 68 (1954) 109-119; J. Christern, Basilika und Memorie der Heiligen Salsa in Tipasa: Bulletin d'arch. algérienne 3 (1968) 193-258; M. Bouchenaki, Fouilles de la nécropole occidentale de Tipasa, 1968-72, Alger 1975; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, Rome 1982, I, 358-365; II, 697-700; S. Lancel - M. Bouchenaki, Tipasa de Maurétanie, Alger [3]1991; S. Ferdi, Augustin: de retour en Afrique 388-430; repères archéologiques dans le patrimoine algérien, Fribourg 2000.

A. Di Berardino

SALT. In ancient cultures salt (Lat. sal from which the term salarium was derived) was very valuable both as a condiment and as a preservative because they did not possess more sophisticated systems of preservation; it was used in sacrifices and often with incense. For this reason salt also had a religious meaning of purification because it was the preservative par excellence of corruptible foods. As a result, salt became a symbol of protection. Salt was consumed by two or more persons as a covenantal sign. God made a pact with his people with "a covenant of salt" (2 Chr 13:5), i.e., a permanent covenant. In the Middle East, salt also signified the destruction of a city through the casting of salt on its ground, which was a sign of aridity and infertility (Dt 29:2; Jgs 9:45). The newborn was massaged with salt (Ezek 16:4). In the gospels, mention is made of salt on various occasions: "Because each one will be salted with fire. Salt is good, but if salt loses its flavor, with what will it be seasoned? Have salt in yourselves and be at peace with one another" (Mk 9:49-50). "You are the salt of the world; but if salt loses it flavor, with what will you be able to season with? It has no other purpose but to be tossed and stomped upon by men" (Mt 5:13).

Salt became a symbol of a spiritual seasoning, and it was believed that it could put the demons to flight. In Christian antiquity, one became a *catechumen through this ritual: a sign of the cross on the forehead, the imposition of the hands, the conferral of a bit of salt and "the bread of exorcism" (*Aug., Confessions 1,11; De catech. rud. 26,50). The rite caused one to taste the "salt of *wisdom." This type of rite (sacramentum salis), which originated in *Africa, was widespread in *Italy and elsewhere. The porrectio salis occurred more frequently during the catechumenal period (Stenzel, 201). The use of a grain of salt in the baptism of babies was suppressed in the Vatican II liturgical reforms; the use of salt in the baptism of adults is optional.

The use of salt in the rite of the blessing by means of sprinkling with water (holy water) was used in the Roman *liturgy; now it is optional. Early on the ancient Romans used water and salt in religious rites; even the prophet Elisha united water and salt in a pot and poured it in unhealthy waters, uttering the phrase, "Thus says the Lord: I make these waters clean; no more will death and sterility spread from these waters" (2 Kgs 2:21). The Christian rite of blessing water and salt dates back to the 5th/6th c. at Rome (Duchesne, LP 1,127). Blessed water became a strong instrument against the demons and was used for every type of blessing.

R.J. Forbes, Studies in Ancient Technology, Leiden 1955, III, 157-174; NCE 12, 989-990; LTK³ 8, 1501-1502; Cath 13, 1045-1046; A. Stenzel, Il battesimo, Alba 1962, 199-204, 235; J.E. Latham, The Religious Symbolism of Salt, Paris 1982; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du IIe au VIe siècle, Spoleto 1988, 383-384; 539-540.

A. Di Berardino

SALVIAN of Marseille (5th c.). Salvian was a significant author because of the attention he devoted to the historical events of his time, which was thrown into chaos by the barbarian invasions and which foreshadowed the destruction of the Roman Empire and ancient civilization, in addition to the fact that these events proved to be precursory signs of a new social order.

The biographical data on his life are scarce and vague. Besides *Gennadius of Marseille (De vir. illust. 68), *Hilary mentions him, the bishop of *Arles from 428/429 to 449, in the Sermo de vita S. Honorati (ed. Cavallin, Lund 1952, col. 19, p. 63) and *Eucherius bishop of Lyons (d. ca. 450), in the preface to the Instructiones (CSEL 31,1,66). Other pieces of information are gathered from his works, which contain ambiguities and lacunae. Because Gennadius says that when he was writing (he began between 467 and 469), Salvian was old and in good health (in senectute bona), one is led to think that Salvius's birth should not be dated beyond the first decades of the 5th c. (On the basis of other elements, it should probably be placed around the year 390.) It is held, on account of some mention which we find in a letter (I, 5) and in the primary work De gubernatione Dei (VI,68-81), that Salvian's homeland was *Trier, or Cologne or a nearby region. His writings reveal extensive cultural formation, with special attention to legal studies. He married Palladia, the daughter of Hypatius, a *pagan man who later converted to Christianity, and of Quieta. After the birth of a daughter, Auspiciola, he agreed with his wife to live a life of sexual continence, a decision that was definitely rejected by his wife's parents (Ep. IV). We do not know when Salvin moved to S *Gaul. From his Letter VIII to Eucherius, and Letter IX to *Salonius, and the letter from Eucherius (Instructiones, mentioned above) and Hilary of Arles (see above), which document for us some of his relationships with the most famous men who emerged from the *cenobium of the island of *Lérins, it was argued that Salvian belonged to the community, at least from the year 426. In 429 he was already a presbyter; we do not know if he was still at Lérins or at *Marseille, where the monastic life received a noticeable boost in religious fervor. We do not know anything about his exercise of the presbyteral ministry.

Hilary of Arles mentions an idea expressed by Salvian "in his writings," which was taken from a work that has not survived. Even some works mentioned by Gennadius have been lost: three books, On Virginity, the Commentary on the Last Part of Ecclesiastes and the Hexameron* in verses, the *homilies "for the bishops" (preached to bishops or composed in service of bishops, as seems more likely to be the case), and the homilies on the sacraments (on *prayer and liturgical rites). The following works have survived: a collection of new Letters, the Ad ecclesiam, the De gubernatione Dei. The letters were sent to the monks of Lérins, to Eucherius bishop of Lyons (II and VIII), to *Agraecius bishop of Sens (III), to his wife's parents (IV), to his sister Captura (V), to a friend named Limenius (VI), to Aprus and Verus (VII), and to Bishop Salonius (IX). This collection of letters, probably a collection compiled by the author himself and which has come down to us incomplete, has little to offer in terms of historical and autobiographical data, although it seems to have been suggested by the literary intent, acc. to the customs of the time. In the treatise Ad ecclesiam (Adversus avaritiam, acc. to Gennadius), in four books, Salvian lamented the avarice that reigns in all people and maintained that every believer, layman or religious, has the duty—but with a few exceptions—of making available his goods, either now in this life, or at least in death, for the benefit of the church. The uniqueness of this thesis (although keeping in mind that the recipients of the church's goods were the poor), upon which the author insisted with such great emphasis, leads one to see in this text not so much a document of clerical fanaticism as much as the expression of a conviction of a social reality marked by intolerable injustices, presented with an overabundant style learned at the orators' school, which easily goes beyond the measure of the one who develops his arguments with calmness.

Salvian's primary work was the De gubernatione Dei (in Gennadius, De praesenti iudicio), contained in eight books, the last of which has survived (or has come down to us) in an incomplete form. Writing after the Ad ecclesiam, the author develops therein the theme of divine *providence, which includes the "governance" and the "judgment" of the world, by referring to the situation of the empire, which was caught up in the social calamities caused by the barbarian invasion. He addressed the Christians of little faith, who were asking how they could reconcile divine providence with the very sad state in which the Catholic Romans, who had been conquered and found themselves oppressed by the barbarians, who were either heretics or *pagans. At first the providence of God is demonstrated with arguments from reason and with recourse to the Bible; then he faces the problem posed by current events. By examining the various forms of behavior from such different countries as *Gaul, *Spain and *Africa, Salvian sought to make people understand that the answer to this question was found in the reprehensible conduct of "Roman" Christians, who in their wantonness were much worse than the barbarians, pagan and heretic alike (whose previous vices he does not pass over). Along with the apologetic objective, the work also follows the clear intent of chastising the moral disorder and exhorting the people to conversion. The De gubernatione Dei is a historical source of considerable value both for the individual events it records and for increasing our understanding of the West at that time in various respects: economic-social, religious and moral, and at least for the political and cultural conditions, although keeping in mind the apologist's objective, the moralist's worries and the author's emphasis led by his love to generalize and to use the darkest hues for his painting. His work reflects the mentality of at least a substantial part of Christians and church officials from that period who sought to understand, in light of their faith, the tragic events in which they were involved and derived from them the consequences for a coherent form of behavior with the profession of the Christian faith. His style, which is not lacking in cogency, reflects the tastes of the age and the habits of his school in his emphasis, his search for effect, and his use of *rhetorical devices and redudant verbiage.

Editions: CPL 485-498; PL 53, 9-238; MGH, Auct. Ant. I, 1 (1877); F. Pauly, CSEL 8 (1883); G. Lagarrigue, SC 176 (1971); 220 (1975) (French tr.: op. cit.; It. tr.: E. Marotta, Contro l'avarizia, Rome 1978).

Studies: A. Hamman: Patrologia III, 500-509 (with bibl.); L. Rochus, La latinité de Salvien, Acad. Roy. de Belgique, Cl. lett. Mém., vol. 30/2, Brussels 1934; O. Janssen, L'expressivité chez Salvien de Marseille, I: Les adverbes, Nijmegen 1937; M. Pellegrino, Salviano di Marsiglia: Lateranum n.s. VI, 1-2, Rome 1940; M. Jannelli, La caduta di un impero nel capolavoro di Salviano, Naples 1948; Ph. Badot, La notice de Gennade relative à Salvien: RBen 84 (1974) 352-366; S. Pricoco, Una nota biografica su Salviano di M.: Syculorum Gymn. 39 (1976) 351-368; Id., L'isola dei santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978; H. Fischer, Die Schrift des Salvian von M. "An die Kirche," Bern-Frankfurt a.M. 1976; C. Leonardi, Alle origini della cristianità medievale: Giov. Cassiano e Salviano di M.: Stud Med 18/2 (1977) 491-608; A. Hamman, L'actualité de Salvien de M.: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 378-393; J. Badewien, Geschichtstheologie und Sozialkritik in Werk Salvians von Marseille, Göttingen 1980; RAC 8, 1258-1266; M. Maas, Ethnicity, Orthodoxy and Community in Salvian of Marseilles, in Fifth-Century Gaul: A Crisis of Identity?, eds. J. Drinkwater - H. Elton, Cambridge 1992, 275-284; D. De Decker, Salvien de Marseille: note critique: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 223-277; BBKL 8, 1258-1266.

M. Pellegrino

SALVIUS (5th c.). Bishop of an unspecified episcopal see, perhaps Octodurus (Martigny), to whom *Eucherius, who is commonly identified as the 5th-c. bishop of Lyons, wrote a letter (Ep. ad Salv.: PL 50, 827-828; CSEL 31,173; MGH, scr. rer. mer. III,39-41), and also sent him the Passio Acaunensium martyrum, S. Mauricii et sociorum eius. Eucherius maintained that the information on the martyrdom that he narrated ultimately went back to the account offered by Theodorus, the first bishop of Octodurus, in whose diocese Agaunum was located. With respect to the identification of Salvius with Silvius, who dedicated his Laterculus to Bishop Eucherius, see DCB 4, 581-582. Moreover, we find a letter addressed to a Salvius among the spurious writings of *Sulpicius Severus (PL 20, 243-244; CSEL 1, 254-56).

CPL 479 and 491; BBKL 8, 1255-1256; LTK[3] 8, 1500.

A. Pollastri

SAMARITANS. In a geographic sense, the term Samaritan refers to the inhabitants of Samaria in the historical region of *Palestine who occupied a central part of the highland to the W of the Jordan River; in the ethnic sense, it refers to the descendants of the Israelite inhabitants who remained in the territory after the destruction of the city of Samaria in 721 BC and the deportation of more than 27,000 people by Sargon II, and who mixed and merged with the settlers coming from E Syria, in particular from Kūtah (Tell Ibrahim, 20 km [12.4 mi] to the N of Babylonia). Tension already existed between the Samaritans and the *Jews from the time of the reconstruction of the *temple.

Numerous Samaritans, who were persecuted by John Hyrcanus and who were left in peace by Pompey the Great and by King *Herod, were slaughtered under Pontius *Pilate, who had prohibited them from gathering on Mount Gerizim under the leadership of an imposter at the beginning of the year AD 36 (Flavius Josephus, Ant. Iud. XVIII, 4,1-2). During the war with the Romans (AD 66–70), 11,000 Samaritans were killed on Mount Gerizim, where they had organized a resistance (Flavius Josephus, De bell. Iud. III 7, 32). Soon after, they regrouped and spread around everywhere in Palestine and the Transjordan, building their own synagogues and respectfully rejecting the claims of both Jews and Christians. The attitude of the Evangelists toward the Samaritans was not uniform: *Luke attempted to understand them (10:30-37; 17:16), John had an attitude of reconciliation (4:4-42), *Mark was silent and *Matthew had reservations (10:5). *Philip was their apostle (Acts 8:5-25). Today, large numbers of them live together at Nablus, at the foot of Mount Gerizim and around their synagogues. They preserve the ancient traditions: they only accept the *Pentateuch; in light of Dt 18:15-19 they are awaiting a non-Davidic messiah who will restore the cult; they faithfully observe the *sabbath and practice circumcision.

At first, they were not different from Jews, who later provided a different explanation for their faith. Properly speaking they are not a sect or a branch of *Judaism. They are religious conservatives and model their rites, religious practices and ceremonies acc. to the Pentateuch. Tied to the Mosaic laws, they worship the God who revealed himself to Moses. The center of their religious life is the synagogue. On Mount Gerizim they celebrate the *Passover and perform other sacrifices. Accepting only the Pentateuch as *Scripture, they do not recognize the remaining portions of the OT, and they oppose rabbinic Judaism. Because of this self-understanding, they consider themselves to be the true Israel.

G. Ricciotti, Storia d'Israele, II, Turin 1934, 175-184; R.T. Anderson, Le Pentateuque Samaritain CW 2473: RBi 77 (1970) 68-75, 550-560; R.J. Goggins, Samaritans and Jews: The Origins of Samaritanism Reconsidered (Growing Points in Theology), Oxford 1975; F. Dexinger, Samaritaner: TRE 29, 750-756; A. Loevenstamm, Samaritans: Enc. Jud. 14, 725-758; DBS 11, 773-1047.

E. Peretto

SAMSON (iconography). The *Fathers of the church likened the figure of Samson (*Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 23: CSEL 28, 168ff.) to Jesus Christ, and in early Christian writings, the triumph of the Philistines was seen as a symbol of divine *redemption and victory over death. Despite this important symbolism, the most ancient and unique scenes, in the context of the cemeterial arts, pertaining to the cycle of Samson come from the catacomb of the Via Dino Compagni at Rome. The cycle includes (1) Samson who slaughters the Philistines with a donkey's jawbone (Jgs 15:9-17) in recess F (Ferrua, Via Latina, pl. CV); (2) Samson who releases the foxes into the fields (Jgs 15:5) in recess B (ibid., XXX,1); (3) Samson who strangles the lion (Jgs 14:6). This last scene is found in two recesses: on the ceiling of recess B (ibid., pl. XVII) one only sees the portion under Samson's feet and the hind legs of the lion; in room L, however (ibid., pl. CIX), Samson is clothed in a tunic and a pallium; below there is a dead lion with the bees making honey in its mouth. The hypogeum is dated between 320 and 360. In the *mosaics there is only one example pertaining to Samson: on the floor of the basilica of *Mopsuestia of *Cilicia, from the 1st half of the 5th c. To this era are also dated the fragmentary reliefs in the martyrion of Seleucia, near *Antioch. With respect to the sumptuary arts, a silk cloth can be found in the Vatican Museum containing the event of the fight with the lion. The 8th-c. cloth is of Syrian origin. Another scene pertaining to Samson can be found among the Christian *symbols on a bronze Roman medallion.

DACL 15, 740; EC 10, 1819-1820; LCI 4, 30-38; F. Buonarroti, Osservazioni sopra alcuni frammenti di vasi antichi di vetri ornati di figure trovati nei cimiteri di Roma, Florence 1716, p. 2, pl. II; P. Lauer, Le trésor du Sancta Sanctorum: Fondation E. Piot, Monuments et mémoires 15 (1906) pl. XVIII; K. Weitzmann, in Antioch on the Orontes, ed. R. Stilwell, Princeton-London 1941, 137 a., I v. XVII; L. Budde, Antike Mosaiken in Kilikien, Recklinghausen 1969, 187, figs. 143-157; TIP 276.

A.M. Di Nino

SAMUEL of Qalamun (Kalamun) (d. 695). One of the primary figures of *Coptic *monasticism at the cusp of the Arabic invasion (7th c.). A native of the Nile Delta and the son of a priest, he became a monk at *Scete and led an *anchoretic life. He underwent the persecution led by the *Melkite patriarch Cyrus Moqauqas around the year 630 because he did not want to deny the anti-Chalcedonian confession. He was then captured by the Mazici and was held prisoner. After he had been freed, he went to Fayum and established a new monastery at Qalamun. As the head of that community he earned great fame and also remained in good relations with the Arabic conquerors. (It was still the period in which Copts and Arabs enjoyed a substantially peaceful coexistence.) The Life of Samuel was written in Coptic and has come down to us intact in the original language and in an abbreviated Ethiopian translation, probably through *Arabic. This hagiographical work contains a large quantity of miraculous events but also many historical pieces of information of great interest, and taken as a whole it is a trustworthy historical source. Samuel's type of ascetic life in the monastery was considered normal for those times; monastic life was one of the components of Egyptian civil and religious life, with constant relations to the various authorities and the local population and the concomitant spiritual and economic problems that resulted from it. As a general rule, asceticism did not have to be very rigorous.

P. van Cauwenbergh, Étude sur les moines d'Égypte, Paris 1914 (repr. Milan 1973); A. Alcock, The Life of Samuel of Kalamun, Warminster 1983; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 2092-2209.

T. Orlandi

SANCTE DEUS, LUCIS LUMEN, CONCORDIA RERUM (ps.-Paulinus of Nola). In the Codex Urbinas lat. 533 of the 15th c. from the Vatican Library, at folios 62r-67r, one finds a poem written in distichs without an indication of its author and title (the incipit reads Sancte Deus, lucis lumen, concordia rerum), which Angelo Mai regarded as previously unpublished (ineditum) and published the editio princeps of this work in 1827, attributing it to *Paulinus of Nola. The verses underwent a second edition with modifications of little importance and still with the attribution to Paulinus of Nola, likewise edited by Angelo Mai in 1833, and were then edited by W. von Hartel, who published them in an appendix to the poems of Paulinus of Nola in the Viennese corpus (CSEL 30, 1894, 350-256). Mai's attribution to Paulinus of Nola, which he based on unpersuasive arguments (the presence of the poem in a codex containing Paulinus of Nola's works, in which also appears, however, the spurious poem Verba tui famuli, rex summe, attende serenus to be attributed to Paul the Deacon, the congruity between scenes of the poem and the themes in the writings of Paulinus of Nola, the author's humility in weeping for his sins, the sacrament of baptism received in his adult years), was not received in the Vienna corpus, in which the verses are presented as those of ps.-Paulinus of Nola, and their nonascribability to Paulinus has now become widely accepted. The poem is the work of an unknown author who in 120 elegiac distichs, a type of versification widely used between the 4th and 5th centuries, expressed his heartfelt Christian faith, giving special emphasis to the theme of conversion, which results in baptism. Conversion is then perceived and presented not as a retreat from the evil committed but is presented in the first place as a moral and religious fact that overflows and leads to the praise of the triune God, a God who loves humankind, and proclaims and offers to all salvation and communion of life with him. The author of the distichs is an expert in the preceding rhetorical and literary language, and this became an efficacious, expressive foundation even for the biblical and liturgical themes which connote the anonymous author's interiority and culture, a man of letters and a sincere believer who expressed his faith. The poem should be examined in the cultural, spiritual and literary context established by some authors from Aquitania of the 4th to 5th c.: Horentius's Commonitorium, the De Providentia attributed to *Prosper of Aquitaine, the verses Ad coniugem, which are likewise ps.-Paulinian, the Epigramma Paulini, the Eucharisticos and the Oratio by *Paulinus of Pella. Perhaps one could speak of the "Aquitaine circle," reusing the phrase coined by A. Feder (aquitanischer Kreis). One is facing a literature that is not so much an examination of conscience and a listing of all the moral precepts (as it is easily defined therein), but of the worship and praise of God, which has existential consequences.

In the 4th-5th c., Aquitaine was characterized by much political instability and substantial economic and social difficulties, from barbarian invasions, which esp. passed through this region from the moment when, on 31 December 406, *Vandals, Alans and Suebi broke through the Rhine barrier and invaded the provinces of *Gaul, passing from Aquitaine into *Spain in the autumn of 409. The period between the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th witnessed disorder, loss, disturbance and even corruption within the church, but also witnessed a significant phenomenon of multiple and documented conversions by simple anonymous individuals as well as by young professionals and intellectuals (one thinks of Augustine and his circle of friends, *Marius Victorinus, Paulinus of Nola and his friends: *Vitricius of Rouen, Aper and his wife Amanda; one also thinks of Prudentius, *Sedulius, *Paulinus of Pella and the conversions connected to the monastery of *Lérins). It also knew the enthusiasm of the ascetic life (one thinks of *Martin of Tours, *Honoratus of Lérins, *Sulpicius Severus and Paulinus of Nola). In this context, the literary and poetic production of the authors of the "Aquitaine circle" between the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c. counseled people to pass from the sapientia terrena to the sapientia Dei, following the teaching and language of the apostle *Paul (1 Cor 1:20ff). This is the sapientia that overcomes stultitia, i.e., serious error with respect to the true value of things. The fool thinks that the things that will last are going to perish and vice versa; for this reason he thinks that the rich, the powerful and those who assert themselves are happy; the goods of the earth, however, can be lost in one day. The wise servant of Christ has the right perception of the true value of things; therefore, he is free of them.

Conversion was therefore lived and presented as the dynamic reality of an encounter with the triune God, to be completed through the passage to a life in wisdom acc. to God. Underlying the entire anonymous poem is the hope: sim mundo stultus ut Tibi sim sapiens (v. 144).

A. Mai, Ss. Episcoporum Nicetae et Paulini scripta ex Vaticanis codicibus edita, Rome 1827, 63-71; Id., Classicorum auctorum e Vaticanis codicibus editorum tomus V, Rome 1933, 369-379; G. de Hartel, CSEL 30, 1894, 350-356; M.G. Bianco, La vita alla luce della sapienza. Il Carme anonimo Sancte Deus, lucis lumen, concordia rerum. Introduzione, testo critico, traduzione e commento, Università degli studi di Macerata, Pubblicazioni della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia 54, Rome 1990.

M.G. Bianco

SANCTUARY

I. Sanctuaries ad corpus - II. Reliquary sanctuaries - III. "Locative" sanctuaries - IV. Hierophantic sanctuaries - V. Therapeutic sanctuaries.

On the basis of the generally received meaning, any place characterized by the presence of a sacred element, for which one can verify a visitation for devotional purposes, which therefore has an implicitly substantial devotional role, can be termed a sanctuary. The list of such places turns out to be extraordinarily rich, both with respect to the innumerable and diverse character of such settlements within the broad time span from the origins of Christianity to the Middle Ages. Within the context of the exceptional documentary panorama available, one can attempt a typological classification of sanctuaries on the basis of the forms in which they impose the presence of something sacred, which justifies the birth and the development of a center for worship; the sequence of clusters provides significant information for the elaboration of a chronological framework within which the comprehensive history of such centers should be reconstructed.

I. Sanctuaries ad corpus. The sanctuaries to be attributed to this group (ad corpus), which is arguably the most consistent and the earliest in formation, are those that arose esp. in direct relation to the burial places which were objects of devotion not only of the martyrs but also of well-known persons, esp. bishops, or at times, important figures of power, as in the exemplary case of the sepulcher of the emperor *Constantine at *Constantinople, "glorified together with a greeting directed toward the apostles" (Euseb., Vita Constantini IV,71). *Rome was the center at which this phenomenon took root, esp. during the period of the persecutions. The city developed an unmatched network of tombs, which progressively, through declared and general venerational attention, for the most part with early and significant monuments, brought the identity of the sanctuaries to maturity by transforming the image of the entire city into a vast sanctuarial entity. Of the 170 cultic regions included as goals for pilgrim visits in one of the itineraria from the 1st half of the 7th c., the Notitia Ecclesiarum Urbis Romae, a series of sanctuaries established in the hypogea of the cemeteries were archaeologically identified, although the sepulchers located in the city often posed significant problems in the areas sub divo, which were brought to light in an extremely fragmented state. In general, then, even in the well-known layouts it seems rather difficult to identify the original configuration of the burial place, which was systematically compromised by an often complex sequence of subsequent interventions designed to improve cultic apparatuses and the progressive refinement of the forms of reception and accessibility of the limina sancta.

One must recall, in general, that in the primary phase of deposition, the remains of the martyrs were mostly placed within simple funerary entities, absolutely indistinct from those of the other faithful, as demonstrated by a fortuitous discovery, during work in 1845 in the catacomb of Bassilla on the Via Salaria vetus, of the intact sepulcher of Hyacinth, who was most likely a victim of the *Diocletian persecution. The martyr's burial cell, which was hidden by the rising of the floor in the original cubicle, had receded backward due to the systematic extraction of venerated relics for transfer into the churches intra muros during the centuries of the Late Middle Ages. The burial cell had been further ravaged by "those seeking the bodies of the saints" during the modern age. It was discovered by the Jesuit Father Giuseppe Marchi with the original slab still affixed and bearing a reference to his name Iacinthus martyr, accompanied by the date of deposition III idus septe(m)br(es) (ICUR X 26662). The date 11 September aligns with his dies natalis mentioned by the depositio martyrum* (Valentini - Zucchetti, 26). In actual fact, the tomb was configured as a niche large "enough to collect . . . a small group of ashes and burned bones wrapped in gold cloth and spices" (Marchi). As simple sepulchers they were taking shape, at the time of burial, near the same loci which received the remains of Peter and Paul in the necropolises on the Vatican Hill along the Via Ostia. However, already within a few decades a significant and parallel program of promoting monuments was taking place, as attested to by the well-known fragment cited in *Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia ecclesiastica taken from the presbyter *Gaius, who lived during the time of *Zephyrinus. In this passage he pointed *Proclus, the head of the *Montanists, to the τρόπαια, i.e., "the trophies of the founders of this church" (Historia ecclesiastica 2,25,7), one in honor of Peter rightfully recognized in a stand leaning against the "red wall," an artifact which was unearthed during the excavation of the 1940s under the presbytery of the basilica dedicated to the apostle.

But it was esp. during the period following the peace of the church that the most significant development of sanctuaries occurred, a development aided by the direct intervention of the popes in the organization of the sepulchers of the martyrs. For some of the tombs that had by that point fallen into oblivion, true and proper works of inventio were undertaken, and preliminary strategies were developed for visiting the venerated tombs. If the literary sources, which fortunately at times can be integrated with the information on the monuments, allow scholars to connect (1) Pope *Sylvester (314–335), who was helped by Emperor *Constantine himself, with the basilicas ad corpus of St. Peter and St. Paul and the first work on the sepulcher of St. *Lawrence; (2) Pope *Julius (337–352) with the most ancient building in honor of *Valentinus; and (3) Pope *Liberius (352–366) with early decoration of the tomb of St. *Agnes (Liber pontificalis I,176, 178, 181, 208), then it was only with Pope *Damasus (366–384) that the project grew and acquired globalizing characteristics, making the church the only true "entrepreneur" of the cult of the saints. The strengthening of the sanctuaries is without a doubt bound to Pope Damasus, who has no parallel throughout the centuries of Late Antiquity. According to his biographer, simply hic multa corpora sanctorum requisivit et invenit, quorum etiam versibus declaravit (Liber pontificalis I,212). This information is to be set against an extensive series of incised epigraphic discoveries by the secretary and calligrapher Furius Dionysius Philocalus that confirm systematic interventions, which, it is believed, were rather standard in terms of the monumental profile in all the martyria of Roman suburbs.

One can reasonably infer that after 384, the year of Pope Damasus's death, each venerated tomb was withdrawn from undistinguished membership in the homogeneous sepulchral areas and entrusted to the devotion of the faithful with clear signs of official church recognition, signs which were summarized in the epigraphic furnishings of the display, in architectural and decorative enhancement, often with the use of splendid marble, and in appropriate inclusion within a circuit tour with well-defined stops. One can hypothesize that the earliest interventions were undertaken by the pontiff in the cemetery of *Callistus, which, until the recent decades of its development, preserved the characteristics of a strictly elitist context for the ecclesiastical hierarchy both in the cubicle of Pope *Cornelius, the successor of Peter from 251 to 253, and in the crypt where the nine popes of the 3rd c., from *Fabian to *Eutychian, were laid to rest. Here, in relation to the remote tomb in which lay the remains of *Sixtus II, a martyr of the bloody persecution of the emperor *Valerian, Damasus had two inscriptions written: one dedicated to his predecessor on the high part and, on the low part, an epigram in honor of all the saints venerated in the cemetery (ICUR IV 9514 and ICUR IV 9513). He also prepared a rather simple organization with the construction of a wall placed upon the original sepulcher acc. to the dining table design, which was constructed in such a way that allowed the people to peek through a fenestella. He also prepared the organization of an altar in the opposite sector, illuminated by an adequately positioned skylight, and the marble covering of the façade. In certain areas, Damasus's intervention over a venerated tomb made provisions for the application of a more developed schema, which can also be ascribable to an empowering in a certain symbolic way of the decorating, which is suggestive, it has been hypothesized, of a ciborium with the function of emphasizing the full presence of the sacred. The best-preserved examples are in the catacomb of *Praetextatus, over the tomb of the martyr *Januarius and in the crypt recently attributed to Pope Urban, where the monumental epigraphs appear flanked by columns supporting a marble architrave with perforated screens for filling the central spaces. Another scheme is also in the sanctuary of St. *Marcellinus and Peter on the Via Labicana, with columns furrowed in replacement for some of the columns close to the wall with the two venerated loculi.

After the 4th c. and until the Early Middle Ages, the venerated centers in suburban Rome acquired characteristics of extraordinary variety in the monumental solutions, which certainly recalled some contributing factors: (1) primarily the peculiarities of the contexts of belonging to the open sky or the underground regions, at times modified at the cost of radical tamperings with preexisting structures; (2) the ability of certain cults to be more attractive than others; and (3) the considerable assistance of devoted benefactors, who often sponsored important structural and decorative transformations to the holy places. In a general and abridged consideration, this material evolution of the sanctuaries can be reduced to a phenomenon of progressive conquering of one's own space, increasingly more suited to the liturgical and cultic demands, to the reception of numerous visitors and to the program of creating new, very sought-after sepulchers, privileged by their vicinity to the limina sanctorum. Numerous basilicas answered these demands, some of considerable size, built, esp. between the 6th and 7th c., on the same tombs of the martyrs such as those of *Nereus and Achilleus, in the structure of *Domitilla on the Via Ardeatina, San Lorenzo on the Via Tiburtina, *Agnes on the Via Nomentana, the martyr Hermes on the Via Salaria Vetus. With this process the object place of devotion developed its own architectonic and functional identity in respect to the original cemeteries, which gradually fell into disuse after the 1st decades of the 5th c., whose survival, no longer guaranteed by the sepulchral activity, was also reduced to the same life of the martyrial center.

But the sanctuaries ad corpus of suburban Rome also played the role of definite protagonists in some substantial phenomena that marked the transformation of the topographical layout of the city and in particular the transformation of the functional relationships between urban spaces properly speaking and extramural territory in the centuries of transition from Antiquity to the Middle Ages, esp. through the well-reconstructed process of gradual improvement and multipurpose growth of the structures, a growth documented in relation to the most important martyria. The first extremely significant tendency in the multifunctional development of the martyrial structures should be seen in the annexing of the baptisteries. The archaeological evidence certainly attests to the presence of a baptismal font, in the final decades of the 4th c. and perhaps by the work of Pope *Damasus as well, in the basilica of St. Peter, where it occupied, presumably, the N arm of the transept, and, at the beginning of the 5th c., at St. Agnes. Later the construction of a baptistery was ordered by Pope *Hilary (461–468) at the basilica of St. Lawrence and by his successor *Simplicius (468–483) at the basilica of St. Paul. But above all, some sanctuaries at early stages attracted occasional vistors, alongside the masses of devotees, for whom were set up specifically host organizations (xenodochia) and facilities (balnea, which are attested to by the sources at the basilicas of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Pancras and St. Lawrence), and certain forms of fixed residency. In addition to the habitacula pauperibus, which was built by Pope *Symmachus (498–514), near the sanctuaries of Peter, Paul and Lawrence (Liber pontificalis I,263), in the same area as the Vatican, and esp. around the Circus of *Nero, stood, on the basis of the testimony given by *Procopius, “many and various homes, which resulted in crammed streets everywhere” (Bellum gothicum II,1).

In relation to the large sanctuaries there gradually arose monastic centers, which must have contributed to the care of the cult and to the assistance of pilgrims: the first cenobitic establishment attested to by the sources in the area outside the walls is the one that arose in service of the structure ad Catacumbas during the pontificate of Pope *Sixtus III (432–440), which was reorganized under the direction of an abbot by Pope Nicholas I (858–867; LP I,234; II,161). Other monasteries were instituted near the sanctuaries of Hermes, Agnes and *Pancras. Various settlements of this sort were widespread, esp., however, in the area of the large sanctuaries, namely that of Sts. Stephen and Cassian ad balneum and St. Lawrence, those of Aristus, Cesarius, the two dedicated to the same Stephen, one of which was for women, at St. *Paul and those of *John and Paul, of Martin, St. Stephen Major and Minor and that of the so-called Hierusalem at St. *Peter. With regard to the stay of foreigners at Rome are linked finally the scholae peregrinonum, which were permanent establishments equiped for reception and shelter, but also with cultural and military functions, and furnished with their own hospital, a church and a cemetery for the community. The four scholae from which information is provided by the Early Medieval sources with respect to the Petrine sanctuary are mentioned by the biographer of Pope Leo III (795–816), who, upon returning to Rome in 799 from the court of Charlemagne, where he had fled following an attack, was received by all classes of Roman society, to which they had allied cunctae scholae peregrinorum, videlicet Francorum, Frisonum, Saxonum atque Langobardorum (LP II,6). It can be seen from the functional point of view that the centralizing of these manifold structures around the chief martyria was at the basis of the “urbanization” of extramural areas linked to the tombs of the martyrs, a phenomenon that annulled the rigid traditional boundaries between city and suburb and had its most significant examples in the final definition of the complex urban structural centers that have formed around the basilicas of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Lawrence and St. Sebastian. The creation of systems of fortification and wall incorporation around these basilicas from the 9th c. onward marks the birth of true and proper civitates around Rome (and as such were known to the sources as civitas leoniana of the Petrine sanctuary and Johannipolis for that of Paul, from the names of the pontiffs who completed the layout of the castra, and the Laurentiopolis), with its own topographic configuration and a quasi-satellite physiognomy with respect to the city enclosed within the Aurelian walls. The presence of walls made such settlements similar to impenetrable citadels, as, among other things, at the time of the Greek-Gothic War Procopius had already attested to for the planning of St. Paul, which as "a portico (that) goes from the city to the temple and many other buildings nearby" made it "difficult to attack" (Bellum gothicum II,1).

Although a substantially uninterrupted visitational trajectory can be laid out in relation to these important centers, during the Early Middle Ages the history of the other numerous sanctuaries ad corpus scattered around the Aurelian walls can be summarized as a progressive abandonment following the transfer of the remains of the martyrs into the worship buildings intra muros. Important precedents are traced in the biographies of the popes between the 7th and 8th c., directed at structures rather distant from Rome (Pope Theodore [642–649] ordered that the remains of Primus and Felicianus be transferred from a cemetery on the Via Nomentana in the area of Mentana, and Pope Leo II [682–683] transferred the remains of the martyrs Simplicius, Faustina and Viatrice from the estate of Generosa, at the sixth mile of the Via Portuensis, to the urban church of St. Balbina: LP I,332, 360). The phenomenon continued to emerge with more consistent characteristics after the siege of the *Longobard (Lombard) King Aistulf (756), after which Pope Stephen II (752–757) multa corpora sanctorum, effodiens eorum sacra cymiteria, ad magnum anime suo detrimentum abstulit (LP I,451-452), and Paul I (757–767), cernens plurima eorundem sanctorum cymiteriorum loca neglectu ac desidia antiquitatis maxima demolitione atque iam vicina ruine posita, protinus eadem sanctorum corpora de ipsis dirutis abstulit coemeteriis (LP I,464). This trend continued to the point of involving the entire web of sanctuaries in the 9th c., esp. with Pope Paschal I (817–824; LP II,52, 53, 54, 56), despite the attempts of one of his predecessors, Hadrian I (772–795), to reinstate the suburban martyria with substantial and general works of restoration.

Rome played a guiding role in terms of managing an important resource, which the sanctuaries constituted for the churches and provided a comprehensive model for sanctuaries, summarizing the chief steps of the evolutionary trajectory of the martyrial centers from the beginning to the Early Middle Ages, even for numerous other urban and rural centers of the Orbis Christianus, which was marked by the presence of venerated tombs. The general characteristics of the layout and the development of these sites, therefore, appear to be systematically traceable to the times of radicalization of Christianity among the people and the establishment of its institutional structures and with diversified perspectives and responses to local situations.

In general, the devotion to the martyrs and the development of the sanctuaries assumed characteristics of broader importance and diffusion, esp. during the post-Constantinian age. Every center tended to justify its own cults, the foundation of a local church. This development came about, in the greater part of the measurable cases, in direct connection with strategically farsighted programs formulated precisely by the bishops, who were the unquestionable managers of the cultic phenomenon and who were often, as in the Roman case of Damasus, responsible for providential acts of discovery (inventio) of the sacred tombs, which the extensive period of time after burial and, of course, the lack of early venerational interests had reduced to oblivion. Thus at Milan *Ambrose directed the first significant monumental interventions at the cemetery ad martyres, outside the Porta Vercellina, and on the street headed toward the Piedmontese area were the sepulchers of Victor, the Mauritanian soldier who was martyred at Lodi during the Diocletian persecution, and of Sts. Felix and Nabor. There a felicitous intervention of the bishop himself had led to the discovery of the remains of *Gervasius and Protasius, ante cancellos sanctorum Felicis atque Naboris (*Ep.*XXII, 1 = PL 16, 1019). Likewise at Nola the significant introduction of the rearrangement of the structure completed by Paulinus of Bordeaux, the consul suffectus and the governor of Campania, who became bishop of the city, had the credit of discovering (inventio) the tomb of St. *Felix, the rediscovery of which the Carmina (esp. XXI, vv. 557-565) clearly allude to.

Three main developments summarize the fundamental features of the evolution of the martyrial structures: (1) the Cimitile complex with the important Paulinian feature (i.e., the construction of the basilica nova to the N of the building ad corpus, which was connected through the replacment of the apse with a monumental triforium); (2) the progressive predisposition of spaces for sepulchers ad sanctum, which is also of exceptional importance (for Paulinus himself, his wife Tharasia and some bishops of Nola tombs were created in proximity to that of the martyr; even the later basilica of St. *Thomas, attributed to a period between the end of the 6th c. and the next, was conceived as a covered cemetery); and (3) the significant, gradual, multifunctional strengthening of structures retrieved from the hub of worship—a baptistery, monastic buildings, spaces for reception and services. These characteristics can be identified with features generally marked by their systematic nature in the sanctuarial realities better known archaeologically. A constant attraction of privileged tombs has been uncovered, esp. episcopal tombs, a phenomenon well known both in the East and the West. This was a polygenetic development even within the perspective of the structures for the cura animarum, which became concrete in the sufficiently attested annexing of baptisteries, which was a dominant, peculiar feature esp. in the Eastern provinces, where it seems to have established itself as the model (in the West, in addition to the Roman examples and the case of Cimitile, significant situations have been documented, e.g., in *Sardinia, at St. Saturnus and at St. Antiochus of Sulcis, in *Gaul at *Tours and in *Spain at Calagurris). At Tours, the "urban" increase in relation to the tomb of St. *Martin and the small church super corpus beati Martini, which was described by *Sulpicius Severus and *Gregory of Tours (part. Historia francorum X,31,4), substantially covers nearly two centuries, from the 4th to the 6th, and the result is established by the complete and exhaustive articulation of structures—the baptistery, a colonnaded structure around the basilica, and oratory and other adjoining sanctuaries, a domus, monasteries and centers of reception—which defines the transition from the civitas Turonorum to the new Christian vicus.

II. Reliquary sanctuaries. This section will cover sanctuaries that arose in relation to the presence of relics. On the basis of the differentiated nature of these relics, these sanctuaries require a further and more precise subclassification, whether in relation to bodily relics, objects of different functions or materials generally sanctified e contactu, relics from the Holy Land or Marian relics. In a few cases, however, one can document the simultaneous presence of categorically dissimilar cultic objects.

The circulation and the cult of corporeal relics had their raison d'être in the idea, formulated esp. by Greek authors such as *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (Sermo I, 8 = PG 83, 818), of an intact preservation of the virtus in the passage from one whole, which could be theoretically broken up ad infinitum, to one part. While it was generally considered a widespread custom in the East and despite its being rather circumscribed in the West—due to a more direct adherence to the legislative norms that prohibited the tampering with sepulchers and on the basis of the professed dislike of this practice by the Roman Church, in particular with certain popes such as *Hormisdas and *Gregory I, who refused the granting of bodily remains even to the representatives of the Byzantine court—this practice found rather significant manifestations in the beginning stages of the development of the sanctuaries. For many local churches the importing of the relics of "foreign" martyrs corresponded to well-studied strategies of cultic politics promoted by the bishops, but it esp. compensated for the lack of a personal historical-hagiographical heritage, which was established by the tombs of the martyrs of the persecutions.

In N *Italy, if one disregards the early circulation of apostolic relics (which, e.g., arrived into the community of Concordia perhaps even before the institution of the episcopate) and certain isolated cases (such as the arrival in Vercelli through the intervention of Bishop *Eusebius, around 360, of the remains of the St. Theonestus, who was probably of Eastern origin), the Ambrosian period seems to have inaugurated a generalization of the phenomenon in Milan. *Ambrose brought to the *Longobard (Lombard) center the relics of the apostles *John, *Andrew and *Thomas; and with these, which were placed under the major altar, he consecrated the sanctuary with a significant cross-shaped floor plan, which was strategically placed on the road toward Rome. Along with such corporeal remains the relics of the martyr *Euphemia of *Chalcedon were brought for a building located at the S of the city, although, only after the bishop's death and during the episcopate of his successor Simplicius. Due to a successful program of promotion of the relics of the saints by *Vigilius, the bishop of Trent, *Milan was enriched with the remains of the Cappadocian priests *Sissinius, Martyrius and Alexander, who were killed while preaching the gospel in the Alpine valleys of Anaunia (Val di Non). The circulation of these holy remains was guaranteed in a noteworthy measure by the friendly relations between the most representative figures of Christianity of that era. From one of *Vitricius of Rouen's writings we learn that in 296 a celebration was held in various cities commemorating the adventus of precious relics such as those of *Nazarius (Milan), Procolus (Bologna) and Antoninus (Piacenza), which were also donated, among other things, by Ambrose and Eustasius the bishop of Aosta. For the consecration of a sanctuary in Brescia in the year 402, *Gaudentius was able to gather, with exceptional adorning of the structure built on a circular layout, the remains of the apostles John, Thomas, Andrew and *Luke, but also the remains of the aforementioned martyrs of Anaunia (Val di Non).

Even at Rome, despite the previously mentioned traditional aversion toward tampering with corpses—a position that made rather improbable the movement, even though temporary after the *Valerian persecution of 258, of the remains of *Peter and *Paul in the memoria apostolorum on the Via Appia, which has been considered by some people the origin of the sanctuary (the genesis of which should be considered, therefore, rather of a commemorative nature; one cannot exclude the presence of relics e contactu)—cultic centers born in relation to the importation of relics or to the deposition of secondary relics are attested to. These relics presumably came to the city through the intervention of ethnic groups residing there permanently. We see this, first, in the catacomb of Pamphilus, where a massive altar seemed to be the ideal entity for the repositioning of the relics of the eponymous African; second, in that of the catacomb ad duas lauros, where the *Four Crowned Martyrs were venerated, who were probably from Pannonia; and third, within the structure of St. Sebastian, in which a monumental mausoleum adjoined to the secular basilica dedicated to Peter and Paul had received, between the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c., the remains of the bishop of Siscia *Quirinus, after his death in his homeland. The presence of the Greek community in the monastery that arose in the place traditionally connected to the martyrdom of St. Paul on the Via Ostia justified the importation to Rome of the head of the Persian martyr *Anastasius Magundat, an object of great veneration ad Aquas Salvias, sometime after the year 628, the year of the slaying, and after 641, the end of the kingdom of *Heraclius. Likewise, the Greek community explains, despite the nebulous information concerning the means by which it might have arrived in the city of Rome, the presence of the head of St. *George, which was rediscovered by Pope *Zachariah (741–752), acc. to his biographer, in a repository box (capsa) in the patriarch's palace of the Lateran and which was transferred into the church of St. George in Velabro (LP I,434). It is difficult to determine, however, if in Rome itself relics were used, whether bodily or of another type, as the basis for the dedication of certain consecrated buildings by pontiffs to nonlocal martyrs, as in the cases of the basilica of S. Apollinare near St. Peter's, the sepulchral areas of the Sicilian Euplus of Catania, or the Egyptian Menas in the vicinity of the basilica of St. Paul. It seems certain, however, that the majority of the sanctuaries erected with the presence of bodily remains, and in particular the earliest ones, underwent a process of extreme "naturalization" in the sepulchral area that received them and enjoyed a cult entirely indistinguishable from the one directed toward the primary tombs of the martyrs, even starting common processes, such as that of the depositio ad sanctos. For the aforementioned Roman cases of Pamphilus, the *Four Crowned Martyrs and *Quirinus of Siscia, e.g., the type of devotional use that was shown by the early medieval itineraria became entirely indistinct, even through a likely distancing of the historical memory of the genetic element of the cult from those of the original sepulchers.

Different evaluations were imposed by some particularly succesful cults, the spread of which was connected to a true and proper diaspora of bodily relics, a diaspora documented in emblematic terms through the remains of the protomartyr *Stephen, after the miraculous discovery (inventio) of the place of his burial, which was followed by a vision received in a dream by the priest *Lucian of Caphargamala (PL 41,807-818), at Kĕfar Gamlā, N of the city walls of *Jerusalem, in 415. The remains, which had been distributed throughout the world (Orbis), gave rise to the birth of various sanctuaries in the West, as far as Mahon, a city located on the island of Minorca, and in the East, esp. at *Constantinople, where the martyr's hand and relics were transferred on several occasions, in honor of which a new church was built, a project that was accomplished by *Pulcheria, the sister of the emperor *Theodosius II in 428. *Eudoxia transferred new relics in the year 439, and again in the 6th c. Julia Anicia broadened the repertory; a legendary tradition then established their subsequent transfer from Constantinople to Rome at the time of Pope *Pelagius II, who placed them in the extramural basilica of St. *Lawrence (BHL II,1139, nn. 7878-7885).

A significant turn in the growth of the sanctuaries that were established in relation to bodily relics should be traced in some substantial changes during the centuries of the Early Middle Ages, a period in which the continuity of visitations to the original martyria was often shown to be radically compromised by political changes; demographic, urban and territorial transformations; and esp. the places of cult ad corpus of suburban Rome, which underwent a gradual but irreversible abandonment due to the systematic movement of the saints' bodies into the urban churches. The phenomenon of the translation of relics, it is obvious, contributed to the definitive changes of mindset and to the change from the traditional reluctance shown by the Church of Rome toward tampering with the venerated sepulchers, a reluctance which had without a doubt impeded the sanctuary-city from transforming itself into an "inexhaustible mine of relics" (Cardini, Reliquie, 1024). A certain generosity of the papacy in the granting of the martyrs' remains was, at one time, deeply motivated by the political repercussions of the establishment of spiritual filiations such as those with the Franks or the Burgundians and could move in parallel with the processes of evangelization of peoples, a phenomenon which justified the "material" property at least of the bodily parts of their own protectors. In this way, well-rooted cults at Rome crossed the Alpine arc and found a home in N Europe, even following the traditional practice furta sacra, such as those of Marcellinus and Peter, which had been transferred into the German town Seligenstadt through Einhard's translation effort and that of Sebastian at Soissons, thanks to Hilduin, the abbot of St. Medardus. The sanctity of certain inescapable centers of Christianity beyond the Alps such as Fleury, e.g., was established upon imported relics, where the relics of St. *Benedict and *Scholastica had come from Monte Cassino. The same was true of Fulda, the most representative holy city of the Saxon area, which in the Middle Ages boasted the presence of the bodily remains of prestigious saints.

Another set of relics in which one should recognize a potential sacred element at the basis of the founding of a sanctuary is represented by the "contact" relics, which were promoted esp. by the Church of Rome as an alternative to the fragmentation and circulation of bodily remains. The efficacy of such sanctuaria resulted in the miraculous passage of the saint's virtus to handmade materials, whether objects that the saints had touched before death such as the chains of the apostles Peter and Paul, the grill of St. Lawrence, or the stones used for the stoning of the protomartyr Stephen, one of which, after being placed super altare, was venerated at Rome in an oratory near the Pauline sanctuary on the Via Ostia (De locis sanctis: Valentini - Zucchetti, 109); the same occurred with elements, esp. fabric, which were sanctified through contact with a tomb. Writing in the year 594 to the empress Constantina and desiring to obtain Paul's remains for the new church dedicated to the apostle at Constantinople, Pope *Gregory I explained that, by placing a brandeum in a small box (in buxide) ad sacratissima corpora sanctorum . . . quod levatum in ecclesia quae est dedicanda debita cum veneratione reconditur; in this way, one would receive the same miraculous effect (tantae per hoc ibidem virtutes fiunt), acsi illic specialiter eorum corpora deferantur (Ep. IV,30,35).

The propagation of relics from the Holy Land, on the other hand, determined the exceptionally early origin of numerous venerated centers related to them, either independently or in strengthening and empowering other forms of devotion. The discovery of the true cross had esp. triggered, from the Constantinian age, an extraordinary diffusion of the staurolite cult, due to the direct intervention of *Helena, who had reached Jerusalem at the invitation of the bishop *Macarius after the Council of *Nicaea (325) and was personally responsible for the first translation of relics from the Holy Land to Rome, where, in the Sessorium Palace, an oratory had been consecrated. The city of Rome (Urbs) itself was also able to fulfill the function of a sorting center, if indeed Rome was the origin of the relics venerated in the church of St. Peter at Spoleto, a station for pilgrims coming to Rome from the North, perhaps among those requested in the 1st half of the 5th c. by Bishop Achilles. Analogously, remnants of wood from the cross of Christ's passion, a symbol of the real body of Christ, had come to Nola through *Melania the Younger, and to Vienna, where remnants had been requested between the year 518 and 523 by Bishop *Avitus from the patriarch of Jerusalem, and to *Poitiers, where a precious relic of the cross, which was also mentioned in the hymns of *Venantius Fortunatus, had arrived, thanks to the emperor *Justin II, for the consecration of a monastery dedicated to the cross. Within the 1st half of the 7th c., Rome was enriched perhaps with new relics from Bethlehem if one can logically tie the title ad Praesepe, which was used to refer, for the first time under Pope *Theodore (642–649), to the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore (LP I,331).

From the 5th c. onward there exists documentation even for the definition of cultic objects tied to the initial spread of Marian relics. The first attestation was the consecration of a chapel at *Constantinople within the building of St. Mary at Blachernae in order to receive the fragment of the Thetokos's cloak, which was brought to *Palestine in 473 upon the order of the emperor *Leo I (457–474; Theod., Epitome 508,24-25). In the same city the church of Chalkoprateia housed, in the 6th c., the girdle of the Blessed Virgin *Mary (ibid., 363).

III. "Locative" sanctuaries. One could define as "locative" sanctuaries the centers of devotional attraction which had been established in relation to the memory of events in reference to special places, in the context of which the desire of repeating the memory was oftentimes materialized with the construction of the building. Alongside the earliest and most emblematic monuments of the Holy Land—the sites of the Passion and the Nativity, the value of which was increased through the direct intervention of *Constantine—a broad and variegated repertory of reminiscent locations should be noted as locative sanctuaries, on the basis of traditions that were more or less trustworthy, of episodes relating to the life or the martyrdom of the saints. At Rome, between *Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, these repertories progressively enriched the already very broad web of sanctuaries ad corpus, creating allusions to the experience of Peter and Paul, to whom, between 676 and 678 Pope Donus had dedicated an ecclesia sita via Ostense (LP I,348), which was later considered the transmission of the memory of the last encounter between the two apostles before undergoing martyrdom, which was narrated in a letter of ps.-*Dionysius (Mombritius, Sanctuarius seu vitae sanctorum, Paris 1910, II,355). Analogously, on the site ad Aquas Salvias of the supposed decapitation of the apostle Paul, acc. to a very ancient tradition mentioned as early as the apocryphal Acts of ps.-Marcellus, the memory of the martyrdom must have materialized very early with the erection of a commemorative building, which in the 7th c. was restored by Pope *Sergius (688–689), presumably in the place today occupied by S. Pauli ad Aquas Salvias, a work of Cardinal Pietro Aldobrandini in the last decades of the 16th c. In relation to Peter, in the area N of the city, between the Via Salaria and the Via Nomentana, a tradition had already been reestablished from the 5th c. and was recorded by the Passio of Papia and Maurus (Act. Sanct., Ian. II,371) and by the Gesta Liberii, which tied the apostle's baptismal activity to the coemeterium Maius, in the area in which one can suppose some material entity was established with the function of a memorial evocation, from which the presbyter John, during the pontificate of Gregory the Great, was able to withdraw olea sancta (Valentini - Zucchetti, 44-45).

Pilgrims attracted by the prospect of visiting the tombs of the saints were directed to turn their own devotional attention also to places consecrated by the acclamation of hagiographic accounts such as the carcer in quo fuit Laurentius, which was included in De locis sanctis (Valentini - Zucchetti, 114-115), or the small oratory near the suburban temple of Mars, on the Via Appia, where the hagiographic account centered the martyrdom of Pope *Sixtus II.

"Locative cultic center" can also be used to describe the series of eremitic sanctuaries, which spread around in the Eastern region, examples of which include the buildings of Qal'at Sim'ān, which developed in the 5th c. around the column of *Simeon the Stylite, and the basilica of Simeon the Younger at *Antioch. Such sanctuaries progressively arose in other geographical areas, esp. with the configuration of the cave sanctuaries, often associated with large pilgrimage roads in Late Antiquity and in the Early Middle Ages.

IV. Hierophantic sanctuaries. The installation of some sanctuaries should also be traced back to the events surrounding the birth of Christ and was well represented in the centuries of Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages from the group connected to the cult of St. Michael, the model of which was generally traced to the Gargano sanctuary dedicated to the archangel in the 2nd half of the 5th c. This would introduce the typical characteristics that almost systematically marked the geomorphological habitat of St. Michael sanctuaries, which can be summarized in the hillside settlements within a natural grotto, often in proximity to rivers or springs, on the backdrop of natural craggy and rocky sceneries. The Gargano grotto was established by two separate cavities from a rocky partition placed at different coordinates, in the smallest of which the archangel, acc. to legend, had left marks, in the point consecrated by an altar. The building was gradually emphasized, first through simple adjustments in the area immediately before the grotto, and then with the progressive juxtaposition of adjoined structures and access to the monuments.

The Gargano sanctuary, however, which was a cultic center in the suburb of Rome, and which was located at the seventh mile of the Via Salaria, seems to have come earlier by a few decades. The first mention of this place is taken from the Hieronymian Martyrology, which mentions its dedicatio for 29 September (Act. Sanct., Nov. II,2, 532), and the remains in a building with three aisles paved with a mosaic and with liturgical fencing in the area of the presbytery.

V. Therapeutic sanctuaries. The name "therapeutic sanctuaries" pertains to those sanctuaries that arose in relation to the charitable characteristics connected to natural elements, esp. water-based, which are generally distinguished by a tendency to be reinstated on sites already highly valued for their thaumaturgic and sacred characteristics in previous eras. Along these lines, one should understand the building of a basilica, between the 5th and 6th c., at the source of the Timavo River, already marked by the cult of the flame in the Roman age, or the devotional visitation to the Temple of Clitumnus, which is linked to an interesting repertory of extemporaneous writings of pilgrims during the *Longobard (Lombard) era, or even the consecration of the place of martyrdom of St. *Saturninus of Cagliari in the area of the more ancient fons Apollinis. Within such a phenomenon of sacralization of the water element one can also frame cases of the increased valuing of water in connection to its baptismal function, both in the context of true and proper baptisteries (Barcino), and through the monumentalization of well-springs or natural aquifers, like a sanctuary-well of the catacomb of St. *Priscilla at Rome, which was characterized by a massive devotional visitation.

General Studies: V. Saxer, Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles. Les témoignages de Tertullien, Cyprien et Augustin à la lumière de l'archéologie africaine, Paris 1980; P. Brown, The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity, London 1981; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae: Le culte des martyrs en Afrique du IVe au VIIe siècle, Rome 1982; L. Pani Ermini, Santuario e città fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo, in Santi e demoni nell'alto medioevo occidentale, secoli V-XI. Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo, 36 (Spoleto, 7-13 aprile 1988), Spoleto 1989, 837-877; Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie (Bonn 22.-28. September 1991), Münster 1995; Lieux sacrés, lieux de culte, sanctuaires. Approches terminologiques, méthodologiques, historiques et monographiques, Rome 2002; Lieux de culte, lieux saints dans le judaïsme, le christianisme et l'islam: RHR 222 (2005) 387-574.

Sanctuaries ad corpus: (Rome) R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, II, Rome 1942; L. Reekmans, L'implantation monumentale chrétienne dans la zone suburbaine de Rome du IVe au IXe siècle: RivAC 44 (1968) 173-207; S. Carletti, Santuari di martiri romani negli itinerari del VII secolo: StudRom 18 (1970) 51-67; Id., Le antiche chiese dei martiri romani, Rome 1972; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975; J. Guyon, Le pélerinage à Rome dans la Basse-Antiquité et le Haut-Moyen-Âge (VIe-IXe s.), in Pélerins de Rome (Visages de Rome, II), Paris 1976, 41-69; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana. Recherches sur l'Église de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie de Miltiade à Sixte III (311–440), Rome 1976; Saecularia Damasiana. Atti del convegno internazionale per il XVI centenario della morte di Papa Damaso I (Città del Vaticano 10-12 dicembre 1984), Vatican City 1986, 291-303; F. Tolotti, Il problema dell'altare e della tomba del martire in alcune opere di papa Damaso, in Studien zur Spatantiken und Byzantinischen Kunst, F.W. Deichman Gewidmet, Mainz 1986, 51-71; V. Saxer, L'utilisation par la liturgie de l'espace urbain et suburbain: l'example de Rome dans l'antiquité et le Haut Moyen Âge, in Actes du XIe Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genéve et Aoste, 21-28 septembre 1986), Vatican City 1989, 917-1032; L. Spera, Cantieri edilizi a Roma in età carolingia: gli interventi di papa Adriano I nei santuari delle catacombe romane: RivAC 73 (1997) 185-254; L. Spera, Ad limina apostolorum. Santuari e pellegrini a Roma nella tarda antichità e nell'altomedioevo, in La geografia della città di Roma e lo spazio del sacro. L'esempio delle trasformazioni territoriali lungo il percorso della Visita alle Sette Chiese Privilegiate, Rome 1998, 1-104; F. Bisconti - D. Mazzoleni, Alle origini del culto dei martiri. Testimonianze dell'archeologia cristiana, Rome 2004; B.M. Apollonj Ghetti - A. Ferrua - E. Josi - E. Kirschbaum, Esplorazioni sotto la confessione di San Pietro in Vaticano, Rome 1951; J. Toynbee - J. Ward-Perkins, The Shrine of St. Peter and the Vatican Excavations, London 1956; E. Kirschbaum, Die Gräber der Apostelfürsten, Frankfurt a.M. 1957; M. Guarducci, Le reliquie di Pietro sotto la confessione della basilica vaticana, Vatican City 1965; L. Reekmans, Le développement topographique de la région du Vatican à la fin de l'antiquité et au début du moyen âge (300–850), in Mélanges d'archéologie et histoire de l'art offerts au prof. Jacques Lavalleye, Louvain 1970, 197-233; Ch. Pietri, Observations sur le martyrium constantinien du Vatican, in Mélanges d'histoire ancienne offerts à William Seston, Paris 1974, 409-418; F. Tolotti, Le confessioni succedutesi sul sepolcro di s. Paolo: RivAC 59 (1983) 87-149; A.M. Giuntella, "Spazio cristiano" e città altomedievale. L'esempio della civitas leoniana, in Atti del VI Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Pesaro-Ancona 19-23 settembre 1983), Ancona 1985, 309-325; G. Filippi, Die Ergebnisse der neuen Ausgrabungen am Grab des Apostels Paulus. Reliquienkult und Eucharistie im Presbyterium der Paulsbasilika: Römische Mitteilungen 112 (2005-06) 277-292.

(Milan) M. Cagiano de Azevedo, Appunti sulla relazione di S. Ambrogio circa lo scavo del sepolcro dei SS. Gervasio e Protasio: Notizie dal chiostro del Monastero Maggiore. Rassegna di studi del Civico Museo archeologico e del Civico gabinetto numismatico di Milan 1-2 (1968) 1-9; M. Sannazaro, Considerazioni sulla topografia e le origini del cimitero milanese Ad martyres: Aevum 70 (1996) 81-111; La città e la sua memoria. Milano e la tradizione di Sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1997; J.M. Spieser, Les fondations d'Ambroise à Milan et la question des martyria: Deltion tès Christianikès Archaologikès Etaireias 20 (1998) 29-34.

(Cimitile) P. Testini, Note per servire allo studio del complesso paleocristiano di S. Felice a Cimitile (Nola): MEFRA 97 (1985) 329-371; Cimitile e Paolino di Nola. La tomba di S. Felice e il centro di pellegrinaggio. Trent'anni di ricerche. Atti della giornata tematica dei Seminari di archeologia cristiana (École française de Rome, 9 marzo 2000), Vatican City 2003; C. Ebanista, "Et manet in mediis quasi gemma intersita tectis." La basilica di S. Felice a Cimitile. Storia degli scavi, fasi edilizie, reperti, Naples 2003; Th. Lehmann, Paulinus Nolanus und die Basilica Nova in Cimitile-Nola. Studien zu einem zentralen Denkmal der spätantik-frühchristlichen Architektur, Wiesbaden 2004; C. Ebanista, La tomba di S. Felice nel santuario di Cimitile a cinquant'anni dalla scoperta, Marigliano 2006.

(Tours) L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du 4e au 6e siècle. Naissance d'une cité chrétienne, Rome 1983; L. Pietri - Ch. Pietri, L'image du Vicus Christianorum chez Grégoire de Tours: Caesarodunum 18 bis (1983) 107-115; J. Biarne - L. Pietri, Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIIIe siècle, 5. Province ecclésiastique de Tours (Lugdunensis Tertia), Paris 1987; P. Saint-Roch, L'utilisation liturgique de l'espace urbain et suburbain. L'exemple de quatre villes de France, in Actes du XIe Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste, 21-28 septembre 1986), Vatican City 1989, 1103-1115

(Other locations) E. Rodríguez Almeida, La primitiva memoria martirial de los santos Vicente, Sabina y Cristeta (Avila, España), in Atti del VI Congr. int. di archeologia cristiana (Ravenna 23-30 settembre 1962), Rome 1965, 781-797; L. Pani Ermini, Ricerche nel complesso di S. Saturno a Cagliari: Rend. PARA 55-56 (1982-84) 111-128; Ph. Pergola, Spazio funerario e culto del martire. Soluzioni originali nel santuario di S. Calocero ad Albenga (SV), in Le sepolture in Sardegna dal IV al VII secolo. IV Conv. sull'archeologia tardoromana e medievale (Cuglieri 27-28 giugno 1987), Oristano 1990, 383-390; B. Aleksova, Loca sanctorum Macedoniae. The Cult of Martyrs in Macedonia from the 4th to the 9th Century, Skopje 1995; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Riflessi topografici e monumentali del culto dei martiri nei santuari paleocristiani del territorio laziale, in Martyrium in Multidisciplinary Perspective: Memorial Louis Reekmans, Leuven 1995, 197-232; P.G. Spanu, Martyria Sardiniae, I santuari dei martiri sardi, Oristano 2000; S. Cisci, Il culto dei martiri sardi, in Sardegna in età tardoantica e altomedioevale attraverso le testimonianze storiche e archeologiche: RivAC 77 (2001) 371-406; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Tipologie monumentali dei santuari martiriali paleocristiani dell'Umbria, in Umbria cristiana. Dalla diffusione del culto al culto dei santi. Secoli IV-X. Atti del XV Congr. int. di studi sull'alto medioevo (Spoleto 23-28 ottobre 2000), Spoleto 2001, 305-338; A.M. Giuntella, Brevi note in margine al santuario di San Vittorino di Amiterno (AQ), in Τερψις. In ricordo di Maria Laetitia Coletti, Alessandria 2002, 313-341; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Santuario martiriale e territorio nella diocesi di Nomentum. L'esempio di S. Alessandro: RivAC 78 (2002) 157-189; J. López Vilar, Les basíliques paleocristianes del suburbí occidental de Tarraco. El temple septentrional i el complex martirial de Sant Fructuós, Tarragona 2006.

Reliquary Sanctuaries: P. Testini, Le presunte reliquie dell'apostolo Pietro e la traslazione ad Catacumbas, in Actes du V^{e} Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne (Aix-en-Provence 13-19 septembre 1954), Paris 1957, 529-538; E. Vogt, Die Textilreste aus dem Reliquienbehälter des Altars in der Kirche St. Lorenz bei Paspels: Revue suisse d'art et d'archéologie 23 (1963-64) 83-90; J.M. Sauget, Saint Grégoire le Grand et les reliques de Saint Pierre dans la tradition arabe chrétienne: RivAC 49 (1973) 301-309; E.D. Hunt, The Traffic in Relics: Some Late Roman Evidence, in The Byzantine Saint. University of Birmingham Fourteenth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, London 1981, 171-180; P. Brown, Relics and Social Status in the Age of Gregory of Tours, in Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity, London 1982, 222-250; P.A. Février, Baptistères, martyrs et reliques: RivAC 62 (1986) 109-138; A. Paredi, La dedicazione della basilica di Sant'Ambrogio a Milano nel giugno del 386: RIL 120 (1986) 69-74; F. Cardini, Reliquie e pellegrinaggi, in Santi e demoni nell'alto medioevo occidentale, secoli V-XI. Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo, 36 (Spoleto, 7-13 aprile 1988), Spoleto 1989, 981-1035; C. Mango, Constantine's Mausoleum and the Translation of Relics: ByzZ 83 (1990) 51-61; F. Heim, Virtus. Idéologie politique et croyances religieuses au IV^{e} siècle, Frankfurt a.M. 1991; D. Woods, The Date of the Translation of the Relics of SS. Luke and Andrew to Constantinople: VChr 45 (1991) 286-292; H. Brandenburg, Altar und Grab. Zu einem Problem des Märtyrerkultes im 4. und 5. Jh., in Martyrium in Multidisciplinary Perspective. Memorial Louis Reekmans, Leuven 1995, 71-98; A. Angenendt, Heilige und Reliquien. Die Geschichte ihres Kultes vom frühen Christentum bis zur Gegenwart, Munich 1997; F. Glaser, Reliquiengräber. Sonderbestattungen der Spätantike: Arheološki vestnik 48 (1997) 231-246; D.G. Hunter, Vigilantius of Calagurris and Victricius of Rouen: Ascetics, Relics, and Clerics in Late Roman Gaul: JECS 7 (1999) 401-430. A. Frolow, La relique de la Vraie Croix. Recherches sur le développement d'un culte, Paris 1961; J. Vogt, Helena Augusta, das Kreuz und die Juden. Fragen um die Mutter Constantins des Grossen: Saeculum 27 (1976) 211-222; S. de Blaauw, Jerusalem in Rome and the Cult of the Cross, in Pratum Romanum. Richard Krautheimer zum 100. Geburtstag, Wiesbaden 1997, 55-73; P. Speck - O. Kresten, Zum Datum der Translation der Kreuzreliquien nach Konstantinopel, in Varia, 7, Bonn 2000, 167-179; M. Meier, Die Translatio des Christusbildes von Kamulianai und der Kreuzreliquie von Apameia nach Konstantinopel unter Justin II. Ein übersehenes Datierungsproblem: Zeitschrift für antikes Christentum 7 (2003) 237-250. J. Wortley, Some Notes on the Early Marian Relics of Constantinople, in Tenth Annual Byzantine Studies Conference (Cincinnati, November 1-4, 1984); E. Testa, Maria Terra Vergine, 2. Il culto mariano palestinese, sec. I-IX, Jerusalem 1984.

"Locative" Sanctuaries: B. Bagatti, Le origini delle tradizioni dei luoghi santi in Palestina: Studium Biblicum Franciscanum 14 (1963-64) 32-64; D. Chen, The Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem: The Design of Justinian's Plan: Studium Biblicum Franciscanum 29 (1979) 270-275; V.C. Corbo, Il Santo Sepolcro di Gerusalemme. Aspetti archeologici dalle origini al periodo crociato, Jerusalem 1982; F. Heim, L'expérience mystique des pèlerins occidentaux en Terre Sainte aux alentours de 400: Ktema 10 (1985) 193-208; F. Tolotti, Il S. Sepolcro di Gerusalemme e le coeve basiliche di Roma: Römische Mitteilungen 93 (1986) 471-512; V.C. Corbo, Il Santo Sepolcro di Gerusalemme. Nova et vetera: Studium Biblicum Franciscanum 38 (1988) 391-422; A.J. Wharton, The Baptistery of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem and the Politics of Sacred Landscape: Dumbarton Oaks Papers 46 (1992) 313-325; J. Engemann, Das Jerusalem der Pilger. Kreuzauffindung und Wallfahrt, in Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie (Bonn 22.-28. September 1991), Münster 1995, 24-35; G. Lavas - T. Mitropoulos, Golgotha, Jerusalem. Die Aufdeckung der Kreuzigungsstelle Christi, in Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie (Bonn 22.-28. September 1991), Münster 1995, 964-968; M. Biddle, The Tomb of Christ, Stroud 1999; W. Pullan, Ascent and Descent in the Constantinian Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, in Text and Artifact in the Religions of Mediterranean Antiquity. Essays in Honour of Peter Richardson, Waterloo 2000, 308-321; G. Avni - J. Seligman, J., New Excavations at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher Compound, in One Land—Many Cultures: Archaeological Studies in Honor of Stanislao Loffreda OFM, Jerusalem 2003, 153-162; L. Spera, Luoghi del martirio di papa Sisto II sulla via Appia: Rend. PARA 73 (2000-01) 101-128; L. Spera, Luoghi di culto di carattere rievocativo nel suburbio, in Ecclesiae urbis. Atti del congr. int. di studi sulle chiese di Roma, IV-X secolo (Roma 4-10 settembre 2000), Vatican City 2002, 691-712; P. Verzone, Il santuario di S. Simeone il Giovane sul Monte delle Meraviglie, in Corsi di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina, Ravenna 1974, 273-286; P. Verzone, Il santuario di S. Simeone Protostilita, ibid., 259-272; J. Christern, Die Pilgerheiligtümer von Abu Mina und Qalàt Simàn, in Spätantike und frühes Christentum. Ausstellung im Liebieghaus (Museum alter Plastik, Frankfurt am Main. 16. Dezember bis 11. März 1984), Frankfurt a.M. 1983, 211-222; J.L. Biscop - J.P. Sodini, Travaux à Qal'at Sem'an, in Actes du XI^{e} Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste 21-28 septembre 1986), Vatican City 1989, 1675-1695; H.C. Brennecke, Wie man einen Heiligen politisch instrumentalisiert. Der Heilige Simeon Stylites und die Synode von Chalkedon, in Theologie und Kultur. Geschichten einer Wechselbeziehung. Festschrift zum einhundertfünfzigjährigen Bestehen des Lehrstuhls für Christliche Archäologie und Kirchliche Kunst an der Humboldt-Universität zu Berlin, Halle 1999, 237-261; M.L. Mancinelli, Santuari rupestri nell'Italia meridionale e dinamica dei pellegrinaggi fra tarda antichità e alto medieovo: alcune riflessioni: VetChr 30 (1993) 85-92.

Hierophantic Sanctuaries: G. Otranto, Il Liber de apparitione, il santuario di San Michele sul Gargano e i Longobardi del Ducato di Benevento, in Santuari e politica nel mondo antico, Milan 1983, 210-245; G. Otranto, Il regnum longobardo e il santuario micaelico del Gargano. Note di epigrafia e storia: VetChr 22 (1985) 165-180; G. Otranto, Per una metodologia della ricerca storico-agiografica. Il santuario micaelico del Gargano tra Bizantini e Longobardi, in Metodologie della ricerca sulla tarda antichità. Atti del Primo conv. dell'Ass. di studi tardoantichi (Napoli 16-18 ottobre 1987), Naples 1990, 121-141; G. Otranto - C. Carletti, Il santuario di S. Michele Arcangelo sul Gargano dalle origini al X secolo, Bari 1990; Culto e insediamenti micaelici nell'Italia meridionale fra tarda antichità e medioevo. Atti del convegno internazionale (Monte Sant'Angelo 18-21 novembre 1992), Bari 1994, 125-166; P. De Santis - D. Nuzzo, Sepolture ad limina nel santuario di San Michele a Monte Sant'Angelo. Ultime indagini, 1999: VetChr 38 (2001) 131-162; S. Franz, L'architettura del santuario sul Monte S. Angelo a Terracina, in Religio. Santuari ed ex voto nel Lazio meridionale. Atti della giornata di studio, Terracina 2004, 182-187; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, I monumenti paleocristiani della via Flaminia (territorio laziale) nelle più recenti ricerche archeologiche. Con un'appendice su S. Michele al VII miglio della via Salaria, in Domum tuam dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di Aldo Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 338-349; M. Bianchini - F. Di Gennaro - M. Vitti, Via Salaria. Basilica beati arcangeli in Septimo, in Ecclesiae urbis. Atti del congr. int. di studi sulle chiese di Roma, IV-X secolo (Roma 4-10 settembre 2000), Vatican City 2002, 625-643.

Therapeutic Sanctuaries: C. D'Angela, Cristianesimo e fruizione delle acque salutari nella tarda antichità. Alcune osservazioni sui centri termali in Italia: VetChr 35 (1998) 69-77; G. Pross Gabrielli, Il tempietto ipogeo del dio Mitra al Timavo: Archeografo Triestino 35 (1975) 5-34; M. Mirabella Roberti, La basilica paleocristiana di San Giovanni del Timavo, in Studi monfalconesi e duinati. Atti della giornata di studio di Monfalcone (3 aprile 1976), Udine 1976, 63-75; E. Russo, Su S. Salvatore di Spoleto e sul tempietto del Clitumno: Acta ad Archeologiam et Artium Historiam Pertinentia 8 (1992) 87-143; A. Maldini, Culto e popolamento antico alle sorgenti del Clitunno, in Città romane, 3. Città dell'Umbria, Rome 2002, 121-165; C. Godoy Fernández - J.M. Gurt Esparraguera, Un itinerario de peregrinaje para el culto martirial y veneración del agua bautismal en el complejo episcopal de Barcino: Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts. Abteilung Madrider 39 (1998) 323-335; L. Spera - E. Smiraglia, Il cosiddetto battistero della catacomba di Priscilla a Roma: sistemazione monumentale e segni cultuali, in Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Genova - Sarzana - Albenga - Finale Ligure - Ventimiglia, 21-26 settembre 1998), Bordighera 2001, 975-1002.

L. Spera

SARACENS. The Greek term Σαρακηνοί was already used by the geographer Ptolemy; it seems to refer to peoples settled in the S of the Sinai Peninsula on the side of the Gulf of Aqaba. The term Saracens, generally speaking, corresponds to Arabs: they appear in classical literature as inhabitants both of the Arabian Peninsula and other areas in the Near East and are already mentioned in Syrian-Babylonian and *Persian texts.

In the OT the term Arab refers to "desert," "people of the desert" or a "nomad," which then acquired a more precise geographic connotation in later texts. In the most ancient books the Saracen peoples were called Ishmael (the son of *Hagar, who was considered the chief of many Saracen tribes) or Midian. The names of the sons of Cush, the son of Ham, in Genesis 10 corresponds to the Arab regions, among which was Sheba, whose queen visited *Solomon. The Midianites or Ishmaelites were also the merchants who acquired Joseph, who had been sold into slavery by his brothers. Nehemiah underwent the opposition of an Arab sheik, Geshem (Neh 2:19; 6:1); the Arabs became tributaries of King Jehoshaphat in 2 Chr 17:11; and in 2 Chr 21:16, the Arabs, perhaps the Nabataeans, are described as bordering on the Ethiopians. It is possible that other place names of the OT refer to Arab regions rather than Egyptian or Assyrian regions. During the time of the NT, the most important Saracen states in the S were those of Hadramut, the Sabaeans and the *Himyarites, who were defeated in the 6th c., shortly before the Arabs in the 7th c. were absorbed by the Islamic conquest. In the N were the kingdom of the Nabataeans, who were Saracens by race but who spoke Aramaic, not Arabic, and the kingdom of Hira, on the borders with Babylon, a vassal kingdom of the Persian *Sassanids, which was established in the 2nd c. AD and lasted until the Islamic conquest. Both in this kingdom and then even in the Arabic kingdom of Hassan, in lower *Syria, Christianity seems to have spread rapidly, with episcopal sees, churches and monasteries. Even the Arab Mesopotamian kingdom of Kindah, which originated in the 5th c., ended shortly after with the Islamic invasion. Many independent Saracen tribes were added to these kingdoms.

The Greek and Roman authors subdivided Arabia into the following categories: Deserta, Felix and Petraea; Tacitus referred to the subjects of *Abgar as Arabes, who in the 1st c. AD reigned over Osroene with its capital, *Edessa. According to the Syriac text the Doctrine of Addai, these Arabs converted to Christianity as early as the time of King Abgar due to the preaching of Thaddaeus/*Addai. If this piece of information is more than likely legendary, the presence of Christians, however, among the Arabs at the time of Abgar the Great, around the year 200, is attested by the historical records. It is likely, even though debated, that this ruler also converted to Christianity. Christianity seems to have arrived among the Arabs rather early, acc. to such ecclesiastical historians as *Eusebius, *Rufinus and *Socrates, but also *Origen and *Jerome. Their accounts, however, should be taken with a grain of salt because at times they confuse *Arabia with India and *Ethiopia. Nonetheless, Syriac authors and even the Arabs themselves confirm the arrival of Christianity among the Saracens, esp. in the N and in the SW of Arabia. Paul himself, in Gal 1:17, attests to having gone to Arabia immediately after his conversion, and in Acts 2:11 we find some Arabs who practiced Judaism present at the *Pentecost sermon of *Peter at *Jerusalem. One should not rule out that the persecutions in the Roman Empire determined the flight of Christians toward the nearby Arab regions. Especially during the Syrian-Arabic kingdoms, Christianity seems to have arrived early. The Saracens of Hassan in NW Arabia were Syro-Arabs often subject to the control of the Romans, who defended them from the Sassanids. In the year 531, the Arab-Roman kingdom was established, which controlled all the Arabs of *Palestine, *Phoenicia, Syria and NW Arabia. The kingdom of *Palmyra was also Syro-Arabic, which became a Roman province after having been defeated by Lucius Domitius Aurelianus in 272. At times, even subsequent to the biblical and patristic age, the term Saracen acquired a more restricted meaning: in particular, in the Middle Ages it referred to the Arabs stationed on the coasts of North *Africa, esp. those opposite *Sicily, from which they completed numerous invasions. Both in antiquity and the Middle Ages, the predatory activities of some of the Saracen groups were well-known.

According to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VI,20), already during Origen's time, the bishop of Bostra, *Beryllus, was converted by him to orthodoxy from antitrinitarianism, and Origen was absolved from charges by an Arabian provincial synod. In 215, Origen went to Arabia upon the request of the Roman governor to explain his teachings; he returned there in the year 250 to refute the heresy acc. to which the soul dies with the body only to resurrect on the day of judgment (ibid., VI,19 and 39). In the beginning of the 4th c., Eusebius's Onomasticon and the Acts of the Council of *Nicaea (325) attest the presence of Christians among the Arabs. At Nicaea there were six bishops from the province of Arabia; others are attested by the Council of *Ephesus in 431, and at the Council of *Chalcedon "Eustathius, bishop of the Saracens" attended, who in 458 was still the bishop of *Damascus. Even at the Second Council of Ephesus in 449 a "bishop of the Arabs," Aussilaus, was present, and Anastasius bishop of Tiran Island was present at the Council of *Jerusalem in 536. The metropolitan of Bostra governed over twenty suffragan Arab bishops. Many of these Arab bishops in Late Antiquity, as in the case of the Syro-Westerners, embraced miaphysite teachings.

According to Rufinus (HE II,6), in the 4th c. the Arab queen Mavia made peace with the Romans through a pact that required the Egyptian monk *Moses (the Saracen) to be ordained bishop of his tribe. Because Moses refused to receive his ordination from the bishop of *Alexandria, who had been accused of *Arianism, the emperor *Valens accordingly recalled an orthodox monk from exile. The monks and the hermits of the Syro-Arabic desert certainly promoted the conversion of the Arab tribes to Christianity. *Jerome and *Theodoret attest the impression that the life and miracles of St. *Hilarion and *Simeon the Stylite made among the Bedouin Arabs, who converted various Arab tribes. Similarly, acc. to *Cyril of Scythopolis, the monk St. Euthymius converted an entire Arab tribe which, at the beginning of the 5th c., had passed over to *Palestine from the Euphrates. Therefore, in the 4th-6th c., many Saracens converted to Christianity, as also confirmed by epigraphy, and the Saracen Christian tribes seem to have been present in the area of Syria, Phoenicia and N Arabia; their local bishops generally depended on the *metropolitans of Jerusalem, Damascus and Tyre, and on the patriarchs of Jerusalem and Antioch.

More to the E, the Mesopotamian area was also densely inhabited by Arab tribes, whose heads, from the 3rd c. AD onward, were generally subject to the Persians. The Acts of Mar Mari* narrate the evangelization of these peoples by Mari, the disciple of Addai. The acts can also reflect later events at the end of the 1st c. to the beginning of the 2nd, but they seem to rest on historical evidence that has been carefully evaluated. Under the Sassanids, the deportations of Christians favored the planting of Christianity in Persia and even in the Mesopotamian areas subject to it, where many Saracens also lived; e.g., around AD 270, hundreds of Christians were deported from Syria and other Roman provinces into Mesopotamia (Babylon and Iraq). The Acts of the Persian martyrs, various Syriac documents, and the history of the church of *Persia and *Seleucia-Ctesiphon attest the spread of Christianity in these areas. This phenomenon also had an influence on the local Arab populations. The Arab king of Hira Nu'mân I, whose kingdom extended over the Arabs of Mesopotamia and into the Persian Gulf, around the year 400, protected his Christian subjects, while Sassanid rulers often persecuted them. Many of his subjects went to the Syro-Arab desert near Simeon the Stylite and converted to the Christian faith; the king himself ended his days engaged in a religious and ascetic life, even if his conversion to Christianity is not entirely certain. Other sovereigns of Hira, however, persecuted Christians, even through the influence of the Sassanids; the wife of one of these leaders, Hind, in the 6th c. established a monastery at Hira in which many Syro-Eastern patriarchs resided and were buried, and her children were Christians. One of these children gave to numerous Arabs the example of his conversion to Christianity (Evagrius Scholasticus, HE VI, 22). Even in the subsequent generations of these sovereigns one finds the presence of various Christian men and women, until the Islamic invasion. The Acts of the councils of 410, 430, 485, 499 and 588 attest the presence of the bishops "of Hira of the Arabs," the most noteworthy of whom were "George, bishop of the Arabs" (ca. 686–724).

In N Arabia, acc. to Eusebius, Rufinus and Theodoret, Arabia Felix, or Yemen, was evangelized by the apostle *Bartholomew, who, as tradition maintained, was also the evangelist of India, where he brought the gospel of *Matthew written in Semitic, which was found at that time by *Pantaenus, the teacher of *Clement of Alexandria, who also went to India in the 2nd c. (According to some, this reference to India should actually be understood as Ethiopia, but it is not certain.) Even the Indian mission of a Meropius, *Frumentius and Edesius, which was mentioned by Eusebius, Rufinus and Theodoret, acc. to some, should be taken to refer to Arabia Felix, even if it is not certain that it was India, or that one could understand that they went to India and during the return passed through N Arabia or through Ethiopia, where Frumentius remained and was subsequently ordained by *Athanasius of Alexandria. Around the year 356, Bishop *Theophilus was sent by the Roman emperor *Constantius as an ambassador among the *Himyarites, where he requested and obtained freedom of religion for his subjects, esp. the Christians. The Himyarite sovereign ordered the building of three large churches, and perhaps Theophilus exerted *Arian influence over local Christians, who lived among a large Jewish and *pagan population. The Arab historians themselves and the first biographers of *Muhammad attest the spread of Christianity at Hira, among the Himyarites and among other N and S Arab tribes between the 4th and 5th c., even if many stories contain legendary elements. According to the Arab historian Ibn Khaldun, as early as the 2nd half of the 3rd c. Abd-Kelal, the son of a Himyarite king, was converted to Christianity by a Syrian monk, but upon being discovered he was killed by his people. According to the church historian *John Diacrinomenos (PG 86,212), at the time of the emperor *Anastasius (491–518), the Himyarites, who had adhered to *Judaism since the time of the queen of Sheba, converted to Christianity and had Silvanus as their bishop, the uncle of John himself. The first biographer of Muhammad, Ibn Ishaq, attests that the first preacher of Christianity in Yemen was a Syrian named Phemion, who along with a certain Saliah—perhaps Silvanus himself—and Mark—was captured by an Arab caravan and sold to a local leader. One of his converts then evangelized the city of *Najran. In the 6th c., Christianity thrived among the Himyarites, who were subject to Abyssinian rule, at the time of Dhu Nuwas, a leader of the Jewish religion who persecuted Christians but was then defeated by the Abyssinian king, a Christian, who promoted the reconstruction of the churches and the reestablishment of Christianity in those lands. *Judaism was very widespread among the Saracens of S Arabia. A Christian successor of Dhu Nuwas, in the 1st half of the 6th c., Abram, under whom Christianity flourished in S Arabia, paid tribute to an Abyssinian king and lived in peace with the Arab tribes and was a friend of Bishop *Gregentius. He came into conflict, however, with some Arab tribes who controlled the pagan pilgrimages to the Kaaba, whose guardian at the time seems to have been the grandfather of Muhammad. Abram was defeated by these Arabs and died shortly thereafter. Under the kingdom of his two sons, in 568, a Persian invasion brought an end to the Christian dynasty of Abyssinia, namely the kingdom of Abram, in whose place a prince was established, who, with the help of the Persian king *Chosroes, defeated and put to flight the Abyssinians from Himyar, many of whom were Christians.

Various Persian governors came after him. Even Muhammad visited the church of Sana'a, the construction of which was ordered by the aforementioned Abram, and listened to the sermons of its bishop, even if under Omar, in the 7th c., the Christians of Najran were forced to convert to Islam or face exile. Many migrated to Hira, on the Euphrates River, where in the 8th c. the Syro-Eastern patriarch *Timothy I endowed them with a bishop, churches and ecclesiastical schools. Traces of Christian thought are still visible even in the Qur'an; the adopted son of Muhammad himself had Christian relatives; Arabic poetry before the Islamic conquest and immediately after is full of allusions to Christian ideas and customs. At Medina, acc. to the tradition, Muhammad received numerous delegations from Christian tribes, and in general he treated the Arab Christians better than he seems to have done with the Jews and, even more, with the pagans (who had the option of either embracing Islam or facing death). If the Christians paid tribute, it guaranteed peace and respect for their clergy, monks and sacred places. It was under the second successor of Muhammad, Omar, that the Christians were treated with such greater harshness that many abandoned their religion for Islam and the number of Christians in Arabia dwindled, even though Christians who paid the tribute continued to reside there and maintained their faith, and Syro-Eastern and Syro-Western "bishops of the Arabs" continue to be attested there; among them there was a bishop of Sana'a, Yemen and Bahrein, acc. to Bar Hebraeus (Chronicon Ecclesiasticum I,303; III,123, 193) and Thomas of Marga (Book of the Governors II,448ff., ed. Budge). According to these historians, under the Umayyad and Abbasid caliphs Christianity was partly respected in the Islamic empire, and many patriarchs of the Syro-Western and Syro-Eastern churches—i.e., of the so-called *monophysites and *Nestorian churches—received certificates and statements of recognition from Muhammad and his successors.

Christianity among the Saracens, which seems to have presented various "heresies," esp. the *Arian and the so-called monophysites and Nestorian heresies, disappeared rather early after the Islamic conquest and without having left many literary traces; it seems, esp., that translations of the *Bible or parts of it in Arabic dating back to the pre-Islamic era have not survived, as is also the case with their prayer books or other works produced by their religious leaders or their monks. At the time, the ecclesiastical language of the areas inhabited by the Christianized Arabs was Syrian, Western or Eastern, and it is probable that even their sacred books were in *Syriac. After the Islamic conquest, the acquisition of the Arabic language by the Christians who remained in the East—who retained Greek or Syriac as the liturgical language—led to the flourishing of the so-called Christian Arabic literature, a category whose legitimacy has been called into question but which is worthy of further study.

B. Luppi, I Saraceni in Provenza, in Liguria e nelle Alpi occidentali, Bordighera 1983; R. Panetta, I Saraceni in Italia, Milan 1973, [2]1998; D.F. Graf, Rome and the Arabian Frontiers: From the Nabataeans to the Saracens, Aldershot 1997; I. Ramelli, Edessa e i Romani tra Augusto e i Severi: Aevum 73 (1999) 107-143; Id., Note sulle origini del Cristianesimo in India: la missione di Panteno: SCO 47 (2000) 363-378; Id. - I. Dognini, Gli Apostoli in India, Milan 2001; D.H. Strickland, Saracens, Demons and Jews: Making Monsters in Medieval Art, Princeton-Oxford 2003; I. Ramelli, Abgar Ukkama e Abgar il Grande alla luce di recenti apporti storiografici: Aevum 78 (2004) 103-108; Id., The First Evangelization of the Mesopotamian Regions in the Syriac Tradition: Antiguo Oriente 3 (2005) 11-54; Id., Possible Historical Traces in the Doctrina Addai?: Hugoye 9 (2006) §§ 1-24; Literatura árabe cristiana, ed. M. Abumalham, Madrid 2001: ibid. esp. K. Samir, SJ, La littérature arabe médiévale des chrétiens, 21-49; I. Ramelli, Atti di Mar Mari, Brescia 2007.

I. Ramelli

SARAGOSSA. The ancient city Salduba of the Cantabri was destroyed by the Romans in 45 BC and reconstructed with the name Caesaraugusta. In 24 BC, it became an important center as a conventus iuridicus for the Roman province of *Tarraconensis. Felix, its first known bishop, dates back to the time of *Cyprian of Carthage (Ep. 67, 6). According to *Prudentius (Persist. IV,81-84), the Christian community of the city suffered heavily from the *Diocletian persecution. At the Council of *Elvira (300–302), the city was represented by its bishop Valerius, at that of *Arles (314) by the presbyter Clement, and at that of *Serdica (ca. 343) by Castus; in 458 it intervened against the uncanonical judicial proceedings of Silvanus, bishop of Calahorra. Among its great bishops, one should note the following: *Braulio (631–651) and *Taio, the successors of *Maximus (592–619) and *John II (619–631). The city was the site for three councils.

380. Twelve bishops of various Spanish provinces and some from Aquitania were present. Along with other matters its eight canons were concerned with punishing *Priscillianist practices, but without condemning the leaders who refused to attend because Pope *Damasus had decided not to condemn anyone who was absent. That notwithstanding, *Sulpicius Severus and the First Council of *Toledo allude to the condemnation of some of the absent bishops.

592. A provincial council which was presided over by the metropolitan Artemius of *Tarragona. Eleven bishops and two delegates were present. Its objective was to resolve some problems pertaining to the lower clergy that had arisen with the *conversion of the *Visigoths to *Catholicism. The authenticity of relics and the possibility for the *Arian *clergy to become part of the Catholic clergy after a new *ordination was also taken into consideration.

691. Provincial council. As a result of the lack of the signatures on the Acts, the number of participants is not known. It promulgated five canons on church discipline.

Mansilla, Geografía I, 101-104; 145-146; S. Aznar Tello, Los obispos de la sede cesaraugustana en la España visigoda del s. VII, Centro Regional de Estudios Teológicos, Zaragoza 1984; Vives, Concilios, 16-18; 159-160; 475-481; Martínez Díez, Hispana, 296 (I); Orlandís, Concilios, 68-80 (I); 235-241 (II); 467-474 (III); B. Vollmann, Priscillianus: PW, suppl. XIV, Munich 1974, 498-502; 546-551; I Concilio Caesaraugustano, MDC anniversario, Zaragoza 1981 (Actas del Congreso conmemorativo); M.V. Escribano, El Concilio I de Caesaraugusta: Rev. Aragonesa de Teología 5 (1997) 37-52.

P. de Luis

SARCOPHAGI, Early Christian. This entry regards as early Christian the sarcophagi that were decorated with motifs or themes pertaining to Christianity. Many sarcophagi from the 3rd and 4th c. preserve such themes and motifs, which come from the Roman shops: the most ancient were built in shops that primarily produced pagan sarcophagi. Among the frequent pagan themes in the 3rd c. were those of philosophers and bucolic scenes, as well as figures of the orantes and shepherds. The first Christian sarcophagi appeared toward the mid-3rd c. and present, alongside some biblical scenes, the aforementioned pagan themes which, however, were acceptable for Christians and amenable to a new interpretation that was specifically Christian. On the sarcophagus of S. Maria Antiqua (Rep 747), joined to the orans, the shepherd and the philosopher, are the scenes of *Jonah and the *baptism of Jesus Christ; on that of Baebia Hertofile (Rep 778), a scene of Jonah and a banquet is found on the lid, as well as a pastoral scene on the strigilated front; and on that of the Via della Lungara (Rep 777) are found the orans, the fishermen and the shepherd on the strigilated front, and the baptism of Jesus Christ on one side.

Christian motifs gradually acquired greater importance toward the end of the 3rd c. as attested by the decorated slab of the Capitoline Museum (Rep 811) with the reader-philosopher and the resurrection of Lazarus; the Velletri sarcophagus (Ws IV, 3), the front of which, dominated by the large figures of an orans and two shepherds, also contains small biblical scenes. With the passing of the 3rd-4th c., this tendency was stabilized and attention was gradually fixed on symbols and scenes that served to express the Christian hope in the afterlife, focusing esp. on the hero who makes possible such hope, i.e., Jesus Christ, and his beneficent actions. Starting esp. from the edicts of tolerance of Christianity, the number of sarcophagi noticeably increased.

The production of sarcophagi in relief with Christian themes and subjects is a typical phenomenon of Roman society and, as such, was inextricably tied to the rich production of pagan sarcophagi, which, starting from the age of Trajan, characterized Roman sculptural art. It was precisely on the basis of such models that early Christian production developed, which acquired and developed typologies, structures and decorations of the preceding production to continue to respond to a particular demand of Roman funerary culture.

Even in Christian culture, the funerary use of sarcophagi represented was significant, both with respect to the social aspect and with respect to economics. Funerary typology, however, in early Christian culture assumed a lightly diversified role, whether it was at a purely functional level or within a highly decorative repertory. The sarcophagi, in fact, were not always used in the early Christian necropolis in a canonical way. For example, they were sometimes buried either in a first burial or in cases of reuse, but in either instance hiding the figured reliefs, which seem to be, for this reason, an exclusive provision for the deceased rather than directed toward the observers.

The practice of the burial should not be considered an exceptional phenomenon, since monuments of some historical-artistic significance, such as the sarcophagus of Adelphia at St. John of Syracuse (Rep II,20) and the sarcophagus of Lot (Rep I,188), found in the complex of St. *Sebastian, were discovered completely buried. The sarcophagus of Lot, among other things, represents one of the most significant examples from the point of view of the techniques used for production inasmuch as some scenes appear at the state of an "outline" while others are perfectly polished and other are still entirely covered with colors.

Sepulchral Seats. As to what holds for the tectonics, of the two chief typologies in use in the pagan tradition, i.e., that of the basin (ληνός) and that of the box, the latter was preferably adopted, although the role of the decorative apparatus appears rather diversified. As early as the last decades of the 2nd c. one can identify an accentuated diminution of mythological themes and the advent of the new themes that better express the diverse imagination of the society of the new century. Starting from the 3rd c. onward, then, increasingly personalized themes are attested that refer to the life, to the actual or presumed public career, and to the aspirations, ideals and imagination of the deceased person's subsequent existence. Battle scenes, hunting scenes, marriages, social clients or figures of philosophers, literate people, images of country life, personifications of the seasons, or entire bucolic and marine scenes represent the deceased's virtues.

If these images, already on account of their themes, referred to the deceased, their ideals and their aspirations both for earthly life and for a possible existence after death, numerous portraits generously distributed on the figures of philosophers, musicians, orantes and the shepherds on the sarcophagi of this period emphasize the personalized meaning of these representations and reveal a growing preoccupation of individuals for their way of life, happiness, the fulfillment of their existence and personal destiny.

In such cultural conditions, around the mid-3rd c. AD, are placed the first group of Christian sarcophagi, which fit naturally within the philosophical, maritime and bucolic-shepherd vein to which the pagan production had arrived, but the themes of which were now diminishing and becoming completely Christian. There are a few examples of sarcophagi that previous scholarship referred to as "crypto-Christian," thereby moving the date of the birth of Christian sculpture back to the end of the 3rd c., which are now preferably referred to as "paradisiacal," emphasizing rather the heavenly context in which they convey the figurative matter.

On the basis of the location of discovery of one of the most significant exemplars of this class of sarcophagi, the sarcophagus of the Via Salaria (Lat. 181), it has been hypothesized that in this area there existed a shop, which was active between the years AD 240–268, and served the needs of the local and wealthy Christian clientele. To the same manufacturer, moreover, have been attributed the sarcophagi of Lungara (Ws 19,6), La Gayolle (Ws 1,3) and Basilea, in which the ancient association is maintained between the four allegorical figures (the orans, the good shepherd, the fisherman and the philosopher), respectively alluding to the concepts of pietas, philanthropy, navigatio vitae and wisdom, among which was instituted an entirely new conceptual nexus, which suggests the evolution of an iconographic language that has evolved into a Christian meaning.

Thus the first images of the OT and the NT, which were initially limited to a few representations such as the story of *Jonah and the baptism of Christ, were significantly inserted into the bucolic context and into the representations of a life devoted to philosophy and reading, symbols of a happy existence, serene and full of peace. Toward the end of the 3rd c., this gradual abandonment of neutral themes in favor of Christian scenes, which were likewise new and inserted into a more complex syntax, appears to be complete, as demonstrated by a series of sarcophagi "in large pastoral scenes," upon which the bucolic material unfolds to embody the ideal of felicitas, climaxing in the Vatican Jonah sarcophagus (Rep I, 7), which organizes the front of the sarcophagus into two registers, inserting alongside the predominant salvific cycle two scenes from the apocryphal Acts of Peter: the episode of the miracle of the fountain and the scene of the arrest.

The tetrachic period (284–313) recorded important innovations both in iconography, preferring scenes of new pregnancy to bucolic themes, and in composition: the front space is organized in two registers in which the succession of scenes occurs seamlessly as in the continuous frieze. Evidence of this trend comes in two polychrome plates from the National Museum of Rome (Rep. I, 773), belonging to a single face of a sarcophagus which, in two registers, displays a decoration inspired exclusively from the NT and dominated by the central scene of the *Sermon on the Mount, with Christ dressed like a cynic philosopher and no longer presented under the appearance of the Good *Shepherd.

An intense production of Christian sarcophagi, which continued the production and the use of Roman sarcophagi from the imperial era and which were decorated in an entirely new and revolutionary way with reliefs entirely filled with Christian themes, begins, therefore, only under the reign of *Constantine and after the *edict of Milan (313). As in the case of the others already mentioned, even this phenomenon of the production of sarcophagi from the imperial era, which denotes a marked change of sepulchral uses, was closely tied and favored by the social situation of that time. The mass conversions and the new role the Christian community assumed in society were without a doubt at the origins of this massive production of sarcophagi, some being important exemplars and richly decorated with figured reliefs, which could even satisfy the desires and the necessities of social representations of prestige.

The figure of Christ plays a central role that characterizes the era of Constantine, jointly with other important new elements. Stylistically, the human figure tended to reacquire a plastic quality, the themes multiplying within increasingly dense and developed spaces. With the advent of religious peace, christological subjects prevailed, modeling the iconography of the heavenly sovereign and the apostolic college on the basis and in contrast to that of the emperor and his court, although the different physiognomy used of the princes of the apostles continued to solidify, and the primacy of Peter was codified in the scenes of the handing down (traditio) of the law or the keys.

Within the prolific Constantinian production, which was by that point destined to overcome the boundaries of urban clients, the sarcophagus of the Museo Pio Cristiano called the "dogmatic sarcophagus" draws attention to this facet (340; Rep I,43) for the uniqueness of the concepts of faith illustrated and interpreted in an exclusively symbolic key. Among the scenes expressed on a double register, one should note the creation of Eve through the work of the *Trinity (which is recognized in a ternary group that all look the same), which addresses the need to reinforce this dogma of faith in an era marked by schisms and heresies.

Around the mid-4th c., the sculptural production of the city of Rome witnessed its most significant flourishing. Among the most significant examples, one could mention the sarcophagus of the Museo Pio Cristiano called "the sarcophagus of the two brothers" (Rep I,45), on which the multiplicity of the scenes taken from the OT and the NT are organized on two registers, at the center of which the male images contained on the wing of the shell show clear signs of an intervention, correcting the original married couple. The apex of Christian sculpture of the period is represented, however, by the well-known sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, which was intended for the prefect of the city of Rome, who had passed away in the year 359, and was preserved in the Museum of the Sacristy of St. Peter in the Vatican (Rep I,680). The exemplar, which is representative of the so-called beautiful style, presents a façade with a double register articulated on two orders of columns, which were initially conceived on analogous models from basilicas and intended to frame the different scenes of a clear interpretation, among which one notes the centrality of those christological scenes. The exceptional tectonics of the sarcophagus is explained by typological research, which during the 2nd half of the 4th c. was defined by systematic recourse to trees, columns and shelled niches through the articulation of the front and the subdivision of scenes. Thematically, the inclusion of episodes illustrating the passion of Jesus or the martyrdom of Peter and Paul characterizes the group of sarcophagi "of the passion" or "of the anastasis." The latter are so named by the symbolic representation of the resurrection, which are epitomized by the two soldiers sleeping at the feet of a crown enclosing the Christogram and supported by a cross.

Although during the Constantinian era, until midway through the century, the reliefs on the sarcophagi were arranged, as we have seen, by individual scenes, primarily those of the miracles of Christ, with a clear soteriological meaning; in the 2nd half of the century, however, new compositions dominate which represent apocalyptic themes, acc. to different variants and which are made acc. to an individual theme and are of a broad inspiration. These new representations, such as the scenes of the passion of Christ and the apostles *Peter and *Paul, the apostolic college, the traditio legis in the presence of the apostles, and the acclamation of the twelve apostles at the apocalyptic cross, show an evident mark of monumental art. If the monumental sarcophagi, dating to the end of the century, like the sarcophagus of Tolentinus of Flavius Iulius Catervius (Rep II,148), former praefectus praetorio, and the large sarcophagus in the basilica of St. Ambrose at *Milan (Rep II,150), probably commissioned by a dignitary of the Milanese court, are monumental sepulchers of great prestige and noteworthy formal quality, the smaller sarcophagi display, on the contrary, a far inferior design of markedly poor style. The sarcophagus containing columns with the apostles, now preserved in three fragments at the Vatican Museum, the Museum of St. Sebastian and the Museum of Krakow, and another with apostles acclaiming in the cloister of St. Paul Outside the Walls are characteristic examples of this Roman production at the turn of the 4th and 5th c. (Rep I,208).

The last great productive phase of the Roman shops, which can be restricted to the era of *Theodosius and *Honorius (380–420), was inspired by a fervid climate of iconographic and stylistic innovations, which can be seen in the progressive abstraction of the material and in the evident reduction and the choice of the themes to be portrayed, which is resolved in the adoption of a repertory dominated by *theophany-based images. They were sarcophagi intended for a clientele of noteworthy Romans and Italians and are ascribable to refined and even diversified groups. Thus, while the theophany-based theme is emphasized by the tectonics of the sarcophagi "at the doors of the city," symbolically alluding to the civitas Dei, "those of Bethesda" exclusively select NT events, while the event of the crossing of the Red Sea connotes the imposing megalography of a group of sarcophagi. Other examples referred to as "with stars and crowns" recover the symbolic hinge of the sarcophagus of the anastasis and introduce theories of crowned saints converging on the cross under the starry firmament. The hieratic character of personages and the courtly character of the composition proclaim its close dependency on contemporary imperial ceremonies of the court and, at the same time, manifest the implementation of that process of osmosis between the funerary model and the worship buildings that anticipated the great era of Ravenna mosaics. An eloquent example of this new tendency can be perceived in the decoration of the sarcophagus in the Capitoline Museums, which shows a type of sarcophagus in the form of a chest of drawers with a decoration of crosses and stars on the front and on the shorts sides (Rep I,813). This ornamentation lent itself to a comparison with the mosaics of the dome of the mausoleum of Galla Placida and with the lids from the Ravenna sarcophagi with a symbolic decoration. The accurate and precise form of the crosses and stars, as well as the profile of the crown, suggest a dating to the second quarter or the mid-5th c. A comparison of the decoration of the monuments in Ravenna with those of the sarcophagi in Rome, which were in overt formal dependence on Constan-tinopolitan models, as well as the type characteristic of Eastern sarcophagi, bear witness during this period to the prevailing influence of Eastern production with respect to structural and formal aspects.

Finally, it should be noted that the production of sarcophagi at Rome noticeably diminished after the year 400 and finished toward the first third of the 5th c. After this date we find the use of sarcophagi decorated primarily at Ravenna and only rarely in other regions of *Italy. The typology, structure and form of the decoration of the sarcophagi outside the Roman context show, however, the typical characteristics of the production of Anatolian and Constantinopolitan sarcophagi.

In the new capital Constantinople, the use and the manufacturing of decorated sarcophagi with figured reliefs extended to the 6th c. with exemplars of even higher quality such as the so-called Sarcophagus of the Prince; an analogous situation can be found at *Ravenna. After the transfer of the capital from the Western part of the empire in the year 402 to the Adriatic city, the use of sarcophagi with figured reliefs is recorded at least for a large part of the 5th c., showing a symbolic decoration until the 6th c. and onward. The Ravenna sarcophagi with reliefs—in all likelihood the majority from local shops but heavily influenced in structure, iconography and style by Constantinopolitan models—are datable, even if they lack external indications, not much beyond the mid-5th c. The use and the production at Ravenna of prestigious sarcophagi with figured reliefs, therefore, seem closely connected to the presence of the imperial court.

Finally, one must take into consideration the important group of Christian sarcophagi of S *Gaul. Places of privileged production turn out to be *Marseille and *Arles, an imperial residence in the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c. and from the year 396, in place of *Trier, the seat of the praefectura galliarum. A large number of Christian sarcophagi with reliefs is therefore to be traced back to the presence of influential persons in the history and culture of this region. The majority of these sarcophagi were in all likelihood imported from Rome, as shown by the structure, iconography and style of the figured relief; others, however, were certainly produced in local shops acc. to Roman models and perhaps by Roman workmen. This heavy dependence of the Gallic market on Roman production made it such that with the end of the production in the capital in the first decades of this century, even in Gaul one finds a heavy shrinkage of the presence of sarcophagi with reliefs generally and primarily of those of the Roman type. A new center, however, developed at Marseille in the first decades of the 5th c. through a new, even though very limited, local production. The pillared sarcophagi of Marseille, with an orans at the center, the apostles and the family of the deceased person, is considered one of the first of this type in the mannerist style of the figures comparable to the Roman sarcophagi of the late Theodosian period. To the same era we can assign a fragmentary sarcophagus of Marseille with a dominant symbolic decoration on the cover at the center of the box and two scenes of the miracles of Christ on the sides of the front. Probably sarcophagi imported from *Constantinople to Marseille and now lost inspired the characteristic details of some of the boxes of local production which were so different from the last Roman products. One front of a sarcophagus of Proconnesian marble in the church of St. Trophyme at *Arles (Rep III,120), in fact, attests the importance of the sarcophagus from Marseille, as one can see in the exceptionally large slab with Christ in the arched center and the apostles Peter and Paul in those on the sides of the front, where one can perceive clear structural traces and esp. the particulars of the style and the manufacturing that was characteristic of Constantinopolitan production.

Even a very limited number of local sarcophagi in *Spain, inferior in quality and difficult to date but nevertheless assignable to the Theodosian period of the 5th c., reflect the structure of the boxes, the composition of the relief figures and iconography characteristic of Constantinopolitan sarcophagi, which were probably imported for a chosen clientele of officials and members of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. On such models, a local production developed esp. at *Tarragona, where we find the only shop of early Christian sarcophagi known in Spain. The first sarcophagi were imported from Carthage, as seen, e.g., in the strigilated front of the two orantes (Schlunk, Tarragona, 29-32). Subsequently, some artisans from *Carthage must have transferred to Tarragona. Frequently, the façade is decorated with fields of lines (Schlunk, Tarragona, 34-36). There are some sarcophagi that also present figures of the apostles or scenes, such as that of Abraham and Moses receiving the law (Schlunk, Tarragona, 1-2). The center of local production with Greek influence, perhaps through Africa, was documented at Bureba (Burgos), as well as a school tradition, likewise of Greek origin, in a broad Andalusian area, which encompasses Cordoba, Écija, Alcaudete and Antequere (Schlunk, Sarcófagos).

J. Wilpert, I sarcofagi cristiani antichi, I-III, Vatican City 1929-1936; F. Gerke, Die christlichen Sarkophage der vorkonstantinischen Zeit, Berlin 1940; J. Kollwitz, Oströmische Plastik der theodosianischen Zeit, Berlin 1941; F. Gerke, Christus in der spätantiken Plastik, Mainz ²1948; F. Benoit, Sarcophages paléochrétiens d'Arles et de Marseille, Paris 1954; G. de Francovich, Studi sulla scultura Ravennate I. I sarcofagi: FR 26/27 (1958); D. Talbot Rice - M. Hirmer, Kunst aus Byzanz, Munich 1959; H. Fournet-Pilipenko, Sarcophages romains de Tunisie: Karthago 11 (1961) 77-166; G. Bovini, Sarcofagi costantinopolitani dei secoli IV, V e VI d.C.: CCAB 9 (1962) 179-192; B. Briesenick, Typologie und Chronologie der südwest-gallischen Sarkophage: JRGZ Mainz 9 (1962) 76-182; Th. Klauser, Frühchristliche Sarkophage in Bild und Wort, Olten 1966; F.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage. I. Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967; F.W. Deichmann, Konstantinopler und ravennatische Sarkophag-Probleme: ByzZ 62 (1969) 291-307; H. Schlunk, Sarcófagos paleo-cristianos labrados en Hispania, Act. VIII CongIntArq-Crist, Barcelona 1972, 187-218; J. Dresken Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarcophage. II. Italien mit einem Nachtrag Rom und Ostia, Dalmatien, Museen der Welt, Mainz a.R. 1998; G. Koch, Frühchristliche Sarkophage, Munich 2000; Akten des Symposiums "Frühchristliche Sarkophage" - Marburg, 1999, ed. G. Koch, Mainz 2002; B. Christen-Briesenick, Repertorium der christlichantiken Sarkophage III. Frankreich, Algerien, Tunesien, Mainz 2003; Sarcofagi tardoantichi, paleocristiani e altomedievali, Atti della giornata tematica dei Seminari di Archeologia Cristiana, École Française de Rome, 8 maggio 2002, ed. F. Bisconti - H. Brandenburg (Monumenti di Antichità Cristiana 18), Vatican City 2004.

M. SOTOMAYOR - B. MAZZEI

SARDICA. See SERDICA

SARDINIA. Sardinia and Corsica made up a single Roman province, it seems, until the time of the emperor *Diocletian, when they were divided into two provinces and joined to the Italian diocese. Throughout the entire imperial Roman period, Sardinia enjoyed peace; it was one of the granaries of *Rome until the *Vandal occupation, when the Sardinian supplies were seized, creating great difficulties for the city of Rome, as noted by *Salvian of Marseille: abscissis velut vitalibus venis (De guber. 12: PL 53,121). It was a province of large private and imperial estates.

According to the Liber pontificalis the emperor *Constantine at the time of Pope *Sylvester donated some of the properties of Sardinia to the church of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus of Rome (LP 1, 183). The Roman church maintained these properties for a long time. It was a place of deportation (see Tacitus, Annal. II,85). Even some Christians were deported there: e.g., Pope *Callistus at the time of the emperor *Commodus (d. 192), Pope *Pontian and the priest *Hippolytus of Rome. Passiones and legendae speak of the deportations that occurred at the time of the *Diocletian persecution (303–305). The following martyrs from Sardinia drew much attention: Gavinus, Luxorius, Simplicius, Saturnus, Antiochus and Ephisius.

In 455 Sardinia came under the rule of the Vandals headed by *Genseric and in 533 under that of the Byzantine emperor *Justinian. The literary sources only provide us a little information on Christianity in Sardinia for the entire ancient and early medieval period; archaeological remains are much more numerous (see *Italy). The first historically verified bishop was *Quintasius of Carales (Cagliari), who was present at the Council of *Arles (314). There were perhaps only two episcopal sees at the time of the Council of *Serdica (343). Because there was an intense amount of commercial traffic between Sardinia and Rome and Sardinia and *Carthage, Christianity arrived there from one of these major cities. The most illustrious bishop was *Lucifer of Cagliari, whom *Athanasius of Alexandria referred to as the Sardiniae metropolis episcopus (PG 25, 650 and 731) with *Eusebius of Vercelli, a native of Sardinia. A few popes were natives of Sardinia: *Hilary (461–468) and *Symmachus (498–514). To obtain information about other episcopal sees we have to come to the year 484, when some Sardinian bishops participated at the Council of Carthage, which was called by the Vandal king *Huneric: Lucifer of Cagliari, Martinian of Forum Traiani (Fordongianus), Vitalis of Sulci (St. Antiochus), Felix of Turris Libisonis (Porto Torres) and Boniface of Senafer (Cornus?) (*Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. prov.: MGH, Auct. ant. 3,71). Only five of nearly 360 bishops were present. With the Vandal king Genseric, Huneric (484) and Thrasamund we have numerous pieces of information concerning the deportations of Christians from *Africa into Sardinia; among those we find *Fulgentius of Ruspe (467–533), who brought with him the remains of St. *Augustine and also established there a monastery in the environs of Cagliari. One of his letters to the bishop of Tarros survives to this day. Carales was the metropolitan see from the period of Vandal rule; first it relied on Rome. At the time of *Gregory the Great, the metropolitan was Quintasius. Byzantine Sulci was an important commercial center; in the 7th c., its bishop Euthalius participated at the christological debate between *monothelites and diathelites. At the time of Gregory the Great there were seven dioceses (not all have yet been identified), but the island was still full of *paganism. For this reason the pope sent two missionaries there, Felix and Cyriacus. He wrote the following on this matter: "From the information provided from Bishop Felix, my brother, and my son Cyriacus, a monk, I learned that the farmers among you all spread around in your lands are given over to idolatry" (Ep. IV,23). The same was also the case for the workers on the church's estates (Ep. IV,26).

Widespread paganism on the island, he believed, was caused by the clergy's indifference (Ep. V,38; IX,204). For this reason, Gregory did not tire of prodding Gennaro, the bishop of Cagliari, to whom he sent more than twenty letters. Pope Gregory's efforts did not take long to come to fruition (Ep. V,38). Moreover, the Roman Church possessed many estates in Sardinia, which were entrusted to the care of a defensor ecclesiae* (Ep. IX,203; XIV,2). During this period the Sardinian church was closely connected with the Roman Church, but when the island passed to Byzantine rule, this led to definite influences from the Greek Church in the customs, forms and content of Christian worship, and therefore to a certain autonomy with respect to Rome, at least after Gregory the Great (with respect to the archaeology—see Italy). Bishop Boethius of Cornus was present at the Lateran Council (649).

DACL 15, 888-899; CE 12, 1087-1088; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia dalle origini al principio del secolo VII (an. 604), Faenza 1927, 656-679; F. Cherchi Papa, La repubblica teocratica sarda nell'Alto Medioevo, Cagliari 1971; C. Bellieni, La Sardegna e i sardi nella civiltà dell'Alto Medioevo, I-II, Cagliari 1973; P. Meloni, La Sardegna romana, Sassari 1975, [2]1990; Sardegna centro orientale dal neolitico alla fine del mondo antico, ed. F. Lo Schiavo, Sassari 1978; A. Boscolo, La Sardegna bizantina e alto giudicale, Sassari 1978; Id., La Sardegna dei giudicati, Sassari 1979; E. Cau, Fulgenzio e la cultura scritta in Sardegna agli inizi del VI secolo: Sandalion 2 (1979) 221-229; T. Pinna, Gregorio Magno e la Sardegna, Sassari 1989; L. Porru et al., Sant'Antioco: le catacombe, la chiesa martyrium, i frammenti scultorei, Cagliari 1989; A.F. Spada, Storia della Sardegna cristiana e dei suoi Santi, 1, Il primo millennio, Oristano 1994; R. Turtas, La diocesi di Sulci tra il V e il XIII secolo: Sandalion 18 (1995) 147-170; A.M. Corda, Le iscrizioni cristiane della Sardegna anteriori al VII sec., Vatican City 1999; R. Turtas, Storia della chiesa in Sardegna: dalle origini al Duemila, Rome 1999; La Sardegna paleocristiana tra Eusebio e Gregorio Magno, ed. A. Mastino et al., Cagliari 1999; Il papato di san Simmaco (498-514), ed. G. Mele - N. Spaccapelo, Cagliari 2000; S. Cisci, Il culto dei martiri sardi in Sardegna in età tardoantica e altomedioevale attraverso le testimonianze storiche e archeologiche: RivAC 77 (2001) 371-406; R. Zucca, Insulae Sardiniae et Corsicae: le isole minori della Sardegna e della Corsica nell'antichità, Rome 2003.

A. Di Berardino

SASSANIDS. The Iranian dynasty which reigned in *Persia from the 3rd c. AD to ca. 640, when it fell into the hands of the Arabs. The Sassanids were always a thorn in the side of the Roman Empire, esp. when in 260, *Shapur I defeated and imprisoned the emperor *Valerian. The subsequent deportation of Christians from *Syria favored the spread of Christianity within the Iranian Empire. Christians were always looked on with mistrust because of their attachment to the Roman Empire, which became stronger esp. after the peace of *Constantine. Their sympathy drew a violent reaction from Shapur II, who began a persecution (339–340), which primarily aimed to strike the ecclesiastical hierarchy: three bishops of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon were subsequently martyred, and the episcopal see remained vacant for 40 years (348–388). Yazdegerd (399–420), the son of Shapur II, proved, however, to be more tolerant toward Christians, so much so that *Maruta of Maiferqat was able to gather in 410 a *council of around 40 bishops at Seleucia, in which they approved the decisions of the Council of *Nicaea and reestablished the Persian church.

DNP 11, 89-98; J.M. Fley, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310, Subs. 36, Louvain 1970; G. Pugliese Carratelli, La Persia dei Sassanidi nella storiografia romana da Ammiano a Procopio, in Scritti sul mondo antico, Naples 1976, 35-46; O. Bucci, La posizione del cristianesimo occidentale e quella del cristianesimo orientale di fronte alla guerra tra Roma e l'impero dei Sassanidi, Atti Accad. Roman. Costant., Perugia 1979, 99-139; C.G. Cereti, Primary Sources for the History of Inner and Outer Iran in the Sasanian Period: Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 9 (1997) 17-71; R.N. Frye, The History of Ancient Iran, Munich 1984; G. Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War, 502-532, Leeds 1998; J. Rist, Die Verfolgung der Christen im spätantiken Sasanidenreich. Ursachen, Verlauf und Folgen: Oriens Christianus 80 (1996) 17-42; Z. Rubin, The Sasanid Monarchy, in The Cambridge Ancient History, 14, eds. Av. Cameron - B. Ward-Perkins, Cambridge 2000, 638-661.

G. Pilara

SATISFACTIO. The theological use of the term satisfactio, which was so characteristic of the Western church fathers, is only understood within the framework of Latin *rhetoric and jurisprudence. This held for both *Tertullian, who used it for the first time, and for subsequent Fathers. Tertullian spoke of satisfactio or of satisfacere Deo ("pleasing God") primarily in penitential contexts, both in texts that pertained to *baptism, first paenientia (Bapt. 20,1) and postbaptismal penance, and in those treatises on the *asceticism of all the faithful (Orat. 23,4). In his uses of this term one can distinguish two foundational aspects. The first pertains to the offering of satisfactio, the confessio, in which one admits to having done wrong and promises to make reparation for it (Paen. 9,2: satisfactio confessione disponitur; 8,9; 10,2; Pud. 9,16). The second aspect considers the effecting of satisfactio: one then completes the promised reparation of the sin in order to avoid the punishment and to obtain venia ("forgiveness") and to be restored to the state of righteousness (Paen. 5,2; 5,9ff.). In this second sense, satisfactio generically refers to paenitentia as interior conversion (Paen. 5,9: per delictorum paenitentiam domino satisfacere), and prayer (deprecatio) and the ascetic acts through which the penitent expresses the seriousness of his repentance (Bapt. 20,1; Pud. 13,14). In all this, Tertullian makes the following assumptions: the relationship between God and human beings is established on law. If human beings do not observe the law, they become debtors to God. Human sin, being a violatio legis, constitutes a fault that demands punishment. God could simply grant forgiveness (venia). He does not do so, however, without requiring the satisfactio paenitentiae as the compensatio poenae (Paen. 6,4). But he is always disposed to accepting this satisfactio (Paen. 7,14). This teaching on satisfactio also found penitential contexts in the writings of *Cyprian, but with the new undertones. As in the case of the term paenitentia, the term satisfactio more often pertains to prayer and the penitential act that the penitent must complete before being admitted to the church's communion (pax ecclesiae: Ep. 59,13; 16,2; On Almsgiving 5). This satisfactio must have the right measure in order to be full (Ep. 64,1; 43,2; Laps. 16). Judgment on the legitimate measure is the responsibility of competent authorities (Laps. 29; Ep. 43,3). Only in this way can satisfactio be grata to the Lord (Laps. 29), who satisfactione placandus est (Laps. 17). After Cyprian's time, Latin Christian authors substantially adopted the same penitential terminology. Specific testimonies can be found in the writings of *Lactantius (Ira 21,9: gratia-satisfactio), *Ambrose (Luc. 7,156-157; 10,88), *Sulpicius Severus (Dial. 2,10: poena-satisfactio), *Augustine (Serm. 19,2-3; Ench. 65,70-71), Pope *Innocent I (Ep. 25,7) and *Leo the Great (Ep. 108).

In the 4th c., penitential language entered *Christology. Explaining Jesus' voluntary acceptance of suffering, *Hilary of Poitiers maintained that this satisfied the penal obligation, although it did not, properly speaking, apply to the suffering Christ as a punishment (Ps 53:12). *Ambrose for his part affirmed, along the same lines, that Christ accepted death so that the sentence might be carried out, the condemnation (of the sinful flesh) might be satisfied (Fug. 7,44). Although this pertains to two rather isolated texts, these are of great importance. They express not only in legal terminology a foundational patristic theme, namely that of expiation, but they also paved the way for Anselm of Canterbury's theology, which would wholly focus on the idea of vicarious satisfaction. Around the same time there appeared a new theological definition of satisfactio, which, however, remained in part very close to that of the first penitential use. In the conciliar acts and the papal epistolary correspondence, but also in preaching, the term satisfactio was used when speaking about the readmittance of heretics into the church's communion or about the recognition of the orthodoxy of bishops who were to be to be reallowed into the episcopal college. At that point the term satisfactio primarily meant confession, as one can gather esp. from the Greek translations that rendered it with the term ἀπολογία (see 1 Pet 3:15 [Vg]; Leo the Great, Ep. 28 28,6: PL 54, 778B. 780A; see also Orig., Hom. Iud. 3,2; Princ. III, 1,16; Jerome, Ep. 52,7). Within this framework of the confession of the true faith, satisfactio at times included justification, a satisfactory expression of faith, but also repentance from error; in certain cases it was also a question of written confessions (satisfactio libellaris; Leo, Ep. 31,4) or a document to be signed (Ep. 30,2). In addition to Leo's documents, which are the most interesting (Serm. 35,5: satisfactio legitima, a request from the *Manicheans; Ep. 89,1: satisfactio correctis, requested from the supporters of the Alexandrian patriarch *Dioscorus; Ep. 164,5: correctis paenitentiae remedium non negetur; also Ep. 127,1: talia scripta, without the term satisfaction), are also major works of *Priscillian (?) (Tract. 1,40: CSEL 18, 33), *Augustine (Gest. Pelag. 11,24; 20,44) and *Sixtus III (Ep. 2,3).

A. Deneffe, Das Wort "satisfactio": ZKTh 34 (1919) 158-175; J. Rivière, Sur les premières applications du terme satisfaction à l'oeuvre du Christ: BLE 25 (1924) 285-297; DTC 14/1, 1129-1210; A. Beck, Römisches Recht bei Tertullian und Cyprian, Aalen [2]1967; J. Roussier, Satisfacere, in Studi in onore di P. Francisci, II, Milan 1956, 113-157; M. Brueck, "Genugtuung" bei Tertullian: VChr 29 (1975) 276-290; G. Hallonsten, Satisfactio bei Tertullian, Malmö 1984 (bibl.); C.H. Menke, Genugtuung: LTK[3] 3, 473ff.

B. Studer

SATOR / AREPO. The so-called magic square of five words of five letters each (25 letters) that can be read horizontally and vertically, with other possible layouts, has given rise to much research and controversy, which at times has been rather fanciful. Writing the words as set out here, they can even be read backward (i.e., as a palindrome, which is a word or phrase that can be read either way, from left to right or right to left). The square can be read in four directions and in all the lines. It was found at Pompeii in an area not far from the amphitheater, but also in many other places (Budapest, *Dura Europos, Cirencester, *Mesopotamia), and it was used in the Middle Ages and subsequently in many churches.

S A T O R
A R E P O
T E N E T
O P E R A
R O T A S

Different translations have been proposed; e.g.: (1) God (SATOR, the creator) rules and governs (TENET) the works of creation (ROTAS OPERA) and as much as the earth produces (AREPO, plough); (2) the sower (SATOR) on his wagon (AREPO is a word of Celtic origins whose meaning is similar to wagon) directs (TENET) with skill (OPERA) the tires (ROTAS, here the wheels signify the orbits of the heavenly bodies). Moreover, when set in a different way the letters that compose the phrase SATOR AREPO TENET OPERA ROTAS can be set in two vertical and horizontal lines with the N at the center (with A and O at the edges in the sense of Alpha and Omega) one obtains the word PATERNOSTER ("Our *Father") twice. This type of reading has led to a Christian interpretation, an interpretation that must be ruled out, because the two examples found at Pompeii are too ancient (dating before the year AD 79), suggesting rather that the square was inspired by *Stoicism (see Cicero, De natura deor. 2,86). The spreading of the letters could have an apotropaic character; but initially it was only a word game. Naturally, the square lent itself to numerous, imaginative and even numeric anagrams. The five words of the magic square are widespread in the Ethiopian region, where they symbolize the five nails of the cross of Christ.

PW Suppl. 15, 1978, 477-565; M. Guarducci, Il misterioso quadrato magico. L'interpretazione di J. Carcopino e documenti nuovi: Archeologia Classica 17 (1965) 219-270; A. Frugoni, Sator arepo tenet opera rotas: RSLR 1 (1965) 433-439; P. Veyne, Le carré Sator ou beaucoup de bruit pour rien: BAGB 1968, 427-460; W.O. Moeller, The Mithraic Origins and Meaning of the Rotas-Sator Square, Leiden 1973; K. Aland, Der Rotas-Sator-Rebus, in Corona gratiarum. Misc. . . . Dekkers, II, Bruges 1975, 285-343; M. Marcovich, SATOR AREPO: ZPE 50 (1983) 155-171; K. Aland, Noch einmal: der Rotas/Sator-Rebus, in Supplementa zu den neutestamentlichen und den kirchengeschichtlichen Entwürfen, ed. B. Koester, Berlin 1990, 177-191 (also in Text and Testimony, Essays on NT and Apocryphal Literature in Honour of A.F.J. Klijn, ed. T. Baarda, Kampen 1988); W. Baines, The Rotas-Sator Square: A New Investigation: NTS 33 (1987) 469-476; U. Ernst, Carmen figuratum, Cologne 1991, 429-459; C. Cartigny, Le carré magique, testament de saint Paul, Paris 1984; M. Marcovich, in Studies in Graeco-Roman Religion, Leiden 1988, 28-46; O. Raineri, Catalogo dei rotoli protettori etiopici della collezione Sandro Angelini, Rome 1990 (see the index of this work: p. 315); M.C. Sacchi Zaffarana, Sator Arepo: palindrome criptografica cristiana, Alpignano 1998 (repr. 2000); R. Cammilleri, Il quadrato magico: un mistero che dura da duemila anni, Milan 1999; M. Chicoteau, Un trésor suisse: le carré magique de "Primum Subinum" (Tessin): RBPh 80 (2002) 97-100; M.G. Lopardi, Il quadrato magico del Sator, Rome 2006.

A. Di Berardino

SATORNILUS (Saturninus). The *gnostic Satornilus, a contemporary of *Basilides, was a disciple of *Menander and carried out his activity in *Syria. According to *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 24, 1)—upon whose description many of the other sources on Satornilus heavily depend—Satornilus affirmed that the *world was created by seven *angels. These angels created humans, who, because of their inability, were unable to stand up straight and crawled on the earth like worms. The Higher Power (ἡ ἄνω δύναμις) sent a spark of life that animated man and allowed him to stand up straight. This represents the spiritual and eternal element of man, which, after his death, is destined to return to the place of its origin. The God of the OT is recognized in one of the seven angels, whose turn toward the unknown God caused the coming of Jesus Christ in order esp. to destroy the God of the Jews. Irenaeus's last piece of information on this matter is hard to reconcile with what he said earlier. He in fact stated that the angels have created two categories of human beings: one good, the other evil; in aid of the first the Savior came to destroy the wicked and the demons who help them. According to Satornilus, procreation and matrimony is the work of Satan, who, moreover, inspired, along with the Creator Angels of the world, the prophecies of the OT.

Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 24; Refut. VII, 28; Tertullian, De anima 23; Philastrius, Liber de haer. 31; Epiphanius of Salamis, Pan. 23; EC 10, 1964-1965; G. Lüdemann, Untersuchungen zur simonianischen Gnosis, Göttingen 1975; S. Pétrement, Le Dieu separé. Les origines du gnosticisme, Paris 1984, 449-458; M. Simonetti (ed.), Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Milan 1993, 6-19.

A. Monaci Castagno

SATURNINUS and DATIVUS, martyrs. Saturninus and Dativus were two martyrs of the *Donatist community of *Abitina. They underwent martyrdom along with their companions under Anulinus in Proconsular *Africa at the beginning of the 4th c. The interrogations took place at *Carthage on 12 February 304. *Augustine specified that the persecutions took place at the time of the emperors *Diocletian and *Maximian (Nam gesta martyrum quibus ostendebatur tempus persecutionis, consulibus facta sunt Diocletiano novies et Maximiano octies, pridie idus februaris, Brev. Coll. Donatist. III,17,32). As is well known, Saturninus was the only presbyter at the head of this community. G.D. Gordini noted concerning this matter: "Fundanus, bishop of the Abitina community in Proconsular Africa, had handed over [traditor*] the sacred books to the local authorities in order to obey the imperial orders of Diocletian, perhaps for this reason the faithful preferred to follow the priest Saturninus in the *eucharistic celebration despite the fact that the imperial decrees prohibited Christians from partaking in gatherings" (BS IX,683). In actuality, the emperors not only prohibited meetings and the rites of the new religion, but they had also ordered Christians to hand over the sacred books to the civil authorities (ut sacrosancta Domini testamenta scripturasque divinas ad exurendum peteret, basilicas dominicas subverteret et ritus sacros coetus sanctissimos celebrari Domino prohiberet).

The Christians of Abitina preferred to shed their blood for their faith rather than to become traditores, as had Bishop Fundanus. They thus continued to gather until the day of their arrest in the house of Octavius Felix. On one Sunday, while they were celebrating the sacrifice of the Lord, they were taken by surprise and led as prisoners before the city magistrates, who then sent them to Carthage to be heard by the Proconsul Anulinus because it did not lie within their jurisdiction to rule over a normal criminal case. Nearly 50 people were arrested and led to *Carthage to be questioned about their religion. The senator Dativus was certainly the first to be judged. After him, Saturninus was sentenced to death; he was a presbyter and the father of four children. Last, all the members of the group likewise professed their faith and underwent martyrdom in the name of Jesus Christ. During the trial the name of Jesus Christ was invoked as the hope of Christians (Domine Iesu, christiani sumus, tibi servimus. Tu es spes christianorum). All professed their faith with constancy and as a result refused to sacrifice to the gods of the pagans and professed their innocence inasmuch as they were not murderers, nor had they committed any fraud.

The Acta martyrum brings to light the struggle of Christ's faithful against the devil, who acted through the will of the emperors. The Donatist compiler, after the Catholic revision, admired in them their faith in devotion, their holiness of life, the constancy in their profession of faith and their victory in suffering. Therefore, the substance of the accusations directed by Anulinus to the prisoners was that of being Christians and of gathering in assemblies that were prohibited by imperial decree. To urge Christians to abjure their faith, the proconsul Analinus subjected them to fierce tortures, without obtaining any results. In the Acts no mention is made of the outcome of the prisoners. It seems that they died in prison sometime after, either through hunger or torture. The account of the martyrdom is owed to the initiative of the Catholic editor who, without a doubt, integrated information into the text from the official documents from the interrogation with a brief comment on the facts. Later the text would undergo the influence of a Donatists compiler.

Augustinus, Brev. collationis cum Donatistis, III, 17,32: PL 43, 643; Id., De civitate Dei XXII, 8: CSEL 40, 608; Ep. 22,2: CSEL, 61-62; PCBE 1, 1038; P. Monceaux, Histoire de la littérature de l'Afrique chrétienne, III, Paris 1905, 140-147; P. Allard, Storia critica delle persecuzioni, IV, Florence 1928, 235-247; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Passio ss. Dativi Saturnini. Note agiografiche: ST 65, Vatican City 1935, 47-71; A. More, Saturninus: LTK[2] 9, 354; G.D. Gordini, Saturnino, Dativo: BS 11 (1968) 682-684.

M.W. Libambu

SATURNINUS of Arles (4th c.). An *Arian bishop who was characterized by *Sulpicius Severus as a "powerless and divisive man; a truly awful man, both wicked and depraved in thought" (homo impotens et factiosus; vir sane pessimus et ingenio malo pravoque—Chron. 2,40; 45). *Hilary of Poitiers also left some information about him (De syn. 2,2; Fragm. hist. 2,8; 11,4). He was the bishop of *Arles under the emperor *Constantius (337–361); we do not know if he already held this office at the time of the Council of Arles (353), but he participated in the Council of *Milan (355) and that of *Béziers (356), which he convoked and over which he presided. At that council the decision was made to exile Hilary of Poitiers and *Paulinus of Trier as well as to condemn *Athanasius. He was present at the Councils of *Rimini (359) and *Constantinople (360). He lead the Arian group in *Gaul and was deposed from his episcopal office by the Council of *Paris (361) through Hilary's initiative. He was not inscribed into the episcopal diptychs because he was a heretic and was deposed acc. to the rules.

E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine 1, Paris [2]1964, 224-226; 243-246; 262-264; Hilaire et son temps. Actes du colloque de Paris 29 septembre - 3 octobre 1968 à l'occasion du XVI[e] centenaire de la mort de S. H., Paris 1968; H.C. Brennecke, Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Konstantius II. Untersuchungen zur dritten Phase des arianischen Streites (337-361), Berlin-New York 1984; BBKL 8, 1408-1409.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

SATURNINUS of Cagliari. In the 6th c., there was a church dedicated to Saturninus not far from Cagliari. We do not know anything for certain about this saint. He was often confused with the bishop and martyr *Saturninus of Toulouse, even if his martyrdom, from a literary point of view, has nothing to do with that of Saturninus of Toulouse (BHL 7495-7496). The Passion (BHL 7491) dates to the 7th-8th c., the legend (BHL 7490) to the 11th-12th c.; the latter was probably written in the monastery of Saturninus at Cagliari. After *Diocletian's retreat, Saturninus was martyred on 30 October at Cagliari by Barbarus, the ruler of Corsica and *Sardinia, because he refused to sacrifice to Jupiter on the Campidoglio.

BHL 7490-7491; BS 11, 671; L. Pani Ermini, Ricerche nel complesso di S. Saturno a Cagliari: Atti della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia, Rendiconti 55-56 (1982-1984), 111-128; P.G. Spanu, Martyria Sardiniae, Oristano 2000, 51-60, 155-156; A. Piras, Passio Sancti Saturnini (BHL 7491), Rome 2002.

S. Heid

SATURNINUS of Rome. A Roman martyr. In his letters, *Cyprian mentions Saturninus, who was born at *Carthage and was arrested during the Decian persecution and then exiled to Rome, where he was perhaps martyred during the Valerian persecution. The Depositio martyrum by the *Chronographer of 354 mentions around the year 336 the tomb of Saturninus in the catacomb of Trasone on the Via Salaria (feast day, 29 November). Pope *Damasus dedicated an epigram to the martyr with unique information. Even the Mart. hier. knew of him, and the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries provide a formulary in his honor. The basilica over his tomb was redone in the 6th c. by Pope *Felix III [IV]. The pilgrims of the 7th c. visited his tomb (CCL 175, 288, 299, 306, 320, 325 and 341), and the historical martyrologies recorded his memoria. The Passio Marcelli (BHL 5234-5235) connected Saturninus with the deacon *Sissinius. Both were forced to work for the construction of *Diocletian's baths before being decapitated on the second mile of the Via Nomentana. Trasone gathered their bodies and buried them in his field on the Via Salaria.

BHL 7493-7494; BS 11, 688-695; BBKL 8, 1409-1410; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 188-190; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 52-54; D. De Francesco, La basilica di S. Saturnino sulla Via Salaria Nova: Ecclesiae Urbis 1, Vatican City 2002, 611-624.

S. Heid

SATURNINUS of Toulouse, martyr (3rd c.). Saturninus (Fr. Saturnin, Sernin) was, around the middle of the 3rd c., the first bishop of *Toulouse. According to the Passio from the 5th c. (BHL 7495-7496), Saturninus refused to sacrifice during the *Decian *persecution (250), and a rioting mob had him bound, without the regular trial, to a bull that was to be sacrificed and that dragged him to his death. The same account of his martyrdom also informs us about the first events at the tomb of Saturninus. Bishop *Hilary (from the 2nd half of the 4th c.) had built there a wooden funerary chapel, which was then replaced by his successor (?) Silvius with a stone building. *Exuperius (405–411) transferred the relics there on a 30 November, at some distance from the early tomb and there commissioned the building of the basilica of St. Sernin which, after it had been destroyed by the Arabs in 721, left no traces. Another basilica built in the same place during the Carolingian era and reconstructed in the 11th-12th c. remains to this day. The Passio does not mention the day of the saint's death; in the Mart. hier. (acc. to the Gallican recension), it is recorded for 29 November and 30 October: the second date is that of the translation of the relics through the work of Exuperius, a transfer which in the Mozarabic calendars was connected to 1 November. The first date was chosen to match that of the feast day of the Roman Saturninus. In the 6th c., the legend of the saint also developed. Although *Caesarius of Arles (G. Morin, Sancti Caesarii Ep. Arel. Opera omnia 2, 1942, 179) made him a disciple of the apostles, *Venantius Fortunatus (PL 88,99-101) and *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 1,30) only state that he came from *Rome. Gregory added that it occurred in 250, in reference to the Passio. The cult spread into *Spain from the 5th c. onward, in the *Visigoth milieu (two Masses in honor of the saint) and in *Gaul, starting from the 6th c., in the region of Toulouse, along the Mediterranean coast and along the itinerary of St. James of Compostella (Santiago de Compostela), and finally in the region of *Paris.

BHL 7495-7508; BS 11, 673-681; LCI 8, 310-311; BBKL 8, 1410-1411.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

SATYRUS (ca. 330–375/378). The older brother of *Ambrose, who was born, perhaps at *Rome, around the year 330. He spent his childhood at *Trier and after studying in Rome and having undertaken an administrative career, he was appointed consularis. He then retired at *Milan to live with Ambrose and devoted himself to a strict Christian life. Upon returning from *Africa, where he had gone to administer some of his family's poperty, he became gravely ill. He died at Milan around 375 (acc. to Palanque; between 377–378, acc. to other scholars). He was buried in the basilica of St. Victor Ciel d'Oro near the grave of the martyr Victor. Ambrose delivered two funerary speeches in his honor (De excessu fratris sui Satyri): the first was delivered on the day of the funerary rites; the second, seven days later. These two speeches constitute the primary source of information on him.

BS 11, 664-666; J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire Romain, Paris 1933, 488-493; A. Palestra, S. Satiro, fratello di s.

Ambrogio e s. Marcellina, Milan 1980; C. Perogalli, San Satiro, fratello di sant'Ambrogio e santa Marcellina. La vita, il culto, l'iconografia, Milan 1980; G. Banterle (ed.), Sant'Ambrogio. Le orazioni funebri. De excessu fratris, Milan 1985, 25-159; PCBE II, 1995-1996.

M.G. Mara

SAVIA. Savia was one of the provinces organized on the territory of *Pannonia Superior after the year 293. The border to the N was the Danube-Drava; to the E it reached the line that crossed the plain of Pannonia, which acted as a border with Valeria. To the W, Savia shared a common border with *Noricum, while to the S it bordered *Dalmatia, i.e., up to the Dinaric Alps. The administrative center was Siscia (today Sisak). The only known episcopal sees were Emona, Siscia and Iovia (today Ludbreg). Emona was then included in the Italic regions. The border city, Petovium, at the time of *Constantine was left to Noricum. In the 6th c., Siscia had to be included in the territory of Dalmatia because Bishops Johannes and Constantius signed the decisions of the Councils of *Salona from the years 530 and 533.

Christianity began to develop in Savia in the 2nd half of the 3rd c. Information about early Christianity in this area is sparse: the only concrete piece of information is the fact that in June 308 (during *persecutions under *Galerius) Bishop Quirinius from Siscia drowned in a stream that ran through Savaria. It seems, however, that the persecutions in Savia and Pannonia Prima were not as arduous or as fierce as they were in Pannonia Secunda. At a later age there is an inscription at *Aquileia, in which mention is made of Bishop Amantius, who was in the episcopal see of Jovia in the late 4th c. and died in 413.

The Christian archaeological remains are few. In Emona the remains of a baptismal vase with sumptuous mosaics were recently discovered. Unfortunately the basilica lies under modern homes. At Siscia there were some offices for the coinage of money (2nd half of the 3rd c. until the 2nd half of the 4th c.). From Siscia came numerous early Christian discoveries (inscriptions, *sarcophagi, scrinia, terra sigillata, lanterns etc.), but up to now the churches and the early Christian buildings have not been excavated. A fragment of terra sigillata portrays a woman (martyr) tied to a tree trunk and undergoing an attack from an animal. At least three churches were within the walls and one outside. It is very difficult to excavate here because the new city lies atop the Roman ruins. In Aquae Iassae (Varaždinske Toplice) a thermal hall in the sumptuous complex built by Constantine was transformed into a church; alongside the hall were added, for other liturgical services, ornate rooms of paintings from which only a few remains have been preserved. On one of the fragments was painted a head with a beard and a halo. Even at Jovia the thermal building was transformed into a church. Both transformations were completed in the late 4th c. In Savia small Christian objects such as *sarcophagi, *lamps, *amulets, *fibulae etc. were found.

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire Romain, Paris 1918; T. Nagy, La storia del Cristianesimo in Pannonia sino alla caduta della copertura romana di confine, Budapest 1939 (in Hungarian with a summary in German); PWK, Suppl. 14, 739ff.; A. Mocsy, Pannonia and Upper Moesia, London 1954; B. Vikic, Elementi ranog kršcanstva u sjevernoj Hrvatskoj: Arheološki vestnik 29 (1978) 588ff.; Lj. Plesnicar Gec, Old Christian Center in Emona, Katalogi in monografije 21, Ljubljana 1983; B. Migotti, Evidence for the Christianity in Roman Southern Pannonia (Northern Croatia), Oxford 1997; D. Gaspar, Christianity in Roman Pannonia: An Evaluation of Early Christian Finds and Sites from Hungary, Oxford 2002.

N. Cambi

SAYINGS of JESUS, apocryphal. A group of brief texts coming from the Middle Ages and modern times which completes the description of the passion of Jesus in the gospels and in the apocryphal texts where the sentencing of Jesus is missing (e.g., Gospel of Nicodemus 9). They were texts that were very well known within popular culture.

Santos Otero, 566-569; Starowieyski 1/2, 671-674, 890-891 (bibl.); Erbetta I/2, 405-406; Craveri 380-381.

M. Starowieyski

SCAPULA. The proconsul of *Africa (211–213), he was the source of a fierce persecution against the Christians. *Tertullian wrote him an open letter, Ad Scapulam, in which he emphasized the proconsul's personal responsibility for the persecution, although his other predecessors had known how to reconcile a sense of compassion with their duties as magistrates (4,1 and 3). Tertullian emphasized, moreover, that Scapula went against the very instructions he had received for punishing guilty people who had confessed and for torturing those who had denied their own crimes, inasmuch as through torture he sought to force those who had already declared themselves to be Christian to deny their confession (4,2). This Scapula should probably be identified with a Scapula Tertullus, the ordinary consul in 195.

J. Schmidt, Ein Beitrag zur Chronologie der Schriften Tertullians und der Proconsuln von Afrika: RhM 46 (1891) 77-98; Prosopographia Imperii Romani saec. I.II.III, pars III, eds. P. De Rohden - H. Dessau, n. 193; Monceaux I, 244-246.

S. Zincone

SCETE, Desert of. A location noted for its salt lakes, situated on the W side of the Nile Delta, about halfway between *Alexandria and Cairo almost within the Libyan desert. The modern name is Wadi al-Natrun (Wadi 'n-Natrun, Wadi El-Natrun); the Greek (and Latin) name derives from the Coptic term "Shiet." This place was known during the classical era for its mineral resources. Around 330, *Macarius the Egyptian settled there, around whom a monastic community was formed. From that time onward it was a monastic center of enormous importance, although this monastery had its highs and lows (destructions by the barbarians, the persecution of the *Origenists etc.). Today these four *monasteries are still fully active (the monasteries of St. Macarius, St. Pshoi [Bishoy, Bishoi], the Syrians and the Romans [al-Baramus]). From these ancient libraries many important codices in *Coptic and *Syriac have survived. It was the custom that the patriarch of Alexandria be chosen from the monastery of St. Macarius in the 9th-11th centuries. In the modern era the location of Scete has been confused with that of Nitria, which is more to the E, within the Delta (the modern name el-Barnugi, from the Coptic Pernug).

D.J. Chitty, The Desert a City, London-Oxford [2]1977; H.G. Evelyn White, History of the Monasteries of Nitria and Scetis, New York 1932, 3 vols.; LTK[3] 7, 881; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1794-1796 (Nitria); 7, 2102-2106; Les Kellia, ermitages coptes en Basse-Égypte: Musée d'art et d'histoire, Genève 1989; O.F.A. Meinardus, 2000 Years of Coptic Christianity, Cairo 1999; M. Capuani, Christian Egypt: Coptic Art and Monuments Through Two Millennia, Collegeville, MN 1999.

T. Orlandi

SCHISM – SCHISMATIC. The term schism entered Christian *Latin usage in the 3rd c. with the meaning: a dissent that led to disunity in the community. Along these lines the term schismatic initially did not refer to a Christian separated from the community but rather a dissident. The concept of schism was immediately put in relation to *heresy by addressing the question of their mutual difference and their relationship. For this reason, in ancient Christian sources we find schismatics almost always likened to the heretics, who, already in the collection of *Cyprian's letters, are often not easy to distinguish (Ep. 33; 66,5). *Jerome identified in heresy a distorted teaching of the Christian religion, although in schism a disagreement from one's own bishop that separates one from the community (Inter haeresim et schisma hoc esse arbitrantur, quod haeresis perversum dogma habeat, schisma propter episcopalem dissensionem ab ecclesia separetur. Ceterum nullum schisma non sibi aliquam coniungit haeresim, ut recte ab ecclesia recessisse videatur: In Ep. Tit. 3,10-11). In the writings of *Augustine the distinction between the heretic and the schismatic is clear (De haeresibus 50); nevertheless, there is in Augustine's writings the awareness that schism sooner or later leads to heresy, esp. when it becomes schisma inveteratum (C. Cresconium II, 4), as was the case with *Donatism, which he, after the Collatio Chartaginensis of 411, no longer mentioned among the schisms but rather among the heresies (Ep. 93,11,46; De haeresibus 69). The Donatists in fact—in his evaluation—had transformed a schism, a form of ungodliness that implies the absence of charity (Ep. 23,7; 108,3,11), into heresy (Ep. 87,4). Donatists who converted, however, were left in their ecclesial offices (Ep. 185,10,47). In the Greek East, in the writings of the Cappadocian fathers, esp. *Basil's, if heresy was to be placed in the line of separation of the faith of the community, schism was placed in that of dissent with the official community for ecclesiastical reasons and for questions that could in principle be resolved (Basil, Ep. 188, can. 1). In the line of schism, Basil places the parasynagōgē, i.e., the liturgical synaxes celebrated by the bishops, presbyters or the faithful who are not properly or not sufficiently taught (Ep. 188, can. 1). Schism is, therefore, a disagreement with the hierarchy of their time and the manner, e.g., in which penance was granted to the *lapsed. The Greek fathers found the primary cause of schism in the libido dominandi (Gk. philarchia, i.e., the lust for power) (Basil, C. Eun. 1,13; John Chrysostom, In Eph 4 hom. 11,4-5; Theodoret of Cyrrhus, In 1 Cor 11,18).

The ecclesial legislation with respect to schism, which was primarily determined at the Council of *Nicaea (325), *Laodicea (345 or later), *Constantinople (381 and 382) and *Carthage (418), usually led to the removal of a presbyter or bishop from his office; *excommunication, however, if it pertained to a monk or layperson, extended even to the point of deferring to the civil authorities in case of factiousness (Synod of *Antioch [341], can. 5). Augustine spoke much of the civil laws against the schismatics in his numerous letters (Ep. 51,1; 76,4; 129,4; 185,2 and 7), esp. those to the emperor *Theodosius I, who issued laws concerning the Donatists (Ep. 105,2,9) and also promulgated a law against all heretics (Ep.

185,7, 25). Evodius along with the bishop Theasius was sent to *Italy to ask the emperor *Honorius to apply some of the imperial laws against the schismatics (Ep. 80, 1), although Augustine did not want the law of retaliation to be applied to the Donatists (Ep. 133,1-2; 134, 2). *Theodosius II also sent Augustine a letter concerning the enforcement of the laws against the Donatists (Ep. 201).

E. Buonaiuti, Scisma ed eresia nella primitiva letteratura cristiana. Saggi sul cristianesimo primitivo, Città di Castello 1923, 274-285; H. Pétré, Haeresis, schisma et leurs synonymes latins: REL 15 (1937) 316-319; N.I. Pontet, La notion de schisme d'après s. Augustin, in L'Église et les Églises I, Chevetogne 1955, 163-180; M. Meinertz, Schisma und Hairesis im NT: Biblische Zeitschr. n.s. 1 (1957) 114-118; S.L. Greenslade, Schism in the Early Church, London 1953, [2]1964; E. Ferguson, Attitudes to Schism at the Council of Nicaea, in D. Baker, Schism, Heresy and Religious Protest, Cambridge 1972, 57-63; A. Schindler, Die Unterscheidung von Schisma und Häresie in Gesetzgebung und Polemik gegen den Donatismus: in Pietas. Fest. B. Kötting, Münster 1980, 228-236; W. Gerlings, Haeresis und Schisma in den Canones der nordafrikanischen Konzilien von 345 bis 525, in A. Gabriels - H.J.F. Reinhardt (ed.), Ministerium Iustitiae (Fest. H. Heinemann), Essen 1985, 161-167.

V. Grossi

SCHOLASTICA. The only piece of information on St. Scholastica, whose actual historical existence has recently been called into question, comes from the second book of *Gregory the Great's Dialogues. The sister of St. *Benedict, Scholastica was consecrated to God from childhood; once a year she was accustomed to meet with her brother near the monastery of Monte Cassino and to have a conversation with him. Gregory the Great recorded in moving terms the account of the last encounter between these two siblings, who were very close to death by that time (Dial. II,33).

BS 11, 742-749; A. Pantoni, Sulla località del convegno annuale di S. Benedetto e S. Scolastica, e sul monastero di Piumarola: Benedictina 15 (1908) 206-228; A. de Vogüé, La rencontre de Benoît et de Scholastique. Essai d'interprétation: RAM 48 (1972) 257-273; P.A. Cusack, St. Scholastica: Myth or Real Person?: DR 92 (1974) 145-159; G. Barone, s.v. Scolastica, in Il grande libro dei Santi, ed. C. Leonardi - A. Riccardi - G. Zarri, III, Cinisello Balsamo 1998, 1767-1768.

S. Zincone

SCHOLASTICUS. In Christian antiquity, the adjective scholastic (obviously from schola) used as a noun preserved at first its original meaning—and therefore indicated the same social-cultural role—that it had in classical Latin culture: a man of the school, a teacher, an educator, a rhetorician, a grammarian, a teacher of declamation and, more generally speaking, an educated person, a learned person, refined, erudite, well read and intellectual (see ps.-Macarius of Egypt, Hom. 15,42: PG 34,604D; Hom. 26,17: PG 34, 685B). Later the term scholastic began to refer to the orator who cultivated the art of forensic eloquence in the context of the school and taught its rules to the students, only treating lites fictae and making the students perform traditional exercises on the basis of didactic texts such as the Controversiae and the Suasoriae of Seneca the Elder (see *Salvian of Marseille, De gubernatione Dei, Praef 2: CSEL 8,2: "[. . .] ut scholastici ac diserti haberentur; *Jer., De vir. ill. 99: PL 23,738: Serapion ob elegantiam ingenii cognomen Scholastici meruit; Aug., De catech. rud. 13: CCL 46,135). In a third semantic phase from the school, emphasis was placed on the legal aspect. For this reason the term came to be applied to the legal professional properly speaking, i.e., the jurisconsult, the patronus*, who discussed—not on the condition that he was such (it should be stated) but that he did so with skill and eloquence—legal cases in the forum, or effectively defended the rights and interests of the citizens before the public authorities (see the Council of *Serdica, can. 10; Soc., HE VI,6,36: PG 67, 681A; Cyr. Scyth., Vita Sabae 61; John Moschus, Prat. Spirit. 131: PG 87, 2996B; Cron. Pasch.: PG 92,980A; Aug., In Joh. 7,11: NBA 50,166: Qui habent causam, aut qui volunt supplicare, quaerunt aliquem scholasticum, a quo sibi preces componantur). Moreover, this should be understood in relation to obligations or disputes of a legal nature that involved in some way the ecclesial community (see Cod. Eccl. Afr. 97). In Late Antiquity and then increasingly so in the Middle Ages, the term scholastic wound up having a full ecclesiastical meaning, to the point of indicating the cleric of the highest level (even called the magister scholarum, cancellarius or similar terms), originally a member of the cathedral chapter, who was responsible for monitoring the progress of the schools within the jurisdiction of the chapter (regimen scholarum, ius scholarum, ius in regendis scholis).

Du Cange, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis VI, 351-352; PWK 21/1, 624-625; Lampe 121-123; E. Lesne, Histoire de la propriété ecclésiastique en France, 5, Les Écoles . . . , Lille 1910-43, 453-512; H. Rashdall, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, Oxford [2]1936, I: 279-282; II: 84-88, 144-146, 155-158; H. Jedin, Domschule und Kolleg: Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 67 (1958) 210-223; New Catholic Encyclopedia 12 (1966) 1170-1171; LTK[3] 3, 330.

M. Spinelli

SCHOLION. Derived from the Greek term σχολή ("occupation, study"), a scholion was a marginal (or interlinear) annotation of a MS of a classical text performing the function of a brief explanation, a grammatical and linguistic note or an analysis of a lemma (word or expression) obscure or little-known of the text itself, mentioned in connection to the line in discussion by an asterisk or a mere repetition of the phrase discussed. The most extensive scholia are for the most part extrapolations of larger commentaries that have been lost. They can also supply mythological, historical and geographical information; identify parallels and interpolations; mention citations from other works; and are useful for modern criticism for the exegesis of the text and the reconstruction of works and lost ancient theories. As a result, it is not easy to make a clear distinction between a scholion and a *gloss (Isidore, Etymol. 1,30; 6,8,1). Mentioned for the first time by Cicero (Ad Atticum XVI,7,3) with the meaning of promemoria, the term scholion was used with the current meaning of "commentary" from the 2nd c. AD onward (Epictetus, Dissert. 3,21,6; Galen 18,2,847). *Jerome subdivided *Origen's writings of scriptural exegesis into volumes (or commentaries), homilies and scholia (σχόλια, σημειώσεις, excerpta, commaticum interpretationis genus: "In the scholia he presented a summary of chapters and succinctly mentioned those questions that seemed to him obscure or that contained difficult points of interpretation": in Ez. praef.; cf., in Is 1,1; in Math. praef.; in Gal. praef.; Ep. 33,4). *Clement of Alexandria's Hypotyposeis on the Scriptures, which have been in large part lost, are considered scholia as are the textual explanations of ps.-Athanasius and *Evagrius of Pontus on the *Psalms, *Polychronius of Apamea on Ezekiel, *Julian of Eclanum on Job, *Arnobius the Younger on the gospels and *Hesychius of Jerusalem on the OT.

A. Gudeman, Scholion: PWK IIA/1, 625-705; T. Fuhrer, Scholion, in Dizionario di Letteratura cristiana antica, Rome 2006, 753; A. Le Boulluec, Generi letterari, in Origene. Dizionario: la cultura, il pensiero, le opere, ed. A. Monaci Castagno, Rome 2000, 185 ("Le opere esegetiche").

M. Girardi

SCHOOL

I. The Christian school - II. The Christian theological schools - III. Evolution of the concept of school - IV. Ancient Christian "exegetical" schools.

By the term school here we intend to speak, on the one hand, of a part of the system and the method, shared or at least not openly rejected even by Christians, in use during the patristic era to teach, and on the other hand, the orientation of the notably "Christian" school of a higher level in biblical exegesis and in catechetical tradition.

I. The Christian school. The religious situation of *Judaism at the time of Jesus was characterized by a multiplicity of religious sects with their cultural centers and training for the sacred, among which emerged the Pharisees (see Mt 15; Mk 7), the Sadducees (see Mt 22; Lk 20; Acts 23), the *Samaritans (see Jn 4), the zealots (see Lk 6:15), the Herodians (see Mk 8:15), the Essenes (Flavius Josephus, Jewish Wars §120, 122, 124), the Zadokites and some others of even less importance (Flavius Josephus, Jewish Wars II,8; Jewish Antiquities 18,4-5). But all these religious movements can scarcely be recognized as a historical and theological development of Judaism or as a manifestation of all the written and oral tradition transmitted by the pertinent structures, which go under the name of the rabbinic school, in which Jesus of Nazareth also participated, by learning to read and write the OT, as did every observant Jew of the tradition of the Fathers, thus becoming an authoritative teacher of doctrine and discipline ("but I say to you") and the head of an apolitical school by its nature (see Jn 6:15), but heavily oriented to the discovery of the self-identity of the people of God and growth in the fidelity to his Word of life. The disciples of Christ had two models to continue the teaching of the teacher: the rabbinic-Hellenistic model, which was attentive to philology and history, and the Roman model, which was primarily disposed toward politics and practical living.

Christian authors knew how to navigate between the two models, bringing to fulfillment the work of the cultural transition from Judaism to the Greek world and from Hellenism to the Roman world, developing school structures not inferior to those that proceeded them in enthusiasm for research and philological investigation, to the point of setting themselves forward as the victorious culture in the face of pagan or Jewish resurgences or any form of competition that was considered defective in comparison to "sound" doctrine and charged with heresy. Faithfulness to NT teaching, which was made to go back to Jesus and the apostles and which was contained in the books of the NT (see 1 Cor 11:2-23; Jude 3), constituted the basis of every sermon or exposition of individual authors or institutions, which arose rather early, upon the basis of existing models, designed to transmit the cultural Christian heritage. As in the case of every school, Christian schools also immediately underwent a process of heavy identification and research or investigation of particular connotations that inspired its existence out of necessity of distinguishing itself from similar schools. One can, therefore, hypothesize for Christianity of the first five centuries a synchronic and at times a diachronic development in at least four phases, which were heavily influenced by contemporary Hellenistic and Roman schools: (1) pre-Constantinian schools of further instruction and exposition of the Christian message, generally catechetical, in the East; (2) pre-Constantinian schools of apologetics, further instruction and exposition of the Christian message in the West; (3) post-Constantinian Christian schools, generally theological and antiheretical, in the East; and (4) post-Constantinian Christian theological schools, which were generally systematic, in the West. Such distinctions have, moreover, only value for scholastic exposition, and the phases are not always easily distinguishable by time and place.

II. The Christian theological schools. The decisive turn through the birth of the schools is to be regarded as AD 70, after *Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans (cf. Lk 21:20), and AD 313, when *Constantine put an end to the persecution with the Edict of Milan (the Edict of Tolerance), officially offering Christianity his support. The leading centers of development can be identified as *Antioch and *Alexandria for the East and *Lyons and *Carthage for the West. Similar actions in erecting schools were taken at *Constantinople in opposition to the pagan schools of *Athens, and at *Rome in opposition to the pagan circle of *Milan. *Jerusalem, the heart of Judaism, soon lost its great influence over other churches, although Rome, the capital of the empire of the pagan world, lent itself to having an ever-increasing influence on expansion of Christianity in the Mediterranean world, confirmed by writers of the caliber of *Irenaeus of Lyons, who did not hesitate to exalt and praise its "mighty superiority" (Adv. haer. III,3,2) and to describe the cosmopolitan movement of pilgrims who were attracted there "from everywhere" to profess the faith coming from the apostles.

The disdain for Israel and the rabbinic schools (Jerome is an exception) was based on the notion that the Jewish people (understood as a whole) had crucified the Son of God and rejected Jesus as Messiah, so that Christianity alone was to be considered as the new Israel, heir also of the sacred books and the revelation of God contained therein. Nevertheless the Christians, though never modifying the structures of the rabbinic or pagan schools, had to overcome numerous obstacles from without and within, and were obligated to establish their own centers, where young men, pagan and Christian, who generally attended the same schools and read the same texts, could acquire the new culture and frameworks for ecclesiastical and administrative careers, which were often interchangeable, beyond the religious education which they normally received in their family. This explains how the classic scholastic system was able to survive beyond the chronological limits of the empire and the disturbing events of the wars and the migrations of peoples. Even when it was thought necessary to base teaching entirely on the Bible and education was directed to the formation of clerics, the classical instruction survived in the structuring of the three typese of schools: (1) the ludus litterarius, i.e., the primary, where children between 7 and 12 years old learned to read and write and to perform the first operations of mathematical calculations; (2) the grammar school, where adolescents learned the works and the style of the most famous Greek and Latin authors; and (3) the school of *rhetoric, the highest level, where young men obtained the summit of knowledge.

Nevertheless, one should note that in the West the study of Greek, the language of learning and commercial exchange, gradually disappeared, and in the East the study of Latin, the language of law, administration and public acts, waned. Nor does it seem that in either the East or the West, there was special public or private interest for buildings dedicated to schooling, except for the Maenianae scholae of Autun (Pan. Lat. 5) and the scholae of Ostia and of a small city in Tunisia.

Coercive methods and the use of memory, of which *Augustine also spoke (Conf. 1,9,14-15; 1,14,23), continued to be in full force, and the problem of the interpretation of texts was resolved in various ways in different cultural contexts of the empire, but primarily with the notable tendency toward *allegorical reading of even historical events described realistically, following the example of *Philo and *Paul, who considered even biblical events commonly presented as historical and the founders of the chosen people as figures and types of Christian events. Preaching, however, addressed to learned peoples, accepted with little resistance the thriving literary culture and became institutionalized in the traditional schools almost as a parallel continuation of the great classical schools, although weakened by the repetitiveness of the degraded rhetoric and the resurgence of pagan religiosity.

*Justin Martyr and *Clement of Alexandria in their schools reconsidered Hellenic philosophy; *Origen wrote the first summa in a Christian light; all three of these scholars began and brought to completion a school, which did not find an equivalent in the West, which was instead marked by the condemnation of traditional culture by *Tertullian, the condemnation of religion and the pagan traditions by *Arnobius and the condemnation of philosophy tout court by *Lactantius. The institutiones would be from that point onward divinae, and a compendium of all the liberal arts. The openness toward classical texts by *Basil of Caesarea in The Exhortation to Young Men on the Way of Gaining Benefit from Pagan Literature is highly speculative and cannot be distinguished from the position of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus in his treatise On the Way of Curing Hellenic Maladies.

Christian young men often had pagan teachers whose teaching was tied to mythology, and one understands well not only the intransigent attitude of *Tertullian (De idololatria 10) but also the intransigent and openly persecutory attitude of *Julian (the Apostate) in prohibiting Christian teachers from teaching in the public schools of the pagan state. Origen's education, as recounted by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VI,2,8-15), concretely describes the formation of a young man, who on the one hand was nourished by traditional studies and on the other hand received an education enriched by well-known biblical teaching.

There were also cases of Christian teachers who were highly regarded by pagans and pagan teachers who boasted of their Christian students: the pagan orator Libanius had a friendship with *Basil of Caesarea and *John Chrysostom; *Themistius, who was also pagan, was the teacher of *Arcadius, the son of the emperor *Theodosius I; *Prohaeresius, a Christian orator of Athens, was the teacher of *Gregory of Nazianzus and the pagan Eunapius. Augustine emphasized for his part the conversion of the famous rhetorician *Marius Victorinus (Conf. VIII,2,5).

From the middle of the 2nd c., Justin, former teacher at Ephesus, had in Rome as a disciple *Tatian, an opponent of Greek culture; at *Alexandria, during the 2nd c., *Pantaenus was the teacher of Clement, the brilliant author of the triptych the Protrepticus, the Paedagogus and the Stromata, which set forth Christ as a guide, a pedagogue and a teacher of humanity. And Origen, who directed the Didaskaleion starting from 204, was a teacher of the enkyklia grammata and philosophy (Eusebius, HE VI,3,3) at Caesarea as well. A witness to his teaching methods was *Gregory Thaumaturgus (see his Thanksgiving for Origen 14,170-15,173, from ca. 238). The natural sciences, geometry and astronomy only served the purpose of illuminating Christian teaching. Only later were the theological schools, communal or individual (see *Apollinaris, *Didymus the Blind, Gregory of Nazianzus: Jerome, Ep. 84,3; 50,1; 52,8), institutionalized.

III. Evolution of the concept of school. Eastern and Western monasticism, starting from the mid-4th c., showed itself in large part hostile to secular culture, and the young people, who were generally orphans, or appointed by someone else's decision to the monastic life, received a purely religious education founded on the sacred books.

But the libraries and the scriptoria "at least until the end of the 6th c. do not allow us to speak of monastic schools replacing or serving as alternatives to secular ones, in which a scholastic cursus was organically established and which were also open to young men who were not destined to the monastic life" (Pricoco).

The effort of giving a rational explanation for the Christian message was not exempt from the risks of syncretism, deriving from the philosophical schools in vogue such as *Platonism, *Aristotelianism and *Stoicism, as Tertullian had already warned (Praescr. VII, 9), but the Hellenism, or better put, a certain syncretism with Hellenism and the religion that lay underneath it, became inevitable and perhaps was a necessary condition for being able to dialogue with the culture of that time.

Around the mid-2nd c., the philosophical schools or the religious gnostic schools spread their message even among Christians (see Col 2:8), as one can perceive from the Christian apologetical treatises that fought against them, even though mixing biblical, philosophical, logical and traditional elements.

Justin Martyr, *Irenaeus of Lyons and Tertullian were the founders of this theological school which was not tied exclusively to the Scriptures.

Irenaeus represented a cultural bridge between Greek and Latin theology and spread the concept of the apostolicity of the church established on the succession of the apostles, i.e., in the final analysis on the principle of authority: the bishop is the guarantor born from the transmission of the revealed truth.

Carthage, on the other side of the Mediterranean, emphasized the authoritative principle for truth, tying it to the monarchical episcopate, because the bishop is appointed directly by God (Cyprian, Ep. 39), and the unity of the church took its origin from the apostle *Peter (Un. 5), the source of the episcopate (even in the purely chronological sense) and the first bishop of Rome (Un. 4,5,251). As a result, communion with Rome became the essential principle of belonging to the universal church (Un. 6).

Already *Ignatius of Antioch had hailed the church of *Rome as a guide of communion in charity. The authority of the bishop—one thinks of the four Latin doctors of the church: *Ambrose, *Augustine, *Jerome and *Gregory the Great, and the four doctors of the Greek Church: *Athanasius, *Basil, *John Chrysostom and *Cyril of Alexandria—was sufficient to create institutionalized groups for teaching and catechesis and was certainly at the origin of what is called the development of dogma, a fundamentally foreign concept to the Bible, which only considered the progress from the OT to the NT. And it is therefore believable that Origen, one of the greatest and most intelligent theologians, who was clearly Platonist in orientation, marked a shift in theology and signified the summit of that great school of Alexandria, which was opposed and exalted at the same time, but nonetheless destined to fame and to making an epic turn in the study of divine revelation. Simply consider that vast avenues of his research regarding the transcendental world (God, the trinitarian mystery, the angels and souls), the historical world (the creation, the first parents of humankind, the economy of the OT, the incarnation of the Savior, resurrection and punishment), the human world (free will, wisdom and imago Dei) and the scriptural world (the interpretation of Scripture, symbolism).

In the West, however, despite the scholastic summae, the Middle Ages were impoverished in culture and institutions that the popular culture favored, because the freedom of research was bound at the beginning by the authoritative rulings of orthodoxy.

Christian philosophy inherited from Greek culture and Christianized the fundamental categories of the way of posing problems and the language and the concepts with which to express them. God is the teacher in the formation of the Christian (Augustine, De magistro 1, 38-46; Thomas Aquinas, Quaestio Disputata De Magistro XI,1-4). Thoroughly imbued with Greco-Roman culture, Augustine ties together ancient philosophy with biblical tradition and the theology of the early Christians. In his work the two worlds merge without making more visible a solution of continuity. Augustine's solution was synthesized in the formula: Crede ut intelligas, intellige ut credas. Faith helps understanding; understanding in turn must put itself at the service of faith. He was greatly indebted to the Greek tradition with respect to the teaching that human formation occurred through an interior way, the teacher of which, following Christian revelation, was Christ.

The Roman schools resisted the barbarian invasions, keeping alive, even in a reduced dimension, the literary culture among the laity, in Italy and Gaul, Spain and North Africa. Carthage maintained its well-known celebrities with such noted figures as *Dracontius, *Felicianus, *Faustus, the teacher of *Luxurius, *Symposius and *Corippus. All this leads one to believe that such schools lasted until the Byzantine reconquest and posed resistance until the Arab conquest of Africa.

In Italy, the school had a moment of glory under *Theodoric, and no one can underestimate the value of *Cassiodorus's work (see also Cassiodorus, Variae IX,21: MGH, Auct. ant. XII,286).

*Justinian with his Pragmatic Sanction from the year 554 devoted his attention to the teachers of grammar, rhetoric, medicine and law. As in the 4th c., the following authors were esp. read in the schools: Virgil, Terence, Horace, Ovid, Tibullus, Lucan, Cicero and *Sallustius; interest, however, for the study of Greek and philosophy seemed to be optional.

In the Greek East the imperial university of *Constantinople did not fade away, which was a prelude to the Byzantine schools. It is true that alongside the schools of the state in the 6th c. there appeared schools within the church for the formation of the clergy with a ratio, which kept very much in mind the Sacred *Scripture, explaining grammatical rules and even metrical rules with examples taken only from Scripture.

But the situation generally sank to such a low level from the cultural point of view that a large mass of illiterate people (illitterati) was pitted against a small number of instructed clerics and a few aristocrats—honestiores—who were also educated by home instructors.

IV. Ancient Christian "exegetical" schools. The term school has been traditionally marked by the particular exegesis of patristic, medieval or modern orientation, summarized in the simplistic formula: literal or allegorical orientation, with one demarcated as proper to the authors of the Antiochene "school" and the other as proper to the Alexandrian "school." It is true that these authors had to their advantage a series of works beginning with ps.-Barnabas, but esp. the exegetical impulse or direction given by the Didaskaleion established by *Pantaenus in Alexandria, following the path, it seems, found in the work of Philo and other Jewish authors. The meaning: somatic or corporeal and psychic or animal were almost overlooked in favor of the pneumatic or spiritual sense, with bold allegories that left even their contemporaries confused.

It is true that Origen's use of allegory did not overlook literal analysis, as one can observe from the Hexapla, but his successors, though in a varying and waning manor—whether in Alexandria, with

*Didymus the Blind and Cyril, or in Caesarea, with *Eusebius, or in Cappadocia with *Gregory of Nyssa, *Gregory of Nazianzus and *Basil, who constituted a sort of Alexandrian subschool—come close to their fierce opponents such as the polemical authors *Methodius of Olympus and *Epiphanius of Salamis.

Contemporaneous to the Didaskaleion is the other catechetical school of Antioch, which was established, it seems, by *Lucian martyr, who was fiercely attached to the literal explanation with few concessions to the messianic "types," which could boast of great individuals such as *Eustathius, *Theodore of Heraclea, *Titus of Bostra, *Eusebius of Emesa, *Polychronius of Apamea, but esp. *Diodore of Tarsus, *John Chrysostom, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, the most rationalist and antiallegorical commentator. Other authors who would likewise attest the importance of the Antiochene school were *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and the Syriac authors *Aphraates and *Ephrem.

Latin Christian authors such as *Victorinus of Petovium and *Hilary of Poitiers in large part remained slaves of their scarce mastery of Greek and therefore showed themselves on the whole to be allegorists and Origenists. *Ambrose was not known for speculative allegorism as much as for an account of an ethical and aesthetic nature, which nevertheless thwarted the "historical" data, or what was considered such, of the Bible, resulting in tortuous and not always clear moral reductions. The following authors, however, are exceptions: the strong personalities of *Ambrosiaster, Jerome, Augustine (only partially), and even *Pelagius. Afterward began and multiplied the dry collections, anthologies and florilegia of the works of earlier Christian authors, and gradually Christian scholarship entered the scholastic phase, with the dominance, apart from a few authors, of only the authoritative interpretation of the scriptural text.

M. Roger, L'enseignement des lettres classiques d'Ausone à Alcuin, Paris 1905; A. Müller, Studentenleben im 4. Jahrhundert n. Chr.: Philologus 69 (1910) 292-317; C. Barbagallo, Lo Stato e l'istruzione pubblica nell'Impero romano, Catania 1911; H. Pirenne, De l'état de l'instruction des laïques à l'époque mérovingienne: RBen 46 (1934) 165-177; G. Bardy, L'Église et l'enseignement au IV^e^ siècle: RSR 14 (1934) 525-549 and 15 (1935) 1-27; L. Bréhier, L'enseignement classique et l'enseignement religieux à Byzance: RHPhR 21 (1941) 34-69; A. Lorcin, La vie scolaire dans les monastères d'Irlande aux V^e^-VII^e^ siècles: Rev. du Moyen-Âge Latin 1 (1945) 221-236; P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris [2]1948; M. Pavan, La crisi della scuola nel IV sec. d.C., Bari 1952; G. Bardy, Les origines des écoles monastiques en Occident: SE 5 (1953) 86-104; Id., Les origines des écoles monastiques en Orient, in Mélanges J. de Ghellinck, Gembloux 1951, I, 293-309; Ch. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique, Paris 1955; G. Downey, Education in the Christian Roman Empire: Christian and Pagan Theories Under Costantine and His Successors: Speculum 32 (1957) 48-61; J. Leclercq, L'amour des lettres et le désir de Dieu, Paris 1957 (It. tr. Cultura umanistica e desiderio di Dio, Florence 1965); P. Riché, La survivance des écoles publiques en Gaule au V^e^ siècle: MA 43 (1957) 421-436; S. Dill, Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire, New York [2]1958; H.I. Marrou, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris [2]1978 (It. tr. Sant'Agostino e la fine della cultura antica, Milan 1987); J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique de l'Espagne wisigothique, Paris 1959; P. Riché, Éducation et Culture dans l'Occident barbare VI^e^-VII^e^ siècles, Paris 1962 (It. tr. Rome 1966); var. aus., Los monjes y los estudios, IV Semana de estudios monásticos, Poblet 1963; H.I. Marrou, Histoire de l'éducation dans l'antiquité, Paris [2]1964 (It. tr. Rome [3]1978); Centri e vie di irradiazione della civiltà nell'Alto Medioevo, Settimane . . . Spoleto 11 (1964); P. Blomenkamp, Erziehung: RAC 6, 502-559; B.C. Hardy, The Emperor Julian and His School Law: ChHist 37 (1968) 131-143; Erziehung und Bildung in der heidn. und christli. Antike, ed. H.Th. Johann, Darmstadt 1976; V. Paladini, L'istruzione nel mondo classico, Naples 1968; Arts libéraux et philosophie au Moyen Âge, Actes du IV^e^ Congrès Int. de philos., Montréal 1969; P. Lemerle, Le premier humanisme byzantin, Paris 1971; La scuola nell'Occidente latino nell'Alto Medioevo, Settimane . . . Spoleto 19 (1972); A. Di Berardino, Maestri cristiani del III secolo nell'insegnamento classico: Augustinianum 12 (1972) 549-556; A. Quacquarelli, Scuola e cultura dei primi secoli cristiani, Brescia 1974; La cultura antica nell'Occidente latino dal VII all'XI secolo: Settimane . . . Spoleto 22 (1975); J. Préaux, Securus Melior Felix, l'ultime "orator urbis Romae," in Corona Gratiarum . . . Dekkers, Bruges 1975, II, 101-121; Église et enseignement: Actes du Colloque du X^e^ anniversaire de l'Inst. d'hist. du christ. de l'Univ. libre de Brussels, ed. J. Préaux, Brussels 1977; J. Bowen, Storia dell'educazione occidentale, It. tr., I, Milan 1979; P. Riché, Les écoles et l'enseignement dans l'Occident chrétien de la fin du V^e^ siècle au milieu du XI^e^ siècle, Paris 1979; M. Falanga, La scuola elementare nell'antica Roma, Rome 1979; S. Pricoco, L'editto di Giuliano sui maestri (CTh 13,3,5): Orpheus 1 (1980) 348-370; M. Pavan, La scuola nel Tardo Antico, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, Atti del conv. di Rome 12-16 novembre 1979, Rome 1981, 553-560; P. Riché, L'école dans le Haut Moyen Âge, ibid., 561-574; G. Mialaret (ed.), Histoire mondiale de l'éducation, Paris 1981 (It. tr. Rome 1986-88); S.F. Bonner, Education in Ancient Rome: From the Elder Cato to the Younger Pliny, London 1977 (It. tr., L'educazione nell'antica Roma da Catone il censore a Plinio il giovane, Rome 1986); J. Rejmer, De Alexandria Aegyptia eiusque civitate temporibus Origenis florente: Meander 41 (1986) 443-458; Christliche Antike / ausgewählt & komm. von D. Schmitz & M. Wissemann, Frankfurt a.M. 1993; ANRW, ed. W. Haase, Berlin-New York 1993; A. Grilli, Uno scritto sull'educazione dei ragazzi alle soglie del neoplatonismo, in Italia sul Baetis: studi di storia romana in memoria di Fernando Gascó, ed. E. Gabba - P. Desideri - S. Roda, Turin 1996, 103-114; G. Bockisch, Die Rhetorik in der Bildungsdiskussion, AU 39 (1996) 6-18; D.W. Roller, Augustan Literary Circles and Herod the Great: JAC 11 (1996) 57-64; R. Frasca, Educazione e formazione a Roma, Bari 1996; R. Cribiore, Writing, Teachers, and Students in Graeco-Roman Egypt, Atlanta 1996; M. Caltabiano, Litterarum numen, Rome 1996; A.K. Gavrilov, Techniques of Reading in Classical Antiquity: CQN.S. 47 (1997) 56-73; T. Banchich - A. Van den Hoek, The "Catechetical" School of Early Christian Alexandria and Its Philonic Heritage: HThR 90 (1997) 59-87; B. Rochette, Le latin dans le monde grec, Brussels 1997; J. Rossel, Aux racines de l'Europe occidentale, Bâle 1995; Th. Schmitz, Bildung und Macht, Munich 1997; K. Vössing, Schule und Bildung im Nordafrika der römischen

Kaiserzeit, Brussels 1997; A. Cucchiarelli, "Allegoria retorica" e filologia alessandrina: SIFC3a ser. 15 (1997) 210-230; B. Legras, Éducation et culture dans le monde grec, Paris 1998; G.M. Vian, La tradizione filologica alessandrina tra giudaismo e cristianesimo: Cassiodorus 4 (1998) 187-197; T.J. Morgan, Literate Education in the Hellenistic and Roman Worlds, Cambridge-New York 1998; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Enciclopedismo e sapere cristiano tra tardo-antico e alto Medioevo [It. tr. A. Granata], Milan 1999; A. Grilli, Politica, cultura e filosofia in Roma antica, Naples 2000; H. Gregory, Teachers and Texts in the Ancient World, London 2000; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville, Turnhout 2000; A.R. Millard, Reading and Writing in the Time of Jesus, Sheffield 2000; R. Cribriore, Gymnastic of the Mind: Greek Education in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt, Princeton, NJ 2001; N. Henck, Constantius' "paideia," Intellectual Milieu and Promotion of the Liberal Arts: PCPhS 47 (2001) 172-186; J.M. Blázquez, La Academia de Atenas como foco de formación humanística para paganos y cristianos: Gerión 19 (2001) 595-628; T. Schmeller, Schulen im Neuen Testament?: zur Stellung des Urchristentums in der Bildungswelt seiner Zeit, Freiburg i.B. 2001; C.A. McNelis, Greek Grammarians and Roman Society During the Early Empire: CLA 21 (2002) 67-94.

B. Amata

SCILLITAN MARTYRS. Twelve martyrs who were later referred to with the title "Scillitan"; their individual names were as follows: Speratus, Nartzalus, Cittinus, Donata, Secunda, Laetantius, Vestia, Veturius, Felix, Aquilinus, Januaria and Generosa. They came from *Scilli, an unidentified place in Proconsular *Africa, but the location does not correspond to Cillium (Kassérine, Tunisia). Apart from the fact that they underwent martyrdom on 17 July 180, nothing is known of their life. The Acts of their martyrdom have been preserved (BHL 7527) and are among the best documents of the African hagiographic literature. The different recensions (BHL 7528-7534) illustrate very well the events through which an authentic text can be transmitted. At a later period, a basilica was built on their tomb, the name of which is often found in antiquity (Aug., Serm. 155 and perhaps Serm. 37, Denis 16, Guelf. 30; Vict. Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. prov. 1,9). On their feast day, *Augustine preached a sermon in their honor, from which we gather that on this occasion the account of their martyrdom was read to the people (the same sermon cited, and Guelf. 31, Lambot 9). The feast is also mentioned in the Mart. hier. and in the Calendarium Carth.; only the name of Speratus, however, appears in the Marble Calendar of *Naples.

We know that in Africa a basilica was built in their honor at the monastery of Biguas (BHL 4906). Some of their relics were preserved at Kherbet Oum el Ahdam in 359 (CIL 8, 20600), and at Dermech, near *Carthage. The bodies were transferred to France at the time of Charlemagne and laid to rest in the basilica of St. *John at Lyons (BHL 2045).

DACL 15, 1014-1021; Vies des SS. 7, 378-381; LTK 9, 551-552; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III^e^ s., Rome 1969, 309; Id., Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 31-34; Id., Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 185-186, 203, 213, 226, 317; G. Lanata, Gli Atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 136-144; F. Ruggiero, Il problema del numero dei martiri scilitani: Cristianesimo nella Storia 9 (1988) 135-152; H.A. Gärtner, Die Acta Scillitanorum in literarischer Interpretation: WS 102 (1989) 149-167; P.-I. Fransen, Les martyrs scillitains: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 89 (2003) 53-56.

V. Saxer

SCOTLAND. For Scotland, as for the rest of Great Britain, scholars do not know for certain about the origins of Christianity and the first steps completed by missionaries who introduced it there. The most ancient historical Scottish sources, however—drawing on the ancient litanies—mention that at the beginning of the 3rd c., around the year 203, Pope *Victor, in attempts to evangelize those lands far away, sent some missionaries. The first clear evidence of Christianity in Scotland, however, is represented in the history of St. *Ninian, who was born around the year 360 in the SW part of the country and went to *Rome to study and to be consecrated bishop by Pope *Siricius. Once he had returned to Scotland at the beginning of the 5th c., he established the first stone church in Candida Casa (today Whithorn), dedicating it to St. *Martin, where he himself was later buried (see Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. III,4). Upon his death, in 432, his successor in the delicate duty of evangelization of those lands that were hostile to the Christian was *Palladius, the apostle of Ireland, who after more than twenty years of preaching died in a place close to Aberdeen, later called Fordunn, where his cult still survives.

After having founded some monasteries in *Ireland, as the Venerable *Bede himself bears witness (III,4), *Columba came to Scotland around the year 563, along with twelve companions, and went to Iona (an island off SW Scotland) to organize the construction of an important monastery, which later had the privilege of becoming an abbey and was always considered the most important of all the Irish and Scottish monastic dwellings. Although Columba evangelized the Picts of the N, the duty of bringing the faith into the SW regions of Scotland was completed by Kentigern, who died around 612 after having become the first bishop of Glasgow, and the E regions were deeply marked by the work of *Cuthbert, concerning whose life and miracles Bede provided extensive information (IV,26-32).

The *Celtic church was tribal and monastic in its organization, and its monks, many of whom lived in the rigidly eremitic style, were well-known for their extreme austerity and for their scrupulous adherence to the Celtic traditions (e.g., in the celebration of *Easter), an aspect which inevitably led to tensions with the influence of *Augustine of Canterbury's mission when his *Roman uses began to become widespread and accepted in N England. Gradually, Scotland began to conform to the Roman rite, esp. after having been encouraged by the bishop of Iona, *Adamnan (d. 704); and in 710 the king of the Picts, Nechtan, as Bede carefully notes (V,21), imposed on all his kingdom conformity to the Roman tradition.

G. Donaldson, Scotland: Church and Nation Through Sixteen Centuries, London 1960; W.C. Dickinson - G.S. Pryde, A New History of Scotland, I-II, New York 1962; J.H.S. Burleigh, A Church History of Scotland, Oxford 1964.

M. Ghilardi

SCRIBE – RABBI. In the Jewish world the term scribe originally referred to a secretary with civil (2 Sam 8:17; 20:25) or military duties (2 Kgs 25:19). From the time of Ezra the term referred to an expert in the Torah (Ezra 7:6, 11); as such, Ezra read to the gathered people the Torah of *Moses, which was given by the Lord to Israel.

In the postbiblical age, the expert in matters of religious law and tradition was called "rabbi"; the rabbi traced his origins and authority to Moses through an uninterrupted chain of transmitters. The title was conferred with a religious ceremony (semikhah = χειροτονία), which, after being prohibited by the Romans, went into disuse. With the dominance of the Pharisaic party after AD 70, the rabbis, who were not priests, replaced the scribes as spiritual guides.

The scribes, in a Roman context (Gk. grammateus), were generally secretaries of public officials and magistrates with duties, and even of private individuals. The scribe is to be distinguished from the librarius (as well as the scriba librarius), who was a simple copyist. Even the emperors had their own scribes (scriba ab epistolis etc.). The scribes were organized into groups. The term was also used in an ecclesiastical context (see *notarius).

EC 11, 172-173; DACL 15, 1027-1035; PWK 21, 848-857; DAGR 4, 1123-1124; J. Neusner, Early Rabbinic Judaism, Leiden 1975.

S. Cavalletti

SCRIPTURE, HOLY.

I. The canon - II. Versions and MSS - III. Inspiration - IV. Function of the Bible in the church.

I. The canon. That the Word of God was transmitted to his people as Sacred Scripture is something that the Christian community inherited from Judaism. Early Christian doctrinal reflection had not defined all its forms; and neither Jesus nor the apostles subordinated revelation to the scholastic ideas of the scribes and teachers of the law, ideas that the latter group would reaffirm when, after the fall of Jerusalem, Jews and Judaism closed ranks. The Hebrew Bible (which was also written in Aramaic in a very small part) was then definitively closed, with the Torah (Pentateuch) having a normative priority, with some rigorous translations for its legal interpretation. As early as *Philo, but in an entirely different spirit, the Pentateuch was the only text to be commented on. At Qumran, however, the book of Isaiah had a central role. The gospels latched onto prophetic freedom: throughout the entire NT the book of Isaiah and the Psalms enjoyed pride of place. Apocryphal literature performed a certain task not so much as a new category of holy books as much as an eschatological and messianic climate conferring unity to the prophecies. And this Galilean mentality was not lacking parallels in the Jewish diaspora, in which the apostle *Paul was reared.

The writings that make up the NT were not originally conceived by their authors as a complementary collection to be added to the Hebrew canon. The churches took care to preserve the apostolic epistles, even if the quality and the activity of the editor remain unknown: many historians have assigned to these editors an editorial role that cannot be ignored. With respect to the words and miracles of Jesus, we possess three redactions, but the early documents to which Luke alludes have been lost; moreover, to this was added the fourth gospel, which came from a special milieu. Since the beginning of the 2nd c., *Ignatius of Antioch showed that he was acquainted with many of these texts, but without citing them as an authority; in the mid-2nd c., *Justin Martyr mentions that they were read during the *liturgy; nonetheless, it is only *Irenaeus who seems to have understood them to be coherent, canonized and fixed. The polemic against the claims of the *gnostics to have secret traditions, and against those of *Marcion of choosing and correcting texts, and of rejecting the Hebrew Scriptures, contributed to reinforcing the awareness of the privilege reserved for the writings considered apostolic, depending on the reception they received within the main churces and taking into account internal criteria of reliability and orthodoxy. Because no central authority had defined the canon of Scripture, each church created particular uses of the Scriptures: Syria, e.g., read the gospel in the Diatessaron. But the force of fraternal communion slowly tended toward uniformity, although qualified intellectuals (e.g., Origen, Eusebius, Jerome) led the bishops and the faithful in their choices. Although rejecting the suspect apocryphal books, many for a long time admitted a category of books which were edifying but not normative. The perplexities, which in the 2nd c. had as their object such important texts as the gospel of *John or the gospels or the apocryphal Acts, were reduced in the 4th c. to certain writings which are found toward the end of the modern-day NT (the epistle to the Hebrews, the Catholic Epistles and the book of Revelation). The question of their apostolic origin remained particularly thorny. With respect to the OT, there were few church fathers who called into question the authority of the deuterocanonical books; and those who, like *Jerome, claimed to align themselves with the Jews and rejected these books, found no resonance among the Christian faithful. The Christian art of the catacombs allotted an extraordinary priority to the deuterocanonical legends: the three youths in the furnace or Daniel in the lion's den, or even a later account, although canonical, such as that of *Jonah. However, it is possible to identify how the citations of the Fathers demonstrate a predilection for more foundational biblical passages.

Certain authors such as *Basil of Caesarea, who at the same time used almost all the writings of our canon, generally limit their biblical sources to a rather restricted list. The history of the canon is therefore much less uniform than what scholars would sometimes have us believe. Explicit lists of biblical books upon which one can base a list of canonical texts for a given council or church father are rather rare. One of the most important documents for defining the tradition and which wound up imposing itself on others was a list authoritatively compiled by *Athanasius of Alexandria in 367 (The Paschal letter 39). The bishop was thinking less of the universal church but more for his own flock, esp. the monks, who continually drew edification from pious apocryphal texts. This list, however, automatically became widely read. In the West one is struck by the fact that there was an anonymous author, in the 6th c., who sought to reject, in the so-called Decretum Gelasianum*, a long and ordered list of apocryphal texts. In fact, the Greek and Latin copyists allowed these texts to pass away, or in any case, poorly transmitted them, which, however, the *Coptic, *Syriac, Arabic and esp. the *Ethiopian churches have better preserved.

Just as even Slavic literature (after the 9th c.) is well furnished in this area, one must hold that certain Greek circles for a long time transmitted this literary production. They rarely preserved heterodox texts, but rather a Jewish Christian or *encratic literature, which was more popular than clerical.

II. Versions and MSS. Access to the original Semitic texts of the OT is the privilege of a few scholars. The NT, written in Greek, cites primarily the classic translation of Hellenistic Judaism, which has come to be called the Septuagint (LXX), although a number of citations unrelated to this version could trace back to some Aramaic Targums, or often to some of the testimonia already recast and adapted to their Christian function. Since the 1st c., Judaism, which had closed in on itself, rejected the LXX and produced new Greek versions, some elements of which must have contaminated a good portion of the MSS of the LXX. The spread of Christianity then led to a progressive translation effort into Latin, Coptic and Syriac; their origins are obscure because the first steps were hesitant, partial and imperfect. Nevertheless, there remain some ancient texts that reflect a social context of the rather conventional culture. They are often related to the textual forms described as Western, because they were first known in Latin (*Cyprian) but which likewise circulated in Syria and which had been poorly preserved in Greek.

The importance of "chosen passages," the testimonia, in early Christian literature leads one to think that completed books were not easy to acquire or perhaps easy to use. A fact of pure library technology—i.e., the replacement of the scroll (volumen) with the codex, in which the pages followed one after another as in our modern-day books—is nonetheless connected to the spread of the Christian Bible and suggests the existence of a vast market of readers that was separated from the old cultural conventions and desirous of consulting, and even of leafing through, the sacred books.

The study of variants demonstrates that the texts were continually reelaborated in recensions that were conscientious of grammar and also Attic purity; they introduced reminiscences of parallel passages or traditions more or less historical (the Western text); or, on the contrary, they were inspired by secular philology and systematically reverted to purer models (the Alexandrian text). The versions were then so full of corrections that they were no longer intelligible; some adhered strictly to the original, and others had the pretext of greater correctness and linguistic purity. Therefore critical editions must master a large quantity of variants, in which the accidental corruptions count for very little; it is a rather secular endeavor of piety and culture.

J. van Haelst's Catalogue des papyrus littéraires juifs et chrétiens (Paris 1976) lists 567 biblical papyri (plus 50 fragments of apocryphal texts). Most have been recently discovered, which materially attests to the forms under which Scripture circulated. Textual criticism classifies both these ancient fragments of MSS that have been preserved (in all languages) and the patristic citations of the scriptural texts. This science must distinguish the editorial action of the great centers of learning (above all *Alexandria, then *Antioch, *Rome, *Edessa, *Jerusalem and many others) and identify the rare documents that have escaped these adjustments to the texts.

Many peculiarities that are attributed to whim, if one considers them to be isolated, assume a precise meaning when the framework is reconstructed. The work becomes even easier when it concerns biblical versions and when the translation variants notably increase the really different readings and feature a quotation.

III. Inspiration. No one theory was elaborated with respect to the inspiration of Scripture, nor was it imposed on reflection: the authority of the Bible was an unquestioned fact. The gnostics, who contested it, placed themselves by that very reason outside the Christian faith. The idea of an ancient and mysterious wisdom, hidden in the sacred books, was rather widespread, in an era which A. Festugière characterized as the decline of rationalism and the mode of the Eastern prophets (La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, I, Paris 1944, 1-44), during which respect for the Bible easily acquired excessive forms: a magical stick could extract all the gnosis one could desire. Because the cultural context was entirely different from the one in which the OT and the NT was edited, the reader ran into many problems, even more so if he had an education based on the training of classical humanism: the anthropomorphisms, the Jewish rites, moral examples, the historical references, the lexicon and the syntax. The work of *Philo and his refined algorithm supplied a valuable model. Moreover, Jesus and Paul had questioned the value of the Mosaic law, and this was verified with Christianity's break from Judaism. Very early on an author like *Barnabas (cf. the epistle to the Hebrews) would be led to deny the literal sense of the ancient precepts in favor of a radically spiritual exegesis. Already before *Irenaeus, an intelligent gnostic like *Ptolemy (Lettre à Flora, ed. G. Quispel, SC 24bis, Paris 1966) was able to propose some distinctions which were very often pertinent. The simple faith of the people, the weight of the lived tradition, the healthy framing of the Christian tradition and the analogy of faith, the responsibility of the bishops, and the charisms of the saints assured the church of the royal road, upon which the fathers of the church such as *Origen, Jerome, *John Chrysostom, *Augustine and many others had walked, with the help of strong literary preparation, dialogue with rabbinical learning, and the incentive of preaching.

All the sacred authors of the OT and the NT were inclined toward the prophetic books; even the primary characteristic of the Holy Spirit was for a long time to speak through their mouth, and precisely to him was attributed the inspiration of the fullness of truth. As a result, it was not easy to lead people to believe that one sole explanation of the biblical text could suffice to exhaust its divine meaning. Little attention was given to distinguishing between what the human author intended directly within the horizon of his own time and the interpretations that could be given by his intuition within the matrix of other cultures, just as no distinction was made between the biblical affirmation of a fact of the history of salvation from the countless metaphysical analyses that theology could give of it. Origen (and other church fathers after him) loved to emphasize the absurdity of a literal explanation, which was based on various ways of speaking that were proper to Semites and from that fact deduced the necessity of a more subtle treatment of Scripture. If statements of this type surprise modern readers, they did not prevent the early church from taking into account literary and historical context; they were sufficiently familiar with the biblical languages to take into consideration many philological phenomena and to understand, in its inner essence, the moral or mystical terminology of the prophets and the apostles. The literary *schools of antiquity were difficult to match. Whether or not, through their exegetical formation, the Fathers depended one on the other (Basil and *Gregory of Nazianzus, e.g., in the Philocalia united the best pages from Origen's writings on the interpretation of the Bible), it would be a misunderstanding of them if we attempted to explain them as simple scholastic routines, because each one of these authors had his own secular literary formation. When we observe one of their reactions toward the abuses of allegorism, the cause often resides in the hostility toward an ambiguous gnosticism, which presumed to derive far-fetched philosophies from the text.

There was such a strong conviction that wisdom could not have a source apart from biblical revelation that the majority of Platonizing theologians maintained that the teachers of Greek religious philosophy had drawn on the writings of Moses. The controversies with a *Celsus, a *Porphyry, a *Julian, all defenders of pagan culture, forced Christian authors in this direction. This question, however, was not so important for those Christian authors who used philosophy, by subordinating it entirely to faith.

IV. Function of the Bible in the church. The liturgy of the word, which is associated with a psalmody of praise or with the Eucharist, is a communal activity, the absence of which is hard to conceive of in any church. Its primary scope is to manifest the presence of Christ in believers. It spontaneously recalls a homiletic element, which explains the literal meaning, and esp. shows the relation of the text with the gospel of Jesus Christ. The prophets, after the manner of those at Corinth, must have also put the history of salvation to a lyrical tone, in the same way in which an *Ephrem used Scripture; the rhythmic prose of a *Melito of Sardis and many others gives us an idea of this practice for the Greek world, in which the heavy encumbrance of classic versification paralyzed poetic inspiration for a long time (e.g., *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Apollinaris of Laodicea). Apologetics (against the Jews, against the Greeks) and the struggles against heresies usually led Christian authors to resort to a discussion of Scripture.

*Hippolytus was probably the first to attempt systematic commentaries for certain biblical passages and an entire book, as e.g. Daniel. Origen, who, in a very learned context, was able to undertake a scientific study of the text (see Hexapla*), devoted himself to cycles of homilies on the entire content of a biblical book, and as well to lengthy, systematic written commentaries. He found models and catalysts in some gnostic works, esp. on the first chapters of the book of Genesis.

If the greatest Fathers were, evidently, familiar with the Bible and, as it seems, knew it by heart, we would also like to know to what extent a private reading of Scripture was practiced. The resistance that a new version (as in the case of the Vulgate) could meet leads us to suppose that numerous formulas of earlier translations had penetrated into the minds of Christian people. It is also a fact that during the *Diocletian persecution there was a hunt for Bibles and that the *martyrs, when at times the MSS were taken away from them, rejoiced at preserving the word of God in their hearts.

Many thousands of titles are carefully noted in the pages dedicated to the entry Bibel (G. Wanke; E. Plümacher; W. Schneemelcher; H. Karpp; K. Aland; S.P. Brock ecc.) in TRE 6, 1-377.

A. von Campenhausen, Die Entstehung der christl. Bibel, Göttingen 1968; P.F. Ackroyd - C.F. Evans, The Cambridge History of the Bible, I, Cambridge 1970. La Biblia Patristica, Paris 1975-2000, collects and places in order all of the patristic references to the Bible; seven volumes have appeared, pertaining to Philo of Alexandria and the 1st-4th c., which have allowed scholars to make enormous progress in the study of the Bible in the writings of the Fathers.

The most recent works on the canon of Scripture: H.Y. Gamble, The New Testament Canon, Philadelphia 1985; B.M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament: Its Origin, Development and Significance, Oxford 1989; E. Earle Ellis, The Old Testament in Early Christianity: Canon and Interpretation in the Light of Modern Research, Tübingen 1991; M. Tardieu (ed.), La Formation des canons scripturaires, Paris 1993; L.M. McDonald, The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon, Peabody, MA 1995; J.W. Miller, The Origins of the Bible: Rethinking Canon History, New York 1997; N.F. Marcos, The Septuagint in Context: Introduction to the Greek Version of the Bible, Leiden 2001; L.M. McDonald - J.A. Sanders, The Canon Debate, Peabody, MA 2002; J.-M. Auwers - H.J. De Jonge, The Biblical Canons, Leuven 2003.

J. Gribomont

SCRIPTURE, HOLY (Ancient Versions)

I. Greek translations - II. Latin translations - III. Aramaic versions - IV. Syriac versions - V. Between East and West: Crossroad churches of cultures.

I. Greek translations. The most ancient translation of the Bible was in the Greek language and dates back to the 3rd c. BC. The translation was made for Jews in *Egypt who no longer understood Hebrew. It was called the Septuagint (LXX) because a legend attributed it to 72 Jewish scribes-translators (who then became 70) who had come from *Jerusalem. The initial term referred to the Torah, i.e., to that part of the Bible which would subsequently be called the Pentateuch by Christians. Today scholars discuss the reasons that justified a similar work. According to some, the initiative was undertaken by the king of *Alexandria Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–246 BC) and by some scholars who, desiring to enrich the library of Alexandria with the Torah of the Jews, asked for its translation into Greek. The *Letter of Aristeas written in 150–100 BC is not of much historical value and probably recounts only a legend, but there are some elements of truth to it. Seventy-two scribes-translators (six for each one of the tribes of Israel), who lived an exemplary life, experts in Hebrew and Greek, were invited upon the request of the king by the high priest Eleazar of Jerusalem to Alexandria, Egypt. The Letter of Aristeas, despite being a forgery, intended to justify the validity of this translation. According to others the translation was necessary for the needs of the Jewish community which no longer understood Hebrew, and therefore the motive was rather liturgical. According to others, moreover, it would have belonged to the missionary tradition of Israel. Israel's task was that of proclaiming the one God, i.e., of making universal the sovereignty of the sole Kyrios. It was certainly an important work for many reasons, e.g., for the history of *Hellenistic Judaism and Christian origins. The first part to be translated into Greek was the Torah, i.e., the first five books of the Bible; then little by little the translation of the other books after the example of the Pentateuch. Because the Jews had begun at the beginning of our era to accept the Hebrew text which they consider to be the original, this gradually became a "standard" text for the synagogue. Destined to become the official text, the so-called Masoretic text (MT) was at times different from that text which the 70 translators translated. The need was therefore felt in the Jewish milieu of revising the Greek text acc. to the official Hebrew text.

There were then revisions by Christians. The most famous was that of Origen of Alexandria in the 3rd c, which was called the Hexapla, because it used six columns: (1) Hebrew text, (2) into Greek letters, (3) *Aquila, (4); *Symmachus, (5) the Septuagint and (6) *Theodotion. While Christianity was growing and the NT was being edited, the Bible that the Christians called the OT was the Greek Bible of the Septuagint. In the first four to five centuries of the Common Era, the Septuagint was the biblical text of reference for the Christian churches without recourse to the original Hebrew. It was considered divinely inspired. In its Greek literalness it then supplied Christians those citations which with the NT were the foundation of the doctrines, the expression of piety and the forms of the Christian liturgy. Early Christianity owed to the Greek translation a good part of its language.

This translation also had a hermeneutical interest: it not only translated but also interpreted the Hebrew text, causing the meaning of the revelation of the OT to progress and creating an entire vocabulary which is today studied for its influence in theology, liturgy, prayer and spirituality.

The discoveries at *Qumran were also very important for the understanding of the Septuagint. Here were found Hebrew and Greek MSS. Some fragments from Qumran corresponded to the Greek model translated from the Septuagint. Therefore, the Greek version can lead us to know a more ancient biblical text, as venerable as the one received today as normative.

This translation is important, moreover, for Greek philology: the person who studies the evolution of the Greek language and the papyri and the inscriptions of the Hellenistic era sees the language of the Septuagint within this evolution: the Jewish Greek of Alexandria is not a Jewish dialect even if it contains many Semitisms. It preceded the Greek of the NT and occupied a place in the general history of the Greek language.

The LXX was important for the history of Christian origins: the birth of Christianity occurred within Jewish currents of thought that were contemporary to Jesus: the Septuagint translation was one of the data that expressed the religious ideas of this cultural context. The NT inserted itself in the evolution of the Jewish religion, for which it signals a change.

Jerome, by translating the Hebrew text that he preferred, knew well that the Greek translation of the LXX could bear witness to the state of this even more ancient text; he still did not have a sufficient notion of the multiple forms of the Hebrew text. But by only using the translations of the Bible made from the Hebrew, Christians ignored the most ancient sources of their religious history: the faith in one universal God implies that the words of revelation can reach in an authentic way every people and every tongue: is it possible to think that there exists in the world only one sacred language: Hebrew? Would vernacular languages be capable of expressing the divinely inspired words? The Bible, however, has the vocation of being translated, for all peoples, in every moment of their history. Christians associate their faith to the language in which they received the Word of God.

Certainly a translation holds for a certain time and for a given people. That time can be long: many centuries, when the language of the people becomes relatively stable, as Latin was in the Middle Ages for the clergy. It can be a shorter period of time when the world of reception undergoes a swift mutation, as was the case in the Roman era with the passage from Greek to Latin in the entire Roman Empire. Recent studies in Catholic scholarship have brought to light a fact that has been overlooked in the past. To understand the authors of the NT, one must study the cultural context in which these writings were composed. The ancient translations, esp. the Aramaic and Greek ones, constitute a permanent hermeneutic bridge between the OT and the NT. The people to whom Jesus spoke understood the Hebrew Bible through Aramaic and Greek translation. The authors of the NT benefited from the felicitous interpretations of the Alexandrian Jews both because they used the Greek translation and because they addressed a public that spoke and thought in Greek.

S.P. Brock - C.T. Frisch - S. Jellicoe, A Classified Bibliography of the Septuagint, Leiden 1973; M. Harl - G. Dorival - O. Munnich, La Bible d'Alexandrie, Paris 1986-; M. Cimosa, Guida allo stu- dio della Bibbia greca (LXX), Rome 1995; C. Dogniez, A Bibliography for the Septuagint: 1970-1993, Leiden 1995; M. Müller, The First Bible of the Church. A Plea for the Septuagint, JSOTSup 206, Sheffield 1996; N. Fernández Marcos, Introducción a las versiones griegas de la Biblia, Madrid [2]1998; M. Hengel, The Septuagint as Christian Scripture, Edinburgh-New York 2002.

II. Latin translations. The gradual and then definitive spread of the Latin language in the place of the Greek language in the world conquered by Rome allowed Christians to understand the necessity of the translations of the Sacred Scriptures even in Latin. Today the Bible that the Latin Fathers were accustomed to call the vetus editio, antiqua translatio, or vulgata editio, we call the Vetus Latina or the Ancient Latin versions or the Old Latin (as it is called in the English-speaking world)—all those translations in the popular Latin language not belonging to *Jerome and that date back to an era of the first fathers of the Latin church. These translations represent a very ancient Greek model of the Bible; they allow one to understand the origin of Christianity in the West and had much influence in the formulation of patristic theology when the Vulgate did not exist. But the term Vulgate, however, starting from the 16th c., was understood to refer to the most widespread Latin biblical text which became "common," as suggested by the Latin term itself, starting from the Carolingian era. This pertains not only to some of the translations made by Jerome of the Hebrew text but also the revisions that he made of the Latin versions already existing. Jerome and the Vulgate therefore are not the same thing. This is a prejudice from which modern students must still free themselves. In the use of the Latin fathers, however, including Jerome, the term "Vulgate" (koinē, "common") is applied to the Greek Bible in the current text, unrevised, and therefore in opposition to the learned edition of Origen and to the corrupted Latin text in use in the 4th c. From the 16th c. onward the term was used in reference to the Latin Bible; at the time of the Fathers, however, no decision had been made to give an official character to the translations of Jerome. Only the memory of Pope *Damasus in the prologue on the gospels was able to bestow authority even to the remaining part.

Subsequently, probably at the mid-5th c., Jerome's translations were supplemented by others and put together by an editor who used the terminology of *Rufinus of Aquileia. This compilation was then preserved in the Bible of Saint-Germain-des-Prés (Paris, BNF lat 11553, ca. AD 800), the Parisian Bible. The so-called Vulgate of Jerome was formed around the year 400. Mediocrity and multiplicity characterized the Latin versions of that particular historical period. Jerome was the heir of a large classical literary culture and, having gone to live in the East as a monk, was also able to enter more deeply in knowledge of the Greek text. Jerome revised the gospels in the East acc. to the best Greek MSS. These Roman revisions are explained in contact with the Jewish and Greek traditions. In actuality, his biblical adventure began with a gesture of trust by Pope Damasus, who in the spring of 384, the same year of his death, asked him to complete a revision of the existing Latin text of the gospels. It is possible to see this fact in the preface and in the dedication to Damasus of his revision of the Latin text of the NT. During his stay at *Rome (382–385) he revised the gospels, using a model of the European type, and correcting the texts of the Vetus Latina most likely acc. to the Greek MSS of the koinē. Pope Damasus looked with favor on the dedication that some authorities bestowed on this venture, which nevertheless was insufficient to give an official character to this undertaking, because Jerome, as is said in this letter, was virtually constrained to do this work at the pope's request. He thus guarded against possible criticisms on the value of his work. It seems in fact that it is the work of a novice who is learning to translate from one language into another, even if on the whole it seems to be a work of good quality. Living for many years at Bethlehem, he was also able to consult the library of Caesarea and Origen's Hexapla. This allowed him to closely follow the Greek Christian texts and to prepare for the Latin-speaking people a Bible corrected on the authority of the Greek text.

Jerome's first Roman revisions were done because the gospels and the *Psalms were the most read books of the Sacred *Scriptures in the liturgy; and if Pope Damasus took the initiative, it means that a true pastoral preoccupation was at the basis of this work. Having before his eyes the Greek translations of Aquila, and esp. Symmachus, Jerome undertook a translation of the OT from the Hebrew. First, however, he wrote a technical work titled Hebrew Questions, in which he compared the ancient translations and sought to clarify the meaning of the text. Jerome, however, did not go for theoretical questions beyond the book of Genesis. For the NT, beyond the gospels, most scholars now agree that Jerome did not edit Paul's epistles, the Catholic Epistles, the Acts of the Apostles and the book of Revelation.

We should also note that St. *Augustine spoke of Jerome's work only in reference to the OT and the gospels. Jerome added nothing to the multiplicity and diversity of translations that he combated. In his work as a translator, like Origen, he had a twofold scope, scholarly and apologetic. Scholarly: to establish a correct Latin text from the vernacularisms and the scribal errors and to create a unity between the existing translations. Apologetic: to give Christians a biblical text that could no longer be accused by the Jews of imprecision and falsehood. Augustine preferred the critical revisions made on the Greek text (the gospels and the Hexapla version) rather than the translations made by Jerome directly from the Greek. As one scholar says concerning these problems: "On the whole, the exegetical work of Jerome was successful more for its philological rigor and large abundance of material used than for the coherency of method and the originality of the interpretation" (Manlio Simonetti). Jerome's exegesis was in the line of the Hebrew interpretation. His dependence on rabbinic teachers is evident.

Nevertheless it is Christian primarily because it respects the preceding Latin tradition, esp. when it pertains to God, divine actions, prayers, rites and language. It was also Christian because it was made in service of the NT, keeping in mind the exegetical interpretation of the church, and esp. Origen's. For his exegesis, Jerome drew heavily on Origen's works. Accused of this dependence, he defended himself by appealing to famous examples of Latin authors and by affirming that with his commentaries he intended to present various interpretations of biblical passages that were difficult to understand to help the reader to judge quid verius sit ("what is more true") and to reject phony cash as a good money changer. At the beginning of his exegetical activity, Jerome intended to put the Latin reader in contact with Eastern exegesis, to render Origen in Latin and to give him romanis auribus ("Roman ears"). Jerome's language, which is at certain points rhetorical, reaches a certain equilibrium and a very religious tone when he supports himself on the ancient Latin versions. His cultural preparation and esp. his literary preparation allowed him to give to his Latin language a tone of poetry and beauty. The version of the gospels reproduces an excellent Greek text. In Letter 57, sometimes called De optimo genere interpretandi, from the end of the year 395, Jerome affirmed as an ideal of translation fidelity to the meaning without excessive adherence to the words following the characteristics of the language into which one translated. Responding to the demands of Pope Damasus of revising the gospels, Jerome encountered two difficulties: one psychological, the other critical. The psychological difficulty was the reaction of the recipients to the changes that had to be made to a standard text that everyone regarded as sacred; this is what happens today in the face of numerous versions and revisions of translations of the biblical text. The critical difficulty was how to navigate through a variety of texts; Jerome would follow an even road by comparing the four gospels with the Greek codices and correcting only what he considered necessary. Above all, Jerome's place in the history of Latin translations remains unique. As a translator he stands out as a genius and a formidable exegete. This has all been said before. This holds much more than his obstinacy and his pursuit of veritas hebraica (to the detriment of the Greek version of the LXX) for which he was often criticized during and after his life.

T. Stramare (ed.), La Bibbia "Vulgata" dalle origini ai nostri giorni, Rome 1987; P.-M. Bogaert, La Bible latine des origines au moyen âge: Revue théologique de Louvain 19 (1988) 137-159; 276-314; The Latin Translations: Old Latin Versions, in MIKRA, Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. M.J. Mulder, Philadelphia 1988, 299-312; Ph. Burton, The Old Latin Gospel: A Study of Their Texts and Language, Oxford 2000; M. Cimosa, Guida alla Bibbia Latina: dalla vetus latina, alla vulgata, alla neo-vulgata, I, IPA, Rome 2007; M. Graves, Jerome's Hebrew Philology: A Study Based on His Commentary on Jeremiah (Vigiliae Christianae Supplements 90), Leiden 2007.

III. Aramaic versions. The NT, although having gradually established itself as a continuation and the fulfillment of the OT, did not inherit it as it appears today in the Bible but as it was already interpreted in Aramaic (in the Targums) and in Greek (the Greek translations then merged into the Septuagint, which I just treated). The study of the language of the Targums allows us also to know the Aramaic language spoken by Jesus. But what is the so-called Aramaic Bible and what are the Targums?

A Targum is a translation of the entire Bible in the Aramaic language first oral and written, which was used in the synagogue by the Palestinian Jews over the centuries. It corresponds to large sections of the Bible: Law, Prophets and Psalms. The Targum has a long history that deserves to be known. It originated from the liturgical needs of the synagogue in an era in which Hebrew was no longer known. It had an enormous influence on the NT. Since the beginning, Christianity inherited interpreted Bibles, both in Aramaic and in Greek (the LXX). The NT presented itself as a continuation of the OT, but of an OT not sterile but rather enriched by the countless oral traditions which converged into the targumic interpretations, i.e., in the "Aramaic Bible." The Christian Bible is not the OT plus the NT, but rather it is the result of a global work of interpretation. Only at the end were they able to distinguish two blocks and to recognize them as inspired by God, an OT and a NT. "These targums were never born from academic concerns, they were not written by scholars and for scholars, but rather emerged from the demands that we could call 'pastoral.' They had the primary scope of communicating the meaning of Sacred Scripture to the masses who had a particularly critical sensibility, both historical and literary or theological: in fact, we know that during the synagogue gatherings of learned people the targum could be easily omitted because it was considered superfluous" (Buzzetti). The pastoral objective made it so that several particulars were paraphrased, others explained and updated.

The term targum refers to a biblical document orally translated from the Hebrew and Aramaic which was subsequently put in writing. According to Le Déaut, who is one of the greatest scholars of targums, the term comes from the Akkadian term targumanu ("interpreter") and derives from the root ragama ("to call"). The root is found only once in the Bible, in Ezra 4:7, before the Aramaic section: "The text of the document of written Aramaic and translated into the Aramaic language [mtrgm 'rmyt]. " It is interesting to note that the Greek of the LXX translates with, ". . . He wrote [egrapsen] in the Syriac language and interpreted . . ." "To be convinced that the targumim are not simply translations, it is enough to notice that the great freedom that they had with respect to the Hebrew original which is explained by turning one's back on the original meaning. . . . This fact attests that they were not such slaves to the letter as is often thought, without nuances" (Le Déaut, Liturgie juive et Nouveau, 26-27). Therefore, a translation from Hebrew into Aramaic was made by Jews for Jews. The Greek translation of the LXX, though having used at times targumic methods, is not a targum in the proper sense of the word. It is likely that in the Diaspora the Jews who no longer knew Hebrew listened to the word of God in the synagogue directly in Greek. Unfortunately we lack sufficient documentation of this practice, even if we have the opinion of the most eminent scholars.

The English term dragoman comes from the Byzantine Greek term dragoumanos and has the meaning of "interpreter" or "intermediary" and corresponds to the term meturgeman of the ancients. In a technical sense the term indicates the official translator of the synagogue who translated verse by verse into Aramaic the reading of the Torah and every three verses the reading of the Haftarah (i.e., the Prophets) but without looking at the biblical text and without having any notes in hand. The targumist followed a very precise legislation present both in the Mishnah and the Talmud. This practice gave rise to the famous rule: "The one who interprets in an overly literal manner is a falsifier, the one who adds something to the text is a blasphemer" (Tos. Meg. 4, 41). It is not clear that these versions were put into writing and have thus come down to us. In any case the term meturgeman is also found in the Aramaic Bible, in Gen 42:23, and refers to the interpreter between Joseph and his brothers. The Jews during the Babylonian exile had begun to speak Aramaic, a language which in Mesopotamia had taken the place of Akkadian. Upon returning from the exile esp., almost no one among the less wealthy classes knew Hebrew anymore; the translation of the sacred books into Aramaic thus became indispensable, esp. for use in the synagogue. Something similar would happen to the Jews of the Hellenistic Diaspora a few centuries after, when the Greek translation of the Septuagint would be born. Le Déaut writes the following: "Even before the exile, the knowledge of Aramaic must have been sufficiently widespread among the higher classes for numerous contacts with the peoples of the East, who spoke the Aramaic language. This language had become, starting from the 6th c. BC, a type of lingua franca used in the relations between the various peoples of the Near East, and Aramaic is attested to in the inscriptions in the 9th c. BC" (Le Déaut, Introduction à la littérature targumique, 24).

Certainly after the exile the linguistic situation in Palestine must not have been so simple. The Jews who had returned from exile spoke Aramaic in their home, and they found many of their fellow countrymen who had not been deported still speaking Hebrew. It was therefore a situation of bilingualism: Hebrew and Aramaic which during the 1st c. BC then became trilingualism: Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek. Some writers continued to write in Hebrew, which was considered to be a scientific language (in the manner of Latin until the French Revolution), and this language then became mishnaic Hebrew or neo-Hebrew and lasted until the mid-2nd c. AD. The rabbinic tradition saw in Neh 8:1-9 the historical origin of the Aramaic translations. The text of Nehemiah recounts that there was an assembly at the SE spot of the temple, on an area that was not sacred. This assembly was called by Ezra who, surrounded by six individuals to the right and the left, made an oral and public translation of the Torah and the prophetic books in Aramaic. According to Neh 8:3, the reading was commented on for the entire people (men, women and children) who understood it because it was performed "by translating and giving the sense." It is now believed that this was the historical origin of the targum.

R. Le Déaut, Introduction à la littérature targumique, PIB, Rome 1966; Id., The Message of the New Testament and the Aramaic Bible (Targum), Rome 1982; Id., Le targum, in DBS 13, Paris 2002 (extensive and updated bibliography by C. Tassin); Id., Liturgie juive et Nouveau Testament, Rome 1965; C. Buzzetti, La Bibbia e le sue trasformazioni, Turin 1994.

IV. Syriac versions. The standard translation of the Bible in *Syriac is called the *Peshitta. The title is Aramaic-Syriac and means "common, usual" because it was a translation of the Bible much used by Christians of the Syriac church. The name was given to this translation around the 10th c. But the OT was translated very early into Syriac, a language similar to Aramaic and therefore even to Hebrew. The books of the OT were translated directly into Syriac from the Hebrew at different times and perhaps in different places. The Syriac translation did not assign much importance to the origin of the biblical versions, as had occurred, however, for the LXX with the *Letter of Aristeas. Some books, esp. the Pentateuch, had close ties with Aramaic targums that had survived. Today there is sufficient agreement among scholars in recognizing a direct literary relationship between the Peshitta and the targums, even if the type of relationship still remains obscure. For the book of Proverbs the relationship between the two and the targum is certainly strong, always coming from the Peshitta rather than the other way around. The most ancient translations of the OT books were made during the period in which the Hebrew text was not yet stabilized—1st c. AD—therefore the Peshitta draws less interest than does the LXX for biblical scholarship on the Hebrew text.

During the 2nd c. AD a large portion of the OT was already translated almost entirely from the Hebrew and was then slowly completed. The deuterocanonical books were translated from a recension of the Septuagint: among these the book of Sirach was translated from Hebrew. The characteristic of this translation is that of being very faithful to the original, elegant in language and clear in expression.

In addition to the standard Syriac version, the Peshitta, there was another made from the Greek text at Alexandria in ca. 615. It is known as the Syrohexapla, which was completed by *Paul of Tella. It was a very literal translation of the text of the Septuagint edited by Origen in his Hexapla along with the diacritical marks (asterisks and obelisks) and with many marginal readings of the Greek translations made by *Aquila, *Symmachus and *Theodotion. Even if it did not survive in its entirety—for the moment, unfortunately, very little has survived of the Greek Hexapla—the Syrohexapla is of primary importance for research on the Septuagint.

Little by little, given the great regard in which the Greek version was held by Syrians, many readings taken from the Septuagint entered the Peshitta. Scholars distinguish that version of the Septuagint from the one called "Philoxenian" from around the 6th c., so named because it was ordered by Bishop *Philoxenus. It seems that it was made acc. to a recension of *Lucian Martyr and was therefore very close to the Hebrew text. There remain few fragments. The other two types are those called "Syriac Palestinian" (from ca. 600), made on Origen's Hexapla text and the one called the "Syriac Hexapla," from the 7th c. and also made on the text of Origen's Hexapla.

It is interesting to observe in the history of the Syriac translations a continuous fluidity between free and literal translation, which reached its climax in the 7th c.

There are many Syriac versions of the NT, the most ancient of which, from the 2nd half of the 2nd c. AD, is *Tatian's Diatessaron. It enjoyed great popularity in the Syriac church (it is uncertain whether it was composed in Greek or Syriac), but it was immediately pulled from circulation, and therefore it has not survived. The closest text that we possess is the Commentary of Ephrem. Even if little known in its original form, the influence of the Diatessaron was very great, with extensive adaptations during the Middle Ages in Persian and Arabic but also in German, Dutch, Italian and English.

The most ancient text of the Syriac gospels that has survived is known as the Vetus Syra and is preserved in two MSS: the Codex Curetonianus (in the British Library of London) and the Codex Sinaiticus (in the monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai). From the textual point of view it was of great importance because it contained numerous Western variants. With the Vetus Latina it is the most ancient translation of the Greek gospels that has survived.

In sum, for the ancient translations of the NT one should note the following:

1. The Diatessaron. In the 2nd c. Tatian composed a unified gospel in Greek, which he then translated into Syriac. The Diatessaron was very widespread even if the original Syriac has practically disappeared. There still exist some translations and citations. A Greek fragment on a parchment from the year ca. 220 was found in 1933 at *Dura Europos on the Euphrates River. It has been used very frequently in the textual criticism of the NT because of its antiquity.

2. The translation of the four separate gospels (3rd c.) preserved in two codices: the Codex Curetonianus and the Syriac Sinaiticus.

3. The Peshitta of the NT, a translation was made in the 5th c. which was less ancient than the OT, contains the entire NT, minus the five books that are not present in the Antiochene canon of Scripture (2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude and Revelation).

4. The Philoxenian translation with the Heraclean revision. Asked for by Bishop *Philoxenus in the beginning of the 6th c., it included the entirety of the NT. Very little has survived. But a revision owed to *Thomas Harclensis (from Heraclea, 7th c.) has survived.

5. They Syro-Palestinian translation (from ca. 600): in Aramaic-Palestinian. The parts preserved in the liturgy have survived to this day.

V. Between East and West: crossroad churches of cultures. The ancient Christian Syriac tradition is very complex, esp. in the first centuries, which was established in a territory bordering two worlds, the Greco-Roman world and the Persian world, capable of assuming elements from different cultures. The connections between the Peshitta of the OT and the Jewish traditions are intersting as well as the Aramaic-Palestinian elements and the Jewish-Aramaic elements present in the gospels. We should recall Vergani's Efrem il Siro: chiesa e paradiso and its exquisite poetry, and *Isaac of Nineveh and his teaching on humility, which he understood as the way of humanization and divinization at the same time.

L. Leloir, Le Témoignage d'Éphrem sur le Diatessaron, Louvain 1962; B.M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the New Testament, Oxford 1977; P.B. Dirksen, An Annotated Bibliography of the Peshitta of the Old Testament, Leiden 1989; W.L. Petersen, An Introduction to the Diatessaron, Leiden 1990; S.P. Brock, The Bible in the Syriac Tradition, Kottayam 1989; Id., Syriac Studies: A Classified Bibliography (1960-1990), Kaslik 1996.

M. Cimosa

SCULPTURE. Artistic product is an expression, on the figurative plain, of the culture that is contemporaneous to it and, as a result, one can speak of "Christian" sculpture only inasmuch as it refers to the theme and the ideological and programmatic content of which it becomes a vehicle, and not to the stylistic and formal characteristics which it shares, of necessity, with all contemporareous production. Given then (1) the cultural inheritance of Judaism, with its effort to avoid the ever-present danger of idolatrous suggestions and practices, (2) the rejection repeatedly manifested by Christians toward idols (even esp. with respect to material productions), and (3) the absence of iconic statues in places of worship, we can see substantial factors that blocked and slowed for a long time, in various ways, the formation and dissemination of a Christian plastic art in the round. (See can. 26 of the Council of *Elvira which, at the beginning of the 4th c., still states the following: Placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur; and although, in this particular case, the council seems to be making reference exclusively to painting, one cannot doubt that even sculpture of a figurative character was largely and implicitly understood.)

By this claim, I do not intend to argue that rounded sculpture was completely lacking in ancient Christianity. The existence of this artistic type is documented, e.g., by some statues, or fragments of statues, of the Good *Shepherd, which can be dated back to the 3rd and 4th c., which had been preserved at *Rome: one at the Museo Pio Cristiano in the Vatican, one at the Museum Kircherianum, one found in 1870 in the archaeological digs of the basilica of St. Clement of Rome, and one found among the ashes of a demolished house in 1887 near the Porta San Paolo, to which one can add a pillaret ending higher up with a bust of the Good Shepherd, which resides among the remains of the Mausoleum of Helena, and elsewhere, at Constantinople, Athens, Sparta and Seville. One notices, however, that, as recent studies have shown well, the first two small statues mentioned, already placed on display in the Museo Sacro della Biblioteca Vaticana, then in the Museo Lateranense and finally in the Museo Pio Cristiano, with the inventory numbers [103] 28590 and [105] 31428, originally consisting, in all likelihood, in high reliefs belonging to panels of monumental *sarcophagi, were restored and radically reworked, respectively, by the sculptors Giuseppe Angelini, in 1764, and Bartolomeo Cavaceppi, 1757, who at that time transformed them into more or less rounded statues. Such a statue was already represented by a well-noted figurine of Christ seated, young and beardless, the so-called Hellenistic, or Apollonian, which can be dated to the 4th c. and is preserved at the Museo Nazionale Romano. It is attested by various treatises from the literary sources. First, *Eusebius of Caesarea spoke of images of the Good Shepherd and Daniel molded in bronze, placed as a fountain ornament erected in the piazzas (Vita Constant. III,49). *Gregory of Nazianzus, in a letter written in the year 382, made mention of statues which perhaps adorned the church which he established in the city. The Liber pontificalis, in the biographical entry on Pope *Sylvester, explicitly mentions statues of gold and silver portraying Jesus Christ, *John the Baptist, crows and lambs, placed as a decoration for the Lateran baptistery (LP, ed. Duchesne, I, XXXIV, p. 174). And the base of the statue, now lost but existing in the 17th c. in the garden of the basilica of St. *Chrysogonus in Trastevere, bore the inscription: Fl. Tertullus de arte sua / aeclesiae donum posuit, thus preserving a rare fact: the name of an ancient Christian sculptor. These were statues which, esp. in the pre-Constantinian age, could decorate even homes and villas of rich Christians. But, beyond these archaeological and literary testimonies, which cannot be ignored, there is no doubt that early Christian plastic art was expressed primarily and largely in the area of funerary relief (see *sarcophagi).

Outside the funerary context in the area of the relief, Christian sculpture exerted its influence primarily in the production of liturgical equipment such as alters, ambos, ciboria, cathedrae, plutaea and presbyterial cancelli.

Starting from about the 6th c.—as a result of influences exerted by Byzantine art—the almost exclusively geometrical motifs that characterized such production in Western artistic culture were enhanced by the addition of flowers, crosses, ribbons and wreaths, which in various ways were composed and intertwined with one another, an example of which is found in the decoration of the basilica of St. Clement in Rome, the ornamental repertory of which—even though, obviously, with different conceptions and stylistic renderings—remained substantially unchanged for the entire century. It should nonetheless be noted that the motifs of this repertory are not exclusive to Christian production (though, on the whole it is by that point quantitatively prevalent), but are widespread in general in all sculpture from that period.

With the waning of such influences following the important political events over the course of the 7th c. (that included, of course, the arrival, first, and then the stabilization of the *Longobards to whose artistic-cultural "influence" scholars have wished to attribute, in the past, a function and a depth far in excess of reality), as well as because of the changed economic conditions, sculpture seems to now revive, in the local sense, the characteristics already widespread in the preceding centuries and, at least in the Western regions, to show an undeniable decline in the quantity of the production (the schola of St. Maria Antiqua, at the Roman forum, e.g., is composed of a simple masonry enclosure decorated with paintings) destined to come back into popular use but always characterized almost exclusively by ornamental and geometric motifs, with an undoubted sense of greater awareness, in the following century.

General Themes: F. Mazzanti, La scultura ornamentale romana nei bassi tempi, Rome 1896; M. Simon, Symbolisme et tradition d'atelier dans la première sculpture chrétienne, in *Actes du V*e Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne (Aix-en-Provence, 13-19 septembre 1954), Paris 1957, 307-319; Corpus della scultura altomedievale pubblicato a cura del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1959ff. (with extensive bibl.); F. Gerke, La scultura paleocristiana in Occidente, in Corsi di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina (Ravenna, 8-20 marzo 1959), 2, Ravenna 1959, 48-78; Id., La scultura paleocristiana in Oriente, ibid., 79-108; var. aus., Corpus della scultura paleocristiana, bizantina e altomedioevale di Ravenna, ed. G. Bovini, I-III, Rome 1968-69 (with bibl.); E. Russo, Studi sulla scultura paleocristiana e altomedievale: Studi medievali 15 (1974) 1-118; R. Farioli, La cultura artistica nelle regioni bizantine d'Italia dal VI all'XI secolo, in I bizantini in Italia, Milan 1982, 137-426; Id., Ravenna, Costantinopoli. Considerazioni sulla scultura del VI secolo, in XXX Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina. Seminario giustinianeo (Ravenna 6-14 marzo 1983), Ravenna 1983, 205-253; Id., L'arte giustinianea in Italia, in Bisanzio, Roma e l'Italia nell'alto medioevo. XXXIV Settimana di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo (Spoleto 3-9 aprile 1986), Spoleto 1988, I, 99-118; F. Bisconti, Arte e artigianato nella cultura figurativa paleocristiana. Altre equivalenze tra letteratura patristica e iconografia paleocristiana, in Res Christiana, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1989, 23-26; S. Casartelli Novelli, Committenza e produzione scultorea "bassa," in XXXIX Settimana di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo, Spoleto 1992, 531-561; N. Hannestad, Tradition in Late Antique Sculpture. Conservation, Modernization, Production, Aarhus 1994; D. Willers, Das Ende der antiken Idealstatue: Museum Helveticum 53 (1996) 170-186; N. Hannestad, Sculptural Genres in Late Antiquity: Continuity or Discontinuity?, in Griechenland in der Kaiserzeit. Neue Funde und Forschungen zu Skulptur, Architektur und Topographie. Kolloquium zum sechzigsten Geburtstag von Prof. Dietrich Willers (Bern, 12.–13. Juni 1998), Bern 2001, 137-145; Id., Das Ende der antiken Idealstatue. Heidnische Skulptur in christlichen Häusern?: Antike Welt 33 (2002) 635-649; E. Russo, Considérations sur la sculpture architecturale et décorative à Nicée à l'époque paléochrétienne: Bizantinistica 4 (2002) 1-11; EAM I-XII, Rome 1991-2002; R. Coroneo, Scultura altomedievale in Italia, Cagliari 2005 (extensive bibl.).

Rome: G.B. de Rossi, Statua del buon pastore scoperta in Roma presso la porta Ostiense: BACr, serie 4ª, 5 (1887) 136-149; Id., Statua del buon pastore: Bull. della Comm. Archeol. Comunale di Rome, serie 3ª, 17 (1889) 131-139; F. Mazzanti, La scultura ornamentale romana nei bassi tempi, Rome 1896; L. Pani Ermini, Note sulla decorazione dei cibori a Roma nell'alto medioevo: Bollettino d'Arte (1974) 115-126; F. Guidobaldi - C. Barsanti - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, San Clemente. La scultura del VI secolo, Rome 1992; C. Gennaccari, Le "statue" del Buon pastore nei Musei Vaticani. Rilettura e additamenta alla luce di alcuni documenti del Settecento: RivAC 75 (1999) 461-473.

Constantinople: D.T. Rice, Sculpture in Constantinople from Constantine to Justinian, in I Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina (Ravenna 31 marzo - 13 aprile 1957), Ravenna 1957, 67-72; A. Grabar, *Sculptures byzantines de Constantinople, IV*e*-X*e siècle, Paris 1963; H. Brandenburg, Rilievi scultorei costantinopolitani dal IV al VI secolo, in XXVI Corso di cultura sull'arte ravennate e bizantina (Ravenna 6-18 maggio 1979), Ravenna 1979, 13-27; B. Kiilerich, Sculpture in the Round in the Early Byzantine Period: Constantinople and the East, in Aspects of Late Antiquity and Early Byzantium. Papers read at a colloquium held at the Swedish Research Institute in Istanbul (31 May - 5 June 1992), Stockholm 1993, 85-97; C. Barsanti - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Premessa a un catalogo della scultura della Santa Sofia di Costantinopoli, in Bisanzio e l'Occidente. Arte, archeologia, storia. Studi in onore di Fernanda de' Maffei, Rome 1996, 79-104; J.P. Sodini - C. Barsanti - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, La sculpture architecturale en marbre au VI^e siècle à Constantinople et dans les régions sous influence constantinopolitaine, in Radovi XIII. Medunarodnog kongresa za starokršćansku arheologiju. Acta XIII Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae (Split-Poreč 25.9. - 1.10.1994), II, Split-Vatican City 1998, 301-376; A. Guiglia Guidobaldi - C. Barsanti, Santa Sofia di Costantinopoli. L'arredo marmoreo della grande chiesa giustinianea, Vatican City 2004.

Ravenna: Var. aus., Corpus della scultura paleocristiana, bizantina e altomedievale di Ravenna, ed. G. Bovini, IIII, Rome 1968-69 (with bibl.); R. Farioli, Il problema delle origini della scultura paleocristiana di Ravenna: Arheološki vestnik 23 (1972) 167-174; Id., Osservazioni sulla scultura di Ravenna paleocristiana: Aquileia nostra 45-46 (1974-75) 717-740; Id., Rilievi ravennati del VI secolo. Gli altari di Argenta e Pomposa: Felix Ravenna 125-126 (1983) 157-174; Id., La scultura architettonica e di arredo liturgico a Ravenna alla fine della tarda antichità: i rapporti con Costantinopoli, in Storia di Ravenna. Dall'età bizantina all'età ottoniana, II, 1, Ravenna 1991, 249-267. Regioni e località diverse: S. Tavano, Scultura paleocristiana e altomedioevale in Aquileia: Arheološki vestnik 23 (1972) 234-256; H. Brandenburg, Spätantike und frühchristliche Skulptur in Thessaloniki, in Actes du X^e Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne (Thessalonique 28 septembre - 4 octobre 1980), Vatican City 1984, 299-317; H. Brandenburg, La scultura a Milano nel IV e V secolo, in Il millennio ambrosiano. Milano, una capitale da Ambrogio ai Carolingi, Milan 1987, 80-129; E. Russo, La scultura del VI secolo in Palestina. Considerazioni e proposte: Acta ad archaeologiam et artium historiam pertinentia 6 (1987) 113-248; C. Barsanti, Scultura anatolica di epoca medio-bizantina: Milion 1 (1988) 275-306; Id., Tunisia. Indagine preliminare sulla diffusione dei manufatti di marmo proconnesio in epoca paleobizantina, in Costantinopoli e l'arte delle province orientali, Rome 1990, 429-436; A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, I capitelli della basilica giustinianea della Theotokos, oggi di S. Caterina, sul Monte Sinai, ibid., 265-342; E. Russo, Sculture del complesso eufrasiano di Parenzo, Naples 1991; C. Barsanti, La scultura paleocristiana e bizantina, in Scultura nelle Marche, Florence 1993, 59-81; R. Farioli Campanati, La decorazione scultorea cristiana della chiesa dei SS. Sergio, Bacco e Leonzio di Bosra: Ocnus 1 (1993) 83-89; T. Weber, Die Statuengruppe Jesu und der Haimorrhoúsa in Caesarea-Philippi: Damaszener Mitteilungen 9 (1996) 209-216; E. Russo, La scultura a Efeso in età paleocristiana e bizantina. Primi lineamenti, in Efeso paleocristiana e bizantina. Frühchristliches und byzantinisches Ephesos. Referate des vom 22. bis 24. Februar 1996 beim Österreichischen Kulturinstitut in Rom durchgeführten internationalen Kongresses aus Anlass des 100-jährigen Jubiläums der österreichischen Ausgrabungen in Ephesos, Vienna 1999, 26-53; Id., Sculture paleocristiane e bizantine dell'Artemision di Efeso, in Der Kosmos der Artemis von Ephesos, Vienna 2001, 265-277; H. Buschhausen, Zur Frage des byzantinischen Historienbildes, in Krieg und Sieg. Narrative Wanddarstellungen von Altägypten bis ins Mittelalter. Internationales Kolloquium im Schloss Haindorf (Langenlois 29.-30. Juli 1997), Vienna 2002, 175-200; C. Barsanti, I plutei di Siponto, Monte Sant'Angelo e Benevento, in 1983-1993. Dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia. Atti del VII Congr. naz. di archeologia cristiana (Cassino 20-24 settembre 1993), Cassino 2003, 745-760.

L. Spera - R. Giordani

SCYTHIA MINOR. The name taken up since the Hellenistic era by the territory contained between the Danube River and the Black Sea, corresponding almost in its entirety to the modern-day province of Dobruja (a medieval name) in Romania. Strabo called the same territory Μικρὰ Σκυθία (Geogr. VII, 4,5), to distinguish it from Scythia Major, which extended to the N of the Black Sea. Under *Diocletian, Scythia Minor, previously part of Moesia Inferior, was made an independent province with the specific name Scythia Minor. According to tradition, Scythia was evangelized by the apostle *Andrew (Euseb., HE 3,1,1). If one considers the intense contacts of the Greek colonies of the W coast of the Black Sea with the relative metropolises of Asia Minor and with the great centers of the Aegean islands and continents of Greece, as well as the large number of native soldiers of the regions already evangelized of the Near East who were encamped on the border of the Lower Danube, one can identify the presence in Scythia Minor of some isolated Christians since the first three centuries of the Common Era. In fact, the persecution that broke out against the Christians by the emperor *Diocletian must have also left numerous victims on the territory of Scythia Minor, esp. among the soldiers. Precisely in this respect, the texts of the martyrologies register many martyrs in such centers as Tomis (Constanța), the chief place of the province Halmyris, *Noviodunum, Dinogetia and *Axiopolis. Other martyrs were attributed to the persecution of *Licinius. In the delta of the Danube, on the right arm of the river, at Halmyris (Solomorus) are perhaps registered the first martyrs known so far on the territory of the Dobruja, and that is Epictetus and Astion, both natives of *Phrygia in Asia Minor, who had fled here around the year AD 290. For this period the bishop Evangelicus is remembered, who seems to have been the first bishop of Tomis. A fragmentary epigraph found there mentions a bishop and martyr who has not yet been identified, probably from the era of the emperor Licinius.

Until the times of the emperor *Anastasius I (491–518) at the head of the church of Scythia Minor was found only one bishop, a resident at Tomis: this is mentioned by the historians *Sozomen (HE VI,21) and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (HE IV,35), by a law from the year ca. 480 of the emperor *Zeno (CI I,3,35), and from other literary sources. The first known bishop with certainty from the historical documents was St. Betronius (Bretanius or Vetranius), after whom are known another eight bishops: Gerontios Terentius (381), Theotimos I (ca. 392–407), Timotheos (431), Ioannes (445–446), Alexandros (449), Theotimos II (458), Paternus (ca. 491–520) and Valentinianus (ca. 550), who had an epistolary correspondence with Pope *Virgilius (537–555) and whose title was episcopus Scythiae. During the last flourishing of Scythia Minor, which goes from the reign of the emperor Anastasius to that of *Justinian I (527–565), various episcopates were created even in other centers of the province, although the bishop of Tomis was transformed into an archepiscopate with the *metropolitan as the head. The "Scythian monks" had an important role in the religious, cultural and even the political life of Scythia Minor, among whom *Ioannes Maxentius (ca. 520) stood out. Although they did not carry out their activities in Scythia Minor, two other monks of Scythian origin acquired fame for their native province. The first was *John Cassian (ca. 360–430/435), born in modern-day Dobruja, while the other was *Dionysius Exiguus, to whom is owed, in addition to the Latin translation of numerous foundational theological works of the Greek patristic authors, the *computus of the Common Era from the birth of Christ (the Dionysian era), a calculation which, although mistaken, is still in use.

The information offered by literary sources on the church in Scythia Minor until the collapse of the Lower Danube (beginning of the 7th c.) were integrated by the archaeological discoveries made on the territory of this late Roman province and, above all, by the epigraphs and the buildings of Christian worship and their adjoined structures. The early Christian inscriptions (5th–6th c.) discovered on the territory of the modern-day Dobruja number around 100, three-fourths of which are in Greek and only one-fourth in Latin. Only one epigraph is bilingual (Greek-Latin). Almost half of the total number of the epigraphs come from Tomis; the others are spread about among Callatis (10), *Histria (10), Salsovia (1), Noviodunum and environs (4), Dinogetia (10), Axiopolis (5), Sucidava (Izvoarele, district of Constanța) (1), Ulmetum (5) and Tropaeum Traiani (1). More than half of these are presented as inscribed on the stones of a local rock or a marble of good quality imported from Proconnesus or from various parts of Greece, although the remaining are objects of metal (silver, bronze or lead), terra cotta, bone, glass or other metals. They are primarily funerary epigraphs; the most frequent ornament is the cross or one of the Christograms. Symbolic figures also appear on some of the epigraphic monuments: e.g., the *fish, the *dove, the *palm leaf, the *vine, the *crown etc.

Some thirty buildings of Christian worship from the 4th to the 6th c. have been discovered on the territory of Dobruja thanks to archaeological digs, all along the longitudinal layout, which have often survived fully only in the foundation or lower courses of the walls. With respect to the topographical distribution, the early Christian basilicas of Scythia Minor are divided as following: Tomis, 6 (2 not excavated); Callatis, 1; Histria, 4; Arganum, 2; Noviodunum, 2 (among which a cemetery hill not excavated); Niculițel, 1; Dinogetia, 1; Troesmis, 3; Beroe, 1, (not excavated); Capidava, 1 (not excavated); Axiopolis, 2 (one cemeterial); Sucidava (Izvoarele, Constanța), 1; Tropaeum Traiani, 5; Ibida, 1 (partially excavated). These are primarily buildings with three aisles, with an apse oriented to the E. One of these, that of Tropaeum Traiani, is the only one to have a transept or the layout of a T. The basilica of Callatis and the smaller of the five among the basilicas of Tomis, three of Tropaeum Traiani, one of Histria and the basilica of Niculițel had crypts for relics under the altar. The sole certain baptistery is the one discovered at the S of the atrium of the marble basilica of Tropaeum Traiani. Among the very numerous architectonic sculptures, one should mention one hundred of the small chapels, tombstones, banisters (Lat. cancelli), ciboria, pulpits, in large part from the marble of Proconnesus. The furnishings also show a great variety, among which stand forth the disc of Bishop Paternus of Tomis and an entire series of small crosses, small objects of bronze, lead, silver and gold, and numerous vases of terra cotta (amphorae, plates and lanterns) with crosses or Christian epigraphs. At Sucidava (Izvoarrele, a district of Constanța) in 1984 an important treasure of 17 pieces of silver was found, among which the small reliquary with a Christogram and a cross inside (Rădulescu, 2593-2564).

E. Popescu, Inscripțiile grecești și latine din secolele IV-XIII descoperite în România, Bucure'ti 1976; I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; Id., Christian Art in Romania 1, Bucharest 1979; I.G. Coman, Scriitori bisericești din epoca strâromână, Bucuresti 1979; A. Barnea, Aspetti della vita economica della Scythia Minor secondo le fonti letterarie ed epigrafiche (sec. IV-VI d.C.): Quaderni Catanesi 2 (1980) 519-547; E. Popescu, Die kirchliche Organization der Provinz Scythia minor vom vierten bis ins sechtes Jahrhundert: JÖByz 38 (1988) 75-94; A. MacKenzie, Archaeology in Romania: The Mystery of the Roman Occupation, London 1986; A. Rădulescu - V. Lungu, Le christianisme en Scythie mineure à la lumière des dernières découvertes archéologiques, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2561-2615; I. Barnea, Romanité et christianisme au Bas-Danube: Byzantiaka 10 (1990) 67-102; O. Bounegru, Contributions stratigraphiques concernant la chronologie des édifices de Scythia Minor: la basilique chrétienne du IV[e] s. d'Histria, in La politique édilitaire dans les provinces de l'empire romain, ed. D. Alicu - H. Bögli, Cluj-Napoca 1993, 195-200; E. Popescu, Christianitas daco-romana: florilegium studiorum, Bucuresti 1994; G.

Atanassov, Croix-encolpions proche-orientales de la région del Dobrudjia du Sud (Bulgarie), in Akten des XII Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, I, Münster 1995, 483-501; I. Barnea, Menasampullen auf dem Gebiet Rumäniens, ibid., 509-514; K. Ilski, Biskupi Mezji i Scytii IV-VI w., Pozna 1995 (collection of texts); EAM 10, 167-171; EAA² 4, 576-583; A. Barnea, Une province chrétienne sous Justinien: La Scythie mineure, in Acta XIII Congressus Intern. Arch. christianae, II, Vatican City 1998, 807-822; N. Zugravu, Martyrs d'Occident vénerés en Scythie Mineure: Studia Antiqua et Archaeologica 5 (1998) 73-80; A. Avram, Inscriptiones grecques et latines de Scythie Mineure, III, Callatis et son territoire, Bucarest 1999; M. Girardi, Basilio di Cesarea, la passio di s. Saba "il goto" e la propagazione del cristianesimo nella regione del Basso Danubio fra III e IV sec., in Italia e Romania, ed. S. Santelia, Bari 2004, 157-172; M. Zahariade, Scythia Minor: A History of a Later Roman Province (284-681), Amsterdam 2006.

I. Barnea

SCYTHOPOLIS. Situated at the crossroads of important routes of communication and in a fertile tract of land, 17 km (10.6 mi) S of the Sea of Galilee, Nyssa-Scythopolis (Beit She'an) was one of the most important cities of the East in antiquity. Founded in the 1st half of the 3rd c. BC probably by Ptolemy II Philadelphus, it became a city (polis) under the Seleucids and was part of the federation of cities known as the "Decapolis." During the Hellenistic period, the city's layout occupied the tract of land N of the hill (Tell Beit She'an, Tell el-Husn), upon which was located the ancient settlement that developed from the late Neolithic period, a location also mentioned in the Bible (Josh 5:11; Jgs 1:27) as one of the Canaanite cities not conquered by the Israelites. It was also mentioned in the letters of Tell el-Amarna, in the list of Canaanite cities of the Karnak Temple Complex and other Egyptian sources. During the Hasmonean period, between the 2nd and 1st c. BC, the city was restricted to the area including the hill and its slopes. After being conquered by Pompey in 63 BC, it reemerged with the name Scythopolis (i.e., the City of the Scythians). This time urban expansion pertained to the area S of the hill, which then became the acropolis of what was destined to become a large Roman city with temples, theaters, monuments, and streets and would remain in vogue for the entire Roman and Byzantine period before experiencing progressive decline and abandonment.

Thorough archaeological investigations were undertaken starting from the year 1921 until 1932 by the University of Pennsylvania. The streets traced and brought to light dated from the Mamluk to the Neolithic period. The circular-shaped church belonged to the Byzantine era, which was dated by archaeologists to the 1st half of the 5th c., thanks to the stylistic similarity of the capitals found there with that of the church of St. Stephen at *Jerusalem, which was built by order of the empress *Eudoxia between the years 431 and 438. The circular edifice was built on the ruins of a mono-apsidal basilica. The rotunda measured more than 38 m (124.67 ft.) and was proceeded by a porticoed atrium to the W. On the inside, two concentric circles created an ambulatory with twelve columns, interrupted by the presbytery to the E. The central area was filled with mosaics containing geometric motifs; the ambulatory was paved with slabs of stone, although a series of doors connected it with the outside and with some rooms set next to the building, among which was a rectangular room with mosaics on the floor. Scholars are not quite sure if the church was entirely covered with a roof, or rather if the central part was sub divo. It could have been a memorial dedicated to the martyr *Procopius, who was said, acc. to *Eusebius, to have been the first martyr of *Palestine during the *Diocletian persecution. A native of *Jerusalem, Procopius lived at Scythopolis where he served as lector, exorcist and translator of *Syriac texts. Led to *Caesarea before the judge, the suggestion was made to him numerous times to sacrifice to the gods and, given his firm resolve to reject this proposition, he was beheaded.

Under the walls of the circular church, archaeologists have traced the foundations of a Roman temple, which was probably dedicated to Zeus. In 1961–1962 a theater was excavated, and excavations followed throughout the 1960s, 70s and 80s, but only from 1986 to 1987 were systematic digs undertaken, which brought to light a large portion of the urban layout of the city of Nyssa-Scythopolis, which in the 2nd c. AD primarily developed to the W of the hill, although the entire urban area was guarded by walls. The central part of the city was found at the foot of the N mountain side of the hill. Here broad streets intersected with porticoed colonnades on the sides. Around these one finds the chief monuments: the theater, whose lower order of the cavea is preserved and part of the frons scenae. In addition to the scena, a colonnaded monumental road ran toward the NE, to the foot of the hill, where the roads that came from the W and E met to form the so-called monument of Antony and a colonnade that probably connected the street with another theater placed on the side of the hill. From the N side of the street, another series of monuments opened: "the central monument," a semicircular nymphaeum and a temple, which was small but elegant, with an apsed cella probably connected to the cult of Dionysus, the chief deity of the city (from which it took the name Nyssa). To the S there was a broad civic basilica, from which remained only the foundation walls. More to the W, before the theater and beyond the road called Palladius, there was another colonnade, behind which spacious baths opened, and even more to the NW, one finds the remains of what was perhaps another basilica, connected to a space in which was placed a forum from the Roman era. More to the S, far from the monumental center of the city there was the hippodrome, which was changed in a second phase into another theater, which was shaped in the form of a ring.

During the late Roman and then the Byzantine age, the urban layout underwent numerous remodelings, which were due to the ever-increasing importance that the city assumed, to the point of becoming the metropolis of the province Palestina Secunda, created after the year 400. Even before the 4th c., some of the monuments at the center of the city were replaced by a series of shops, but it was in the Byzantine age that more changes took place. The earthquake of 363 caused much damage to the buildings of Scythopolis; the hippodrome was replaced by a more modest amphitheater, and some temples and monuments were destroyed; the church was constructed in a circular layout on the ruins of the Temple of Zeus on the acropolis. During the entire 6th. c., also due to the demographic explosion that pertained to all of Palestine, works of systematization and restoration consumed the city. During these years, in 525, *Cyril was born at Scythopolis, who, though still young in 543, embraced the monastic life and moved to the Judean desert, first to the laura of St. Euthymius, then to that of St. *Sabas. Through his biographies of the monks, Cyril was a witness to the most flourishing period in Palestinian *monasticism. The walls of the city were restructured, and in the periphery to the N two churches were constructed on the Monastery of Our Lady, which has preserved mosaics with human figures, birds and a representation of the zodiac, and a funerary chapel with a mosaic representation of the months and an inscription that mentions a building adapted as a bath for lepers. A synagogue was discovered, covered with mosaics, in relation to the so-called Leontius residence to the W of the center of the city. Another building outside the belt of walls to the N is perhaps to be identified with a Samaritan synagogue.

With the Arab conquest of *Palestine in 634 there began the slow but irreversible decline of Scythopolis, which today bears the name Beih She'an. Private homes and shops began to be built on the ancient streets, marketplaces and monuments—a sign of the shrinkage and impoverishment of the city also caused by a series of earthquakes such as that of 660, and esp. that of 18 January 749, which devastated a large part of Palestine and the nearby regions. During the era of the Abbasids the city centered in the N area, the occupation of which is attested to until the Mamluk period.

G.M. Fitzgerald, Bet-Shan Excavations 1921-1923, vol. III, The Arab and Byzantine Levels, Philadelphia 1931; Id., A Sixth Century Monastery at Beth-Shan (Scythopolis), Philadelphia 1939; Eusebio di Cesarea, Storia Ecclesiastica e i Martiri della Palestina, ed. G. del Ton, Rome 1964; Atti dei martiri, ed. G. Caldarelli, Alba 1975; A. Mazar, Beth-Shean. Tel Beth-Shean and the Northern Cemetery, in New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 1, 214-223; G. Foerster, Beth-Shean. Beth-Shean at the Foot of the Mound, in ibid., 223-235; P.E. MacGovern, Beth-Shan, in Anchor Bible Dictionary 1, 693-696; A. Mazar, Four Thousand Years of History at Tel Beth-Shean: An Account of the Renewed Excavations: Biblical Archaeologist 60 (1997) 62-76; S. Hadad, Excavations at Bet Shean. I: The Oil Lamps from the Hebrew University Excavations at Bet Shean, Jerusalem 2002; A. Mazar, Excavations at Tel Beth-Shean 1989-1996. I: From the Late Bronze Age IIB to the Medieval Period, Jerusalem 2006.

C. Pappalardo

SEAL

I. In Greek philosophy - II. In the Old and New Testament - III. In the writings of later Christian authors - IV. In gnosticism.

In Greek thought, the OT and the NT, the writings of Christian authors, and in *gnosticism, the image of the seal, through the idea of "mark" which evokes it, relates to one of the following: the divinity itself, the idea, the intelligence, or the representation that is impressed on the soul, or the sacraments of baptism and confirmation.

I. In Greek philosophy. One can find the concept as early as the (Orphic) Hymns 34, 26, where Apollo is said to possess "a seal that confers a mark on all the cosmos." For Plato, the object known—evidently reduced to the state of an idea—possesses a seal which is impressed on the soul (Theaetetus 192a 4-6); and the understanding "puts a mark on the path of politics" (Polit. 258c 4-5; see Whittaker, Alcinoos 109 n. 219). Just as Plato (in the Theaet. 192a), so too the Stoics established a comparison between the seal and the representation that is impressed on the soul (SVF I, 484, II, 55 von Arnim). Arius Didymus, who is mentioned in Alcinous (Did. 166,39-167,6 Whittaker and in *Eusebius, PraEp. Ev. XI,23,3-4 [Mras 51,18-52,4]—see also Diels, Doxogr. Gr. 447a-b) likens the unique idea-model which brings about the varied corporeal objects in which its form is reproduced to the one seal which gives origin to many marks and images (see Dölger, Sphragis 66, Whittaker, Alcinoos, 27 app. font.).

*Philo of Alexandria, as in the case of Arius Didymus, likens the ideas to the seal (De opif. M. 129 I 44, 20; 134 I 46, 18 Cohn-Wendland, see Whittaker, Alcinoos, 109 n. 219) and has recourse to the image of the seal that is impressed on different materials, conferring its mark to a multitude of objects (Quod. det. pot. ins. sol. 76, I, 275, 25-28), or to that of the seal that is impressed on the soul, which is compared to wax (Quis rer. div. her. 181, III, 4, 18-22). Moreover, drawing near to the conception of the Orphic hymn 34, he presents the universal logos (which is identical to the "idea of the ideas" and to the "idea-model") or as the "seal-model" (archetypos sphragis, De opif. m. 25 I 8, 2-4, De ebriet. 133 II 196, 5-6), or as the "seal of God" (sphragis theou, De plant. 18 II 137, 13), or as the "universal seal" (ton holon sphragis, De mut. nom. 135 III 179, 20-21), or as simply the "seal" (sphragis, De migr. Abr. 103 II 288, 19-20; cf. Dölger, cit., 67 nn. 2, 3, 5, Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit, 17). According to the information provided by Proclus (Def. I: Friedlein 90, 14-17), the Pythagoreans, who can be identified with the Neo-Pythagoreans from the imperial age, presented as "a seal of Rhea" the proper power of the generative divinity of life, and which is diffused in all the cosmos (Dölger, Sphragis, 66 n. 1).

For the Middle Platonist Plutarch (De Is. et Os. 373 A: Bernardakis II 528, 10-13), the forms deriving from the immutable and incorruptible ideas, and ideas that are impressed upon sensible and corporeal objects, which are destined for change and corruption, are comparable to the nonlasting mark impressed by the seal upon the wax (see Whittaker, Alcinoos, 109 n. 219) (the image of wax derives from Platonism and Stoicism, see Plato, Theaet. 194c 4-8, SVF I 484; see in Whittaker, Alcinoos, 97 n. 144; Philo, Quis rer. div. her. 181, cf. supra). The idea of "seal" is referred to implicitly by Plotinus (Enn. V, 3,2 [300, 9-10]) to the second hypostasis, the understanding which transmits its marks (typoi) to the rational faculty of the third hypostasis, the universal soul (see S. Lilla in Storia della teologia I, ed. E. dal Covolo, 273 = Dionigi l'Areopagita e il platonismo cristiano, 100). The comparison that can be detected in Arius Didymus, Philo and Plutarch between the single idea that always remains the same despite its presence in various sensible images and the seal that always remains unique, although impressing itself many times on wax, is taken up by Proclus, who traces the seal back to the soul and the universal understanding (In Parm IV: Cousin 130,17-131,16; see also de Andia, Henosis 83-84).

II. In the Old and New Testament. Especially in the books of Ezekiel and Isaiah, and in the apocryphal Psalm 15 of Solomon and the Odes of Solomon, the sign marked by God—identical to his name—marks the righteous and protects them (Dölger, Sphragis, 55-63, Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 14-15). From this idea *John, in his book of Revelation, derived the theme of the "seal of the living God" marked on the foreheads of God's servants (Rev 7:2-3; 9:4; see Dölger, Sphragis, 57, Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 16). In the letter to the Hebrews and in St. *Paul's writings, the close connection between God the Father and the seal is clearly implicit: Christ bears "the stamp of the Father's substance" (Heb 1:3); and in *baptism God "seals" the human being through the *Holy Spirit (2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:14, 4:30; see also Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 3-7).

III. In the writings of later Christian authors. Following the path of St. Paul—and, with respect to the logos, as well as the path of Philo of Alexandria—patristic authors applied the image of the seal to the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (see Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon, 1355f-1356); and, as Chadwick noted (Origen: Contra Celsum 342 n. 1), they related it to baptism and confirmation (for the pertinent documentation and the history of this theme, see Dölger, Sphragis, 70-80, 148-171, 179-193; Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 46-63, 64-93, 235-246, 297-305; A Patristic Greek Lexicon 1356c-1357).

Under the influence of the OT idea that the seal protects the righteous (see above), the Fathers associated the same sign also to the sign of the cross, which serves to protect them from the attacks of the devil (Dölger, Sphragis, 171-179; Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 261-283; A Patristic Greek Lexicon 1356b).

From the close relationship between the seal and baptism derived several ideas which are its corollaries: the seal is the sign of the Christian message and the Christian faith, the mark pressed on the flock of the faithful, the name of the Son of God transmitted with baptismal water, the symbol of regeneration and transformation produced by baptism (Dölger, Sphragis, 98-119; Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 284-296); thanks to baptism, it protects and assures the Christian of eternal life (Dölger, Sphragis, 119-125, 141-148); it implies that after baptism the Christian is bound to carefully observe specific duties, which cannot and must not be broken by sin (Dölger, Sphragis, 126-140). Its presence in the rite of baptism has a clear parallelism in the mystery rites (Dölger, Sphragis, 156-171).

Conforming himself to the proper tendency of the entire Christian tradition, *Origen associated the seal to baptism (Lampe, Seal of the Spirit, 162-170) and also to the Father and the Son (in In Ioh. I,1,6, p. 4, 25-28: Preuschen; the Lamb is the symbol of the logos); but also in regard to the seal he was not entirely opposed to adopting ideas characteristic of the Greek philosophical tradition: in In Ioh. XX,24,208 (358,23-29) he affirms that one single seal is impressed on various materials, generating numerous similar marks (cf. Arius Didymus and Philo of Alexandria), and that, analogously, the representations produced marks in various subjects (cf. the Stoics); and the same holds for the thoughts or the ideas (cf. Plutarch).

*Basil of Caesarea appropriated the association between the logos and the seal present in the writings of Philo of Alexandria (Hom. 15, De fide: PG 31,468B7; see also S. Lilla in Storia della teologia I, ed. E. dal Covolo, 271, 273 = Dionigi l'Areopagita e il platonismo cristiano, 98, 100).

Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite also made a connection between baptism and the seal (De eccl. hier. II,i, 4 [71, 17, 72, 11], II,ii,4 [75-21-76, 2]); he also made use of the image of the seal that always remains the same and detached, though giving place to different marks to explain how the divinity remains unchanged and transcendent despite being present everywhere (the difference between the various images depends not on the seal but on the nature of the matter that receives the marks; De div. nom. II,5 [12,7-9], II, 6 [129,12-130,4]; see also de Andia, Henosis, 83-84; in these last two passages the theme already present in the writings of Arius Didymus, Philo of Alexandria, Plutarch and Proclus thus returns).

IV. In gnosticism. Likewise in gnosticism the relationship between seal and baptism is constant, and in particular between the seal and the oil used in the related ceremony. *Celsus, who is cited by Origen (C. Cels. VI,2: Koetschau II 97, 2-5), reports the gnostic version of Jesus' baptism: the one who impresses the seal is called "Father," although the one who receives it and the who responds "I have been anointed with the white ointment of the tree of life" is called "young" and "Son" (see Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, 297; Dölger, Sphragis, 89-94; Chadwick, Origen, 342 n. 2). In the gnostic texts the Acts of Thomas chs. 26 (Bonnet 141, 14, 16, 142, 5), 27 (142,7), 131-132 (239,3-4,8), the "seal" practically coincides with the baptism imparted with oil (Bousset, Hauptprobleme, 299; Dölger, Sphragis, 95-96); because of this oil God recognizes his own flock (ch. 26 [141,17-18]). In the Acts of Philip ch. 144 (Bonnet 86,5-8), the shining seal of Jesus Christ is associated with his glorious garment that protects the one who calls upon it and makes that person capable of proceeding beyond the "masters of the world" (kosmokratores) and the "wicked dragon" (ponēros drakōn) (see Bousset, Hauptprobleme, 303).

W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis [Forsch. zur Relig. und Liter. des Alten und Neuen Testaments, 10. Heft], Göttingen 1907 (repr. Göttingen 1973), 297-305; F.L. Dölger, Sphragis. Eine christliche Taufbezeichnung in ihren Beziehungen zur profanen und religiösen Kultur des Altertums [Studien zur Gesch. und Kult. des Altertums Fünfter Band 3/4, Heft], Paderborn 1911; H. Chadwick, Origen: Contra Celsum, Cambridge 1953, 342 nn.1-2; G.W.H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit: A Study in the Doctrine of Baptism and Confirmation in the New Testament and the Fathers, London [2]1967; Id., A Patristic Greek Lexicon fasc. 5, Oxford 1968, 1355-1357; J. Whittaker, Alcinoos: Enseignement des doctrines de Platon, Paris 1990; S. Lilla, L'oriente greco: dai Cappadoci allo pseudo-Dionigi l'Areopagita, in Storia della Teologia I, ed. E. dal Covolo, Rome 1995, 271, 273 = Dionigi l'Areopagita e il platonismo cristiano, Rome 2005, 98, 100; Id., Neuplatonisches Gedankengut in den Homilien über die Seligpreisungen Gregors von Nyssa (Suppl. to VChr. LXVIII), Leiden 2004, 3, 3 n. 4; 9, 9 n. 33; Y. de Andia, Henosis. L'union à Dieu chez Denys l'Aréopagite (Philosophia antiqua LXXI), Leiden 1996, 82-84; LTK 9, 567-568.

S. Lilla

SEBASTE. Sebasteia, Sebastia (modern-day Sivas), in Asia Minor, was established by Pompeii with the name of Megalopolis (Strabo, Geography XII, 37, 560) in the Roman province of Cappadocia. Renamed Sebaste under the emperor Augustus, following the administrative reform it became a metropolis within the Pontus diocese of the province of Armenia Minor, Armenia II after the reform of *Justinian. To Justinian is also owed the reconstruction of the wall (Proc, Aedific. 3,4). It had a strategic and commercial importance along the military roads of the empire, which joined the N of Asia Minor. It was Christian from the 2nd c. onward; it contained five suffragan sees (Sebastopolis, Nicolopis, Colonia, Satala and Berissa). The city had important figures in its bishops, from Meruzanes (3rd c.), the recipient of a letter on penance De poenitentia by *Dionysius of Alexandria on the *Novatian schism (Eusebius, HE 6,46), until Eulalius (or Eulogius), who took part in the Council of *Nicaea, and his son *Eustathius, to the martyrs Biagius and Peter I, and *Peter II of Sebaste, the younger brother of *Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nyssa. Among the numerous martyrs, which spread its fame in all the Christian world, the most noteworthy were the *Forty Martyrs of Sebaste, soldiers of the Legio XII Fulminata stationed since the time of the emperor *Vespasian, who were exposed naked to the ice of a lake frozen over at Sebaste on 9 March of a year between 320 and 324 during the persecution of *Licinius, acc. to the testimony of *Ephrem (?) (Encom. in sanctos XL mart.: J.S. Assemani, t. II, Rome 1743, 341-356; Encom. in Basilium M.: S.G. Mercati, S. Ephraem Syri opera, t. I/1, Rome 1915), of the Acts (BHG 1201ff.) and *Sozomen (HE 9,2) and praised by Basil of Caesarea (in XL mart.) and Gregory of Nyssa (Or. III in XL marts.) among the first. In the 12th c. the city became the see of a Turkish emirate.

DACL 15, 1107-1111; EC 11, 207-208; LTK 9, 556; G. Fedalto, I, 50-54; M. Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, Paris 1740 (repr. Graz 1958), I, 419-434; D.M. Girard, Sivas, huit siècles d'histoire: ROC 10 (1905) 79-95, 169-181, 283-288, 337-349; Fr. Hild - M. Restle, Kappadokien (Kappadokia, Charsianon, Sebasteia und Lykandos), Vienna 1981 (Tabula Imperii Byzantini, 2), 274-276; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford [2]1971, 134, 166-173; N. Garsoïan, Nerses le Grand, Basile de Césarée et Eustathe de Sébaste: REArm 17 (1983) 145-166, repr. in Id., Armenia Between Byzantium and the Sasanians, London 1985; Id., Some Preliminary Precisions on the Separation of the Armenians and Imperial Churches. I. The Presence of "Armenian" Bishops at the First Five Œcumenical Councils, in Καθηγητρια. Essays presented to J. Hussey, Camberley 1988, 249-285; Id., L'Église Arménienne et le Grand Schisme d'Orient, Louvain 1999, CSCO 574 (extensive bibl.); R.C. Blockley, The Division of Armenia Between the Romans and the Persians at the End of the Fourth Century A.D.: Historia 36 (1987) 222-234; M. Girardi, Basilio di Cesarea e il culto dei martiri nel IV secolo. Scrittura e tradizione, Bari 1990, 121-136 ("The Fourty Soldiers of Sebaste") and passim; Id., Basilio di Cesarea. I martiri. Panegirici per Giulitta, Gordio, 40 soldati di Sebaste, Mamante, tr., intr. and notes ed. M. Girardi, Rome 1999; P. Maraval, The Earliest Developments of the Cult of the Forty Martyrs of Sebasteia in the Byzantine East and in the West, in The Forty Martyrs of Sebasteia, Belfast Byzantine Colloquia 1996, 137-155.

M. Girardi

SEBASTIAN. The Roman Depositio martyrum* recalls, for 20 January, St. Sebastian ad catacumbas. *Ambrose added that he was a native of *Milan (In Ps. 118: PL 15,1574): that he lived at the time of *Maximian and *Diocletian and underwent *martyrdom at *Rome. His passion belongs to the epic and cyclical genre: around the primary hero gather, like actors, numerous Roman martyrs, historical or not, whom he aids in prison, among which the *hagiography intertwines some bonds of relationship. This cult, which had developed initially under the shadow of the cult of the *apostles in the basilica bearing their name on the Via Appia, ended up overshadowing that cult. The body of the saint was the object of numerous transfers, certainly partial in some instances, to St. Médard at Soissons, to St. *Gregory at the Vatican, at Fulda, Farfa and other places. The relics worked numerous miracles everywhere.

A. Dufourcq, Étude sur les Gesta martyrum romains, I, Paris 1900, 301-302; Vies des SS. 1, 395-400; LTK 9, 557; BS 11, 776-801; J. Crété, Saint Sébastien et saint Fabien, martyrs: Itinéraires (Paris) 328-330 (1988-89) 106-107; C. Saliou, Du légendier au sermonnaire: avatars de la Passio Sebastiani: REA 36 (1990) 285-297.

V. Saxer

SEBEOS (Eusebius). Armenian bishop from the 1st half of the 7th c. According to later testimonies, he was the author of a History of Heraclius, only a few fragments of which are known. He was wrongly identified with the author of an anonymous treatise titled *The History of Chosroes II (i.e., the king of Persia, 590–628).

Editions: F. Macler, Histoire d'Héraclius par l'évêque Sébéos, Paris 1904; G.V. Abgaryan, Patmow'tiwn Sebēosi [history of Sebeos], Erevan 1979; C. Gugerotti, Sebïosi, Storia. Traduzione dall'armeno, introduzione e note (Eurasiatica 4), Verona 1990; The Armenian History Attributed to Sebeos, I, tr. and notes by R.W. Thomson; II, Historical commentary by H. Johnston, Liverpool 1999.

Studies: J.-P. Mahé, Critical Remarks on the Newly Edited Excerpts from Sebeos, in T. Samuelian - M. Stone, Medieval Armenian Culture (Armenian Texts and Studies 6), Chico, CA 1984, 218-239; R.W. Thomson, Biblical Themes in the Armenian Historian Sebēos, in G.I. Reinink - A.C. Klugkist, After Bardaisan: Studies on Continuity and Change in Syriac Christianity in Honour of Professor Han J.W. Drijvers, Leuven 1999, 295-302.

S. Voicu

SECOND COMING of CHRIST. Apocryphal text. An apocalyptic text preserved the Ethiopian, translated from the Arabic; the original Greek text was written in the 2nd/3rd c.; it shares some commonalities with the Apocalypse of Peter. It treats the following topics: the resurrection, the last judgment, the punishment of the damned and the joy of the saved.

S. Grebaut, ROC 15 (1910) 198-214; 307-323; 425-439 (with Fr. tr.).

M. Starowieyski

SECRETUM (Secrecy). According to Heinrich Georges (p. 2559), the noun secretum has essentially two meanings: it can refer, first, to isolation, i.e., solitude. In this sense, this isolation can more precisely determine the spatiality, even the recollection that takes place there and the means of communication: e.g., the secretum longum or ambigua secreta or secretum petere.

Second, the noun secretum can also include the idea of secrecy or mystery, e.g., when it designates secret thoughts (secreta nostra, secret teachings) or actions (secretiorae artes, magic arts). In this sense the term can also refer to the rites of initiation, which have as their scope one's participation in the divine destiny or the divine vital force (σωτηρία). This cultic convention, however, was rejected with the Platonist doctrine of spiritual ascent toward the divinity. One should not, therefore, exclude that these mysterious arts carried out in secretarium (Georges, p. 2558) also represented the most intimate essence of the ambigua secreta. The noun secretarium above all signified the separated place, i.e., the special place in which the cultic activities took place (the temple, the interior place of the sacrifices). In the Christian church it referred to a sacred place, in which the most sacred things were kept, i.e., the *Eucharist and the Sacred *Scriptures. In a broad sense, however, the term secretarium also contained legal and political dimensions, when it is used to refer to places of religious or political decisions. Thus the term secretarium was used to indicate the interrogation room in a legal context and, consequently, the political assembly hall, e.g., the secretarium of the senate. Subsequently the ecclesiastical synods took place in the secretarium, as did the Synod of *Carthage in the year 525.

Literate Christians knew the aforementioned meanings of the term secretum/μυστήρια. Nevertheless, its meaning was decisively changed. Both the biblical and Christian authors, in fact, related the term secretum esp. to the divine revelations pertaining to the kingdom of God (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ). Therefore, the term secretum was often used in the context of Jesus' parable narrations (parabolē—Mt 13:11; Mk 4:11; Lk 8:10). Thus the term secretum more specifically characterized the kingdom of God, but at the same time it did not yet reveal the mystery. In the secretum, the human being contemplates the face of God. Last, however, with this term the mystery of Christ was also expressed in a special way (Phil 2:6-9; Col 2:2). The prophecies which were still hidden were fulfilled in the person of Jesus Christ. But also the church, it sacraments and its teachings were secreta et ineffabilia sacramenta, secreta iudiciorum, secretum tabernaculi. The Fathers, therefore, saw in the secretum of the incarnation of Jesus Christ the foundation of the church's mysterious marriage with Christ.

For the philosopher and rhetorician *Marius Victorinus, who had converted to Christianity, the secretum dei was above all Christus dictus sapientia (Adv. Ar. III, 10). Through his own cross, i.e., through the latitudo, longitudo, altitudo and the profundum of the cross, Christ has manifested to humankind God's love and in this way even love for oneself (caritas Christi). For Faustinus the Luciferian the mystery of the *incarnation represented the central point of the sacraments the secretum fidei (De Trin. XX, 1). Even for *Ambrose, the mystery of divine filiation (De Patriarchis 11,51), the secretum altiora mysteria (Exp. Ps. CXVIII, 17,11) can be perceived only if one withdraws in secreto mentis animae (Exp. Ps. CXVIII, 2,29) or in secreto cordis (Exp. Ps. XIX, 25). Already very early *Augustine also used in a figurative manner the expressions secretarium mentis (De Trin. 7,8; Io. ev. tr. 23,9; En. in Ps. 34,2,3) or secretarium templi, where the heart is the sanctuary where God dwells (En. in Ps. 78,8) and, therefore, one can bring about there in the most intense manner, the human being's encounter with God (secretarium veritatis). The heart, therefore, can even be the place of distance from God (deserto secretario conscientiae, Gn. adv. Man. 2,6). Consequently the orientation and the preparation of the human heart remains decisive. Thus the heart is identified with the inner person (Lib. arb. 2,42; see also, Orig., Hom. 10,3: interiorem hominem et cordis secreta).

Real-Encyklopädie der christlichen Alterthümer, 2, 748; NP 2, 315-316; G. Lampe, 1230; TWNT 4, 809-835; RAC 14, 1093-1131; H. Georges, Ausführliches Lateinisch-Deutsches Handwörterbuch, Basel [9]1951, 2258-2559; G.A. Wewers, Geheimnis und Geihmhaltung im rabbinischen Judentum, Berlin-New York 1975; J. Pépin, L'arcane religieux et sa transposition philosophique dans la tradition platonicienne, in Mélanges Mario Dal Pra, Milan 1984, 18-35; L. Brisson, Usages et fonctions du secret dans le pythagorisme ancien, in P. Dujardins, Le secret, Paris-Lyon 1987, 87-101; W.B. Kees (ed.), Secrecy in Religion, Leiden 1987; M. Giebel, Das Geheimnis der Mysterien. Antike Kulte in Griechland, Rome und Ägypten, Zürich 1990 (It. tr. I culti misterici nel mondo antico, Genoa 1993); K. Vandorpe, Breaking the Seal of Secrecy: Sealing-Practices in Graeco-Roman and Byzantine Egypt on Greek, Demotic and Latin Papyrological Evidence, Leiden 1995.

J. Lam Cong Quy

SECUNDIANUS of Singidunum. An *Arian priest, he was the bishop of Singidunum (Belgrade) upon the death of *Ursacius (ca. 370–375). In 381 he was sentenced and deposed, along with Palladius of Ratiaria, at the Council of *Aquileia (381).

M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 441; Y.-M. Duval, La convocation du concile d'Aquilée de 381, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V. XXX Incontro di Studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 3-5 maggio 2001: SEA 78 (2002) 421-437.

M. Simonetti

SECUNDINUS, Manichean. Manichaean auditor at Rome (late 4th c.). *Augustine mentioned his work titled Contra Secundinum manichaeum as the last of his writings explicitly against the *Manicheans (Retr. II,10), which suggests a date after 404 for its completion. In all actuality, the work is a letter written in response to a preceding letter written by Secundinus. We even have the fortune of possessing a letter written by Secundinus, from which Augustine cited only a few lines in his response. In effect, both letters were preserved in a single MS. Secundinus referred to himself as a Roman (and to Augustine as Punic), but we know nothing else of him. He states that he knows Augustine through his writings and greets him with flattering titles, although it seems that the two never met. In the Retractations, Augustine calls Secundinus an auditor, although it is not clear how he obtained this bit of information about this individual.

Secundinus wrote to Augustine velut amicus, honorifice obiurgans, but his words of praise are shown to be false by his reproaching tone, because he accused Augustine of not being able to understand the struggle undertaken by the Father, his firstborn and the Holy Spirit against the forces of evil, and he was, therefore, never a true Manichean. Secundinus's objective is that of defending Manicheism against some of the first critiques raised by Augustine, esp. pertaining to the two eternal principles and the revelatory value of the OT. Secundinus concluded with an invitation to the bishop of Hippo to turn to his earlier religion ("the way of the truth and knowledge") and to lend his eloquence to the fight against Catholicism. In addition to responding to Secundinus, the treatise C. Secund., which Augustine regarded as his favorite anti-Manichaean work, gives us a brief summary of the arguments of his first controversies. Augustine's greatest merit stands in the fact that he allowed this letter to which he then responded to be preserved in the same MS.

CPL 324, 325; PL 42, 571-602; CSEL 25/2, 893-947; BA 17, 510-633; P. Alfaric, L'évolution intellectuelle de saint Augustin, I, Paris 1918, 88-89, 215-216; F. Decret, L'Afrique manichéenne (IVe-Ve siècles): Étude historique et doctrinale, II, Paris 1978, 99-108; J. van Oort, Secundini Manichaei Epistula: Roman Manichaean "Biblical" Argument in the Age of Augustine, in J. van Oort - O. Wermelinger - G. Wurst (eds.), Augustine and Manichaeism in the Latin West, Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies 49, Leiden 2001, 161-173.

J.K. Coyle

SECUNDINUS of Ireland, bishop (d. ca. 447). His name was Sechnall. He was perhaps one of the first missionaries who came (from *Gaul?) into Ireland in the 5th c.; acc. to tradition, he was the son of the "Lombard" Restitutus and *Patrick's sister. Secundinus was the author of an abecedarian hymn in honor of St. Patrick (inc. Audite omnes) preserved in the antiphonary of Bangor (ff. 13v-15v) and bearing the title Ymnum Sancti Patrici (*see Audite omnes amantes). During the Middle Ages, Secundinus was remembered locally as a saint on 27 November.

Kenney, I, n. 87, 258-260; CPL 1101; PL 53, 837-840; 72, 590-592; W. Stokes, The Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, London 1887, II, 382-384; F.E. Warren, The Antiphonary of Bangor, London 1893-1895, II, 14-16; C. Blume, Analecta hymnica Medii Aevi 51, Leipzig 1908, 340-346; L. Bieler, The Hymn of St. Secundinus: PRIA 55 (1953) 117-127; BS 11, 805-807; L. Bieler, St. Secundinus and Armagh: Seanchas Ardmhacha 2 (1956) 21-27; M.W. Herren, An Early Irish Precursor of the "Offiziendichtung" of the Carolingian and Ottonian Periods: Euphrosyne 22 (1994) 291-300.

E. Malaspina

SECUNDUS, gnostic. One of the first disciples of the *gnostic teacher *Valentinus and therefore to be dated around the mid-2nd c. His written works no longer survive, and the only information we have about him comes from *Irenaeus, who in Adv. Haer. I,11,2 briefly reports some of his teachings, immediately after having explained those of Valentinus, in a form varying from these teachings, leaving one therefore to suppose that for the remainder, he thought in the manner of Valentinus: "Secundus, for his part, maintained that the first Ogdoad consisted of a Tetrad to the right and a Tetrad to the left, and taught that one was called 'light' and the other 'darkness.' In his opinion, the power that separated from the rest and fell did not proceed directly from the thirty aeons but was produced by them." As far as we can see, it seems that Secundus's ideas were very close to both *Valentinus and *Ptolemy the Gnostic, another Valentinian.

C. Colpe, Gnosis II (Gnostizismus): RAC 11 (1980) 538ff.; M.A. Williams, Rethinking "Gnosticism." An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category, Princeton, NJ 1996; C. Markschies, Die Gnosis, Munich 2001; K.L. King, What Is Gnosticism?, Cambridge, MA-London 2003; A. Marjanen (ed.), Was There a Gnostic Religion?, Göttingen 2005; K.L. King - R. van den Broek, Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, I, eds. W.J. Hannegraaff et al., Leiden-Boston 2005, 412.

I. Ramelli

SECUNDUS of Tigisis. Bishop of Tigisis (today Ain el Bordj in Algeria, between Constantine and Madauros) and the primate of *Numidia at the beginning of the 4th c. After the persecution of 303, *Mensurius the bishop of *Carthage wrote him a letter describing what had occurred at Carthage and how he had hidden the *Scriptures (Augustine, Brev. collat. III,13,25: CSEL 53,75). Secundus answered him describing what had occurred in Numidia during the persecution of 303 and that he had not handed over the Scriptures. Thus we see that communion between the two primates still existed at this time. In the so-called Council of *Cirta (Constantine) from the year 305 (Lancel dates it 307)—which was in reality a gathering of 12 bishops to ordain *Silvanus in this city—Secundus, who presided over it, opened the gathering by asking that each person make an examination of conscience regarding whether he was a traditor. The request was justified by the fact that among those who were to be ordained were those who had been traditores. On this occasion Secundus was accused by Purpurius of Limata, who was also guilty of serious crimes, of having himself been guilty of being a traditor and other crimes (Gesta apud Zenophilum: CSEL 26,186-197; *Optatus of Milevis, De schism. I,14: CSEL 26, 16; Augustine, Brev. collat. III,15,27). Having obtained the general agreement of entrusting to God the responsibility of each one present, they proceeded to the ordination of Silvanus in the place of the deceased Paul.

Upon the election of *Caecilian as bishop of Carthage, the bishops of Numidia gathered together for one week in the city (311/312). Secundus presided over this meeting. These bishops, with their primate as the leader, supported the opponents of Caecilian, who had been accused of having been ordained by *Felix of Aptunga, a traditor, and ordained in his place *Maiorinus, who had been protected by *Lucilla. Secundus, as noted many times by *Augustine, had thus not only forgiven the traditores who had gathered in the meeting of Cirta, but was also unable to prove his innocence before the other bishops. In fact, even he had brought about the condemnation of an individual who was absent (Caecilian), with an unproven accusation and elected in his place another bishop, thus becoming the one responsible for the formal act of the Carthaginian dissent into a *Donatist ecclesial structure (Augustine, Contra Gaud. I,37,47; Contra Ep. Parm. I, 3,5; Ep. 43,2-9; Ep. 53,2,4). Moreover, it was the Donatists who regarded Secundus's consecration of Maiorinus as the moment in which the *schism began (see Gesta apud Zen.: CSEL 26,185 and 189).

Monceaux IV, 7-10; BA 32, 738-739; PCBE 1, 1052-1054; S. Lancel, Les débuts du Donatisme: la date du "Protocole de Cirta" et l'élection épiscopale de Silvanus: REAug 24 (1979) 217-229; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000.

A. Di Berardino

SECUNDUS of Trent (d. 512). Monk of Non who in the year 602 baptized at Mainz the king of the *Longobards (Lombards) Adaloald the son of *Agilulf and *Theodelinda. He was the author of the Historia Langobardorum, now lost, a text used by Paul the Deacon (Historia Langobardorum IV,27). During those years the church of Trent was favorably disposed to the *Three Chapters, as was Secundus of Trent; for this reason he wrote to Pope *Gregory the Great without receiving a response; he then asked Queen Theodelinda to request a response (Gregory the Great, Ep. 14,12). The question is asked whether Secundus should be identified with the monk *Secundinus (PCBE 2, 2014 n. 8), to whom Gregory in the year 599 sent a letter (9,147), which illustrates the question of the controversy of the Three Chapters, to which the recipient seemed favorably disposed.

K. Gardiner, Paul the Deacon and Secundus of Trento, in History and Historians in Late Antiquity, eds. B. Croke - A.M. Emmett, Sidney 1983, 147-153 (on the possibility that Paul had used the preceding chronicle—now lost—of Secundus of Trent); R. Cervani, La fonte tridentina della "Historia Langobardorum" di Paolo Diacono: Atti. Acc. Roveretana degli Agiati 26 (1986) 97-103; G. Voltolina, Secondo di Trento, un benedettino alla Corte dei Longobardi: Riv. Cistercense 10 (1993) 51-58; Patrologia IV, 245; PCBE 2, 2017.

A. Di Berardino

SEDATUS of Béziers (Sedatus Biterrensis). Sedatus, or Sedatius, was the bishop of Béziers and took part in the Third Council of *Toledo (589), which saw the gathering of bishops and delegates from the entire Visigothic kingdom: *Spain and Narbonese France. During the same year, in the month of November, he was present at the Council of *Narbonne and put his signature immediately after the Metropolitan Migetius, a sign of respect owed perhaps to his advanced age (Verbraken).

Some sermones have been passed down under the name of Sedatus, which recent scholarship, starting from A. Wilmart and G. Jouassard, has attributed to *Sedatus of Nîmes, who was also present at the Council of *Agde (506) and perhaps that of *Toulouse of the preceding year.

Verbraken, however, has maintained that the Epistola sancti Sedati episcopi ad consolacionem et terrorem peccatorum (cod. A 24 Sup. from the Ambrosiana MS collection in Milan) should be attributed back to Sedatus of Béziers. This MS comes from Certosa di Asti (15th c.) and is ascribed to Sedatus of Nîmes in the CPL (n. 1005b) and the PLS (3, 445). Annotated by G. Morin, the Epistola was published in 1980 by Verbraken, who strongly denied authorship by the bishop of Nîmes. The same Epistola was published in 1992 by M.G. Bianco, who used in addition to the Ambrosiana MS a codex from the Biblioteca Nazionale Vittorio Emmanuele of Rome (n. 1190). This scholar, who attributed it to Sedatus of Nîmes, showed, however, how parts of the text are identical to Caes. Arel., Serm. 56,2-3, *Faustus of Reiz, Serm. 14 and ps.-Aug., App. 249,5-6 and App. 260,2. A. Finally, A. Solignac is inclined to attribute the Epistola to Sedatus of Nîmes, in the entry Sédat de Nîmes for the DS (1990); Solignac, however, distinguishes, along with Verbraken, secs. 6-11 of the Epistola, which are probably the work of a different hand.

Lacking the formal characteristics that were specific to the composition of letters (sender, recipient, superscription, greetings, du-Stil), this text is, instead, more of a monitio than it is a letter. The following themes are discussed: the benefits of conversion, it does not matter if it occurs late in life (see Ezek 18:21); the external signs of penitence and the necessity of joining bonae operae to vestimenta religiosa; the proclamation of future punishments (octo damnaciones) for the sinner; the three steps (tres mansiones) of the sinner and the righteous, respectively death, judgment and damnation, or transit into heaven, resurrection with the saints and eternal life; the six cogitationes that save the soul; the five ways in which God facit iusticiam cum sanctis suis. What is also significant—also for the attribution to Sedatus—is the importance attributed to the question of the clothing and the mention of the tonsure, both (clothing and tonsure) at the center of the Council of Narbonne. The synod, in fact, was in direct contact with the Council of *Toledo, which had among other things made laws on the tonsure and the clothing proper to penitents. The question of the clothing of clerics was explicitly raised in the first canon.

PLS 3, cols. 445-446 (writings attributed to Sedatus of Nîmes and to Sedatus of Béziers); Concilia Galliae. A. 511 – A. 695, ed. C. de Clercq, CCL 148 A (1963) 257; La collección canónica hispana, V: Concilios Hispanos. Segunda parte, eds. G. Martinez Diez - F. Rodriguez (Monumenta Hispaniae Sacra. Serie Canónica 5), Madrid 1992, 141; Epistola: CPL 1005; CPPM 3535; P.-P. Verbraken, Traces d'un "De consolatione peccatoris" attribuable à Sedatus de Béziers: RBen 90 (1980) 135-139; M.G. Bianco, Sedato di Nîmes, "Consolatio et monitio peccatoribus," in "Humanitas" classica e "sapientia" cristiana. Scritti offerti a Roberto Iacoangeli, ed. S. Felici, Rome 1992, 287-303; W. Bergmann, Studien zu einer kritischen Sichtung der südgallischen Predigtliteratur des fünften und sechsten Jahrhunderts, I, Leipzig 1898, 279-305; A. Wilmart, Une homélie de Sedatus, évêque de Nîmes, pour la Nativité de Notre-Seigneur: RBen 35 (1923) 5-16; G. Morin, Bulletin d'ancienne littérature chrétienne latine 1 (1921-1928): RBen 41 (1929) n. 212, 103; G. Jouassard, Saint Césaire d'Arles et Sedatus de Nîmes: Science Religieuse 31 (1941–1943) 211-215; P.-P. Verbraken, Sermons jumeaux de Sedatus de Nîmes pour la fête de Noël: RBen 88 (1978) 81-91; DS, 14, coll. 508-510 (A. Solignac).

B. Clausi

SEDATUS of Nîmes (6th c.). Sedatus had a good classical training and became the bishop of Nîmes around the year 500. (He should not be confused with *Sedatus of Béziers, as has been done in the PL 72,771-72.) He was the friend of *Ruricius of Limoges, who wrote various metrical poems for him (1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 44) and *Caesarius of Arles. Although he had written many sermons, there remains only one, on Christmas, which was quoted by Cesarius of Arles (Sermo 190). The other two sermons are of uncertain authenticity (one likewise on Christmas and the other on Epiphany) and three letters.

Editions: see CPL 1005: Sermo de Natali Domini: PLS 4, 1927-1929 [is reused by Caesarius of Arles, Serm 190. The same sermon is found in the Codex Mellicensis 218 (E. 8), where the exordium is changed]; Sermo de Natali Domini (uncertain): CPL 1006; PL 39, 1977-1981; Homilia de Epiphania (uncertain): CPL 1007; PL 39, 2013-2015; PL 72, 771-774; CSEL 21, 247-252; Epistulae: see CPL 1005c. Ep. (inter Fausti Ep.) 15,16,19; PL 58, 865; another unedited letter is found in the Codex A 24 Sup. Bibl. Ambr. Moreover, G. Morin thought he had found some of Sedatus's texts in the writings of Caesarius of Arles (Serm. 56,4; 57,4; 193; 194).

Studies: W. Bergmann, Studien zu einer kritischen Sichtung der südgallischen Predigtliteratur, I, Leipzig 1898, 279-305; A. Wilmart, Une homélie de Sedatus, évêque de Nîmes pour la Nativité de Notre Seigneur: RBen 35 (1923) 5-16; P.-P. Verbraken, Sermons jumeaux de Sedatus de Nîmes pour la fête de Noël: RBen 88 (1978) 81-91; Patrologia IV, 300-301.

M. Maritano

SEDULIUS. Caelius Sedulius, born in S *Gaul or in N *Spain, he was—acc. to the subscriptio of the Codex Gothanus (8th c.)—a layman who studied in *Italy and composed his works in Greece, during the time of the emperors *Theodosius II and *Valentinian III, between the years 425 and 450. The title antistes and episcopus (present in some MSS) and verses 23-25 from book 1 of the Pasch. Carm., which present him as a man who worked tirelessly in his efforts for the choir, leads one to believe that he was presbyter. In five books he composed a hexameter paraphrase of the gospels, which he titled the Paschale carmen, drawing inspiration from the text of 1 Cor 5:7 Pascha nostrum immolatus est Christus. The first book mentioned the salient deeds of the OT, freely chosen without rigorous order, and the other four a paraphrase of the gospel narratio from the annunciation to the ascension of Christ, enriching it with digressions and enlivening it with the colores of classical (Virgil, but also Lucan and Claudian) and Christian poetry (*Juvencus, *Prudentius, *Paulinus of Nola).

Book 1, considered by some to be foreign to the economy of the poem, is justified from within the polemic against those who reject the OT (*gnostics, *Marcion). The two testaments have one single author and are inconceivable when separated from each other. Christ was already present in the ancient law and governed the two Testaments (1,145-146). In the OT, the Father works with the Son; in the NT, the Son acts with the Father (1,291-296). The poem is preceded by a letter written in prose addressed to Macedonius, which contains a sort of autobiographical confession as well as the poetic program of the author, which inspires the decision to compose the work and justifies the choice of the poetic form, emphasizing the learned character of the public to which it is addressed. After the dedicatory epistle there follows a praefatio written in eight distichs, all centered on the motif of the banquet, which, inasmuch as it is a metaphor of the Last Supper, is central in the economy of salvation. The paschales dapes allude to the title of the work in its subject, Christ, the sacrificial lamb becoming the eucharistic food. Lacking in this are the typical elements of the proemium acc. to the ancient instructions, which we find, however, in the first book in hexameters, which exhorts one to reject the deceitful contents of classical poetry (1,17-22), against which the paraphraser pits his poetic project, which is read for the practice of psalmody (1,23-26: Cur ego Dauiticis adsuetus cantibus odas / cordarum resonare decem sanctoque uerenter / stare choro et placidis caelestia psallere uerbis, clara salutiferi taceam miracula Christi?). With respect to his predecessor Juvencus, Sedulius used more sources, at times conflating them, or even a harmony of the gospels, dating back to the very tradition of the Syriac Diatessaron, and the practice of a freer paraphrase, both in relation to the succession of events in the evangelical epitext and the abundant use of the resources of rhetoric (exclamation, apostrophes, rhetorical questions, amplifications, additions), and last, to the continual attention in bringing forth from the reworded episodes the theological and spiritual meaning. Essentially christocentric, Sedulius's poem does not restrict itself to the simple rewriting of the life of Christ, because he leaves space for exegesis, drawing on the Psalms and St. Paul's epistles. At times, the poet indulges in symbolic developments, as in the case when he recognizes in the four arms of the cross the four regions of heaven: Christ on the cross shows his sovereignty over heaven, extending his members to its four points (5,182-95). Shortly after the Council of *Ephesus in 431, Sedulius inserts into his poem a prayer directed to the Virgin *Mary, the Theotokos (2,63-72). The poem, which was published in the year 494 by Turcius Rufus Asterius, enjoyed great success during the Middle Ages (Springer, 128-150); Remigius of Auxerre (9th c.) has left us an Expositio of this poem (which was partially published in the CSEL 10,316-359).

The Paschale carmen was reparaphrased by Sedulius in a heavily rhetorized prose, the Paschale opus, which has the objective, as he himself states in the Letter to Macedonius, of filling some lacunae present in the Carmen and of answering some accusations of unfaithfulness directed at his paraphrase (dicentque nonnulli fidem translationis esse corruptam). Sedulius must have drawn from a biblical exegetical literature (commentaries, lists) that was widespread during his time.

Two hymns in praise of Christ have been attributed to Sedulius. The first is, in effect, a poem written in elegiac meter consisting of 55 distichs. Another one of his well-known writings was a work titled (absent in the codices) Collatio Veteris et Novi Testamenti, which makes reference to its typological-christological character. The hymn is a brief history of salvation and is established on episodes of the OT christologically interpreted and pertains to Christ's miracles and life. The second, A solis ortus cardine, is an abecedarian hymn in 23 tetrastichic strophes of iambic dimeters, used in the liturgy.

Editions: CPL 1447-1454; PL 19, 433-752, 753-770 (Hymns); J. Huemer, CSEL 10 (1885); F. Corsaro, Sedulio poeta, Catania 1956 (collects three studies, the second of which contains the Italian translation of the poem and the hymns).

Studies: Patrologia III, 304-308 (bibl.); G. Boissier, Le Carmen Paschale *et l'*Opus Paschale de Sedulius: Rev. Philol. 6 (1882) 28-36; Th. Mayr, Studien zu dem Paschale Carmen des christlichen Dichters Sedulius, Augsburg 1916; C. Weyman, Beiträge zur Gesch. der christlich-lateinischen Poesie, Munich 1926, 121-137; A.D. McDonald, The Iconographic Tradition of Sedulius: Speculum 8 (1933) 150-156; E. Bitter, Die Virgil-Interpretation der frühchristlichen Dichter Paulinus von Nola und Sedulius, Tübingen 1948 (Diss.); G. Moretti Pieri, Sulle fonti evangeliche di Sedulio: Atti e Memorie Acc. Tosc. La Colombaria 34 (1969) 125-243; Ch. Witke, Numen Litterarum. The Old and the New in Latin Poetry from Constantine to Gregory the Great, Leiden-Cologne 1971, 206-218; I. Opelt, Die Szenerie bei Sedulius: JbAC 19 (1976) 109-119; R. Herzog, Die Bibelepik der lateinischen Spätantike, Munich 1975, LII-LIV; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975, 41-45, 64-68, 87-90; C. Tibiletti, Note al testo del "Paschale Carmen" di Sedulio, in Forma Futuri. Studi in onore del card. M. Pellegrino, Turin 1975, 778-785; A. Grillo, La presenza di Virgilio in Sedulio poeta parafrastico, in R. Chevallier (ed.), Présence de Virgile. Actes du Colloque des 9, 11 et 12 Décembre 1976, Paris 1978, 185-194; M. Donnini, Alcune os- servazioni sul programma poetico di Sedulio: RSC 26 (1978) 426-436; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 248-252; G. Malsbary, Epic Exegesis and the Use of Virgil in the Early Biblical Poets: Florilegium 7 (1985) 55-83; M. Roberts, Biblical Epic and Rhetorical Paraphrase in Late Antiquity, Liverpool 1985; S. Costanza, Da Giovenco a Sedulio. I proemi degli "Evangeliorum libri" e del "Carmen Paschale": Civ. Cl. Cr. 6 (1985) 253-286; C. Dermot Small, Rhetoric and Exegesis in Sedulius' Carmen Paschale: Classica et Mediaevalia 37 (1986); C.P.E. Springer, The Gospel as Epic in Late Antiquity. The Paschale Carmen of Sedulius, Leiden 1988; A.V. Nazzaro, Sedulio, in Enciclopedia Virgiliana, IV, Rome 1988, 751-752; Id., Poesia biblica come espressione teologica: fra tardoantico e altomedioevo, in F. Stella (ed.), La Scrittura infinita. Bibbia e poesia in età medievale e umanistica, Florence 2001, 130-152 (on Juvencus 1, 224-70 and Sedulius 2, 73-133); F. Stella, Poesia e Teologia. L'Occidente tra IV e VIII secolo, Milan 2001, 47-58.

A.V. Nazzaro

SELEUCIA - CTESIPHON
I. The city - II. Councils.

I. The city. Seleucia-Ctesiphon was the name of two ancient twin cities on the Tigris River ca. 60 km (37.3 mi) N of Babylon and ca. 35 km (21.7 mi) S of Baghdad. The first, Seleucia (today Tel Umar), was established by Seleucus I Nicator around the year 312 BC on the right bank of the river, with a mixed population of Greeks and Babylonians. It was destroyed by the Roman general Cassius in the year AD 164. The second, Ctesiphon (today Salman Pak), was established by the Parthians on the opposite bank of the river, thus becoming the winter residence of the Arsacids and the capital of the *Sassanids until the Arabic conquests (636). The first place to have a Christian witness was the hill of Koha, between the two cities, which was subsequently incorporated in the Sassanid Ardashir's new capital around the year 230 (the Mahoza of Jewish and Christian sources, Veh Ardashir for the Iranians). The name of the twin cities was used to refer to the center of the Persian Orthodox Church, which subsequently became *Nestorian, in all likelihood from the 3rd c. and until the Abbasids (750–1258), the era in which this center moved to Baghdad. The bishop who resided at Seleucia-Ctesiphon since the Synod of Mar *Isaac, in 410, carried the title of *catholicos and later (between 450 and 550) that of catholicos-patriarch. The collection of synods that were held there, which gathered probably under *Timothy I around the year 800, allows one to reconstruct for almost four centuries the expansion of the *Persian church (which was Nestorian after the synod of 486), its chronology, its prosopography, and the evolution of its teaching and discipline. This important source was published by J.-B. Chabot, which was supplemented with a French translation, titled Synodicon orientale (Paris 1902).

PWK 21/1, 1148-1184; PWK Suppl. 4, 1102-1118; KLP 2, 369; 5, 83-85; Ortiz de Urbina 121-122; LTK 9, 651-652; CE 13, 54; M. Streck, Seleucia und Ktesiphon, Leipzig 1917; M.J. Huggins, Chronologus of the Fourth Century Metropolitans of Seleucia-Ctesiphon: Traditio 9 (1953) 45-100; W. de Vries, Antiochien und Seleucia-Ctesiphon, Patriarch und Katholikos?, in Mélanges Tisserant, III (ST 233), Rome 1964, 429-450; J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310, subs. 3A, Louvain 1970, 40-44; Encyclopedia Iranica, s.v. Ctesiphon.

F. Rilliet

II. Councils. Seleucia-Ctesiphon, at least since the beginning of the 4th c., was the see of the catholicos or the archbishop of the East, i.e., of the highest ecclesiastical authority of the Persian Empire. It was, therefore, the theater of numerous synods (at a certain point expressly provided for at two-year intervals), the most famous of which were the synod of 399–400, presided over by *Maruta of Maiferqat, which ratified the end of the imperial persecutions from the 2nd half of the 4th c. and nominated *Isaac to the position of catholicos; the synod of 410, presided over by Maruta and Isaac, which reorganized the ecclesiastical structure and the legislative ordinances (introducing the so-called canons of *Nicaea) and proclaimed (or rather, confirmed) the autonomy of the Persian church with respect to the "Western" church (probably the patriarchate of Antioch); the autonomy, by that point very great, became total independence with the synod of 422; the synod of 486 under *Barsauma attests the full transition of the Persian church to "*Nestorianism" and legitimated the marriage of bishops.

Palazzini 5, 41-45; J.B. Chabot, Synodicon Orientale, Paris 1902; J. Labourt, Le christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide (224-632), Paris 1904; J.-M. Fiey, Les étapes de la prise de conscience de son identité patriarcale par l'Église syrienne orientale: Or Syr 12 (1967) 3-22; J. Gribomont, Le symbole de foi de Séleucie-Ctésiphon (410), in A Tribute to A. Vööbus, Chicago 1977, 283-294; A. Vööbus, The Canons Ascribed to Maruta Maipherqat and Related Sources, CSCO 439-440/syr 191-192, Louvain 1982; C. Baumer, Frühes Christentum zwischen Euphrat und Jangtse. Eine Zeitreise entlang der Seidenstraße zur Kirche des Ostens, Stuttgart 2005, 65-110.

S.J. Voicu

SELEUCIA - CTESIPHON, School of. *Mar Aba, the famous teacher at the school of *Nisibis, toward the end of the years 530–540 established a second large school in the Persian capital, Seleucia-Ctesiphon, bringing with him his students *Ishai, *Thomas of Edessa and *Cyrus of Edessa, whom he respectively nominated rector, teacher and translator at the new school. This foundation made part of an attempt, on the part of one group of theologians who had gathered around their great teacher, to spread the spirit of the school of Nisibis throughout the entire Persian territory.

Baumstark, 118-123; Bettiolo, Lineamenti, 521, 570-571.

K. den Biesen

SELEUCIA in ISAURIA, Council of. Called by the emperor *Constantius, in conjunction with the Western Council of *Rimini, to restore peace to the church, which had been deeply disturbed by the events that occurred between the years 357 and 358 due to the age-old *Arian controversy, the Council of Seleucia of Isauria (Asia Minor) opened on 27 September 359 in the presence of nearly 160 bishops and lasted two days. The anti-Arian majority, represented in large part by the *homoiousians, led by *Silvanus of Tarsus, *Eleusius of Cyzicus and *Eustathius of Sebaste, imposed the formula of faith of Antioch (341), rejecting, after fierce debates, a formula of compromise presented by *Acacius of Caesarea, in the name of a minority that united homoians and pro-Arians: this formula rejected on the one hand the homoousios and the anti-Arian homoiousios* and on the other the Arian anomoion*, and proposed to only affirm that Christ was similar to the Father. With this formula rejected, its supporters boycotted the council's work, which, to their detriment, promulgated an excommunication and a deposition from ecclesiastical office.

But the commission and the council, which communicated its results in October to Constantius, who was residing at *Constantinople, found the emperor to be very hostile because he favored instead the formula given by Acacius. There then followed long discussions, during which news had arrived that the Western bishops gathered at Rimini yielded to the formula of faith supported by pro-Arians and the emperor, which was in accord with the formula drafted by Acacius of Caesarea. For this reason, Constantius also ordered the signing of that formula for the representatives of the Council of Seleucia who had come to him and was able to obtain it after much insistence. The last signatures were given on the night of 31 December.

Hfl-Lecl 1, 929-955; Simonetti 314, 326-338; A. Miranda, Chiesa "orientale" ed "occidentale" nel sinodo di Seleucia-Rimini, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli IIIV. XXX Incontro di Studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 3-5 maggio 2001: SEA 78 (2002) 461-470.

M. Simonetti

SEMIARIANS. *Epiphanius (Panar. 73) referred to the *homoiousians in this manner: ἡμιάρειοι, which *Filaster (Haer. 67) and *Augustine (Haer. 51) rendered with the title semiarriani. The title is tendentious and arises from the overly simplistic identification of anti-Arian orthodoxy with Nicene theology established on the term homoousios, misunderstanding the fundamental orthodoxy of the anti-Arian supporters of the term homoiousios.* If ever applicable to a specific group, the title semiarians could have, more reasonably, characterized those homoiousians who after the year 360 separated from the group inasmuch as they refused to recognize the divinity of the *Holy Spirit and the term homoousios, which other homoiousians had accepted between 363 and 366. In other contexts, they were referred to as "*Macedonians."

The De haeresibus of Saint Augustine: A Translation with an Introduction and Commentary by L.G. Müller, Washington, DC 1956, 179.

M. Simonetti

SEMI-PELAGIANS. Supporters of a theological movement that flourished in the 5th c. in *Gaul. Current tendency is to call them the teachers from Provencel or Marseille; the term "semi-Pelagians," which came into use at the beginning of the 17th c., insinuates a collusion with Pelagianism. These were the primary centers of the movement: the small island of *Lérins opposite Cannes and *Marseille. *John Cassian, a Western author who knew Eastern theology and was full of ascetic experience acquired in the deserts of *Egypt, established two monasteries at Marseille; he died around the year 435. *Honoratus, at the beginning of the century, established a monastery at Lérins, in which lived such famous monks as *Vincent of Lérins, as well as *Hilary, *Lupus, *Faustus, and *Eucherius, with his sons *Veranus and *Salonius, who were bishops in Gaul. The primary sources for this teaching were as follows: John Cassian, Conl. XIII, the two letters written to *Augustine by *Prosper of Aquitaine and Hilary, and the treatise De gratia by *Faustus, who was bishop of Riez and died at the end of the century.

The semi-Pelagians were against Pelagius no less than Augustine. They acknowledged original *sin, the necessity of baptism and *grace for salvation. They separated themselves from Augustinianism on the problem of the distribution of grace and the beginning of the salvific act. According to Augustine, from the massa perditionis of all humanity, God chose ante constitutionem mundi with a free and merciful decree, some people, without any merit of their own, to be elect and predestined infallibly to eternal life. Other people, the object of God's just judgment and not of his mercy, were left to their own (relinquuntur) in a state of damnation (Persev. 14,35). Thus the possibility of being saved is not given to all. The semi-Pelagians taught that Christ died for all humanity and that all people were called to salvation: there is no exclusion of anyone from God's side. According to the theological anthropology of Faustus of Riez (De gratia II,12), God created humanity by granting not only free will, but also a bonum naturae, the inclination to the good, the ability to discern between good and evil, piety toward God, abundance of grace, wisdom and prudence. Evil is foreign to human nature. The natural goodness that renders human beings in the image of God is also presented in a *Stoic garment, bonae semina voluntatis (ibid. I,12), an idea derived from John Cassian (Conl. XIII).

According to Augustine, these gifts have been totally lost with original sin, not being natural (Praed. sanct. 5,10). Everything that pertains to eternal life derives not from nature, which is tainted, but from grace, which restores nature (Prosp., C. Coll. 13,5).

These gifts, however, which the semi-Pelagians considered to be natural because given with the same human nature, which God conceived and brought to completion with creation, have been seriously changed by original sin but not destroyed: what is part of nature can diminish but not entirely cease. There is present in every human being, therefore, the principle of good, operating on the level of salvation. With the gifts of nature one can enter the vestibula salutis; with the subsequent grace of Christ one is introduced ad ipsa vitae penetralia (Faust., De gratia II,9). In virtue of this initial bona voluntas, each person has an incipient faith (ibid. II,8) and can turn to God with prayer (ibid., II,12), although, for Augustine, both the bona voluntas (Civ. Dei XIV,11) and faith, in its beginnings and its progression (Praed. sanct. 11,22), and the ability to pray (Persev. 23,64) are the works of God. Salvation, even in its very beginning, for Augustine, is the work of gratia Dei per Iesum Christum; for the semi-Pelagians salvation can begin by prima gratia or the gifts of creation and must be brought to completion by gratia Christi: dona praestita per naturam, sed confirmanda per gratiam (Faust., De gratia II,12). God the Creator is not different from God the Redeemer; the author of nature is also the author of grace (ibid. II,10). Thus falls the objection that both salvation, in its beginning, is a human work: the human being acts with the gifts received from God in creation. The gifts of redemption are, therefore, far superior to those of creation (ibid. II,10). For Faustus, one can never attribute to oneself even the beginning of salvation (ibid. II,10): it is to be attributed entirely to God; the gratia Christi is always a free gift and never a recompense for merit. Human initiative made possible by the gifts of creation, far from establishing merit, is only a condition so that the gratia Christi may work (Faust., Ep. 1). Both Cassian and Faustus recognized that often, with his grace, God anticipates human initiative. The semi-Pelagians maintained that in this way they safeguarded the foundational characteristics of grace: necessity, gratuity and prevenience.

Faustus's treatise reflects the teaching of the Council of *Arles (473) and *Lyons, shortly after. Conversely, the Second Council of Orange (539), presided over by *Caesarius of Arles, states that to work, ut expedit, any bonum pertaining to eternal life is not possible per naturae vigorem, but only through the illumination and inspiration of the Holy Spirit (can. 7, DS 180). Faith (fides) is always a gift of God and is not derived from nature (DS 200). At the same time *predestination to evil is condemned.

Faustus of Riez and the semi-Pelagians of the 5th c. cannot formally be called "heretics": only in the year 529 was the semi-Pelagian teaching condemned. The Council of Orange, not completely accepting Augustine's teaching on grace, offered no decisions on the chief point of the controversy and on the essential difference between Augustinianism and semi-Pelagianism (Koch, Der heilige Faustus, 194, 204).

Primary Sources: John Cassian: CPL 512-513; Conlatio 13: PL 49, 897-954; CSEL 13; SC 54, 147-181; Faustus of Riez: CPL 961; PL 58, 783-836; CSEL 21; Prosper: CPL 523; Letter to Augustine: PL 44, 947-954; BA 24, 392-412; Hilary, Letter to Augustine: PL 44, 954-960; BA 24, 414-434.

Studies: A. Koch, Der heilige Faustus. Bischof von Riez. Eine dogmengeschichtliche Monographie, Stuttgart 1895; DTC 14, 1786-1850; M. Simonetti, Il De gratia di Fausto di Riez: SSR I (1977) 125-144; C. Tibiletti, Giovanni Cassiano. Formazione e dottrina: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 355-380; S. Pricoco, L'isola dei Santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978; C. Tibiletti, Libero arbitrio e grazia in Fausto di Riez: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 259-285; Id., La salvezza umana in Fausto di Riez: Orpheus n.s. 1 (1980) 371-390; furthermore, the bibl. in BA 24 and in Patrologia III, 486-496; Patrologia IV, 254-259; DSp 14 (1990) 556-568; A.Th. Smith, De gratia: Faustus of Riez's Treatise on Grace and Its Place in the History of Theology, Notre Dame, IN 1990; Giovanni Cassiano, Conferenze ai Monaci, Rome 2000; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, t. VI: Les derniers écrits de Jérôme et l'oeuvre de Jean Cassien (414-428), Paris 2002.

C. Tibiletti

SENATOR of Milan (5th c.). A simple priest, he was one of the few envoys sent by Pope *Leo the Great, along with *Abundius of Como and Eterius of *Capua, in the summer of 450 to carry to *Constantinople three letters pertaining to the condemnation of *Eutyches's teachings (Ep. 69 to the emperor *Theodosius II; Ep. 70 to the Empress *Pulcheria; and Ep. 71 to the archimandrites and the presbyters who were faithful to Bishop *Flavian). The delegation also had the objective of verifying the orthodoxy of the new bishop of Constantinople *Anatolius; moreover, the delegation also brought the Tomus ad Flavianum to be signed also by *Anatolius. Upon returning to *Rome the delegation presented an account of their trip to Pope *Leo.

In the following year, Senator went to *Milan, with Abundius, with one of Leo's letters to explain the outcome of the Council of *Chalcedon (the Council of *Milan [451]). He then served as the bishop of Milan for three years between 470 and 480. In a song he was also praised by *Ennodius for his learning (Carm. II,87).

PCBE 2, 2021-2023.

A. Di Berardino

SENECA and PAUL, Correspondence of. This apocryphal collection of letters exchanged between Seneca and *Paul was mentioned for the first time by *Jerome (De Vir. Ill. XII), who included the pagan philosopher in his work on famous men because this epistolary exchange was read very often. Nevertheless, *Lactantius (Div. Inst. VI,24,13-14) shows that at the beginning of the 4th c. this collection was not yet known; therefore, it has been commonly accepted that it was composed during the period between these two works. It seems that the coincidence that Seneca and Paul were at Rome during the latter's imprisonment, in addition to the sympathy toward the *Stoic philosopher for the closeness of his thought to Christianity, supplied the basis for the anonymous author of the correspondence to conceive that there was a friendship between the two men. The idea of the legend of such a friendship solidified during the Middle Ages.

The collection is composed of 14 brief letters in Latin, sent by Seneca to Paul and six from Paul to Seneca. Only the last five bear a date, but they are not arranged in chronological order. One would expect that they would treat theological and philosophical topics; but in these letters Seneca and Paul dwell on trifling matters, stylistic formalities and displays of mutual affection. The primary objective of this correspondence was apologetic: to promote the acceptance of Holy *Scripture despite its impoverished style in the learned context of the 4th c. through the figure of Seneca, who had come to esteem Paul's writings. It is interesting how in the letters the *pagan philosopher insistently urges Paul to write with more formal elegance, and he supposes that the apostle had written in Latin.

C.W. Barlow, Epistolae Senecae ad Paulum et Pauli ad Senecam, Rome 1938 (= PLS 1, 673-678); L. Bocciolini Palagi, Epistolario apocrifo di Seneca e San Paolo, Florence 1985; E. Liénard, Sur la correspondance apocryphe de Sénèque et de saint Paul: RBPh 11 (1932) 5-23; P. Benoit, Sénèque et Paul: RBi 53 (1946) 7-35; A. Somigliano, Note sulla leggenda del cristianesimo di Seneca: Rivista St. Italiana 62 (1952) 325-344; A. Kurfess, Zum dem apokryphen Briefwechsel: Aevum 26 (1952) 42-48; J.N. Sevenster, Paul und Seneca, Leiden 1961; M. Natali, Epistolario tra Seneca e San Paolo, Milan 1995; A. Fürst, Pseudepigraphie und Apostolizität im apokryphen Briefwechsel zwischen Seneca und Paulus: JbAC 41 (1998) 77-117; Th. Fuhrer - F. Siegert - P. Walter, Der apokryphe Briefwechsel zwischen Seneca und Paulus, Tübingen 2006.

O. Jiménez

SENIORES LAICI. A modern expression to refer to an African institution designated with different terms. The first mention of the seniores laici is in the writings of *Tertullian (Apol.. 39,5), the meaning of which, in the context and the treatise De paenitentia (9,4), seems to have referred to the clergy (presbyters) because it is said that they presided in the community: Praesident probati quique seniores, honorem istum non pretio, sed testimonio adepti. Even the treatise Passio Perpetua uses the term, but it indicates persons who were different from the presbyters (12,4-7; cf., 13,1). In the year 303, a civil official, in a village close to *Carthage, called together the seniores plebis, Christians who were different from the clergy (Passio Felicis, ed. Musurillo, p. 266). In a legal case from the year 314 (or 315), a certain individual named Maximus who represented the *Donatist party spoke in the name of the seniores christiani, who were charging their bishop *Felix of a crime (Acta purgationis Felicis: CSEL 26, p. 198; Duval p. 234 and p. 239, where mention is also made of tres seniores). In the trial that took place in 320 at Cirta (Gesta apud Zenophilum), raised by Nundinarius against *Silvanus, reference is made numerous times to the seniores; from the narrative, one concludes that they were a group and that they had a certain authority distinct from that of the clergy for the secular affairs and that they could also raise charges against the bishops for internal conflicts within the community; they represented the Christian community. *Optatus of Milevis recalls how Bishop *Mensurius of Carthage, having to leave his church as a result of the persecution of *Diocletian, entrusted the goods of the church to the fideles seniors (De schismate 1,17: PL 11,918). Using various expressions, *Augustine often made reference to laypeople who had a role in the church. One of his letters (Ep. 78: PL 33,267) is titled dilectissimis fratribus, clero, senioribus et universae plebi. He also in other places uses the term seniores (Contra Cresc. 3,29,33: PL 43, 513-514); seniores ecclesiae (Contra Cresc. 3,56,62: PL 43, 529); seniores nobilissimi (Enarr. in Ps. 36,2,20: PL 36,378). The Council of Carthage (403): magistratus vel seniores locorum (ed. Munier, CCL 149, p. 210; seniores of Nova Germani, p. 217). *Ambrosiaster affirms that at this time the seniores no longer existed as an institution (Com. in Ep. Tim. 5,1,1: PL 17, 475-476); naturally he was referring to his Italian context. The African elders of the 4th and 5th c. did not belong to the clergy and had not received ordination but were also distinct from the ordinary fideles; they resided among the Catholics and also among the Donatists (Augustine, En. in ps. 36, sermo 2,20: CCL 38,363; Contra Cresc. 3,46,62: PL 43,529); their duties had to be administrative and that of a counselor. Their institution and function derived from the synagogal tradition (Caron; Frend; Quispel), or better yet the tradition of the African villages of the Maghreb that had a council of elders, because the existence of the seniores laici was a typically African phenomenon (Shaw). In this case preceding forms of organization were taken up by Christian communities.

P.G. Caron, Les seniores laici de l'Église africaine: Revue Internationale des droits de l'antiquité 6 (1951) 7ff.; P. Monceaux, Les seniores laici: Bulletin Societé Nationale des Antiquaires de France (1903) 283-286; DACL 8, 1053-1064 e 15, 1198-1200; A. Vilela, La condition collégiale des prêtres au III^e siècle, Paris 1971; W.H.C. Frend, The seniores laici and the Origins of the Church in North Africa: JTS 12 (1961) 280-284; P.G. Caron, I poteri giuridici del laicato nella chiesa antica, Milan ²1975; G. Quispel, African Christianity Before Minucius Felix and Tertullian, in Actus: Studies in Honour of H.L.W. Nelson, ed. J. den Boeft - A.H.M. Kessels, Utrecht 1982, 257-335; B.D. Shaw, The Elders of Christian Africa, in Mélanges offerts en hommage à Étienne Gareau, Ottawa 1982, 207-226; D. Rankin, Tertullian and the Church, Cambridge 1995 (see p. 141); Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000.

A. Di Berardino

SENTENTIAE EPISCOPORUM. The text, the complete title of which is Sententiae episcoporum numero LXXXVII de haereticis baptizandis, is a text transmitted among *Cyprian's works. These are the statements, faithfully recorded, of 87 African bishops who participated at a council, the third of the series, held at Carthage on 1 September 256 in relation to the baptismal controversy that had arisen between Cyprian and Pope *Stephen. Cyprian, it seems, called the council, presided and acted as secretary. Eighty-seven bishops coming from Proconsular Africa, *Numidia and *Mauretania were present. Natalius of Oea represented two absent bishops. The gathering was held in the presence of the presbyters, deacons and laity. Cyprian delivered a brief opening speech and encouraged the free response of each bishop, who must not be the judge of his colleagues, because each one received authority from Jesus Christ. All the bishops intervened with one declaration, which was promptly recorded. Many of these either begin with the biblical citation or rather refer to one to justify their own statement. The bishops, repeating Cyprian's ideas, esp. those expressed in his letter to Jubaianus, took a stance against the validity of baptism administered by heretics or schismatics. Cyprian concluded the statements by saying that his sententia was fully expressed in a letter to Jubaianus, whose episcopal see is not mentioned. *Augustine, in the treatise De baptismo contra donatistas, cites almost in full and comments on the individual statements of the bishops, some at length (6,9–7,44). The list of episcopal sees, some unidentified, is very useful for the reconstruction of the intense diffusion of Christianity in North *Africa, esp. in the proconsular province. One can count more than 130 episcopal sees, some very close to each other (3/4 km [.5 mi]). There also exists a Greek version of the statements recorded both in the PL and the CCL.

CPL 56; PL 3, 1090-1116; CSEL 3, 1, 435-461; ed. G.F. Diercks, CCL III/E (2004); E.W. Benson, Cyprian: His Life, His Times, His Work, London 1897, 331-436 and 565-610; DTC 1, 390-418; P. Batiffol, Les règlements des premiers conciles africains: BALAC 3 (1913) 1-19; P. Batiffol, Origines de règlement des conciles, in Études de liturgie et d'archéologie chrétienne, Paris 1919, 84-153; M. Bévenot, Cyprian's Platform in the Rebaptism Controversy: Heythrop Journal 19 (1978) 123-142; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979, 476-482; Y. Duval, Densité et répartition des évêchés dans les provinces africaines au temps de Cyprien: MEFRA 96 (1984) 493-521; J.A. Fischer, Das Konzil zu Karthago im Spätsommer 256: AHC 16 (1984) 1-39; E. Contreras, Sententiae episcoporum numero LXXXVII de haereticis baptizandis: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 407-421; Id., Las actas del tercer concilio bautismal de Cartago del año 256: Teología 24 (1987) 29-57; M. Marin, Le sententiae LXXXVII episcoporum: in margine al problema del rapporto fra Sacra Scrittura e Concili: Invigilata lucernis fons 11 (1989) 329-359; J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, Paderborn 1997; P. Bernardini, Le sententiae episcoporum del concilio cartaginese del 356 e la loro versione greca. Nuova edizione del Corpus Christianorum: Cristianesimo nella Storia 27 (2005) 477-498.

A. Di Berardino

SENTENTIAE S. AUGUSTINI et ISIDORI. This anonymous text in PL 90,647-652 was published with the title De computo dialogus. It begins with *Augustine, who affirms that the four elements, like the foundation of *Scripture, are necessary in the church: the divine canon, history, number and grammar. Number because it serves to determine future events and feasts; this affirmation is illustrated with a long citation of *Isidore of Seville, who praises number, and a citation from Augustine's work (Etymol. 3,4; De libero arb. II,16,42; see Cassiodorus, Inst. II,4,7). Therefore, it proceeds in the form of a dialogue with questions and answers between the teacher and the student. Number (or computus) was established at the beginning of creation and the instrument of order in the cosmos; it is an art connected with the part of philosophy called physics, which in turn is subdivided into the quadrivium. The various numbers are then listed and explained. In the so-called Sirmond MS, the dialogue is preceded by a prologue and chapters (capitula), perhaps an integral part of it; and it is subsequently followed by another small work titled De divisionibus temporum liber (PL 90,653-664 in a later redaction). This last book taken from the division of time in 14 segments from the smallest (Atomus, momentum etc.) to the largest (aetas, saeculum, mundus). The three texts probably formed one sole work, a scholastic text, known and widely used by the Venerable *Bede in his treatise De temporum ratione.

Editions: CPL 2312; H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller. Verzeichnis und Siegel, Freiburg i.Br. 1995, 175; CPPM II 3097; CPPM III,A 622/d; M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature. 400-1200, Dublin 1985, 323. The prologue in C.W. Jones, Bedae opera de temporibus, Cambridge, MA 1943, 393-394; De divisionibus temporum: C.W. Jones, Bedae Pseudoepigrapha, Ithaca-London 1939, 48-51.

Studies: C.W. Jones, Bedae opera, 109; F. Wallis, Bede: The Reckoning of Time, Liverpool 1999, XXIII-XXV; LXXIII; P. Piccari, Il Computus nell'Alto Medioevo, in R. Capasso - P. Piccari (ed.), Il tempo nel Medioevo. Rappresentazioni storiche e concezioni filosofiche, Castel Madama (Rome) 2000, 49-62; D. Ó Cróinín, Early Irish History and Chronology, Dublin 2003.

A. Di Berardino

SEPTEM ORDINIBUS, De. A document written probably after the year 420, but it could also have originated in *Spain at the end of the 6th c. It appears as Ep. 12 of ps.-Jerome. The seven levels of the ecclesiastical hierarchy (fossarii, ostiarii, lectores, subdiaconi, levites or diaconi, sacerdotes, episcopi) are explained esp. on the basis of the Bible and their function in the church.

CPL 764; CPPM II A 861; A.W. Kalff, Ps.-Hieronymi De septem ordinibus ecclesiae, Würzburg 1937; G. Morin, Le destinataire de l'apocryphe hiéronymien "De septem ordinibus ecclesiae": RHE 34 (1938) 229-244; R.E. Reynolds, The Pseudo-Hieronymian "De septem Ordinibus Ecclesiae": RB 80 (1970) 238-252; H.J. Frede, Kirchenschriftsteller, Freiburg [4]1995, 534.

S. Samulowitz

SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS, emperor. He was born at *Leptis Magna in 145 and died at Eboracum, modern-day York, in AD 211. About 187 he married as a second wife Julia Domna from the house of the priests of *Emesa who had introduced her to the beliefs and worship practies of the Eastern religions. In the family of Septimius Severus one thus finds the tendencies and mindsets of the empire's two most eccentric provinces, *Africa and *Syria: this would have an impact on his religious politics. He was the emperor from 193 to 211; he lived during an extremely difficult period, through internal turmoil and external wars.

With respect to the Christians, during the first years of his reign he had a tolerant attitude: the synods and the assemblies of bishops that were held in many cities to examine the question of the date of *Easter is a proof of this tolerance. There are not lacking several instances of violence which seem to be isolated (thus in the year 197 a persecution broke out at Carthage, which should probably be put in connection to the arrival of the new proconsul). With the beginning of the 3rd c., the situation seems to have totally changed. (Perhaps the demand of maintaining the cohesion of the empire might explain this new attitude.) If one regards as authentic the information contained in the Historia Augusta (see Spartianus, Septim. Sev. 17,1), in 202 the emperor through an edict prohibited Jewish and Christian proselytism (Iudaeos fieri sub gravi poena vetuit. Idem etiam de Christianis sanxit). As a result, with a general legislative provision directed against the Christians (and Jews), their propaganda must have been halted, striking esp. the catechists.

Recent criticism has been clearly divided over the reliability of this passage from the Historia Augusta: several scholars in fact regard it as the fruit of fantasy or false information; others do not see any convincing reasons to accept it. Those were important years for Christianity: because of the presence of important figures—*Tertullian, *Origen, Pope *Victor (189–199) and Pope *Zephyrinus (199–217)—and because of the work of movements that by reviving apocalyptic hopes—such as *Montanism—actually weakened the unity of the empire. Undoubtedly the situation of the church seems to have become worse in the tenth year of the reign of Septimius Severus: *Eusebius of Caesarea informs us (see HE 6,1ff.; 6,7ff.) of persecutions, famous martyrdoms that occurred (1) in *Alexandria, where the faithful were brought from all of *Egypt and *Thebaid and where, among others, *Leonides, *Origen's father, was martyred; (2) in Africa as inded the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis narrates and *Tertullian confirms; and likewise (3) in Cappadocia and probably at *Antioch and *Jerusalem.

With the emperor Caracalla (211–217) the persecution subsided; one therefore concludes that if the edict did exist, it was not applied by Septimius Severus's successors. In recent decades, talk about the emperor and his religious politics has come up again. According to some scholars (Wypustek), during Septimius Severus's time the persecution against the Christians, though having a local character, had a noteworthy broadness, brought about by two elements: the growing hostility, at the popular and official level, against magic and the activity of the *Montanists, whose practices were considered close to those of the astrologers and the *magi. On the contrary, acc. to others (Daguet-Gagey), none of the emperor's edicts openly targeted the Christians; actually, the open adherence of famous individuals from the court and members of the senatorial families to the Christian faith marked a definitive act of the church's conquest of the empire (dal Covolo). And what is more, multiple contacts between the two institutions would also be reflected in the harmony between the religious ideology of the court and the monarchian hegemony of the Church of *Rome. It is certain, as has been noted (Mazzarino, L'Impero romano, II,483), that there has never again been such an era so dense with absurdity, to the point of paradox, as the time of Commodus and Severus: it also shows the coexistence of widely varying elements from the propensity toward the message of Christ by some important figures of that time to violent episodes of persecution against Christians.

M. Platnauer, The Life and Reign of the Emperor L. Septimius Seuerus, Oxford 1918; PWK, II A, 1940-2002 s.v. Severus; S. Mazzarino, L'Impero romano, II, Bari 1973, 434 ff. (bibl. on pp. 604 ff.). On the reliability of the information from the Historia Augusta, see among others, in the negative sense, T.D. Barnes, Legislation Against the Christians: JRS 58 (1968) 32-50; R. Freudenberger, Das angebliche Christenedikt des Septimius Severus: WS 81 (1968) 206-17; in favor, see W.H.C. Frend, A Severan Persecution? Evidence of the Historia Augusta, in Forma Futuri. Studi in onore del Card. M. Pellegrino, Turin 1975, 470-480; V. Grossi - P. Siniscalco, La vita cristiana nei primi secoli, Rome 1988, 37-45 and 170-205; A.R. Birley, The African Emperor Septimius Severus, London-New Haven ²1988; E. dal Covolo, I Severi e il cristianesimo. Ricerche sull'ambiente storico-istituzionale delle origini cristiane tra il secondo e il terzo secolo, Rome 1989 (extensive bibl., pertaining to the ancient sources and studies, at pp. 95-107); K. Christ, Geschichte der römischen Kaiserzeit, Munich ³1994; A. Wypustek, Magic, Montanism, Perpetua and the Severan Persecution: VChr 51 (1997) 276-297; Gli imperatori Severi: storia, archeologia, religione, ed. E. dal Covolo - G. Rinaldi, Rome 1999; K. Rosen, LTK³ 9, 475; A. Daguet-Gagey, Septime Sévère. Rome, l'Afrique et l'Orient, Paris 2000; Id., Septime Sévère; un empereur persécuteur des Chrétiens?: REAug 47 (2001) 3-32.

P. Siniscalco

SERAPEION (Serapeum) in Alexandria. Every temple consecrated to the god Serapis was a Serapeion. The most famous in all antiquity was in *Alexandria, and its first nucleus seems to be due to Ptolemy I Soter; Ptolemy II enriched the temple with a library. Ptolemy III built up the temple anew; the works were supervised by the architect Parmeniscus. Emperor *Claudius enlarged the building and made it more magnificent. A first destruction of the Serapeion occurred under *Trajan, due to a Jewish revolt; it was rebuilt under *Hadrian (117–138), when a statue of the sacred bull Apis was also added to it. Its splendor and lavishness were extolled by *Ammianus Marcellinus (XII,16,12) as second only to those of Rome's Capitoline Hill. Its definitive destruction, as a symbol of paganism, took place under Bishop *Theophilus of Alexandria in AD 391. A Christian church was built up on its remains, and a community of monks settled there.

Pagan and Christian sources provide different versions of the facts. *Eunapius (Lives of the Sophists, 421 Boissonade) claims that the Serapeion was destroyed for no plausible reason; the statues and all sacred objects were stolen, and only the floor remained, since it was too heavy to be removed. Then, a group of monks was introduced there. *Socrates (HE V,16-17) recounts that Theophilus obeyed Emperor *Theodosius's order concerning the destruction of pagan sanctuaries. So "he purified the Mithreion and destroyed the Serapeion." First, he brought the sacred objects out of the temple and exposed them to ridicule. The *pagans, offended, attacked the Christians, and a sort of civil war arose in Alexandria. Theophilus had all idols destroyed apart from the statue of a deity represented as a monkey, again for the sake of derision of paganism. "The Serapeion was demolished and despoiled." During this operation, hieroglyphic inscriptions were found carved upon stones, which included signs resembling crosses, and a discussion arose concerning the possibility of a reference to Christ's cross. *Sozomen (HE VII,15) also indicates the public exposure of the symbols of pagan mysteries, directed by Theophilus, as the cause that aroused the pagans' indignation, so that clashes followed between pagans and Christians in Alexandria. He goes on to say that the heathens closed themselves up in the Serapeion and used it as a fortress; they even held Christians prisoner in it and tortured and killed them. The facts were reported to Theodosius, who proclaimed the Christian victims martyrs and ordered the destruction of the pagan temples but forgave the pagans in hopes that his clemency would induce them to convert to Christianity. When the emperor's edict (dating to 16 June 391, from *Aquileia) was read, the Christians in Alexandria cried out of joy, and those in the Serapeion were frightened and fled. The Christians, then, occupied the place. Sozomen refers to both the demolition of the temple and its conversion into a Christian church. *Rufinus (HE XI,23), after providing a fine description of the Serapeion, reports the same version as Sozomen, but emphasizes that the Serapeion was leveled, the statue of Serapeion burnt, every bit of precious material removed, and a community of monks from the desert was established upon its ruins. He also observes that Theophilus unmasked the lies of the priests of the Serapeion (V,22). Other Christian authors who speak of the destruction of the Serapeion with satisfaction are *Sophronius, who even wrote a work titled The Demolition of the Serapeion (*Jerome, Ep. CVII,2; *Paulinus of Nola, Carmen XIX,109; *Theodoret, HE V,22,3). According to Eunapius (Lives of the Sophists, 472 Boissonade), Theophilus after this had many other pagan temples destroyed and many other statues eliminated.

E. Testa, Legislazione contro il paganesimo e cristianizzazione dei templi (sec. IV-VI), Liber Annuus 41 (1991) 311-326, esp. 315-316; J.C. Haas, Alexandria in Late Antiquity: Topography and Social Conflict, Baltimore 1996; S. Ensoli, I santuari di Iside e Serapide a Roma e la resistenza pagana in età tardoantica in Aurea Roma, Rome 2000, 273-282; What Happened to the Ancient Library of Alexandria?, ed. M. El-Abbadi - O. Fathallah, Leiden 2008.

Ilaria Ramelli

SERAPION of Antioch (2nd c.). Eighth bishop of *Antioch whose episcopate corresponds roughly to the reign of the emperor *Septimius Severus, or rather to the period 190–210. Some fragments of one of his anti-*Montanist letters have been preserved, Epistula ad Caricum et Pontium, and of a letter to the church of Rhosos near Antioch against the *docetic teaching contained in the Gospel of Peter (Euseb., HE 5,19,2-3 and 6,12,3-6). A long fragment of the Gospel of Peter, discovered by Bouriant at Akhmim in 1886, corresponds exactly to Serapion's description. *Eusebius knew of a third letter of Serapion to a certain Domnus, who had converted to *Judaism, and suggests that other writings of his probably existed which have, however, been lost (HE 6,12,1).

U. Bouriant, Fragments du texte grec du livre d'Enoch et de quelques écrits attribués à saint Pierre, in Mémories publiés par les membres de la mission archéologique française au Caire 9/1, Paris 1892, 93-147; W. Bauer, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei, Tübingen [2]1964, 22-24, 146-147; J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, Paderborn 1997, 23-59.

K. den Biesen

SERAPION of Thmuis (d. after 362). Friend and disciple of *Anthony the Great, Serapion was famous for the "amazing sanctity of his life and the power of his eloquence" (Sozomen, HE 4,9), and was nicknamed "the scholastic" for his learning, genius and erudition (see Jerome, De vir. ill. 99). He became the superior of a monastic community and then in 339 bishop of Thmuis, on the delta of the Nile. He had a great relationship with *Athanasius of Alexandria, from whom he received various letters: in 339 a first (PG 26, 1412-1414), in 358 another, in which he referred to the details of *Arius's death (PG 25, 685-690), then in the year 359/360 four (or three) important letters on the divinity of the Holy Spirit (PG 26,529-676), which represent an essential treatment on this question. In all likelihood Serapion was present at the Council of *Serdica in 343 and defended Athanasius (see Athan., Apol. contra Ar. 50); likewise in 356, with four other bishops, he refuted the libelous statements against Athanasius before the emperor *Constantius II (Sozomen, HE 4,9). Serapion himself suffered because of the persecution: he was exiled, and the Arian Bishop Ptolemy seized his episcopal see: for this reason Jerome called him in confessione inclytus (De vir. ill. 99). He died after 362. His feast day is celebrated on 21 March in the Latin church; 7 March, in the Coptic church.

From his noteworthy literary production (see Jerome, De vir. ill. 99), some letters remain (the letter of encouragement to the monks of Alexandria is important) and a treatise against the *Manicheans, Contra Manicheos, where he shows his great rhetorical, philosophical and theological learning, criticizing the system of the two principles, the good and the evil, and by demonstrating the contradiction and inconsistency of the foundational teachings of Manicheism. His treatise on the Psalms, however, has been lost.

The Eucology, which bears his name, is generally recognized as his. There are about 30 prayers: 18 refer to the eucharistic liturgy, 7 to baptism and confirmation, 3 to ordination and 2 to the blessing of the oils and the funerals. The *anaphora is explicitly attributed to Serapion. It includes the preface, the Sanctus, the *epiclesis of the consecration and communion addressed to the Logos and not the *Holy Spirit (a particularity that is exclusive to this anaphora), the intercession of the living for the dead, the recitation of the *diptychs and for those who have brought the oblations. It is an interesting text for the history of the Egyptian liturgy of the 4th c., in which stabilized texts and the redactor's personal edits are mixed.

Editions: CPG 2485-2495; PG 40, 895-942; Contra Manichaeos, ed. R.P. Casey, Cambridge, MA 1931 (the only complete edition): for new fragments of the letter, see CPG 2488-2493; Eucology: G. Wobbermin, TU 17/3b, Leipzig 1898; F.E. Brightman: JTS 1 (1899/1900) 88-113, 247-277; F.-X. Funk, Didaskalia et Constitutiones Apostolicae, II, Paderborn 1905, 158-195 (with Latin tr.); E. Lodi, Enchiridion Euchologicum fontium liturgicorum, Rome 1979, nn. 563-569. It. tr. A. Hamman, Le preghiere dei primi cristiani, Milan 1954 and 1983, 159-181.

Studies: DACL 11 (1933) 606-612; DTC 14 (1941) 1908–1912; PWK Suppl. 8 (1956) 1260-1267; Patrologia II, 81-87; A. Peters, Het Tractaat van Serapion: SE 2 (1949) 55-94; B. Capelle, L'anaphore de Sérapion: Muséon 59 (1946) 425-443; B. Botte, L'Euchologe de Sérapion est-il authentique?: OC 48 (1964) 50-56; K. Gamber, Die Serapion-Anaphora ihrem altesten Bestand nach untersucht: Ostkirliche Studien 16 (1967) 33-42; P.E. Rhodopoulos: The Sacramentary of Serapion, Thessaloniki 1967; M.D. Dufrasne, Les tendences ariennes et pneumatomaques de l'Eucologue du Pseudo-Sérapion, (Diss.) Louvain 1981; BBKL 9 (1995) 1404-1405; M.E. Johnson, The Prayers of Sarapion of Thmuis: A Literary, Liturgical and Theological Analysis (OCA 249), Rome 1995; A. Verheuil, La prière eucharistique dans l'Euchologe de Sérapion: Questions Liturgiques 80 (1999) 374-383.

M. Maritano

SERDICA (Sardica)

I. The city and Christian origins - II. Council.

I. The city and Christian origins. As with the rest of the modern-day cities in Bulgaria, the origin of the city of Serdica (today Sofia, the capital of Bulgaria) was lost during the period before the Christian era. As an area of little importance, it was the center of the territory of the Thracian tribe of the Serdi or the Sardi, where the two forms of the name derived (Serdica or Sardica), the first of which subsequently prevailed. According to the most likely hypothesis, the name, etymologically speaking, would derive from a term whose meaning corresponds to the late Slavic term srêda, sreda ("middle, center"); therefore, after the 6th c. it was transformed by the Slavs, following the precise translation, into Srêdec (-tz).

Serdica is found on a vast and fertile tract of land, at the slopes of the mountain Skomios (now Vitosa) at the intersection of the main roads from the SW (*Macedonia), from the NW (from the famous Via Diagonalis, which began from Singidunum [modern-day Belgrade] on the Danube River through Naissus, Remesiana, Serdica, Philippopolis toward *Byzantium-*Constantinople), and finally, on one road that came down from the N along the River Oescus (today Iskur). After conquering Macedonia (146 BC), the Romans subsequently pushed toward the interior of the Balkan Peninsula; in 29/28 BC, M. Licinius Grassus subjected these regions to Rome and so too the tribes of the Serdi. Once *Thrace had also been conquered, the strategia of Serdica was organized in this region, including a very vast territory with the occupied center of Serdica. The site was fortified and the relative communication was organized in a stable way. During the war with the Dacians over the Danube, the emperor *Trajan (98–117) visited the Balkan Peninsula and, among other things, greatly contributed to the development of Serdica, which was organized as a municipium and fortified, receiving the name of Ulpia Serdica. With the construction of various fortresses, streets, bridges etc., having a popular memory connected to the name of the famous emperor, a section of the Via Diagonalis to the W of Serdica has preserved to this day the name via Traiana. Remains of the fortification built at the time of Trajan were brought to light by archaeological digs. When *Aurelian (270–275) was forced to abandon *Dacia (part of modern-day Transylvania and Wallachia), he organized the cis-Danubian into Dacia Ripensis (with Ratiaria as the center) and Dacia Mediterranea, with Serdica as the center. Serdica thus acquired a special importance as a military, administrative and cultural center, dominated by the Latin language. In the 3rd c., some walls for the protection of the city were constructed.

The greatest development was reached at the beginning of the 4th c. and that led the emperor *Constantine I (306–337), who was born in the nearby city of Naissus (today known as Niš), to promote for some time the idea of establishing his imperial residence at Serdica. In the agitated period of the 5th c., Serdica underwent invasions and destructions many times: during the years 441 and 447 by Attila the Hun, then during the 2nd half of the century, by the *Goths. At the time of the emperor *Justinian I (527–565), the city experienced a new period of splendor, its fortifications were rebuilt, and various public and private buildings were produced. In the year 809 the city was conquered by Khan Krum (802–814) and included within the territory of the Bulgarian state (which was established in 681). In 1018 the Byzantines once again reconquered Serdica, which then passed definitively to the Bulgarians at the end of the 12th c. Many archaeological remains lie under important buildings: the ancient curia is found under the Sheraton Hotel, Roman basilicas are under the National Historical Museum, and sophisticated mosaics are under the Rila Hotel. In the environs of Serdica, the emperor *Galerius was born (d. 311), who when he was dying there issued an edict of tolerance in April of 311, in hopes of placating the God of the Christians.

The most ancient testimonies to Christianity in Thrace have a legendary character. Christianity soon entered Serdica because it was a place of transit, and the city became one of the chief centers of the new faith. The first known bishop of Serdica was *Protegenes, to whom Constantine sent a rescript on the manumissio in ecclesia (CI 1,13,1). *Bonosus (d. ca. 390) was the bishop of Serdica, the founder of the sect of the Bonosians.

Various ancient Christian testimonies are found at Serdica. Roman baths with a hypocaustum and a calidarium, built around the 3rd c., were transformed around the 5th c. into a Christian center of worship, the rotund church of St. George, which later, in the 11th-12th and 14th c., was enlarged and embellished with mural paintings. In the 15th c. it became a *metropolitan church. In the NW part of the city, at that time outside the walls of the city, as early as the beginning of the 4th c. the small funerary church with one aisle was built (still existing under the Hagia Sophia) which, after it had been damaged by the *Goths around the year 376 and 382, was restored at the time of Emperor Justinian I (527–565) and called the "Hagia Sophia" (Sveta Sofija) and embellished with mural paintings and mosaics. The church with three aisles was made of brick, covered with a dome, contained a woman's gallery and transept, and was fortified to the W by towers. The ancient church was found in a cemetery, and in one of the tombs was found a silver reliquary with a Christogram on the front side, while on the back there was a staurolite Christogram with the letters A and Ω. The name of the church already at the beginning of the year 1300 became the official name of the city of Serdica-Sredetz, as one can deduce from a written record in 1329. From the necropolises alongside the church of Hagia Sophia and elsewhere in the city some thirty Christian inscriptions have been uncovered, written in both Greek and Latin; these serve as evidence of a large Christian community since the 6th-7th c. The importance of Serdica as a Christian center is confirmed by, among other things, the fact that here in the year 343 a famous ecclesiastical council was held, the "Concilium Serdicense."

B. Filov, Sofijskata cŭkva Sv. Sofija, Sofia 1913; K. Mijatev, Dekorativnata živopis na Sofijskija nekropol, Sofia 1925; S.N. Bobčev, Jubileina kniga na grad Sofija, Sofia 1928 (with the studies of A. Iširkov, G.I. Katzarov, Jord. Ivanov); B. Filov, Sofijskata cŭkva Sv. Georgi, Sofia 1933; S.N. Bobčev, Serdica, Sofia 1943; V. Beševliev, Spätgriechische und spätlateinische Inschriften aus Bulgarien, Berlin 1964, 1-20; EAA 7, 207; R. Pillinger, Monumenti paleocristiani in Bulgaria: RivAC 61 (1985) 275-310; Spätantike und frühbyzantinische Kultur Bulgariens zwischen Orient und Okzident, ed. R. Pillinger, Vienna 1986; ODB 3, 1876.

I. Dujčev

II. Councils. To resolve the disagreements that had arisen between Western and Eastern bishops concerning the *Arian controversy (the Councils of Rome and Antioch from the year 341), at the request of the Western bishops and the emperor *Constans, a council was called at Serdica (today Sofia), a city belonging to the Western part of the empire but close to the border with the East. In the autumn of the year 343 nearly 100 Western bishops gathered, headed by *Hosius of Cordoba and *Protogenes of Serdica (Pope *Julius was represented by two priests and a deacon) and nearly seven Eastern bishops, among whom Maris of Chalcedon, *Narcissus of Neronias and Stephen of Antioch, who were pro-Arian, stood out. The Western bishops insisted that *Athanasius, *Marcellus and other Eastern bishops who had been deposed in the East because they were anti-Arian but who were rehabilitated at the Council of Rome (341) by the Western bishops take part in the work of the council. The Eastern bishops refused to admit them, and because of this difficulty the council came to an end. The Eastern bishops left Serdica after having written a synodal letter in which, after various accusations, they excommunicated the chief proponents of the Western bishops and substantially confirmed the formula of faith of *Antioch (341). The Western bishops continued their work alone: once again they rehabilitated Athanasius, Marcellus and *Asclepas of Gaza; they approved a series of disciplinary canons, among which 3 and 3b included the possibility of a bishop who had been condemned by a provincial council to have recourse through appeal to the bishop of Rome; they presented their version of the events in a synodal letter, in which they condemned the leaders of the Eastern bishops; they published a doctrinal statement in which, without using the divisive christological term homoousios, they provided a monarchian interpretation of the Nicene Creed (325), by affirming one sole hypostasis of the Father and Son and by condemning those who, like the Eastern bishops, affirmed two distinct beings among them. The council sanctioned the break of relations with the pro-Nicene West and the predominantly anti-Nicene East (the first break to have occurred in the history of the church) and gave rise to a phase of inactivity that lasted until the death of the emperor Constans (350).

Hfl-Lecl 1, 737-823; DTC 14, 1009-1014; M. Simonetti, 161-187; L.W. Barnard, The Council of Serdica: Some Problems Reassessed: Annuarium Hist. Conc. 12 (1980) 1-25; Id., The Site of the Council of Serdica: SP 17, Oxford 1982, 9-13; Id., The Council of Serdica 343 A.D, Sofia 1983; I. Opelt, Die westliche Partei auf dem Konzil von Serdica, in Spätantike und frühbyzantinische Kultur Bulgariens zwischen Orient und Okzident, ed. von R. Pillinger, Vienna 1986 85-92; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988; B.H. Stolte, La chiesa orientale e i canoni "occidentali," in Il tardoantico alle soglie del duemila: diritto, religione, società, ed. G. Lanata, Pisa 2000, 165-175; H. Hess, The Early Development of Canon Law and the Council of Serdica, New York 2002.

M. Simonetti

SERGIA (7th c.). *Hegumen of the *monastery of St. *Olympias in *Constantinople and a contemporary of *Sergius, the patriarch between 610 and 638. From her writings we have the Narratio Sergiae de translatione Sanctae Olympiadis (BHG 1376), her record of the translation of the reamains of the deaconess Olympias, mentioned in the *Byzantine church on July 24-25-26 and in the Mart. rom. on 17 December, who was famous for the letters sent to her from exile by *John Chrysostom (SC 13bis). Sergia, who refers to herself in many places of the work as ἐγὼ ἡ ἁμαρτωλὸς Σεργία (thus removing any doubts regarding attribution) used written and oral sources and the Vita S. Olympiadis in her composition (BHG 1374-1375). The Vita S. Olympiadis was written perhaps by *Heraclidas of Nyssa and reedited by Malingrey and compiled in a completely different style. The Narratio was edited by Delehaye on the basis of a single MS witness (the 11th-c. Paris. 1453).

CPG 7981; H. Delehaye, Vita Sanctae Olympiadis et Narratio Sergiae de eiusdem translatione: AB 15 (1896) 400-423; 16 (1897) 44-51; J. Bousquet, Récit de Sergia sur Olympias: ROC 11 (1906) 255-268; Beck 461; Patrologia V, 108.

A. Labate

SERGIOPOLIS. A Roman fortress (castrum), today Resafa (Rusafa; al-Rassafa), in the province of Augusta Euphratensis; it is one of the most beautiful cities in the desert of Syria because of its ruins, 40 km (24.9 mi) from the Euphrates River, between Sura and *Palmyra (Tadmor) Anastasius on a very busy street toward *Dura Europos to the S, Callincium to the E and Aleppo to the W, in a culturally mixed border zone, and an important commercial center in the Syro-Mesopotamian steppe. After the destruction of Dura Europos, the emperor *Diocletian fortified Resafa, which had two military martyrs during the Great Persecution (of Maximian): *Sergius and Bacchus. The emperor *Anastasius (491–518) built there the cathedral and renamed the city Sergiopolis; he ordered the construction of three cisterns to supply the city with water. The episcopal see depended on the metropolitan of Hierapolis (Mabbug); but the emperor Anastasius made it a metropolitan see. The first known bishop was Marinianus (ca. 430–ca.451), who was appointed by *John of Antioch (Mansi 5, 915 and 943) and was present at a council that occurred at *Antioch (Mansi 7, 325). In the 6th c. it became a metropolitan see, which was created by the emperor Anastasius (491–518) with five dependent episcopal sees (see Notitia episcopatuum for Antioch: Echos d'Orient 10, 145) and took the name Anastasopolis (H. Gelzer, Georgii Cyprii Descriptio orbis romani, Leipzig 1880, 45). In 543 Bishop Candidus ransomed 1,200 prisoners taken during the sack by *Chosroes I (Procopius, De bello pers. 2,5,20). Bishop Abraham took part in the Council of *Constantinople 553 (Mansi 9, 390).

From the beginning of the 6th c., Resafa was not only a fortress but also a rich sanctuary and a pilgrimage center. On account of the wealth of the sanctuary, Chosroes I wanted to conquer it; at that time the emperor *Justinian fortified it with a compact wall: "He surrounded it with a solid wall and collected a large quantity of water to thus provide for the inhabitants. He also added to this place houses and porticoes and other buildings. . . . He then set up a garrison" (Procopius, On the Buildings II,9). Chosroes II sacked the city in 616, and subsequently the region fell into the hands of the Arabs (636). The Umayyad Caliph Hisham (724–742) favored the influx of Christian pilgrims. Around the end of the century the city was practically abandoned and sacked. Sergiopolis had a large rectangular wall belt (536 x 350 x 549 x 411 m = 1758.5 x 1148.3 x 1801.2 x 1348.4 ft), 3 meters (=9.8 ft.) thick with 15 towers; it is crossed by two chief streets: one from E to W and the other from N to S. The martyr had a great cult among the bedouin Arabic peoples from the region, and buildings were erected for his relics. Inside the city there are three churches in the longitudinal access. Basilica B to the S of the city's center was the martyrium of St. Sergius built by Alexander Hierapolis not beyond the year 425 (the first martyrium was outside the walls); this church was built by Bishop Sergius (d. after 524) in 518, when the relics were already transferred into another church. This church with three aisles, even if smaller than that of basilica A, was one of the most beautiful churches in Syria: 48.50 x 25.70 m (159.1 x 84.3 ft). In the 8th c. it was abandoned, and part of its material was reused elsewhere. Basilica A to the SE, with three aisles, built at the end of the 5th c., became the sanctuary of Sergiopolis. Sergius, the E part, which was splendidly decorated, was destined for the systematization and cult of the martyr's relics, which were preserved in a golden *sarcophagus. The building had subsequent additions, e.g., a port to the N led to a broad courtyard for access to the pilgrims. The sanctuary of St. Sergius is impressive and remains well preserved in the conch; Bishop Abraham had undertaken some works of restoration there (this bishop was present at the Council of *Constantinople in 553) in 559. Another church, the tetraconch (i.e., a building with four apses), had space for the bishop's throne, a small baptistery and episcopal tombs, among which was that of Abraham. Some scholars maintain that this was the cathedral, which could instead be basilica A (or perhaps there were two bishops). The basilica of Holy Cross has the best-preserved ruins. At Resafa, lodging places for the pilgrims were also built.

J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947; Fedalto II, 999; T. Ulbert, Resafa-Sergioupolis (Nordsyrien). Arbeiten 1976-1980, in Actes du X Congrès int. d'archéologie chrétienne, Vatican City 1984, II, 635-640; T. Ulbert, Die Basilika des Heiligen Kreuzes in Resafa-Sergiupolis, Mainz 1986; P. Donceel-Voûte, Les pavements des églises byzantines de Syrie et du Liban, Louvain-la-Neuve 1988, 268-274; L. Padovese, Guida alla Siria, Casale Monf. 1994, 167-169; D. Woods, The Emperor Julian and the Passion of Sergius and Bacchus: JECS 5 (1997) 335-367; E.K. Fowden, The Barbarian Plain: Saint Sergius Between Rome and Iran, Berkeley, CA 1999; M. Konrad, Der spätrömische Limes in Syrien: archäologische Untersuchungen an den Grenzkastellen von Sura, Tetrapyrgium, Cholle und in Resafa, Mainz 2000; ODB 3, 1877.

A. Di Berardino

SERGIUS, patriarch (610–638). Sergius was of Syro-Jacobite origin. He was first a deacon and a director, at *Constantinople, of an asylum for the poor. He ascended to the patriarchal throne on 18 April 610 under the reign of the emperor *Heraclius, whose military endeavors against the Avars and the Persians he supported, esp. on the occasion of the attack orchestrated by him (the siege of Constantinople in 626), so much so as to merit the title "savior of the capital." With the objective of restoring the empire's religious unity, which had been split by *monophysitism, esp. in the E regions, he proposed the compromise of the doctrine on the sole energy in Christ (*monoenergism), writing on this topic to the Syro-Arabic bishops: George Arsas (618), *Theodore of Pharan (ca. 620), *Paul the Patriarch of Antioch (622) and Cyrus of Fasi (626), who was later the patriarch of Antioch (633). Against the opposition of *Sophronius of *Jerusalem, he released in August of 633 a synodal dogmatic decree that imposed silence on talk of the sole and double will in Christ, suggesting to others that they speak of the one soul operative in Christ. For this reason he also sought the support of Pope Honorius, who responded by praising Sergius's prudence. In November 638, another synodal decree approved the Ekthesis with the condemnation of those who had rejected it. He died on 9 December 638. He was condemned as a heretic by the Sixth Ecumenical Council (Constantinople 680).

CPG 7604-7608; Grumel, Regestes 278c-293; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del secolo VII, Rome 1971, passim (index p. 584); L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, passim, esp. 196-205; J.L. Van Dieten, Geschichte der Patriarchen von Sergios I. bis Johannes VI. (610-715), Amsterdam 1972; Fliche-Martin V, passim, spec. 103-104; ODB 3, 1878; Patrologia V, 100-103; F. Carcione, Sergio di Costantinopoli e Onorio I nella controversia monothelita del VII secolo, Rome 1985; BBKL 9, 1413-1428.

D. Stiernon

SERGIUS, pope (687–701). Upon the death of *Conon (21 September 687), the archpresbyter *Theodore was elected, who was supported by soldiers, and the archdeacon *Paschal. To overcome this division, the majority of the clergy and the people nominated the presbyter Sergius, who was of an Antiochene family, but born at Palermo, and who at that time belonged to the Roman clergy (LP I,371-372). Theodore immediately withdrew; Paschal, however, turned to the exarch, to whom he promised a hundred pounds of gold. The exarch, having arrived at Rome, recognized Sergius only after the payment of a hundred talents of gold, which had already been promised by Paschal. In 692, the emperor, who had convoked a council at *Constantinople (Quinisext or *in Trullo), sent the canons to *Rome to obtain Sergius's signature to be placed after that of the emperor. Sergius refused because he considered it to be contrary to ecclesiastical tradition (LP I,373). *Justinian II then thought of having recourse to force, as had occurred during the time of Pope *Martin I, but the attempt failed through the opposition of the army of *Ravenna and the *Pentapolis (LP I,373-374). Sergius, following the path of the tradition established by his predecessors, also continued to be interested in some of the religious problems in England (Jaffé 2131-2133); he baptized Caedwalla, king of Wessex, who had come to Rome as a pilgrim, where he died (he was buried in the basilica of St. *Peter). He bestowed the pallium on Bertaldus of Canterbury. He encouraged the evangelizing work among the Frisians by *Willibrord (d. 739), whom he ordained bishop in 695. Moreover, he also ordained Damian, the archbishop of Ravenna (693). He introduced into the Mass the song of the Agnus Dei. He undertook many remodelings in the Roman churches, esp. the basilica of St. Peter. He died on 7 September 701.

CPL 1740-1741; Verzeichnis 541; PLS 4, 2174; AASS, Sept III, 425-445; LP I, 371-382; BS 11, 873-875; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del secolo VII, Milan 1971, 494-504 (see index); L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 162-163; J.-M. Sansterre, Les moines grecs et orientaux à Rome aux époques byzantine et carolingienne: milieu du VI[e] s.-fin du IX[e] s., 2 vols., Brussels 1980-1993; Patrologia IV, 183-184; EPapi 1, 633-637.

A. Di Berardino

SERGIUS (ps.-Cassiodorus) (5th c.). The grammarian Donatus, whose student was *Jerome around the year 354, wrote, among other works, the Ars ("grammar"), a manual par excellence in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages. Thereafter, the work was subdivided into the Ars minor and the Ars maior and had numerous commentators (e.g., Sergius, Cledonius and Pompey). Among these commentaries there is only one on the Ars maior, which was attributed by its first editor, Garet, in 1679, to Cassiodorus (PL 70,1219-1240). Stock, its recent editor, along with other scholars attributes this commentary to Sergius and places the author in 5th-c. Campania, because he cites *Paulinus of Milan (Carm. 26,4). Sergius, though being thoroughly imbued with classical culture, shows a good understanding of Christian terminology and practices.

CPPM IIIA, 117; A. Negri, Elio Donato, Ars grammatica maior, Reggio Emilia 1960; C. Stock, Sergius (Ps.-Cassiodorus), Commentarium de oratione et de octo partibus orationis Artis Secundae Donati. Überlieferung, Text und Kommentar. Sammlung wissenschaftlicher Kommentare, Munich-Leipzig 2005.

A. Di Berardino

SERGIUS AMPHIATOR (The Sacristan). According to *John of Ephesus (HE 4,41), a certain Sergius participated in the secret consecration of the miaphysite patriarch of *Antioch, inasmuch as he was the sacristan (amphiator) and the master of ceremonies, in the winter of 579/580. When it was discovered that the ceremony was held at night, Sergius fled along with the bishops who participated in the consecration. Shortly after, he himself was consecrated as bishop and metropolitan of *Edessa by *Damian, the anti-Chalcedonian patriarch of *Alexandria (578–605). Some canons attributed to Sergius have been preserved, concerning whom we know nothing else. *Syriac *hagiography has at times identified him with Sergius the Armenian, the bishop of Edessa.

Brockelmann, 263; F. Nau, Littérature canonique syriaque: ROC 14 (1909) 127-128. (Fr. tr. of the unpublished text of the canons); E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI[e] siècle (CSCO 127, Subs. 2), Louvain 1951, 241-243.

K. den Biesen

SERGIUS and BACCHUS, martyrs. The Passio of the two official saints (BHT 1624) was probably composed by using some brief historical information (date and place of burial), in order to explain the popularity of their cults, whose center of diffusion was the castle of Resafa, 200 km (124.3 mi) E of Aleppo at the border of the Roman Empire, the destination point of the famous pilgrimage in the East (see, e.g., the anonymous author of Piacenza [CCL 175,153]). Around 500, Resafa became a city called *Sergiopolis. The emperor *Justinian displayed a special devotion to Sergius and Bacchus. Despite the Arab invasion, Sergiopolis remained a Christian city until its end, around 1260. The place of the city's burial is not yet identified. It seems that since 354 a votive basilica was erected in honor of Sergius and Bacchus at Eitha (Syria); over the course of the 6th c. the basilicas multiplied at *Bostra, *Constantinople, *Ravenna and *Rome. The depiction of the two saints in the church of S. Maria Antiqua seems to reproduce a canonical model originating at Resafa. *Gregory of Tours knew of the two saints (Hist. Franc. 7,31; 10,31; Glor.mart. 96). Their feast day was set for 7 October in the Mart. hier. and in the historical martyrologies, starting from the anonymous author of Lyons.

BHG 1624-1625; BHL 7599-7607; BHO 1052-1055; BS 11, 876-882; LCI 8, 329-330; BBKL 9, 1435-1436; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926, repr. Rome 2000, 461-464; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938, 92-93; B. Kötting, Peregrinatio Religiosa. Wallfahrten in der An- tike und das Pilgerwesen in der alten Kirche, Münster 1950, 132-138; Chr. Ihm, Die Programme der christlichen Apsismalerei vom 4. Jahrhundert bis zur Mitte des 8. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart ²1992, 193-194, 210-211; E. Schurr, Die Ikonographie der Heiligen, Dettelbach 1997, 231-240; D. Woods, The Emperor Julian and the Passion of Sergius and Bacchus: JECS 5 (1997) 335-367; E.K. Fowden, The Barbarian Plain: Saint Sergius Between Rome and Iran, Berkeley, CA 1999.

V. SAXER - S. HEID

SERGIUS GRAMMATICUS (6th c.). A contemporary of *Severus of *Antioch, he is known to us only by the collection of letters which he exchanged with the patriarch of Antioch between 515 and 520. Although the title "grammarian" seems to allude to his profession, the interest shown by Sergius in his writings shows him to be more of a philosopher or rather a layperson with philosophical interests. The correspondence, including Sergius's three letters and their respective responses by Severus, was translated into *Syriac by *Paul bishop of Callinicum and has been transmitted to us by only one MS (BL add. 17154). Sergius reused motifs and insights that were specific to the most extreme form of *monophysitism, as it was represented at his time by *Julian of Halicarnassus. As in the case of Julian, he so emphasized the unity of the natures in Christ that he compromised the properties of the human nature and the incarnate Logos. Taken up by missionary zeal, Sergius strained to acquire supporters for the monophysite cause and asked for, among other things, their adherence to one of his "formulas" (kephalaion): "After the ineffable union (in Christ) we no longer speak of two natures in two properties." To avoid, on the one hand, any element of distinction in the incarnate One and on the other hand a confusion of the natures, Sergius arrived at the point of professing one sole "substance" or "essence" (ousia) in Jesus Christ. Applying Aristotelian categories to the definition of the christological dogma, Sergius thus introduced a new type of christological teaching. As a result, from the "sole essence" of Christ, a new and "unique property" also derived. This essence is manifested, e.g., in Christ's virgin birth, his freedom from natural instincts, the absence of *sin and his *resurrection. Nevertheless the contrast with Severus seems to be owed more to the novelty of Sergius's formulations than to the concrete image of Christ he proposed; Sergius, however, borrowed typical elements from Severus's Christology.

DTC 14, 1996-1997; Patrologia V, 203-204. Edition: J. Lebon, Severi Antiocheni orationes ad Nephalium: eiusdem ac Sergii grammatici epistulae mutuae (CSCO 119-120, Script. Syri 64-65) (Syriac text with Latin tr.) Louvain 1949. Studies: J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien, Louvain 1909, 163-172; I.R. Torrance, Christology After Chalcedon: Severus of Antioch and Sergius the Monophysite, Norwich 1988; Grillmeier II, 2, 117-135; II.3.

L. PERRONE

SERGIUS of Cyprus. The bishop of Constantina (or Constantia), modern-day Salamis, on the island of *Cyprus; he convoked a provincial synod in the year 643, which then came to be known as the Second Council of Cyprus, in which he brought about the condemnation of *monothelitism. The Acts of this synod were then sent to Rome, accompanied by the Epistula ad Theodorum papam, written by the same Sergius, which is surprising for its extraordinarily gratifying gestures of respect toward the primacy of the Roman church.

CPG 7628; Mansi 10, 913b-916e; Hfl-Lecl III, 400; ACO (ser. 2), I, 60-65; Palazzini 1, 290; M. Maccarone, Il primato del vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio, Rome 1989 (see index).

K. DEN BIESEN

SERGIUS of Rish'ayna (d. 536). Chief doctor at Rish'ayna (Theodosiopolis), perhaps the presbyter, who was certainly a *monophysite but was challenged and criticized in subsequent monophysite literature (esp. in the writings of ps.-Zachariah) on account of his supposed luxury and avarice (accusations which nonetheless could be explained partially because of his support, late in his life, of the antimonophysite initiatives of the *Chalcedonian patriarch of *Antioch, *Ephrem), Sergius (d. 536 at *Constantinople) was one of the more talented intellectuals and learned men of the *Syrian church of his time. He studied for several years at *Alexandria, perhaps at the beginning of the year 500, and certainly his writings relating to the Aristotelian corpus bear traces of the Alexandrian interpretation of the writings of *Aristotle, which in those years were studied and implemented by *Ammonius, e.g.; and, one must add, this would have been practiced within subsequent Syriac intellectual circles, esp. monophysite ones, who were working in the Monastery of Qenneshre, established at that time, in 521, by *John bar Aphtonia. Sergius was an intelligent translator of Aristotelian works or works connected to the Aristotelian corpus; his translation of the treatise De mundo, e.g., is considered a masterpiece. Moreover, he was the author of various philosophical works: Treatise on Logic; On Affirmation and Negation; On Genus, Species and the Individual; On the Cause of the Universe According to Aristotle's Principles.

But Sergius is not only known for his writings on logic and philosophy. Being a doctor, his activity was concentrated for a long time on the translation of Galen's works, and he even began to expound the thought of the Greek philosopher at the insistent request of his student and admirer, Theodore (not the Nestorian Theodore of Merv, as has been suggested, but the bishop of Karh Guddan, on the Tigris River). Theodore was struck by the clarity and solidity of Galen's arguments, which Sergius traced back to the teachings of Aristotle, which he regarded as the foundation of every "scientific" advance. This massive production should not cause one to forget the doctor of Rish'ayna's lasting commitment in the theological sphere. His were the first Syriac translations of the writings of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, which began to circulate around 520, before which he placed a small treatise on the spiritual life. They were edited and marked by the heavily Evagrian emphases. One should recall that Sergius retranslated the same Gnostics Centuries, also written by *Evagrius of Pontus, in a version that the subsequent Syriac tradition regarded as irreverent but which was much closer than the preceding version to the Greek text.

Duval 247-249, 266-273, 276-278, 315, 363-364; Baumstark 167-169; Chabot 71-72; Patrologia V, 467-468; P. Sherwood, Sergius of Reshaina and the Syriac Versions of the Pseudo-Denys: SE 5 (1952) 174-184; A. Guillaumont, Les "Képhalaia gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens, Paris 1962, 215-227; H. Hugonnard-Roche, Sur les versions syriaques des Catégories d'Aristote: Journal Asiatique 275 (1987) 205-222; Id., Aux origines de l'exégèse orientale de la logique d'Aristote: Sergius de Resh'aina: Journal Asiatique 277 (1989) 1-17; Id., Note sur Sergius de Resh'aina, traducteur du grec en syriaque et commentateur d'Aristote, in The Ancient Tradition in Christian and Islamic Hellenism. Studies in the Transmission of Greek Philosophy and Sciences Dedicated to H.J. Drossaart Lulofs, ed. G. Endress - R. Kruk, Leiden 1997, 121-143; Id., Les "Catégories " d'Aristote comme introduction à la philosophie, dans un commentaire syriaque de Sergius de Resh'aina: Documenti e studi sulla tradizione filosofica medievale 8 (1997) 339-363; Id., Comme la cigogne au désert. Un prologue de Sergius de Resh'ayna à l'étude de la philosophie aristotélicienne en syriaque, in Langages et philosophie. Hommage à Jean Jolivet (Études de philosophie médiévale 74), Paris 1997, 79-97; BBKL 9, 1432-1435.

P. Bettiolo

SERGIUS PAULUS (1st c.). Quintus Sergius Paulus (Paullus), proconsul of Cyprus, wanted to meet *Barnabas, a native of the island, and Saul of Tarsus, who were preaching in the synagogues, at their arrival at Paphos, a city on the W point of the island and the place where the governor ruled. After one of Saul's miracles, who from that point onward used the Roman cognomen of "*Paul," the proconsul "believed, for he was amazed at the teaching of the Lord" (Acts 13:12). This event is dated around the year 48 (see Boffo, 243-244). Why did Sergius Paulus want to meet the apostle? Did he know something about the new sect? After this encounter, Paul and Barnabas changed their missionary plans and went into the regions where the Sergii Pauli had large landholdings (Pamphylia [see *Lycia and Pamphylia], Pisidia, Lyconia and *Galatia). Paul's success at Antioch of Pisidia is owed without a doubt to the support of the proconsul who had become a Christian. Sergius Paulus is different from the other Roman official who had the same name and was the curator of the waters of the Tiber River.

KLP 4, 484-487; DBS 12, 693-699; L. Boffo, Iscrizioni greche e latine per lo studio della Bibbia, Brescia 1994, 243-244 and note 4; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan 2004, 36-38.

A. Di Berardino

SERGIUS the STYLITE (8th c.). Western Syrian author who wrote an apologetic treatise against the Jewish opinion that "God does not have a son and cannot conceive" (I. 1), in which he often referred to Flavius Josephus. The *Christology of the treatise can be interpreted in both a *Chalcedonian and miaphysite sense; given that it says that Sergius was born at Gusit, i.e., close to Emesa (Homs), it may also more likely be the case that he was a miaphysite. The work was written probably in the period between 730 and 770.

Baumstark, 180; A. Haymann, The Disputation of Sergius the Stylite against a Jew (CSCO 338-339), Louvain 1973.

K. den Biesen

SERMO, Sermon. Some information on the sermon during the patristic age in the Middle Ages, esp. in the transmission of patristic texts, has been marked for the entries homily* and homiliary*, because of the close relationship among the terms. Nevertheless, the sermon as a concept and in its evolution remains to be treated. In classical Latin the term sermo designates a conversation, a common discourse (analogous Latin terms are as follows: oratio, locutio, a discussion of the familiar style (analogous terms: colloquium, congressus). It is distinguished from elaborate discourse, from the peroration and the harangue, and from versified texts (poems, songs, etc.; as an exception, Horace's Satyrae were titled sermones, because they were placed within the literary genre of satiric dialogue). The equivalent Greek term was λόγος. The phrase "to address" in Latin is sermonem proferre; to have a conversation with someone in Latin is sermonem conferre cum aliquo. A language full of sweetness and abandonment is, Cicero believed (Off. I, 37,134), sermo lenis minimeque pertinax.

In the Bible, the term sermo indicates a discourse (sermonem istum proferre: Josh 2:20), an oracle (sermo Domini erat pretiosus in diebus illis: 1 Sam 3:1), a teaching (Fuit vir propheta potens in opere et sermone: Lk 24:19), language, labii unius et sermonum: Gen 11:1. The ancient African biblical versions render the term λόγος with the Latin term sermo; the European versions instead chose the term verbum; the Greek term ῥῆμα is also translated with the term sermo. The term λόγος from the Septuagint version was not always translated with the term verbum. In the majority of cases, the Vulgate preferred sermo, perhaps because the term verbum had become by antonomasia the Word, the Creator and Redeemer: Omnipotens sermo tuus de caelo: Wis 18:15. Therefore the ancient theological equivalents added to the Hebrew term dabar disappear from sermo but remained tied to the term verbum (particularly the creating and renewing efficacy, which was typical of the Hebrew concept, which was by that time adopted by Christian theology). This explains why the Word was at times called the "sermon": Nos enim Sermonem Dei scimus indutum carnis substantiam, writes *Novatian (De Trin. 21: PL 3, 928C). The term is applied to the aeon (Νοῦς), in *Valentinus's theory, acc. to *Tertullian: Emittit et ipse ex semetipso Sermonem et Vitam (Adv. Valent. 7: CCL 2, 758).

The notion of act implied in sermon, in a precise, temporal-historical context, is found in biblical literature: Reliqua autem sermonum Jeroboam scripta sunt in libro sermonum dierum regum Israel (2 Kgs 14:28); sermones, i.e., the acts of the king; the sermones dierum are the animals. To the ordinary ability to speak, the natural capacity to express oneself and to communicate a line of reasoning, a supernatural reality is added. The λόγος σοφίας (sermo sapientiae) and the λόγος γνώσεως (sermo scientiae: 1 Cor 12:8) have been given by the *Holy Spirit for the good of the community, with the necessary interpretatio sermonum, the explanation of the charismatic message. The Word of God is essentially a divinus sermo (Ambr., Ep. I,7,5: PL 16,906B); sermo caelestis (Ambr., Ep. 30,9: PL 16,1063B); sacer sermo (1 Clem 56,3: PG 1,321A, ἅγιος λόγος). The ancient Latin version published by G. Morin (Anecdota Maredsolana, II, Maredsous 1894, p. 51) has the term sanctus sermo. For *Irenaeus of Lyons, the sermo is also a rational force: paratum fieri ad susceptionem perfectae rationis, which corresponds to the Greek phrase εἰς ὑποδοχὴν τοῦ τελείου λόγου (Adv. haer. II,19,4; see I,5,6). The Greek term λόγου has fallen out of the MS tradition but could be restored on the basis of other texts from the writings of Irenaeus and Tertullian (Adv. Valent. 25,2).

Thus the term sermo became an expressive sacred entity; the term itself, by that point enriched by new elements, belonged to Latin Christianity. Its first meaning pertained to a world of communicating with simplicity a religious teaching and supposed a work of reflection and editing. But there is also an attestation to an exquisitely theological concept. *Tertullian, in the context of his trinitarian theology, offered the following translation of Jn 1:1: Sermo erat apud Deum et Deus erat sermo (Adv. Prax. 5: CCL 2,1163), and distinguished the terms sermo and ratio: Rationalis enim Deus, et ratio in ipsum prius et ita ab ipso omnia. Quae ratio sensus ipsius est. Hanc Graeci λόγον dicunt, quo vocabulo etiam sermonem appellamus ideoque iam in usu est nostrorum per simplicitatem interpretationis sermonem dicere in primordio apud Deum fuisse, cum magis rationem competat antiquiorem haberi, quia non sermonalis a principio sed rationalis Deus etiam ante principium, et quia ipse quoque sermo ratione consistens priorem eam ut substantiam suam ostendat. Tertullian made a clear distinction between sermo and ratio, contrary to the African use (in usu est nostrorum); for Tertullian, in God, ratio is immanent and becomes a sermo after the Creator's first act: Fiat lux (see Ch. Mohrmann, Études sur le latin des chrétiens, III, Rome 1965, 110; Tertull., Adv. Prax. 5: CCL 2,1163-1164).

The transition from λόγος (also translated ratio) to sermo and verbum pertains to philology and linguistic criticism. *Lactantius equated the terms: Melius Graeci λόγον dicunt quam nos verbum, sive sermonem: λόγος enim et sermonem significat et rationem (Div. inst. IV,9,1: CSEL 19,300). The Greek Fathers also knew the term διάλογος, which was at times translated with the Latin term concertatio (*Origen, C. Celsum III,1: GCS 1,203: a debate). One then finds the terms διαλογή (a term not directly translated into Latin [Epiph., Panar. 20,3: PG 41, 273A] but rather translated with the phrase vocabulorum disceptatio: ibid. 76,9: PG 42,532D) and διαλογισμός, disputatio (John Chrysostom, Hom. 8 in 1 Tim.: PG 11,590G). The verb διαλογίζομαι is translated as reputari; the same translation is used for λογίζομαι (Athan., Vit. Ant., 42: PG 26,905AB). It is always the same reality: speech, whether public or private. But with the spread of Christian Latin, the term sermo would be applied to speech destined for the proclamation of the Word of God and the edification of the audience: it is an important element of the tradition and Christian teaching. It would also become a literary genre: the Fathers preached sermones, which were recorded by tachygraphers (as in the case of *Augustine), and they published their texts (e.g., Pope *Leo the Great).

But at the same time the term sermo retained its ancient meaning of "statement, declaration" and was often qualified with an epithet: one, e.g., reads in the Rule of Saint Benedict: sermo responsionis porrigatur bonus (ch. 31: CSEL 75,96); auditus malae rei aut otiosi sermonis (ch. 67, p. 172). The other meanings are as follows: (1) a text: Quae enim pagina aut qui sermo divinae auctoritatis veteris ac novi Testamenti (Rule of St. Benedict, ch. 73, p. 180); (2) an expression: Multi super hoc sermone diversa finxerunt (Jerome, Ep. 20,1: CSEL 54, 104); (3) a term: Δεός sermo graecus est, qui latine interpretatur "timor" (Cassiodorus, Exp. in ps. 21,1: CCL 97,190); (4) an inner speech: Quodcumque cogitaveris sermo est (Tertull., Adv. Prax. 5). During the Middle Ages, the term sermo was also equivalent to a legal action brought about by the judge.

During the 4th c., the term sermo also occurred more often for every type of preaching: catechetical, exegetical and parenetic. *Ambrose pointed out: Hesterno sermo noster ac tractatus usque ad sancti altaris sacramenta deductus est (De sacr. V,1,1: PL 16,445C). *Augustine also had recourse to the terms sermo and tractatus: Sermonem ad altare Dei debemus hodie infantibus de sacramento altaris. Tractavimus ad eos de sacramento symboli. . . . Hodie illis de hac re sermo debetur (Serm. 228,3: PL 38,1102). The tractatus is therefore a more consistent statement, more developed than the sermon, and is usually more concise; its argument also seems to be more demanding than what occurs in the case of the sermon. The enarratio, the commentary, is carried out under the form of a sermon for the faithful: Statui autem per sermones id agere, qui proferantur in populis, quas graeci ὁμιλίας vocant. Hoc enim iustius esse arbitror, ut conventus ecclesiastici non fraudentur etiam psalmi huius intelligentia, cuius, ut aliorum, delectari assolent cantilena (Enarr. in ps. 118, proem.). The sermon was brief and listened to while standing: Longam lectionem audivimus, brevis est dies: longo sermone etiam nos tenere vestram patientiam non debemus. Novimus quia patienter audistis, et diu stando et audiendo tanquam martyri compassi estis (Aug., Serm. 274, In natali martyris Vincentii: PL 38,1253).

The variety of concepts are taken up by *Isidore of Seville: Homiliae autem ad vulgus loquuntur, tomi vero, id est libri, maiores sunt disputationes. Dialogus est conlatio duorum vel plurimorum, quem Latini sermonem dicunt. Nam quos Graeci dialogos vocant, nos sermones vocamus. Sermo autem dictus quia inter utrumque seritur. Unde in Vergilio: Multa inter se serebant. Tractatus est unius rei multiplex expositio, eo quod trahat sensum in multa, sententiam contrectando secum. Differt autem sermo, tractatus et verbum. Sermo enim alteram eget personam; tractatus specialiter ad se ipsum est; verbum autem ad omnes. Unde et dicitur: Verbum fecit ad populum. Commentaria dicta quasi cum mente. Sunt enim interpretationes, ut commenta iuris, commenta Evangelii (Etymologiae VI,8,2-5: PL 82,237G-238B). For Isidore of Seville, the sermon is still a dialogue, although the verbum is a speech directed to all people. It seems, however, that in the pastoral experience, the sermon is applied to catechetical teaching, exegetical explanation, moral and disciplinary admonition, religious exhortation, to every type of discourse for every circumstance, largely independent of the number of people in the audience. Moreover it seems that the dialogical aspect corresponds more to the simplicity of the content than to the oratorical form: moreover, the homily (homilia) is elaborated acc. to the methodology of sapiential theology and not acc. to a systematic or artificial criterion. *Caesarius of Arles made an anthology of sermons available for the use of the clergy: sermones istos . . . populo frequentius recitare (Serm. 2: CCL 103,19): they are easy sermons, filled with an Augustinian spirit, and adhere to the human and spiritual situation of the faithful. Bishop Felix prepared a collection of sermons (sermones) delivered by *Peter Chrysologus (CCL 24, 24A, 24B): evidence of an editorial policy!

The narrow interpretation of the sermon as a parenetic discourse probably comes from the Sermo Domini in monte, which was interpreted by *Augustine: Inveniet in eo, quantum ad mores optimos pertinet, perfectum vitae christianae modum. . . . Nam sic ipse sermo concluditur, ut appareat in eo praecepta esse omnia quae ad informandam vitam pertinent (De sermone Domini in monte I,1: CCL 35,1). The Sermon on the Mount is a prototype of popular preaching, a very precise literary genre, from the 4th c. onward. The homily is applied more exactly to an explanation of the biblical text proclaimed during the liturgical celebration. The sermon became a discussion carried out with a precise methodology, and not necessarily in dependence upon the biblical text. Nevertheless, the distinction is so uncertain also because the modern editors of patristic texts have at times used questionable criteria. Pope *Leo the Great's sermones received the title tractatus in the critical edition made by A. Chavasse (CCL 138-138

A), on the basis of a title given by a 9th-c. MS. Oftentimes the uncertainty of the terminology has repercussions in the description of the liturgical books from the Western and Eastern traditions. Medieval sermons were not necessarily introduced by the biblical passage (in contradistinction to the homilies), but the content distinguishes them easily from the hagiographical texts, martyrological and historical in character (martyrologies, menaea and synaxaria, passionaries and legendaries).

The sermon was a liturgical act, inserted into the celebration: the ministerium sermonis was connected to the ministerium altaris: Qui iam ministrantes altari, quo vos accessuri estis, assistimus, nec ministerio sermonis vos fraudare debemus (Aug., Serm. 214,1: PL 38,1065). The preacher participates in the "spirituality" of the sacred text: Divinae lectiones omnes ita sibi connectuntur, tanquam una sit lectio; quia omnes ex uno ore procedunt. Multa sunt ora ministerium sermonis gerentium, sed unum est os ministros implentis (Aug., Serm. 170,1,1: PL 38,927). Just as the biblical texts come from the same mouth, so too the preaching (the sermones) of the various preachers finds its unity in the inspiration of the *Holy Spirit: Per ineuntem Spiritum officio oris nostri divini sensus sermo diffunditur (Hilary, Tract. in ps. 118, Tau, 2: CSEL 22,541).

*Egeria heard at *Jerusalem readings and sermons in *Syriac, *Greek and Latin, which were translated by interpreters (Itinerarium Egeriae, 47: CCL 175,89).

During the Middle Ages the sermon was separated from the liturgy; it was a speech delivered for a given occasion and was heard in a suitable setting: In sequenti dominica dicere matutinas et missarum ad usum praedictum et cum nota, et tali hora qua scholares post missam ire poterunt ad sermonem (Statutes of the University of Paris, from 1380; ed. G.A. Lobineau, Histoire de la ville de Paris, III, Paris 1725, 498). In the inquisitorial practice, the person condemned had to listen to a sermo publicus or actio fidei, also called a sermo generalis de fide.

The Council of Trent, in 1562 (sess. XXII, can. 8), prescribed preaching on the biblical readings frequenter inter missarum celebrationem . . . , diebus praesertim dominicis et festis (DS 1749). But the liturgists considered the sermon an ordinary interruptio of the liturgical celebration (e.g., P. Radó, Enchiridion liturgicum, I, Rome 1961, 334). Only after Vatican II would the situation tend to change in a very general way; the homily was preferred to the sermon; the typical sermon in three points followed by a conclusion was also abandoned, as well as the pertinent technical oratory that was often hardly sacred (one thinks of the Conférences held at Notre-Dame, at Paris, which were famous Lenten sermons; or the English "sermon," a text proclaimed without gestures and vocal effects). In modern languages, the term sermon at times acquires an ironic note, directed at moralizing content, at arrogant and annoying expression, and at the length of the discourse.

The primary derivative terms in patristic and medieval Latinity pertain to the same concepts:

1. Sermonarium, liber sermocinalis, sermologus: a collection of sermons. Sermologus, sive liber sermonum, distinct from the homeliarius (Joannes Belethus, Rationale divinorum officiorum, c. 60: PL 202, 66AB; see c. 42: PL 202,69D-70A).

2. Sermunculus: short discourse: Huic sermunculo adnexui (Jerome, Ep. 32,1, ad Marcellam: CSEL 54, 252); ad compendium studiosae intelligentiae in brevem sermunculum . . . coartamus (Hilar., Instructio psalmorum, 17: CSEL 22, 15); prayer: Quis sermunculis ocius terminatis domum egressus inter exercitus multitudinem . . . emigrat (Adamnan of Iona, De locis sanctis III, 4: PL 88,912).

3. Sermonari: to speak: Pullus gratiarum sermonetur tibi (Priscill., Tractatus I, 31: CSEL 18, 26).

4. Sermocinari: to converse with: Inductio est oratio qua rebus non dubiis captamus assensionem eius cum quo instituta est, sive inter philosophos, sive inter rhetores, sive inter sermocinantes (Cassiodorus, De artibus ac disciplinis liberalium litterarum 2: PL 70,1165A).

5. Sermocinator: preacher: Sermocinator dum veritatem quam meminit loquitur (Fulgentius of Ruspe, Contra sermonem Fastidiosi Ariani, 17: PL 65,523A).

6. Sermocinatio: discussion, conversation: Tanti magistri non solum ad ipsos sermocinatio, sed etiam pro ipsis ad Patrem oratio (Aug., Tract. in Ioh. 104,2: CCL 36,602).

M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, III, Milan 1949, 216-222: the sermon; Ch. Mohrmann, Praedicare-Tractare-Sermo, in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, II, Rome 1961, 63-72; J.B. Schneyer, Geschichte der katholischen Predigt, Freiburg i.Br. 1968; W. Schütz, Geschichte der christlichen Predigt, Berlin-New York 1972; R. Grégoire, Homéliaires liturgiques médiévaux. Analyses de manuscrits, Spoleto 1981, 18-37; RAC 16, 148-175; De Ore Domini: Preacher and Word in the Middle Ages, ed. Th.L. Amos - E.A. Green - B.M. Kienzle, Studies in Medieval Culture 27, Kalamazoo, MI 1989, 41-60; J. Hamesse - X. Hermand, De l'Homélie au Sermon. Histoire de la Prédication Médiévale, Louvain-la-Neuve 1993, 186-192; R. Étaix, Homéliaires patristiques latins: recueil d'études de manuscrits médiévaux, Paris 1994; F.J. Tovar Paz, Tractatus, sermones atque homiliae: el cultivo del género literario del discurso homilético en la Hispania tardoantigua y visigoda, Cáceres 1994; F. Siegert, Homily and Panegyrical Sermon, Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 B.C.–A.D. 400, ed. S.E. Porter, Leiden 1997, 421-443; M. Sodi - A.M. Triacca, Dizionario di omiletica, Turin 1998; H.O. Old, The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church, 2 vols., Grand Rapids, MI 1998; B. Mayne Kienzle, The Sermon, Typologie des Sources, Turnhout 2000.

R. Grégoire

SERMO ARIANORUM. From 418, *Augustine of Hippo had in hand this *Arian text that was sent to him so that he could refute it. Some MSS along with the refutation, Contra sermonem Arianorum (Against a Sermon of the Arians), have also transmitted to us the Arian text: it was a document circulating among the *Goths who had come to *Italy with *Alaric and Ataulf, which presents itself not as a homily but as a small compendium of radical Arianism in the West, associated with the school of *Wulfila.

CPL 701; PL 48, 677-684; Patrologia III, 97-98; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 129-134; M.G. Mara, Der Serm. Arrian., in Augustinus-Lexikon, I, Basel 1986-1994, 454-455.

M. Simonetti

SERMON on the MOUNT (iconography). Patristic literature often makes reference to the Sermon on the Mount, although the iconography is reticent. The format of the representation of the Sermon on the Mount presents Christus Magister in adlocutio with his right hand, in his left hand is an open scroll, at the moment in which he turns to the audientes (*apostles or followers). These characteristics of the composition were found in a scene represented on the multicolored *sarcophagus preserved at the National Museum of Rome, dated at the end of the 3rd c.–beginning of the 4th c. AD (Rep 773b, p. 321, pl. 62): here the figure of Christ, who has a beard, draws its inspiration from the iconography of Zeus seated and draped, but the scroll is not open. In a fragment of a sarcophagus coming from Portus, dated to the 2nd quarter of the 4th c. (Rep 110, p. 80, pl. 29), the representation shows the scroll open, and those listening (audientes) are four young male figures, turned toward him. The same scene appears on a fragment discovered at the cemetery of Calepodius (Nestori 1971). According to Wilpert, a precedent for this depiction, in this case, the first in the order of time, should be seen in the fresco in cubicle III of the hypogeum of the Aureli (dated to ca. AD 230–240): here a bearded figure in a tunic and a pallium, seated on top of a hill, wields a scroll extended between his hands, although at the top sheep and goats eat. According to Cecchelli (1944) and more recently Himmelmann (1975), in reality it is an image of the Shepherd of the Soul inspired from the figure of the philosopher of life: the spiritual look would in fact be typical of this representation, and its interlocutors (sheep and goats) are not facing him. The same interpretive uncertainty weighs on the representation of the cubiculum A in the catacomb of the Via D. Compagni at Rome (the frescoes of this sector are dated to ca. AD 320), in which Ferrua has proposed that one can see in it Christ's Sermon on the Mount, with Christ standing on a rock; he has his arm lifted in the act of speaking to a crowd of disciples below. In contrast to Ferrua, Klauser (1962) and then Kötzsche-Breitenbruch (1976) prefer to interpret the image as that of Moses who speaks to the Israelites. Both Hempel (1961) and Klauser note in the same cubiculum the presence of the representation of Christ the teacher (Christus Magister) speaking to the twelve apostles, a theme that would find widespread diffusion in the mosaic decorations of 4th-c. basilicas and onward. According to Bisconti the scene should rather be attributed to a deceased person placed in the context of paradise with a bucolic background.

For the fragments of the aforementioned sarcophagi, see C. Cecchelli, Monumenti cristiano-eretici di Roma, Rome 1944, 14-15; F.W.Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, I, Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967. For the hypogeum of Althea Aureli, see the previous references in Cecchelli, op. cit., 1-119, to which one must now add those provided by N. Himmelmann, Das Hypogäum der Aurelier am Viale Manzoni. Ikonographische Beobachtungen (Abh. d.Wiss. und der Lit., Geistes- und Sozial-wiss. Klasse, n. 7), Wiesbaden 1975. For the catacomb of the Via D. Compagni, see A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di Via Latina, Vatican City 1960, 47, pl. XIV; Th. Klauser: JbAC 5 (1962) 179; H.L. Hempel, Zum Problem derAnfänge der AT Illustration: ZNTW 73 (1961) 300; L.Kötzsche Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe an der Via Latina in Rom: JbAC 19 (1976) 87-88; F. Bisconti, L'ipogeo degli Aureli in viale Manzoni: un esempio di sincresi privata: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 889-903; TIP 279.

L. Ungaro Testini

SERMONS, AFRICAN (anonymous). In 1949 J. Leclercq published eight anonymous sermons of African origin (CPL 418-425), which were of Augustinian inspiration (one of the Latin *Epiphanius, another seems to be that of Augustine, and a third brief sermon draws on a sermon from *Augustine). They pertained to NT topics (eunuchs, love for neighbor, celebration of the martyrs, the lost sheep, the hundredfold recompense, the Samaritan woman and the measures). Another group of nine sermons was discovered in the homiliarium of Fleury. These are devoted to various Christian feasts (*Epiphany, *Ascension, *Pentecost, *John the Baptist and the celebration of the *martyrs). Moreover, other sermons of dubious authorship or total anonymity circulated and were published by Wilmart, Morin, Lemarié and Étaix; some were attributed to Augustine, others to *Fulgentius of Ruspe. Some of these sermons, to criticize the *Vandal kings, spoke of the biblical tyrants, esp. the Pharaoh. For a list of these sermons, see A. Isola, pp. 10-19.

CPL 418-425; CPPM 1, 1935-1942; homiliarium of Fleury: CPL 855-863; PLS 2, 1326-1328 (A list of sermons with reference to the published text in various volumes); J. Leclerq, Les inédits africains de l'homiliaire de Fleury: RBen 58 (1948) 53-73; Id., Sermons de l'école de S. Augustin: RBen 59 (1949) 100-113; G. Morin, Deux sermons africains du V^e^/VI^e^ siècle avec un texte inédit du symbole: RBen 35 (1923) 233-245; J. Lemarié, Un sermon inédit sur Matthieu 16,13-19 de l'école de Fulgence de Ruspe: REAug 18 (1972) 116-123; Id., Sermon africain inédit pour la fête des innocents: AB 96 (1978) 108-116; P.P. Verbraken, Études critiques sur les sermons authentiques de Saint Augustin, Steenbrugge 1976; A. Hamman, La trasmission des sermons de saint Augustin: les authentiques et les apocryphes: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 311-327; R. Grégoire, Homéliaires liturgiques médiévaux. Analyse des manuscrits, Spoleto 1980, 263-280; A. Isola, I cristiani dell'Africa vandalica nei Sermones del tempo (429-534), Milan 1990; Dizionario di letteratura cristiana antica, ed. S. Döpp - W. Geerlings, Rome 2006, 766.

M. Simonetti

SERMONS, ARIAN (anonymous). Published in 1992, 12 Latin sermons delivered by the same Arian author, which were found in a medieval homilarium from the 2nd half of the 8th c. (Codex latinus monacensis 6329), deriving from Freising: 4 preached on the occasion of Christmas, 3 for *Epiphany, 2 during *Lent and 3 during Holy Week: the MS is in a corrupt state: hence the difficulty of its correct interpretation. The biblical text used by the anonymous author is very special: perhaps because he at times had at hand the Greek text. He must have been bilingual and perhaps lived in a bilingual milieu, and did his best to preach in Latin. His *Arian teaching does not figure very prominently because the teaching was delivered in a sermon. The author acknowledged the *baptism of children, who are without sin; he therefore did not know of the *Pelagian controversy. Liturgical and linguistic characteristics lead one to date the author, who was a *Goth, into the 2nd half of the 4th c. in E Illyricum.

R. Étaix, Sermons ariens inédits: Recherches Augustiniennes 26 (1992) 143-179; R. Gryson, Les sermons ariens du Codex latinus monacensis 6329. Étude critique: REAug 39 (1993) 333-358.

A. Di Berardino

SERMONS, DONATIST. 1. As a result of research for the publication of a critical edition of the African homilies of minor authors, esp. of the anonymous collections gathered in the supplements to the Patrologia Latina under the name of *John Chrysostom, thanks also to the studies of Wenk, F. J. Leroy announced the discovery of 22 unpublished sermons from the time of *Augustine, to be found in the Latin MS 4147 (Rec. 499) of the Austrian National Library of Vienna.

The MS, also containing other texts, lacks initial letters and rubricated titles; it is also flawed with numerous mistakes and, on the whole, betrays a lack of proofreading; the difficult script and the numerous abbreviations appear to indicate that the text was prepared for private use. The dating is uncertain because the reference to the *Pelagian error, the absence of allusions to *Arianism and the exhortation to Christians to assume the role of judge in order to remove the brethren from the risks of a pagan judgment, which are the sole internal chronological references, allow one to consider the year 429 and the *Vandal invasion as the terminus ante quem.

The identification of the author-preacher of the sermons seems difficult: the stylistic considerations upon which one attempts to formulate an attribution must take into account a prose lacking special connotations that sets forth proper uses of a certain school, which can be recognized in the writings of many African authors, including *Augustine; attentive studies on the lexicon used esp. in sermon 18 are bent on demonstrating the *Donatist identity of the author.

The new sermons essentially address moral themes: the necessary obedience to the law, the search for poverty, merciful judgment toward one's brother, recognition of God's gifts, the necessity and the beauty of faith (sermons XI, XX, XXB., XXVII, XXIX, XXXV, LI, LIII, LV, LVI and LVII); the exhortation to an upright Christian life does not fail to pass through the examples of great famous biblical individuals and people mentioned in the gospel like Joseph, Job, Paul and Abraham (sermons VIII, XIII, XIV, XXXIV, XLIX and L); there are a few references to Christian practices and sacraments: respect for the *sabbath lived as a moment in which one does good, trust in God's mercy as an incentive for confession and appeals to prayer without showy displays (sermons X, XVII, XIX, XXXI and LX). Last, in sermon XLVIII there is an explicit invitation to flee from *Pelagianism. The provisional edition of the 22 unpublished sermons has been prepared by F.J. Leroy.

2. The Vienna collection forms, acc. to Leroy, a series with another collection of the Escorial Library, from which he published in 1997 a homily (no. 18), and demonstrated that it was Donatist. His enticing hypothesis is that the two collections form a unity because of the style, thought and terminology. The readers of the sermons were not aware of their Donatist character because they circulated under the auspices John Chrysostom's name (see *John Chrysostom [Latin Collection]). The unknown author of these 60-some sermons does not show himself to be polemical toward the Catholic position and does not offer us much concrete information on the life of African Donatists.

3. Several Donatist sermons composed to keep alive the memory of their martyrs have also been preserved. One could mention Sermo de passione sanctorum Donati et Advocati (BHL 2303B)—an account of the murders of some bishops during the expulsion from their basilica at *Carthage between 316 and 321—and Passio Marculi sacerdotis (BHL 5271).

PLS 4, 649-850; CPL 915 app., 938, 939, 940, 941; A. Wilmart, La collection des 38 homélies latines de S. Jean Chrysostome: JTS 19 (1917/18) 305-327; Tabulae codd. mss. praeter Graecos et Orientales in Bibliotheca Palatina Vindobonensi asservatorum. tt. III-IV. cod. 3501-6500, cur. Graz, Ed. Nova, 1965; F. Unterkirchen, Die datierten Handschriften der Österreichischen Nat. Bibliothek von 1501 bis 1600, Vienna 1976; W. Wenk, Zur Sammlung der 38 Homilien des Chrysostomus Latinus (mit Edition der N. 6, 8, 27, 32 und 33): WS 10 (1988); J.-P. Bouhot, Les traduction latines de Jean Chrysostome du V^e au XVI^e siècle, in Colloques Internationaux du C.N.R.S., Traductions et traducteurs au Moyen Âge, I.R.H.T. 26-28 mai 1986, Paris 1989; F.J. Leroy, Vingt-deux homélies africaines nouvelles attribuables à l'un des anonymes du Chrysostome Latin (PLS 4): RBen 104 (1994) 123-147; Id., L'homélie donatiste ignorée du Corpus Escorial (Chrysostomus Latinus, PLS IV, sermon 18): RBen 107 (1997) 250-262; Id., Les 22 inédits de la catéchèse donatiste de Vienne. Une édition provisoire: RechAug 31 (1999) 149-234; J.S. Alexander, Criteria for Discerning Donatist Sermons: SP 38 (2001) 3-7; A. Schindler, Du nouveau sur les donatistes au temps de saint Augustin?, in Augustinus Afer, ed. P. Fux, Fribourg 2003, 149-152.

D. Nuzzo

SERPENT. In the Bible the serpent (ὄφις, δράκων; serpens, draco), which in the Greek world was the object of ancient chthonic cults and was already present in the Minoan-Mycenaean religious culture, appears primarily in the story of Gen 3:1-14, where the ὄφις was called the most cunning among creatures, and it assures the woman that, if they would eat the fruit of the tree prohibited by God, they would not die but would become like gods, inasmuch as they would know how to recognize good and evil. Therefore, after the first parents ate the fruit, at the moment God rebuked them, the man attributed this fall to the woman and the woman to the serpent: ἠπάτησέν με (3:13), so that as a result the Lord cursed the serpent (3:14). Other significant appearances of the serpent in the OT are connected to *Moses: Ex 4:3, 17 and 7:15 speak of the transformation of the rod into the serpent, as a work of wonder, but esp. in Num 21, in which we find an event that would have numerous repercussions both in the later books of the OT and the NT and in the writings of the Fathers of the church. As a punishment for having spoken against the Lord, the Israelites in the desert were bitten by numerous snakes and were dying; they then besought Moses to intercede on their behalf, and the Lord ordered Moses to make a snake and to erect it as a σημεῖον ("sign"): whoever was bitten and looked at it would be able to continue to live. All this was accomplished in the following way: Moses made a bronze serpent, which would save from death all those who had been bitten so that all might turn to the serpent (21:9).

In the OT Wisdom literature, e.g., in Ps 139:4 and Pr 23:32, the serpent is characterized by its venom, danger and bite (Eccl 10:8, 11). In Job 26:13 the "apostate serpent," which God is said to have expelled, seems to be identified with the devil. Among the prophets, although Jer 8:17 announces the sending of the serpents that would bite and cause death, Is 27:1 predicts in an allegorical tone that the Lord would conquer the serpent by striking it with his knife. Subsequent reflection on this event narrated by Moses concerning the serpent that had been lifted up in the desert can be found in the more recent book of the OT, in Wis 16:4-10, and the possibility is not to be ruled out that this exegesis of this episode was given at the same time as the Christian interpretation of this passage. The author says that even in the desert, when the Israelites were dying because of the serpent bites, the wrath of God did not last for long, but soon God sent a "symbol of salvation": whoever turned to it was not saved because of the symbol that he saw but thanks to God, "the Savior of all men"; "and with this act you have convinced our enemies that you are the one who delivers us from every evil." In fact, no other remedy was found that saved their life because "they deserved to be punished" (κολασθῆναι), for God's mercy (ἔλεος) came to their help and healed them. In the gospels, in Jn 3:14-17 we find the exegesis of the events of the serpent lifted up by Moses in the desert: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whoever believes in him may have eternal life. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only Son, that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but in order that the world might be saved through him." See Jn 12:31-32: " Now is the judgment of this world; now will the ruler of this world be cast out. And I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all people to myself." In Lk 10:19,

Jesus granted to his disciples the power to walk on serpents and scorpions—i.e., symbolically over "every power of the enemy," evidently the devil—without being hurt by them (likewise Mk 16:18). The serpent also has a negative meaning in Mt 23:33, where Jesus called the Scribes and the Pharisees hypocrites—"serpents, a brood of vipers," sons of those who murdered the prophets, stained by the blood of the innocent *Abel to that of Zechariah—and promised them that they would not escape "the judgment of the Gehenna." In Mt 10:16, however, the serpent also acquired a positive value as a symbol of wisdom as a supplement to meekness: Jesus urged his followers to be "wise as serpents and innocent as doves."

St. *Paul in 2 Cor 11:13 recalled the "serpent which in its wickedness deceived Eve" and fears that it can even corrupt the thoughts of his own faithful because of their simplicity; in 1 Cor 10:9, Paul mentioned that the Jews died in the desert because they were bitten by the serpents, an event which, however, also immediately calls to mind the salvation supplied by the serpent lifted up by Moses as a figura Christi. In Rev 12:9 and 20:2 the author foresees the eschatological defeat and the chaining of the "great dragon, that ancient serpent, who is the devil and Satan, . . . for a thousand years," after his fight with the woman and Michael the archangel; at the end of the thousand years in which he will remain locked up, he will be thrown into the "lake of fire," the "second death" in which death itself will die. As a whole the NT, the term δράκων is used only for the serpent in the book of Revelation and nowhere else: in the gospels and the epistles of St. Paul one always finds the term ὄφις.

In the writings of *Philo of Alexandria, in the first half of the 1st c. AD, esp. in his treatise Legum Allegoriae, the serpent appears as an allegory of pleasure that accompanies the meeting between the intellect and sensation, essential aspects of knowledge, but which symbolizes in addition to ἡδονή—an allegorical meaning found also in *Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa—σωφροσύνη or temperance: it is a double interpretation, as brought to light by F. Calabi's study, Il serpente e il cavaliere: piacere e sophrosyne in Filone di Alessandria: Annali Storia Rel. 8 (2003) 199-215.

In the writings of the fathers of the church the serpent is often associated with negative meanings and evil itself, on the basis of the narrative found in Genesis concerning original *sin, where the serpent plays an important role as the tempter. Already in the *Letter to Diognetus (12) the anonymous author speaks of the serpent's deception to the detriment of the first parents, which is associated with ignorance and opposed to the knowledge of God. The serpent is identified with the devil, the source of evil and the deceiver of Adam, by *Ignatius of Antioch, in his letter to the Christians of Tralles (10) and to those of the city of Philippi (11), where he calls it the "apostate," the rebel against God, the deceiver of *Adam and the one who inspired Cain, who dared even to the point of tempting Jesus in the desert. The same identification is understood in his letter to the Christians of Philadelphia (6; n.b., longer recension), where the serpent "preaches deception and error in order to destroy humankind." And the story of the deception of the serpent and his cursing in the book of Genesis is mentioned by *Justin Martyr (Dial. Tr. 79; 88; 124). Irenaeus (AH I,27) identified the serpent with the devil, the deceiver, whom he saw present in the heresies, and esp. in the *Ophite gnosis (ibid., 30), and in III,3 he mentioned that the full cursing of original sin falls on the serpent and not on the first parents (see IV, pref. 4 and 1; V, 21; 23; 26; fr. XV). And in IV,24 he stated that Christ on the cross "brought life to man [ἄνθρωπος] from the wound of the serpent." Even *Theophilus in his treatise Ad Aut. (II,21 and 28) thought that Satan was the one speaking through the serpent in Genesis, and *Tertullian recalled that the Fall was owed to the serpent's persuasion (An. 16; and Ad Iud. 2); in An. 21 he attributed evil to the serpent's instigation and not to our natural disposition; in Carn. 17 he saw an opposing parallel between Eve, who believed the serpent, and *Mary, who believed the angel, and in Res. 28 he foresaw that the ancient serpent, the same one from Genesis and Revelation, will be conquered and the dead will arise from the heart of death.

*Origen likewise (Princ. II,8,3, and III,2,1) interpreted the biblical serpent as an allegory of the evil spirit or as a spirit inspired by the evil one, and in his treatise C. Cels. (IV,36.39), he refuted, by referring to his own commentary on Genesis, *Celsus's criticism of the Genesis account, acc. to which God showed himself to be weaker than the serpent and incapable of convincing his own creatures, unlike the serpent. Origen, however, accused Celsus of confusing the Christians with the Ophites, gnostics who were not even Christians (ibid. VI,28.37.39). In C. Cels. VII,39 Origen interpreted the opening of the eyes of the two first parents, which was foretold by the serpent and which occurred after sin, as the opening of the eyes of the senses, which were initially closed, although they had their spiritual eyes open. If Origen associated the serpent with the Ophites, *Hippolytus of Rome (Ref. V,1.4.6.11-12.14; VI,7) associated it with the gnostic Naasenes, by retracing their name to the Hebrew nahash, "serpent"; with the Peratae, who also appealed to the exegesis of the event recorded by Moses; and with the *Sethians. *Cyprian, in Ep. 33,2, identified the serpent with the devil and proclaimed his defeat by Christ thanks to the cross, therefore in 55,9 he could exhort Christians to martyrdom as a combat against the serpent, with the shield of faith. Cyprian would rebuke Demetrian for worshiping the serpent, which in the treatise Ad Dem. (16) is identified with the devil himself. *Methodius of Olympus (Symp. III,6) celebrated the victory of the Logos, God and man, over the serpent, i.e., the evil one who had brought damnation on all human beings.

Even *Gregory of Nyssa identified the serpent as Satan, e.g., by calling him "the evil one," ὁ Πονηρός (Enc. in XL mart., PG 46,764,25), "the apostate serpent" (C. Eun. III,10.16 and In Cant. GNO VI,165,11), the "ancient serpent" (Inscr. Ps. GNO V,162,20) and the "Father of lies"; the serpent is also tied to the lie in the treatise C. Eun. (I,1,108) because he lied when he said that through disobedience the human being would assume the divine nature (likewise in Vit. Mos. 2,213). And in the treatise Ant. adv. Apoll. (GNO III,1,141) Gregory observed that the one who sins does not lack a nous, but only lacks an upright dianoia, "just as the serpent the beginner and discover of wickedness . . . was not said to lack a nous, but was even more astute than the other creatures." The serpent thus ended up becoming the symbol of wickedness (κακία), as in the Vit. Mos. (2,63), and Gregory, in Ep. 3,6-7 subsequently interpreted the enmity predicted between the woman and the serpent as the enmity between human beings and wickedness (κακία), which does not belong to human nature, so that the ancient precept "you will love your neighbor and hate your enemy" could be applied to one sole enemy, the enemy of all humankind, i.e., evil, sin. In the treatise Vit. Mos. (2,256) the serpent, as an incarnation of the sin of envy, is called "the father of death, the first entrance of sin, the root of wickedness, the origin of pain." The head of the serpent is the ability to invent new evils (Diem natalem Christi, PG 46, col. 1133,9). Furthermore, as already in the writings of Philo and Origen, upon whom he probably depended, Gregory of Nyssa interpreted the serpent as the allegory of pleasure (ἡδονή) and passion (πάθος), which follows it in the commentary In Eccl. (GNO V,348,15-16); "the pleasure of taste" in Or. dom. (280,27 and 284,10); pleasure in general that urges us to turn to an earthly and pitiable joy (ibid., 282,8 and 300,31) and Opif. hom. (197,27); and "wicked desire" in Vit. Mos. (2,275). Under the appearance of pleasure, the serpent caused the first parents to eat "the evil fruit of sin" (Opif. hom. 200,39); in various other cases Gregory also mentioned the pagan cults of the serpent (δράκων). In the work In diem lum. (GNO IX,223), in radical opposition to the serpent, Christ was called to correct our sin, to bring the human being to perfection (τέλειον) and to save him (σῴζει τὸν ἄνθρωπον). *Basil of Caesarea, in Sermo 21, alludes to Sir 21:2, likening the serpent to the woman and even sin, as shown in the study written by Nardi (see bibl.), which also offers a panorama of the symbolic meanings of the serpent in the classical, Jewish and gnostic world, where it was tied to the idea of virility, and the patristic world, where the serpent was seen mostly as a symbol of deception and seduction. With respect to the iconographic consequences of the theme from Genesis of the serpent, the OT Christian miniatures, esp. those depicting Eve and the serpent, seemed to derive not so much from Jewish models as much as Christian texts of the first centuries, as observed by F. De' Maffei (see bibl.).

The serpent is a symbol of a cunning that is not always negative, as in the previously mentioned text from Mt 10:16, which was cited by Ignatius of Antioch in the letter to *Polycarp (2), by *Clement of Alexandria in the Stromata (VII,12), and again by St. *Augustine in the De Doctrina Christiana (III,25[35]), where he used it to indicate an example of the positive meaning that the term "serpent" can acquire in Scripture, although its deception and destruction wrought upon Eve is an opposite example. But we esp. have a biblical episode, widely commented upon in the writings of the Fathers, where the serpent acquired a contrary meaning to the one assigned to it in Genesis: not of temptation and betrayal but of healing and salvation. In fact, the serpent lifted up by Moses in the desert on the wooden rod by God's order saves all those who are about to die and who look at it: the Fathers perceived therein a clear typological prefiguration of Jesus Christ, who saves human beings from death through his cross. Thus Ignatius of Antioch, in a letter to the Christians of Smyrna (2), also echoing Jn 12:32, mentions that "the Logos, when his flesh was lifted like the serpent of bronze in the desert, drew all human beings to himself for their eternal salvation." Although this statement appears within the longer recension of Ignatius's letters, the authenticity of which is debated and could date to the 4th c., the Letter of Barnabas (12), which is certainly from 2nd c., had already seen in the Mosaic episode the prefiguration of the salvation brought by the crucified one against the bites of the serpent which represent sin, the bearer of death, because of the first serpent-deceiver.

The same typological exegesis was widely developed by Justin Martyr, who in 1 Apol. 60 recalled the event with Moses and considered the serpent a prefiguration of the cross and also put it in parallel with a passage from the Timaeus, which he believed *Plato had taken from the Mosaic text, even though misunderstanding it. And in the Dial. (91-94 and 112), he presented an extensive interpretation of the event as a prefiguration of the mystery of the cross, "which has brought salvation to those who have been bitten by the serpent" (Dial., 100). Christ is therefore the new serpent raised on the wood that neutralizes the moral effects of the ancient serpent's deception: it is not by chance that the same animal assumes these antithetical meanings: the opposing parallel is therefore all-encompassing. Christ is not only the serpent but is also the true μυστήριον. As such Christ was opposed by Justin to the μυστήριον established by the serpent of the pagan mystery cults, which is none other than Satan (1 Apol. 27-28), acc. to the well-developed identification of the serpent as Satan who tempted Jesus in the desert (*Dial.*103, 125), and as the "wicked spirit and the deceiver" (Dial. 39), which will persecute Christians until the parousia, when Christ will destroy "the serpent who sinned from the beginning" and will condemn death (Dial., 45). Justin Martyr ascribed to the "deceiving serpent" the pagan counterfeiting of the Jewish-Christian truths (Dial., 70). The serpent of the pagan mysteries was also mentioned by *Clement of Alexandria, who identified it with the devil, who led the first parents to death and who was, however, defeated by Jesus Christ (Protr. 1-2); Clement also allegorically interpreted this serpent in the book of Genesis as a symbol of pleasure (Protr. 11); similarly he called Satan the "deceiving serpent" (Paed. III,2) and said that Satan was the one to have Daniel thrown into the den of lions (Strom. I,21).

Likewise, Tertullian (Ap. 21 or Cor. 7) cursed the snakelike divinities of paganism, and he also allegorically interpreted the snake lifted up by Moses in the desert as a type of the cross (Idol. 5, Marc. II, 22; in III, 18 and Iud. 10), which has delivered us from the serpents, i.e., the devils who lead people to evil, recalling that the deeds that occurred to the people of Israel occurred figuratively, that is to say, in a typological manner. This salvation was granted even though the Israelites were suffering a just punishment for the idolatry into which they had fallen. Tertullian interpreted God's victory over the serpent prophesied by Isaiah as a victory over Satan (Adv. Marc. IV,24; Origen did the same in Princ. III,2,1). And in the appendix to the treatise Scorpiace, against the heresies, Tertullian affirmed that among the reasons for the veneration of the serpent by the Ophite gnostics there was also, specifically, the event recorded by Moses of the lifting of the serpent on the wood, as in the case of the Peretae mentioned by Hippolytus of Rome. Gregory of Nyssa also interpreted "the serpent of bronze lifted up, which saved the people from lethal bites," as a symbol of the "οἰκονομία which has come about by means of the cross for our salvation" (In Cant.—GNO VI,8,3-6; lilkewise in Vit. Mos. 2,31-33 and 275-277), where the typological assimilation of Jesus to a serpent, which is at first sight contradictory, is explained by the fact that the serpent was a symbol of sin and Jesus on the cross has been imputed with our sins so as to remove them (Vit. Macr. 24,13). St. Augustine also interpreted the Mosaic event as a prefiguration of Christ's salvific cross (Civ. Dei X,8, C. Faust. Man. XII,28-30 and XIV,8, and Doctr. chr. III,10[20]), and he identified the serpent with the devil, ascribing subtlety to him, as St. Paul had done (Civ. Dei XIV,9); therefore he clarified that the devil chose the serpent as a means of expression to deceive the first human beings, who not only sinned but also refused to recognize their fault, by attributing their own responsibility to others, the woman or the serpent (Civ. Dei XIV,11[14]). And the condemnation of the serpent (Civ. Dei XV,7) pronounced by God, Augustine maintained, was directed toward the devil, whose deception was owed to envy (Civ. Dei XV,23). And in Doctr. chr. I,14 Augustine affirmed that although the "wisdom" of the serpent imprisoned us, the "folly" of God (in the sense found in Paul's writings) has delivered us.

The presence of the serpent, mostly as a symbol, in the writings of the Fathers is extremely conspicuous; and it is not even remotely possible to give a full account of it. Only a few more details need to be mentioned. *Severian of Gabala, the bishop-lecturer who was an opponent of *John Chrysostom, among his various orations, esp. on the book of Genesis, also composed one On the Serpent (CPG 4196; see S. Voicu, Fogli copti di Severiano di Gabala, De Serpente: Augustinianum 34 [1994] 471-474). Árpád Nagy, in his essay Figuring out the Anguipede and His Relation to Judaism: JRA 15 (2002) 159-172, analyzed the ancient iconography of the snakelike divinities and maintained that the Hebrew root gbr designated various powers of the God of Israel and could in turn be connected to various attributes of the snake, whose image does not directly represent the God of Israel or even the name of God which was transposed on the image as a result of the influence of Greco-Roman culture on Jewish culture during the 1st–4th c. AD. During these same centuries, I have observed that in the Christian milieu there developed the typological theology of Christ as a salvific serpent raised on the wood, who was prefigured by the serpent which Moses lifted up in the desert.

Finally, in the writings of the Fathers the serpent very often took on a symbolic meaning, mostly in connection with Satan and evil, and as an allegory of pleasure, cunning and temptation, but it could also assume an entirely antithetical meaning, as a type of Christ in his full salvific power, exclusively in reference to the Mosaic event of the serpent lifted up in the desert and to the already existing biblical reflections on it in the book of Wisdom and the gospel of *John, all texts that were well known by the Fathers and that certainly influenced their exegesis.

The motif of the serpent also extended to Christian culture in general and iconographic representations. One particular application, e.g., can be found on the Constantinian coin, acc. to C.M. Odahl, An Eschatological Interpretation of Constantine's Labarum Coin: San 6 (1975) 47-51. Depicting on the back a serpent pierced through by a Christian symbol, the coin represents and celebrates the end of the imperial persecutions, although it does not invite one to attack the pagans, which did not occur under the reign of *Constantine, but subsequently, when Christianization also passed through the repression of *paganism. As M.G. Mara explored in her article, Memorie pagane nella cristianizzazione della Sabina: SMSR 20 (1996) 287-292, the analysis of the sources pertaining to the expansion of Christianity in Sabina reveals that, before this process, snakelike pagan divinities were worshiped in the area, as shown esp. by the legend connected to the Grotto of St. Michael the Archangel on Monte Tancia or Monte San Giovanni, where Michael defeated a serpent or a dragon: it was the symbol of Christianity's victory over the local pagan cults. We already hinted at the symbolic meaning of the serpent in gnosticism, where a considerable ramification is represented by the so-called Ophite gnosis, whose connection to the serpent we have seen was taken from the heresiologies. It is not by chance that the serpent Chnoubis was an Egyptian iconographic object of the theological sort, which was widely present on gnostic gemstones, as Attilio Mastrocinque has shown in his study Le gemme gnostiche, in Sylloge gemmarum gnosticarum (A. Mastrocinque, ed., Rome 2004, I:51-112).

E. Küster, Die Schlange in der griechischen Kunst und Religion, Giessen 1913; S. Davis, The Snake Cult in Greece and the Oracle of Apollo: Scientia 47 no. 88 (1953) 83-86; R. Merkelbach, Drache: RAC 4 (1959) 226-250; B. Goldman, A Snake Goddess, Asiatic Demonology and the Gorgon: AJA 45 (1961) 189; A. Oikonomides, Amphiaraos, Hypsipyle and the Snake: VTu 4 (1965) 75-78; R. Luyster, Symbolic Elements in the Cult of Athena: HR 5 (1965) 133-163; W. Taylour, New Light on Mycenaean Religion: Antiquity 44 (1970) 270-280; M. Mayer Modena, Il tabù linguistico e alcune denominazioni del serpente in semitico: Acme 35 (1982) 173-190; R. Hägg - Y. Lindau, The Minoan "Snake Frame" Reconsidered: OAth 15 (1984) 67-77; D. Sansone, The Survival of the Bronze Age Demon: ICS 13 (1988) 1-17; D. Barrett, Lucretius' Snake, DRN 3.657-9: LCM 15 (1990) 144; G.A. Samonà, Il Sole, la terra, il serpente: antichi miti di morte, interpretazioni moderne e problemi di comparazione storico-religiosa, Rome 1991; K. Wellesley, Lucretius' Snake Dissected: LCM 16 (1991) 41-42; F. Vattioni, Nḥš ṭb = serpente buono?: Studi Classici e Orientali 41 (1991) 457-463; V. Karageorghis, Miscellanea from Late Bronze Age Cyprus: Levant 24 (1992) 212-217; P. James, Pentheus Anguigena: BICS 38 (1991-93) 81-93; R. Simonetta, Nascita dell'oracolo di Trofonio: Aevum 68 (1994) 27-32; M. Sancassano, Il lessico greco del s.: Athenaeum 84 (1996) 49-70; Id., Il mistero del s.: Athenaeum 85 (1997) 355-390; Id., Il serpente e le sue immagini, Como 1997; M.D. Reeve, A Rejuvenated Snake: AAntHung 37 (1996-97) 245-258; M. Leigh, Lucan and the Libyan Tale: JRS 90 (2000) 95-109; K. Lapatin, Journeys of an Icon: JMA 13 (2000) 127-154; Id., Mysteries of the Snake Goddess, Boston 2002; A. Kerkeslager, The Apophis Snake on a Coin of Domitian from Alexandria: NC 161 (2001) 287-290; H. Egli, Das Schlangensymbol: Geschichte, Märchen, Mythos, Düsseldorf 2003; A. Trcková-Schulzová, Motif of the Snake and Its Meanings in the Minoan Iconography: Eirene 39 (2003) 119-149; M.W. Janan, The Snake Sheds Its Skin: CPh 99 (2004) 130-146; C. Ulbert - J.C. Wulfmeier - I. Huld-Zetsche, Ritual Deposits of Mithraic Cult Vessels: JRA 17 (2004) 354-370; I. Ramelli, San Giustino Martire: il multiforme uso di mystérion e il lessico dell'esegesi tipologica delle Scritture, in Il volto del mistero. Mistero e religione nella cultura religiosa tardoantica, ed. A.M. Mazzanti, Castel Bolognese 2006, 35-66; Id., Mystérion negli Stromateis di Clemente Alessandrino: aspetti di continuità con la tradizione allegorica greca, ibid., 83-120; C. Nardi, "Donna come s.": l'uso di Sir. 21, 2A nell'Omelia XXI di Basilio Magno: AATC 58 (1993) 87-130; F. De' Maffei, Eva e il serpente: RSBN 17-19 (1980-82) 13-35.

I. Ramelli

SERVANUS. The legendary Passio brings to life a Scottish bishop-saint by the name of Servanus, who flourished perhaps in the 7th c., in every sort of adventure. The center of the saint's activity and later his cult was the monastery of Culross in Scotland. According to others, Servanus lived in the 5th c. and was a disciple of *Palladius, the missionary of Scotland and the teacher of Kentigern. His feast day is on 1 July. Servan is the name of the British town in which he was born and buried and is also the place where Louis Duchesne lived, the famous editor of the Liber pontificalis.

BHL 7609-7610; BBKL 9, 1466; A. MacQuarrie, Vita Sancti Servani. The Life of St Serf: The Innes Review 44 (1993) 122-152; BBKL 11, 1466.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

SERVATIUS of Tongres (d. ca. 384). First certain Bishop of Tongres, capital of Tongres in the E part of Belgium, which in the 4th c. belonged to the province of Germania Secunda. Servatius took part in the anti-*Arian struggle of the mid-4th c. and at the Councils of *Serdica (343; today Sofia), where one finds his signature at the Councils of Sarbatios and *Rimini (359), showing him to be a zealous defender of orthodoxy. He also intervened at the supposed Council of Cologne (346), but the conciliar document is a forgery from the 8th c. He was sent as an ambassador to the court of the emperor *Constantius by the usurper Magnentius in 350, in order to obtain recognition from the legitimate emperor. He was also remembered as the builder of two churches, one at Tongern, which has been confirmed by excavations, and the other at Maastricht (Traiectum). We do not know of the date of his death. *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 2,5; Gl. conf. 71) notes that, miraculously warned of the invasion of the Huns, he went to die at Maastricht, which then became an episcopal see. His veneration is attested since the 5th c. According to legend, he was born in *Armenia and was a relative of Jesus Christ and a disciple of *Peter. His feast day appears in the Codex Wissemburgensis from the Mart. hier. for 13 May.

BHL 7611-7641; BBKL 17, 1290; R. de la Haye, In welke eeuw leefde St. Servas?: De Maasgouw 1 (1994) 5-28.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

SERVUS DEI. A title that could have originated from the heading of some canonical letters (Rom 1:1; Phil 1:1; Tit 1:1; Jas 1:1) with which the respective authors declare their standing before God and, more specifically, Jesus Christ. In the OT, the expression was used to refer to one's dependence on God: Moses, in the Vulgate, was called the servus Dei (2 Chr 24:9). As early as *Tertullian the term was used to refer to Christians, who among each other are fellow servants (conservi, Adv. Marc. 4,29; De paen. 10,4). Women were called "servants of the living God, fellow servants and my sisters" (see De cultu fem. 2,1). Latin authors such as *Cyprian and *Lactantius likewise apply these terms to all Christians. *Augustine also used the expression servus Dei to refer to believers (In Ioh. Tr. 10,7). Augustine presented himself as "Augustinus episcopus, servus Christi servorumque Christi" (De bono viduit., see the heading; De. pecc. meritis 3,1; Ep. 130,1; see Ep. 217). Monica was called servorum tuorum (Conf. 9,9,22). In Augustine's writings the expression also acquired another meaning, referring to the persons dedicated to God in attaining to perfection by living acc. to the apostolic model (Deo servientes—Civ. Dei 22,8,3; Ep. 186,1), but he esp. makes reference to the monks: servi Dei monachi, who at that time were laypeople (Ep. 220,4; Serm. 356,15). Yet in ecclesiastical jargon along with other similar phrases (ancilla Dei, famulus Dei), the formula has become a common figure without any allusion to the virtue of humility or one's way of life. Pope *Damasus called himself beatissimorum martyrum cultor Damasus episcopus, servus Dei. Other popes were content with the title famulus Dei. From these simple formulas developed more complex ones such as servus servorum Dei by Pope *Gregory I, which became customary in the pontifical chancery and then beneficially copied by a bishop here or there (see Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II,4). When Gregory I used the title in his correspondence with *John IV the Faster, patriarch of *Constantinople, who had proclaimed himself "ecumenical patriarch" (*John the Deacon, Vita Gregorii II,1), he was only adopting a formula that was dear to him and one that he had already used. The title servus Dei was given to bishops, priests and monks; in the Code of Canon Law it is reserved for the Christian whose process of beatification has begun.

Gregory I, Reg. Epist.; In Ezec., praef.; Mor. in Job; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 189; DACL 1, 1973-1993; 5, 1007-1114; 15, 1360-1363; EC 11, 420-422; I. Schuster, Il titolo di "Servus Dei" nell'epistolario di S. Gregorio M.: Scuola Catt. 73 (1945) 137-138; M. Colombás, El concepto de monje y vida monástica hasta fines del siglo V: StudMon 1 (1959) 257-342; L. Johan van der Lof, The Threefold Meaning of Servi Dei in the Writings of Saint Augustine: Augustinian Studies 12 (1981) 43-59; A. Zumkeller, Augustine's Ideal of the Religious Life, New York 1986; G.P. Lawless, An Augustine Glossary of Monastic Terms, in Homo spiritalis. Festgabe für L. Verheijen, ed. von C. Mayer - K.H. Chelius, Würzburg 1987, 276-294; J. Sepulcre, Léxico monástico en las cartas de San Agustín: Revista agustiniana 34 (1993) 799-829.

E. Peretto - A. Di Berardino

SETHIANS. *Gnostic sectarians who derived their name from Seth, a figure who had a particularly important role in the mythology of the sect. The most ancient heresiological testimony available is that of ps.-Tertullian (Adv. omnes haer. 2), who names the Sethoitae after the *Ophites and *Cainites; but his presentation of the sect and its teachings is rather confusing. *Epiphanius's note (Panar. XXXIX, 1-5), which depends in part on ps.-Tertullian, is, however, more precise and detailed. The later heresiological sources (*Filaster, *Isidore of Seville, *John of Damascus etc.) are all dependent on Epiphanius and therefore do not add new information. Likewise, through the heresiological testimonies, there also existed other groups that in one way or another appealed to the figure of Seth. In particular, *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 7,5), when speaking of the *Valentinians, attributed their division of humankind into three groups: the pneumatics, psychics and the hylics, corresponding respectively to Seth, Abel and Cain. The Sethians concerning whom ps.-*Hippolytus spoke (Ref. V, 19,1–22,1) have no relation to the heretics of the same name to which ps.-Tertullian and Epiphanius make reference and should rather be identified with the group concerning which Irenaeus spoke in the aforementioned passage.

Interest for the Sethian gnostic groups was reawakened by the discovery of the texts from *Nag Hammadi, in many of which Seth seems to be a figure of central importance. Some scholars (e.g., H.M. Schencke) maintain that they are able to individuate, on the basis of this new documentation, the lines of an autonomous and coherent Sethian doctrinal system. The texts of Nag Hammadi to which he refers are the following: The Apocryphon of John (BG 8502; NHC II,1; III,1; VI,1); the Hypostasis of the Archons (NHC II,4); the Gospel of the Egyptians (NHC III,2); the Apocalypse of Adam (NHC V,5); the Three Steles of Seth (NHC VII,5); Zostriano (NHC VIII,1); Melchizedek (NHC IX,1); The Thought of Norea (NHC IX,2); the Trimorphic Protennoia (NHC XIII,1). The adherents of this gnostic group were aware of the fact that they represented the physical and, at the same time, spiritual progeny of Seth; inasmuch as they are descendents of Seth, they are φύσει σωζόμενοι and Seth is their savior-revealer. Other characteristic elements of this doctrinal system are the divine triad (primordial father, Barbelos, αὐτογενής); the four illuminatory aeons (Harmozel, Oroiael, Daveithe and Eleleth); and a theological outline of history and an outline of the theology of history. In some of these treatises, one can see an open appeal to the typical questions of the Platonic philosophical condition. The hypothesis of the existence of a sectarian group of "Sethians" or a Sethian doctrinal system organically structured is, however, still heavily debated.

F. Wisse, The Sethians and the Nag Hammadi Library: SBL Seminar Papers (1972) 601-607; H.M. Schenke, Das sethianische System nach Nag-Hammadi-Handschriften: Studia Coptica (ed. P. Nagel), Berlin 1974, 165-173; A.F.J. Klijn, Seth in Jewish, Christian and Gnostic Literature, Leiden 1977 (with bibl.); B. Layton (ed.), The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, in Proceedings of the International Conference on Gnosticism at Yale, New Haven (Connecticut), March 28-31, 1978, II: Sethian Gnosticism, Leiden 1981; J.-M. Sevrin, Le dossier baptismal séthien, Québec (Canada) 1986; J.D. Turner, Sethian Gnosticism and the Platonic Tradition, Leuven 2001.

C. Gianotto

SÉTIF. The city corresponding to the ancient Sitifis, belonging to Mauritania, it became a colony under Nerva (AD 96–98), and under *Diocletian (end of the 3rd c.) it was the capital and most important center of Mauritania Sitifiana. *Theodosius, the father of the emperor, in his struggle against Firmus, who had rebelled against him in 372, established his general quarters there (*Ammianus Marcellinus, 29,5,7.50.56). At the time of *Augustine it underwent an earthquake, which forced the inhabitants to abandon the city and to camp out for some 15 days in the countryside: at that time 2,000 people asked for *baptism (Aug., Serm. 19,6). During the *Vandal occupation, Sétif and its region temporarily returned and became part of the empire (442–455). Reoccupied by the *Byzantines, it again became the capital of Mauritania I; during this period, Solomon established there a new circle of much tighter walls. It remained a flourishing city during the first two centuries of the Arab occupation and fell into ruin only because of Ketania. It is not possible to invoke the inscription of Sertoria (CIL 8,8647) as a convincing argument for speaking of Christianity at Sétif in the 3rd c. In fact, the dove and the palm were not specifically Christian symbols. Moreover, the epigraph was not dated.

The proofs for a Christian presence in the city only appear at the end of the 4th c., with the inscriptions, and in the 5th c., with bishops. The inscriptions are funerary: they were discovered by P.A. Février in the basilicas he excavated. They form a continuous series from 378 to 429 (one is from 471), and they are not characterized by any specifically Christian symbol, with the exception of the Constantinian *monogram, which appears during a later era. With respect to the worship buildings, Mesnage counted there half a dozen temples and two were the objects of publication by Février.

We know the names of the following bishops: (1) Severus, beginning of the 5th c. (Aug., Ep. 111,7); (2) Novatus, his successor, 403–440 (conc. Carth. 419; Aug., Ep. 185,220; CIL 8,8634), and his rival from the *Donatist party Martian; (3) Lawrence, who dedicated a church to his patron saint in 452 (CIL 8,8630); (4) Donatus, 484; (5) Optatus, 525. Sétif is likewise mentioned as an episcopal see in the Thronos alexandrinos from the 8th c. and the list of Leo VI, also known as the Wise, in 883.

PWK 5, 393; DACL 15, 1363-1384; P.A. Février, Fouilles de Sétif. Les basiliques chrétiennes du quartier nord-ouest, Paris 1965; Id., Fouilles de Sétif. Quartier nord-ouest. Rempart et cirque, Alger 1978; R. Guéry, La nécropole orientale de Sitifis (Sétif, Algérie): fouilles de 1966-1967, Paris 1985.

V. Saxer

SEVEN MARTYRS of CAPSA. All the MSS of *Victor of Vita's Historia persecutionis, with the exception of certain MSS containing many lacunae, contain in the appendix the Passio beatissimorum martyrum of the seven "brothers" in the faith; the same Historia (III,41) makes a brief (interpolated?) mention of their martyrdom at *Carthage. Some scholars are of the view that the Passio was not written by Victor but by an anonymous author. In 484, the *Vandal king *Huneric, an *Arian, unleashed a persecution against the Catholics, exiling the clergy. In this milieu seven "brothers," who lived together in a monastery at Capsa (today the important city of Gafsa, in *Byzacena)—the deacon Boniface, the subdeacons Servus and Rusticus, the abbot Liberatus, and the monks Rogatus, Septimus and Maximus—were brought to Carthage, locked in prison and tortured to bring about their apostasy. When Huneric was unable to accomplish this, he had them killed; their bodies were thrown into the ocean but were carried back to shore by the waves. The Augustinian order celebrates 26 August as their feast day because it surmises that these individuals lived in the spirit of Augustinian monasticism.

BHL 4906; Comm. Martyrologium Romanum 343; AASS. Aug. 3, 454-457; BS 8, 16; G. Capello, Il latino di Vittore di Vita: Atti della Società italiana per il progresso delle Scienze 25 (1936) 74-108; S. Costanza, Vittore di Vita. Storia della persecuzione vandalica in Africa, Rome 1981; J. Moorhead, Victor of Vita: History of the Vandal Persecution, Liverpool 1992; S. Lancel, Victor de Vita, Paris 2002, 69-71 (discussion), 213-220 (text in Fr. tr.).

A. Di Berardino

SEVEN SLEEPERS of EPHESUS. The legend, acc. to the argumentation offered by Honigmann, originated in the middle of the 5th c. at *Ephesus by the work of its bishop *Stephen, who intended to increase the prestige and the power of the see of Ephesus. In fact Stephen's name appears on one of the MSS that narrates the events and was subsequently omitted or changed because he had participated at the "Robber Council of Ephesus," in 449. The first Greek redaction was immediately changed; moreover, it has numerous variations acc. to the tradition in which it has come down to us. It constitutes part of the theme of the individual who falls asleep and upon awaking finds that in the meantime the world has changed. The most ancient mentions of this story are those of *Jacob of Sarug (d. 521), *Zachariah Scholasticus (ca. 550) and *John of Ephesus (died 585) in the East, and in the West the pilgrim Theodosius (ca. 530; De situ terrae Sanctae 26: In provincia Asia civitas Epheso, ubi sunt septem fratres dormientes (CCL 175,123), who also gives their names, and *Gregory of Tours (d. 594) (Gloria mart. 94: MGH SS. Rer. Mer. I,2; n. 95; PL 71,787ff.). Paul the Deacon (Hist. I,4) narrates something similar, but in a different context: in a place in Germany the bodies of seven Christians with their garments are preserved intact. Photius had partly read through a passion about the seven young men (Bibliot., Cod. 253, ed. R. Henry, 7,209-211), for which he offers a summary. The legend situated at Ephesus narrates that the emperor *Decius (249–251) went into a city, ordering that all people sacrifice to the pagan gods. Seven young men of noble birth, who were accused of being Christian, were brought before the emperor, who, being young, granted them time to reflect and recant. Taking advantage of the situation, they hid themselves in a grotto of a nearby mountain. Upon their return to the city, Decius ordered that they be sought out, and he found them through the betrayal of their parents; because they had remained faithful to the faith, they were enclosed alive in a cavern, the entry of which was sealed shut. After nearly two centuries, under the emperor *Theodosius II (d. 450), a shepherd (or owner) of the place opened the walled entrance to the cavern and the seven young men awoke, believing that they had slept only one night. One of them went to the city to buy food with a coin from the time of Decius; he found, however, that everything had changed and that nothing was recognizable on account of the presence of a large cross at the door of the city. He was then arrested because he was using a coin from the time of Decius and was brought before the governor and the bishop, before whom he laid out his story. Investigators went to the grotto, along with the emperor Theodosius, where they found the other young men. They recounted their story and immediately fell asleep in peace. The young men were buried one alongside the other; the emperor ordered the construction of a church on their tomb. The names of these young men vary acc. to the literary tradition. For Symeon Metaphastes their names are as follows: Maximillianus, Jamblicus, Martinus, Joannes, Dionysius, Exacudadius and Antoninus; for *Gregory of Tours: Maximian, Malcom, Martinianus, Constantine, Dionysius, John and Serapion. Other names are found in other contexts.

Butler sets forth the hypothesis that the legend could have a basis in the fact that the seven young men were killed and buried and their bodies were rediscovered in 479; this hypothesis, however, was refuted by the arguments set forth by Honigman. In any case, it was useful for proving the resurrection of the body. The story of seven young men was widespread in many cultures and languages: in Europe through the Legenda aurea written by Jacobus de Varagine, in the Greek world through the work of Symeon Metaphrastes, as well as in other Eastern regions and other languages.

There exists at Ephesus the monumental memoria beneath the gorge on the E slope of the Panayidağ, where, acc. to tradition, the seven young men were buried; it is a cemetery where Christians and Muslims still go. In 1927 it was excavated by F. Miltener, who among other things found the remains of a church, other buildings, around 700 tombs and more than 2,000 lanterns. This archaeologist dates the complex to the mid-5th c. The legend is found in the Qur'an (sura 18), which also speaks of the presence of a dog who must awake the saints, but it does not offer the location. A mosque at Chenini, 18 km (11.2 mi) from Tatouine in S Tunisia, is connected to the legend: in that place seven Christians were imprisoned and shut in prison by the Romans; they could not find rest until they became Muslims. In the Roman Martyrology, the feast is dated to 27 July (Maximianus, Malchus, Martinianus, Dionysius, Joannes, Serapion and Constantinus), although in the Byzantine calendar it is set for 4 August and 22 October.

BHG 1593-1599d; Auctarium 1969, p. 163; Novum Auctarium 1984, p. 184; BHO 1012-1022; BHL 2313-2319; AASS. Iulii, VI, 375-397; Symeon Metaphrastes: PG 115, 427-448; DACL 15, 1251-1262; BS 11, 900-907 (extensive bibl.); LTK[3] 9, 563-565; RBK 2, 192ff.; E. Gibbon, The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, New York 1962, ch. 33; I. Guidi, Testi orientali inediti sopra i Sette Dormienti di Efeso: Atti della R. Accademia dei Lincei, MAL, III, serie 11 (1984) 343-445 (with It. tr.); B. Krush: AB 12 (1893) 371-387; M. Huber, Textbeiträge zur Siebenschläferlegende des Mittelalters: Romanische Forschungen 26 (1909) 462-583; 825-836; Id., Die Wanderlegende von den Siebenschläfern: eine literargeschichtliche Untersuchung, Leipzig 1910; A. Allgeier, Der Ursprung der griechischen Siebenschläferlegend: Byzantinisch-neugriegische Jahrb 3 (1922) 311-323; P. Peeters, Le texte original de la Passion des Sept Dormants: AB 41 (1923) 369-385; I. Lévy, Le chien des Sept Dormants: Annales de l'Institut de philosophie 2 (1934) 579-584; C. Praschinkler - F. Miltner - H. Gerstinger, Das Cömeterium der Sieben Schläfer, Baden 1937; E. Honigmann, Stephen of Ephesus (April 15, 448–Oct. 29, 451) and the Legend of the Seven Sleepers, ST 173, Vatican City 1953, 125-168 (see AB 72 [1954] 265-266); L. Massignon, Les Sept Dormants d'Éphèse (Ahl-Al-Kahf) en Islam et en Chrétienté, in Opera Minora, III, Paris 1969, 104-160 (see J. Dumont, Sur le culte des VII Dormants d'Éphèse, notamment au Luxembourg: Bulletin linguistique et etnographique 7 [1952] 30-48); F. Benoît, La Madeleine et les Dormants d'Éphèse: Provence Historique 12 (1962) 233-235; J. van der Straeten, Translation d'un bras de S. Maximien un des Sept Dormants: AB 89 (1971) 363-369; J. Bonnet, Artémis d'Éphèse et la légende des sept dormants, Paris 1977; A. Le Roux, Les Sept Dormants d'Éphèse: leur culte en Asie Mineure, en Afrique du Nord et en Bretagne, Gourin 1999; R. Pillinger, Piccola guida al cimitero dei Sette Dormienti ad Efeso, in Atti dell'VIII simposio di Efeso su S. Giovanni apostolo, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 2001, 275-286; S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-ecclesiastici in Oriente nella tarda antichità. Il II Concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2001, 115ff.; I sette dormienti: una leggenda fra Oriente e Occidente, [scritti di] Gregorio di Tours, Fozio; con un saggio di Louis Massignon, intr. by G. Avezzù, Milan 2002 (contains the Passio septem dormientium apud Ephesum by Gregory and Codex 253 of Photius's Bibliotheca); V. Rosen, Testi orientali inediti sopra i sette dormienti di Efeso [n.d.].

A. Di Berardino

SEVERIAN of Gabala (d. 408/425). In 399–400, following the example of his contemporary Antiochus of Ptolemy, Severian left the city of Gabala (modern-day Jeble-Ğabla, on the Syrian coast) to seek success as a preacher in *Constantinople. His success was so great that *John Chrysostom appointed him, at the end of 401, as his vicar before leaving on his trip to Ephesus. The incidents caused by Severian's prying attitude made a public reconciliation necessary (summer 402), which turned out not to last very long, because at the Synod of the *Oak (403) Severian was one of John Chrysostom's accusers. Forced to leave Constantinople in 404, Severian was able to impose *Porphyry at *Antioch as the successor of Bishop *Flavian. All trace of him is then lost. *Gennadius of Marseille (De vir. ill. 21) dates his death under the reign of the emperor *Theodosius II (408–450), but Severian was probably already dead by 425, and certainly before the Council of *Ephesus (431). Although *Syriac was his mother tongue, only Severian's original works in Greek have survived: a corpus of homilies, to which are adjoined fragments of a commentary on *Paul's letters transmitted by the catenae. On account of their stylistic diversity, the two groups of texts do not seem to go back to one author, but the broken transmission of both prohibits one from reaching a definitive judgment on this question.

Severian's homilies are often cited by the 5th- and 6th-c. *florilegia, but in the direct transmission they exist almost exclusively under the name of John Chrysostom. This change of attribution, which occurred around the mid-6th c. (perhaps to avoid confusion with *Severus of Antioch, who was condemned in 536), is so generalized that recognition of its authentic authorship has become difficult and controversial, which is also complicated by the unreliability of the indirect transmission and by the existence of ps.-Severian homilies in various languages (Greek, *Coptic, *Armenian, Arabic, Syriac and Latin).

Stylistic analysis has allowed scholars to reconstruct a corpus of more than 60 homilies, all dating back to the beginning of the Constantinopolitan period (399–402), which are generally long and disjointed, with consistent changes of theme. In his preaching, theoretical concerns prevail, esp. in the defense of the faith of *Nicaea and *trinitarian doctrine, but without substantial reflection on these topics. With the exception of a few exhortations to *almsgiving, he seems to have had little interest in ethical issues. Occasionally he displays exceptional philological erudition, but some of his biblical etymologies can only be explained by using the Syriac language as a point of departure.

His exegetical positions, which have not been studied very much, reflect various influences: the cosmology is generally Antiochene; well-noted analogies with *Eusebius of Emesa can be perceived in his exegetical terminology, even if Severian did not reject recourse to traditional allegories. At times his arguments were ancient and worthy of note, and they often depended on *Theophilus of Antioch's writings. Zellinger demonstrated that he had close contacts with *Ephrem.

CPG 4185-4295; DSp 14, 752-763; DTC 14, 2000-2006; BBKL 9, 1487-1504 (unreliable); H.D. Altendorf, Zur Bischofsliste von Gabala: ZNTW 50 (1959) 48-61; Id., Untersuchungen zu Severian von Gabala, Tübingen 1957 (diss.).

Authenticity: S.J. Voicu, In illud: Quando ipsi subiciet omnia (CPG 4761), una omelia di Severiano di Gabala?: Rivista di Studi Bizantini e Neoellenici 27-29, n.s. 17-19 (1980-82) 5-11; Id., Nuove restituzioni a Severiano di Gabala: Rivista di Studi Bizantini e Neoellenici 30-31, n.s. 20-21 (1983-84) 3-24; P. Regtuit, Severian of Gabala and John Chrysostom: The Problem of Authenticity, in Philohistôr. Miscellanea in honorem Caroli Laga septuagenarii, eds. A. Schoors - P. Van Deun (Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 60), Leuven 1994, 135-149; K.-H. Uthemann, Kriterien zur Abgrenzung der Homilien Severians von Gabala unter den Pseudo-Chrysostomica, SP 20, Leuven 1989, 61-69 (unreliable); S.J. Voicu, Confusioni e restituzioni: Severo e Severiano: Orpheus n.s. 16 (1995) 434-440; Id., L'omelia "In lotionem pedum" (CPG 4216) di Severiano di Gabala: Due note: Muséon 107 (1994) 349-365; Id., Il nome cancellato: la trasmissione delle omelie di Severiano di Gabala: RHT n.s. 1 (2006) 317-333.

Homilies: PG 48-65 (passim); M. Aubineau, Un traité inédit de christologie de Sévérien de Gabala "in Centurionem et contra Manichaeos et Apollinaristas" (Cahiers d'Orientalisme 5), Geneva 1983; P. Nautin, L'homélie de Sévérien de Gabala "Sur le Centurion contre les Manichéens et les Apollinaristes." Remarques sur le texte et l'interprétation: VChr 38 (1984) 393-399; M. Aubineau, Sévérien de Gabala, "De Spiritu sancto." Histoire des éditions et récupération de la fin d'un texte, amputé dans la Patrologie grecque, in Polyanthema. Studi di letteratura cristiana antica offerti a Salvatore Costanza. 1 (Studi Tardoantichi 7), Messina 1989, 37-47; R.E. Carter, A Greek Homily on the Temptation (CPG 4906) by Severian of Gabala: Introduction, Critical Edition and Translation: Traditio 52 (1997) 47-71; K.I. Dyobouniotes [Δυοβουνιώτης], "'Ιωάννου Δαμασκηνοῦ Λόγοι ἀνέκδοτοι": Ἐκκλησιαστικὸς Φάρος 13 (1914) 58-69, 119-149; S. Haidacher, Drei unedierte Chrysostomus-Texte einer Baseler Handschrift. II: ZKTh 31 (1907) 141-171; Ch. Martin, Note sur l'homélie de Sévérien de Gabala in illud: Pater, transeat a me calix iste (Mt 26,39): Muséon 48 (1935) 311-321; A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus, Ἀνάλεκτα Ἱεροσολυμιτικῆς σταχυολογίας. I, Petroupolis 1891, 15-26; A. Olivar, Sancti Petri Chrysologi Collectio sermonum a Felice episcopo parata, sermonibus extravagantibus adiectis. III (CCL 24B), Turnholti 1982, 927-930; R.F. Regtuit, Severian of Gabala, Homily on the Incarnation of Christ (CPG 4204): Text, Translation and Introduction, Amsterdam 1992; H. Savile, Ἰωάννου τοῦ Χρυσοστόμου . . . , Eton 1612-13, 5, 648-653, 898-906; K.-H. Uthemann - R.F. Regtuit - J.M. Tevel, Homiliae Pseudo-Chrysostomicae. Instrumentum studiorum. I, Turnhout 1994, 59-65, 89-102, 107-117, 124-138, 146-153, 165-172, 185-201; A. Wenger, Notes inédites sur les empereurs Théodose I, Arcadius, Théodose II, Léon I: REB 10 (1952) 47-59; A. Wenger, Une homélie inédite de Sévérien de Gabala sur le lavement des pieds: REB 25 (1967) 219-234; B.S. Pseutogas, "'Η ψευδοχρυσοστόμεια ὁμιλία στόν Τίμιο καί Ζωοποιό Σταυρό (BHG[3] 415[m] and 415[n]) εἶναι τοῦ Σεβεριανοῦ Γαβάλων": Γρηγόριος ὁ Παλαμᾶς 62 (1979) 299-318 [doubtful]. Severian of Gabala, Homilies on Creation and Fall [In Cosmogoniam], trans. R.C. Hill, in Commentaries on Genesis 1–3, ACT, Downers Grove, IL 2010, 1-93.

Armenian: J.B. Aucher, Severiani sive Seberiani Gabalorum episcopi Emesensis homiliae . . ., Venetiis 1827, 16-371; N. Akinian, Ewsebeay Emesac'woy Čaṙk[c] [The Homilies of Bishop Eusebius of Emesa]: HA 72 (1958) cols. 161-182, 449-474; 73 (1959) cols. 1-30, 161-182, 321-360; G. Dürks, Eine fälschlich dem Irenäus zugeschriebene Predigt des Bischofs Severian von Gabala: ZNTW 21 (1922) 64-69; H.J. Lehmann, Per Piscatores - Orsordawk': Studies in the Armenian Version of a Collection of Homilies by Eusebius of Emesa and Severian of Gabala, Aarhus 1975, 273-367; H.J. Lehmann, Severian of Gabala: New Identifications of Texts in Armenian Translation, in T.J. Samuelian (ed.), Classical Armenian Culture: Influences and creativity (Armenian Texts and Studies 4), University of Pennsylvania 1982, 113-124; H.J. Lehmann, Severian of Gabala: Fragments of the Aucher Collection in Galata Ms 54, in D. Kouymjian (ed.), Armenian Studies - Études arméniennes in memoriam Haïg Berbérian, Lisbon 1986, 477-487; H.J. Lehmann, What Translators Veil and Reveal. Observations on Two Armenian Translation of One Greek Homily, in H. Lehmann - J.J.S. Weitenberg, Armenian Texts: Tasks and Tools (Acta Jutlandica 69:1. Humanities Series 68), Aarhus 1993, 75-84

Coptic: S.J. Voicu, Fogli copti di Severiano di Gabala, De serpente (CPG 4196): Augustinianum 34 (1994) 471-474; M.E. Foat, Encomium on Ss. Peter and Paul Attributed to Severian of Gabala, in P. Chapman et al., Encomiastica from the Pierpont Morgan Library: Five Coptic Homilies . . . (Edition) (CSCO 544 / Copt. 47), Leuven 1993, 85-130; (Translation) (CSCO 545 / Copt. 48), Leuven 1993, 65-101 (spurious); E. Lucchesi, Un sermon copte de Sévérien de Gabala sur la Nativité du Christ (attribué aussi à Proclus de Constantinople): Analecta Bollandiana 97 (1979) 111-127 (spurious).

Georgian: G. Garitte, Un fragment géorgien de l'homélie IX de Sévérien de Gabala: Muséon 60 (1953) 97-102;M. van Esbroeck, Deux homélies de Sévérien de Gabala (IVe-Ve siècle) conservées en géorgien: Bedi Kartlisa 36 (1978) 71-91; Id., L'homélie "sur les apôtres" de Sévériende Gabala en version géorgienne: Bedi Kartlisa 37 (1979)86-101; Id., L'homélie géorgienne de Sévérien de Gabala CPG 4216: Muséon 104 (1991) 73-108.

Syriac: C. Moss, Homily on the Nativity of our Lord by Severian, Bishop of Gabala: Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 12 (1947-48) 555-566 (doubtful).

R.E. Carter, An Index of Scriptural References in the Homilies of Severian of Gabala: Traditio 54 (1999) 323-351; Id., The Chronology of Twenty Homilies of Severian of Gabala: Traditio 55 (2000) 1-17; C. Datema, Towards a Critical Edition of the Greek Homilies of Severian of Gabala: Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica 19 (1988) 107-115; Id., The Rôle of the Martyr in the Homilies of Severian of Gabala, in A.A.R. Bastiaensen - A. Hilhorst - C.H. Kneepkens, Fructus centesimus. Mélanges offerts à Gerard J.M. Bartelink . . . (Instrumenta patristica 19), Steenbrugis 1989, 61-67; R. Goulet, Un nouveau fragment stoïcien chez Sévérien de Gabala: Études philosophiques (1985) 251-255; R.F. Regtuit, Severian's Charm: The Preaching of Severian of Gabala, in E.A. Livingstone (ed.), Studia Patristica XXVII: Papers presented . . . in Oxford 1991, Leuven 1993, 202-208; K.-H. Uthemann, Severian von Gabala in Florilegien zum Bilderkult: OCP 66 (2000) 5-47; S.J. Voicu, Teofilo e gli antiocheni posteriori: Augustinianum 46 (2006) 373-388.

Pauline Commentaries: K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche aus Katenenhandschriften gesammelt und herausgegeben, NTA 15, Münster i.W. 1933, 213-351; S. Zincone, L'esegesi paolina di Severiano di Gabala: Annali di storia dell'esegesi 6 (1989) 51-75.

S.J. Voicu

SEVERINUS, pope (638–640). Roman, son of Avienus, he succeeded Pope *Honorius I in October 638 but was consecrated only on 28 May 640. The delay was caused by the fact that the emperor *Heraclius, before ratifying the election of the pope, asked the Roman apocrisaries sent to Constantinople to sign the Ekthesis, a heterodox profession of faith published in September-October 638 (in the sole person of the incarnate Word there is one sole will) and was imposed by the emperor himself and the patriarch of Constantinople, *Sergius I. The legates, who could not work on behalf of the pope, were detained in the East for nearly a year and a half. In the meantime, acc. to the Liber pontificalis, Maritius, who was in charge of safeguarding the collection of letters—a supporter of the exarch of Ravenna Isaac—led the Roman army to seize the goods collected by Pope Honorius in the Lateran vestiarium, believing that their annual pay was also located there. The bishop's palace was occupied and guarded, Isaac exiled the dignitaries of the clergy, he eliminated every resistance, and he divided all the goods among soldiers, exarch and emperor. After these events, Severinus was consecrated and reigned for two months. The Liber pontificalis described him in the following terms: sanctus, benignus super omnes homines, amator pauperum, largus, mitissimus (I, 329) despite the severity and the violence of those times. He ordained various bishops and made restorations to the apse of St. Peter's Basilica. He died on 2 August 640 and was buried in the Vatican basilica.

Anastasius Bibliotecarius, PL 129, 583-586; Mansi 10, 1003-1006; Jaffé I, n. 1039, 227; LP I, 328-329; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del VII secolo, Milan 1971, 112-113, 138, 173, 177, 192, 195, 232, 283, 300, 378, 418 and 509-512; Id., Il Sinodo Lateranense dell'ottobre 649, Vatican City 1989, 37, 112, 127, 171, 215, 304, 306, 374 and 394; BBKL 9, 1510-1511; Dizionario storico del Papato, Milan 1996, 1374-1375 (Ph. Levillain); LTK³ 9, 501-502; EPapi I, 590-592.

M. Spinelli

SEVERINUS of Cologne (late 4th c.). He succeeded *Euphratas as the bishop of Cologne. *Gregory of Tours spoke of Severinus as a man honestae vitae et per cuncta laudabilis, and narrated that, at the moment of the death of *Martin of Tours (397), Severinus received a revelation about this matter through the vision of a choir of angels (De virt. S. Mart. I,4: MGH, scr. rer. mer. I,590). Severinus's episcopate must therefore be dated to the 2nd half of the 4th c. He ordered the construction of the church dedicated to Sts. *Cornelius and *Cyprian, near which he was buried; this church adopted Severinus's name in the 9th c. A text titled Doctrina de sapientia, which consists of a series of brief statements, is attributed to Severinus. The biography of his life, which was written at the end of the 9th c. or the beginning of the 10th, lacks any basis in historical fact.

CPL 1153; PL 74, 845-848; J. Schlecht, Doctrina XII Apostolorum. Die Apostellehre in der Liturgie der katholischen Kirche, Freiburg i.Br. 1901, 127-129; DCB 4, 627; BS 11, 963-965; LTK 9, 699; DACL 15, 1391-1393; BBKL 10, 1507-1510; Diz. di letteratura cristiana antica, ed. S. Döpp et al., Rome 2006, 769.

S. Zincone

SEVERINUS of Noricum (5th c.). Saint, monk "apostle" of Noricum. Information about his life survives primarily through *Eugippius, his young disciple, who in 511 wrote a Vita s. Severini (CPL 678). With this text one should take into consideration the two epistulae exchanged between Eugippius and *Paschasius. It is somewhat likely that, being a native of a noble Latin family, perhaps Italian, Severinus also sought, in the first half of this century, the solitude of the desert in a location of the East (Eug., Ep. 9.10: CSEL 9, 2, 4-5) and from there around 454, led by divine inspiration (Sev. 9,4), he went to Noricum Ripensis on the Danube border to bring help to those peoples who were oppressed by the continual invasions of the barbarians. These are the few personal characteristics that can be garnered from Eugippius's writings; for the remainder he tends to make Severinus out to be a promoter of the new ideal of the monastic life in adhering more properly to the spiritual and temporal demands of that century. Severinus died in Noricum in 482 after having given life, with an apostolate of less than 30 years, to a plan of moral and material relief to those people prior to the consolidation of the Christian faith in that area. Because of this spiritual awakening along the borders of the Danube River, various monasteries emerged that were at one time centers of organized resistance against the returning barbarian invasions and seats of a charitable and social assistance programs (work, health, agricultural and artisanal economy, etc.). Finally, his body—the Vita recounts—in 488, at the moment of the Roman population's exodus before the resumption of the barbarian offensive, was taken from his early place of burial (possibly the tomb under the St. Jakobskirche at Heiligenstadt) and taken in a procession to *Italy by his students. After a first stop at Montefeltro near Rimini, at the invitation of the rich Roman matron Barbaria, it was definitively buried around 495 in a mausoleum built at Castrum Lucullanum (Pizzofalcone) near Naples. There, after the long pilgrimage, the monastic community which had arrived from Noricum established a new monastery.

Also worthy of note are the Hymnus in laudem sancti Severini, perhaps from the mid-9th c. (CSEL 9, 2, 71-73), and the Translatio s. Severini by *John the Deacon (MGH, scr. rer. lang. et. ital. saec. VI-IX, 452-459) both written at a time after the transfer of the saint's remains (along with the rediscovered relics of the martyr Sossus, a companion of St. *Januarius) to Naples, in the monastery of the Benedictines that then took its name from him. The calendar of that church in the Roman martyrology commemorates him on 8 January.

AASS Ian., I, Paris 1863, 483-497; BS 11, 965-971; R. Noll (ed.), Eugippius. Das Leben des heiligen Severin, Passau [3]1981; Ph. Régerat (ed.), Eugippe. Vie de saint Séverin, Paris 1991 (=SC 374); F. Lotter, Severinus von Noricum. Legende und historische Wirklichkeit, Stuttgart 1976; D. Norberg, Notes critiques sur l'Hymnarius Severinianus, Stockholm 1977; V. Pavan, Note sul monachesimo di s. Severino e sulla cura pastorale nel Norico: VetChr 15 (1978) 347-360; R. Noll, Literatur zur Vita sancti Severini aus den Jahren 1975-1980: Anzeiger der phil.-hist. Klasse der Österr. Ak. der Wiss. 118 (1981) 196-221; R. Pillinger, Bibliographie zur Vita sancti Severini (1980-1998): MittChrArch 5 (1999) 93-96; F. Heim, Le saint et la cité dans la tourmente des invasions barbares: l'exemple de saint Séverin du Norique, in G. Freyburger - L. Pernot (ed.), Du héros païen au saint chrétien (= Actes du colloque du C.A.R.R.A., Strasbourg, 1er-2 décembre 1995), Paris 1997, 165-175; A. de Vogüé, Il monachesimo prima di san Benedetto, Seregno 1998; Eugippius und Severin: der Autor, der Text und der Heilige, ed. W. Pohl - M. Diesenberger, Vienna 2001; D. von der Nahmer, Agiografia altomedievale e uso della Bibbia, Naples 2001, 113-145 (= Vita Severini [prev. publ. in FS B. Jaspert, Paderborn 1995]).

V. Pavan

SEVERUS. *Encratite heretic. *Eusebius of Caesarea dates him after *Tatian and identifies him as his follower (HE 4,29,4). Eusebius also noted that Severus accepted the Holy *Scriptures with the exception of *Paul's epistles and the Acts of the Apostles, a revealing characteristic of Severus's Jewish-Christian cultural milieu. Severus's disciples were called "Severians." *Epiphanius of Salamis (Haer 45) described them as possessing *gnostic-Encratite characteristics: they maintained a dualistic theory of the creation of the world by inferior powers. Moreover, they affirmed that the seed of the devil-*serpent gave origin to the *vine and that the devil also made human sexual organs and the female: hence the necessity of abstinence from wine and *marriage.

DCB 4, 632-633; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte der Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884, 544-555; F. Bolgiani, La tradizione eresiologica sull'encratismo, I: Le notizie di Ireneo; II: La confutazione di Clemente di Alessandria: AAT 91 (1956-57); 96 (1961-62).

E. Prinzivalli

SEVERUS of Antioch (d. 538). Born at Sozopolis in Pisidia, he studied at *Alexandria and Berytus (Beirut), where he was converted to a more committed religious life. Baptized in 488, he entered a convent near *Gaza. His religious formation occurred in the *monophysite context of this religious confession, which he immediately embraced and soon became its most representative spokesperson on the political and cultural level. Having gone to Constantinople in 509—he was present during the regime of the Henoticon that was favorable to the monophysites—he effectively spread his ideas there, and in 512 he was consecrated bishop of *Antioch. After six years of intense activity in favor of his cause, the antimonophysite reaction brought about by *Justin's ascension to the throne (518) forced him to seek refuge in *Egypt, where he continued the anti-*Chalcedonian fight by any means at his disposal, esp. with his writings. Around 535, Severus accepted *Justinian's invitation, who was seeking an agreement with the monophysites, to come to Constantinople but, because of yet another change in course by the emperor, he was marginalized in 536, while a decree ordered his books to be burned. He again went to Egypt, where he died at Chois on 8 February 538.

Severus produced an immense amount of literary work in his doctrinal defense of moderate monophysitism, in controversy with radical monophysitism on the one hand and Chalcedonianism on the other. The condemnation issued by Justinian and the hostility of the Chalcedonians brought about the loss, with the exception of a few fragments, of the original Greek texts of his works; but they were soon translated into Syriac, and they have come down to us in this language in large number. Of his doctrinal works, all written in controversy with others, the following are anti-Chalcedonian: the treatise To Nephalius (ca. 508); Philalēthēs ("lover of truth"), written during his first stay at Constantinople, in which Severus examined the *florilegium from the writings of *Cyril of Alexandria taken in a *dyophysite sense, to vindicate the monophysite character of Cyril's theology; and the treatise Against John the Grammarian (in three books), in which Severus refuted an apology of the Council of *Chalcedon written by *John of Caesarea. The following treatises were written against the monophysite currents of thought that were not shared by Severus: Against Sergius the Grammarian, four letters written shortly after 515, in which Severus combated the radical monophysite thesis acc. to which, because of the union, the human and divine properties have been mixed in Christ, and the corpus of writings intended to combat the so-called *aphthartodocetism of *Julian of Halicarnassus, written after 518: Critique of Julian's Tome; Refutation of Julian's Propositions; Against the Additions to the Tome; Against Julian's Apology; the Apology of the Philalēthēs.

From Severus's writings the following have survived: 125 *Cathedral Homilies, delivered during the years of his episcopate at Antioch (512–518) to celebrate feast days and saints, to explain scriptural readings etc.; more than 300 completely fragmentary letters of the 4,000 that he had written, which are very important historically and doctrinally. A baptismal rite and some poems pertaining to religious topics have also survived.

Severus was a prolix author who did not tire of repeating ad satietatem the fundamental principles of his beliefs: he illustrates them with continual reference to *Scripture (which was ignored, however, by certain proponents of Chalcedon such as *Leontius) and to the patristic *tradition—acc. to the use of that era—among whom Cyril of Alexandria shines forth. Even though he systematically rejected recourse to Greek *philosophy, he was an excellent dialectician. He was an implacable controversialist and knew how to present the complex material that was of interest to him with remarkable clarity. For this reason he outshined other writers of his time. He was the most qualified representative of so-called verbal monophysitism, which took the name "Severian" from him. Severus primarily wanted to be an expositor and the defender of Cyril of Alexandria's teaching, without, however, some of the uncertainties and terminological waverings of his teacher that could favor the Chalcedonians, and which had been rendered rigid and organic in a monophysite sense, on the basis of the famous expression "one sole nature of God the incarnate Logos." Severus understood the term physis as indicative of a concrete and subsistent individual nature, which was equivalent therefore both to hypostasis* and to prosōpon*. This physis of the Logos became incarnate with the union, which is acc. to nature and acc. to hypostasis (kata physin, kath' hypostasin), where nature and hypostasis are obviously that of the Logos, which are united to the humanity of Christ. Such a humanity is intact and complete, and in the union its properties, though adhering in the nature and hypostasis of the Logos, remain distinct, without mixing and becoming fused with the divine properties (against Sergius): therefore the body of Christ before the *resurrection was corruptible and mortal (against Julian), and Christ is consubstantial with the Father acc. to the divinity and to us acc. to the humanity. As in the case of Cyril, Severus also described this union through the analogy offered by the union of the human soul with the body. He could not admit that this intact and complete humanity constituted one nature, because for him to admit two natures in Christ signified also admitting two hypostases and therefore dividing Christ after the manner of *Nestorius: for this reason he rejected Chalcedon and Pope Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum. He was only willing to acknowledge, like Cyril, that one could speak of Christ's two natures in theory: in this sense Christ derives from two natures (ek duo physeōn) and from two hypostases, but really from the union a single nature and a single hypostasis is derived, a composite nature (= hypostasis) because the human properties were added to the divine properties: therefore Christ cannot exist in two natures (en duo physeis), as the Chalcedonians maintained. Given the distinction of the properties, Severus distinguished in Christ human and divine acts, suffering and dying on the one hand, working miracles and rising from the dead on the other: but because of the unity of the subject there is no sense in dividing these actions between man and God.

Severus's theology was closer to Chalcedonian theology than he realized, esp. neo-Chalcedonian theology; for this reason his monophysitism was called "verbal." But he never wished to acknowledge this affinity, because for him one simply had to affirm that Christ existed in two natures to evoke the *heresy of Nestorius.

Recently attention has been brought to Severus's work as an exegete. Severus was original because he joined the Alexandrian and Antiochene traditions. He was attentive to the literal interpretation of the sacred text, and even had philological and grammatical interests, but was open, esp. in the interpretation of narrative texts, to symbolic exegesis.

CPG III, 7022-7080; DTC 14, 1988-2000; J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien, Louvain 1909; Id., La christologie du monophysisme syrien, CGG 1, 425-580; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 403; M. Brière, Introduction générale aux homélies de Sévère d'Antioche: PO 29 (1960) 7-72; J. Gribomont, La catéchèse de Sévère d'Antioche et le Credo: Parole d'Orient 6-7 (1975-76) 125-158; L. Perrone, Il dialogo contro gli aftartodoceti di Leonzio di Bisanzio e Severo d'Antiochia: Cristianesimo nella storia 1 (1980) 411-443; L.R. Wickham, Severus of Antioch on the Trinity: SP 24 (1993) 360-372; R. Roux, L'exégèse biblique dans les Homélies cathédrales de Sévère d'Antioche, Rome 2002; P. Allen - C.T.R. Hayward, Severus of Antioch, London-New York 2004.

M. Simonetti

SEVERUS of Aquileia (586–607). Paul the Deacon narrates (Hist. Langob. III,26) that, once Elias patriarch of *Aquileia, after 15 years of serving in the episcopate, had died, Severus succeeded him. We do not know the details of his election, but these facts must not have pleased the exarch, who would have preferred to energetically intervene to put an end to the age-old schism of the *Three Chapters. The condemnation of the Three Chapters (553) in fact—as everyone knows—met fierce opposition in the West, for which the Aquileian and the Istrian schism represents the most salient and resistant episode, which lasted until the time of Pope *Gregory the Great and with which he occasionally dealt in his collection of letters. Thus, after the energetic but useless suggestions to bring an end to the schism directed by Pope *Pelagius I to the *Byzantine authorities in *Italy in the spring of 559, after the sorrowful but futile letters written by Pope *Pelagius II to the bishops of Istria and their metropolitan Elias to convince them of the indefectible teaching of the apostolic see and to invite them to a meeting that could identify and remove the causes of the division, and once Elias had died and Severus (586–607) had been elected, the exarch Smaragdus judged opportune the use of more energetic methods than those previously adopted. In fact he arrested Severus and his three suffragan bishops (John Parentium, Severus of Trieste and Vindemius of Cyssa probably at Grado for the consecration of the metropolitan), who were led to *Ravenna and persuaded to enter *communion with the bishop of that see, John, who was an opponent of the Three Chapters.

The pleasant and suggestive gestures that John probably used, reinforced by the fear of imperial arms and the presence of the feared exarch, finally led those four bishops to reform and to cede to the double force of reason and threats; but upon returning to their sees, they returned to embrace the schismatic party, as the primary sources attest. In fact, after having been denounced by the followers of the schism, they perceived themselves to be constrained to retract the recantation in a synod of ten bishops, who had been summoned to Marano (591). The bitterness and the indignation of *Gregory the Great, who had succeeded Pope Pelagius II in 590, emerged in a letter sent to Severus of Aquileia intimating to him that he needed to present himself at Rome, along with his suffragan bishops, to put an end to the controversy in a synod. But the dissident bishops, even though agreeing to the pope's requests and to the imperial iussio set forth by him, preferred to send a libellus supplex (MGH, Ep. I,17-21) to the emperor. The result of this recourse and resistance to Rome's doctrinal line on the specific question of the Three Chapters represents one of the partial eclipses of the criterion of the primacy of the Roman see that history at times records among Christianity's members and even in the knowledge of some bishops. The emperor Maurice was shaken by this request and ordered Pope Gregory to adapt to the circumstances of the times. In the meanwhile, Grado, a new residence of the patriarch of Aquileia, underwent an invasion from Slavic pirates and was tormented by other natural calamities reported to us by Paul the Deacon (Hist. Langob. IV,2,4). Gregory did not fail to help with their misfortunes while continuing his efforts to put an end to the schism, which by that point was on the way to extinction, as in the case when the exarch Smaragdus urged that the afflicted bishop of Trieste, Firminius, not be left undefended, who, after having been reconciled with Rome (602), was obligated to face a popular uprising that was brought against him by Severus of Aquileia (MGH, Ep. II,360,399).

Upon his death (607), the exarch Smaragdus once again had recourse to violence to impose on Grado a candidate favorable to Rome as a successor of Severus, namely, Candidianus. The dissidents elected another schismatic patriarch, John, with the cooperation of the *Longobard (Lombard) king *Agilulf and his duke Friuli, Gisulf II. There thus began a rival series of patriarchs of Aquileia, one who was resident at Grado with jurisdiction over the coastal strip and Istria, which was subject to the *Byzantines, and a second who was resident in the fortified Castle of Cormons with jurisdiction over the Longobard hinterland.

PCBE 2, 2062-2064; P. Paschini, Storia del Friuli, I, Udine 1934, 101-109; G. Cuscito, Aquileia e Bisanzio nella controversia dei Tre Capitoli: AAAd 12 (1977) 231-262; Id., Testimonianze epigrafiche sullo scisma tricapitolino: RivAC 53 (1977) 231-256; Id., La politica religiosa della corte longobarda di fronte allo scisma dei Tre Capitoli, in Atti VI Congr. intern. di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1980, 373-381; Id., Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 293, 295-296, 305-306, 318; Id., Fede e politica ad Aquileia. Dibattito politico e centri di potere (secoli IV-VI), Udine 1987, 112-126.

G. Cuscito

SEVERUS of Málaga (d. ca. 602). Companion and friend of *Licinianus of Cartagena, and in all likelihood also of *Eutropius of Valencia, alongside whom he probably received an educational formation in the Servitan monastery (possibly in the neighborhood of Valencia). Bishop of an episcopal see that was subject to the *Byzantines, he energetically intervened in the struggles against the *Arians. After 580, he composed a booklet titled Libellus unus adversus Vincentium against Bishop Vincent of Saragossa, who, ceding to the pressures of King Liuvigild, became an Arian. He also wrote a treatise bearing the title Anulus (Isidore of Seville, Vir. ill. 30), on virginity, which he sent to one of his sisters. None of these works have survived. He worked together with Licinianus in the theological editing and structuring of the latter's letter to the deacon Epiphanius (Ep. ad Epiphanium), on the spiritual nature of the angels. He enjoyed much fame as a good theologian. He died around 602.

J. Madoz, Liciniano de Cartagena y sus cartas, Madrid 1948; DHEE 4, 2446; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 347-348.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

SEVERUS of Milevis. Bishop of Milevis in *Numidia at the beginning of the 5th c. Friend of *Augustine from his youth, his friend in study and therefore, along with *Alypius and *Evodius, a companion in religious life. He was in correspondence with Augustine (see Augustine's Ep. 62 and 63, concerning the ordination of the deacon Timothy; Ep. 109 is a letter of Severus's which is full of praises for the writings of his friend, to which Augustine responded with Ep. 110) and with *Paulinus of Nola (see Aug., Ep. 31,9; Paul. Nola, Ep. 7,1 = Aug. 32,1). In 411 Severus went to the Conference of *Carthage, but because of sickness he was unable to participate in it. His name appeared among the signatories of the letter issued by the Council of Milevis (416) on the question concerning the *Pelagian controversy (Aug., Ep. 176). Severus indicated his own successor to the clergy of his diocese without informing the laity: a dispute arose and was resolved peaceably with the personal intervention of Augustine (see Aug., Ep. 213, 1 from the year 426).

PCBE 1, 1070-1075.

F. Scorza Barcellona

SEVERUS of Minorca (d. after 419). Bishop of Minorca (Baleari) for the first decades of the 5th c. Baronius published and attributed to Severus an encyclical letter found in the Vatican Library, putting it in relation to the information of an African document (De miraculis St. Stephani: PL 41,833-854). The letter provides information on the tensions between Jews and Christians and on the conversion of the Jews of Mahón, when Paulus *Orosius transferred the relics of St. *Stephen Martyr; moreover, he provided information on the liturgy, politics and the social life of the island. The text, which was published by Baronius, was reprinted by the Maurinists and Migne. G. Seguí Vidal republished it in a critical edition and vindicated its authenticity and integrity, a revindication also supported by E. Dekkers, U. Domínguez del Val and F. Martí; it was rejected, however, by Blumenkranz and, with more caution, by M.C. Díaz y Díaz, who date the writing to the 8th c. and not to 418, as maintained by Baronius, or 417, as Seguí argued. In Severus's debated letter a Commonitorium is cited, which Seguí and J. Hillgarth identify as the Altercatio Ecclesiae et Synagogae, a ps.-Augustinian text (PL 42,1131-1140). Today the Altercatio (CPPM 2, 163 and 1565) is no longer considered Severus's work, although it could be dated to the 5th c. and not to the 11th, as A. Oepke had maintained.

Editions: CPL 576-577; CPPM 2, 1566; PL 20, 731-746; PL 41, 821-832. Studies: G. Seguí Vidal, La carta-encíclica del obispo Severo. Estudio crítico de su autenticidad e integridad con un bosquejo histórico del cristianismo balear anterior al s. VIII, Palma de Mallorca 1937, 149-185; B. Blumenkranz, Juifs et chré- tiens, London 1977, n. IX, 419ff.; n. XIX, 128ff.; J. Amengual i Batle, Noves fonts per a la historia de les Balears dins el Baix Imperi: Bolletí de la Societat Arqueològica Lulliana 37 (1979) 99-111; Patrología III, ed. sp. Madrid 1981, 683-685; E.D. Hunt, St. Stephen in Minorca: An Episode in Jewish-Christian Relations in the Early 5th Century A.D.: JTS 33 (1982) 106-123; J. Amengual i Battle, Un prematur testimoni de la polèmica antijueva: La circular de Sever de Menorca (417), pres. i tr., LLuc 60, 1981; Id., Orígenes del cristianisme a les Baleares, II, Palma de Mallorca 1992, 12-64; Domínguez del Val, 78-81.

E. Romero Pose

SEVERUS of Naples (d. 409?). Twelfth in the catalog of bishops from Naples, acc. to a later catalog he was raised to the episcopate serving from February 363 (a date that does not seem possible) to 29 April 409, reintroducing orthodoxy after the successes of the *Arians and the pagan revivals. Severus immediately became popular by transferring to Naples the remains of his predecessor Maximus, who was persecuted by the Arians and died in exile. He was highly regarded by "all the sects," as the pagan leader *Symmachus wrote in 397–398, the senator and praefectus Urbi, in a letter to Decius the consul from Campania (Q. Aur. Simm., Ep. VII,51: ed. O. Seeck, in MGH, Auct. ant. VI,I [1883], 191). *Ambrose met Severus in 392 at *Capua, during a plenary council of Campania; a year later he wrote to him, affectionately commending to him the "brother and copresbyter" James, who had just come back from *Persia in the "blissful streets" of Campania and in need of peace (Ep. 59 [85]: PL 16,1232-1233). According to the episcopal chronicle (Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum [= LP Eccl. Neapol.]), in MGH, Script. rerum lang. et ital. [ed. G. Waitz], Berlin 1878, 404-405 and 437 [Catalogus Blanchinianus]), Severus established four basilicas and two monasteries, one of St. *Martin and the other of St. Potitus (but the second attribution was perhaps an interpolation in the Parthenopean LP). Moreover, he erected a basilica to the Savior that was rich in marble and mosaics, which was unwelcome to the Arians because it was consecrated to Jesus' divinity. The basilica was later called St. *James the Great, and only the three arched apses have been preserved. Scholars universally have attributed the construction of the baptistery of St. John in the Fountain, the most ancient in the West (which was constructed 30 years earlier than the baptistery in the Lateran Basilica built by *Sixtus III). Outside the city Severus built the cemeterial basilica of St. Fortunatus, which received the remains of Maximus and probably housed the first sepulcher even of his successor. In the underlying archaeological remains, some traces of frescoes (4th–5th c.) showed the saints from Milan *Gervasius and Protasius, confirming the bond between the church of Naples and Milan. In all likelihood, around the year 850 Severus's remains were transferred into the urban basilica.

B. Capasso, Monumenta ad historiam Neapolitani Ducatus pertinentia I, Naples 1881, 166-169 (Gesta Episc.), 223 (Catal. Blan.) and 269-279 (Vita, miracula, carmen); D. Mallardo, S. Severo vescovo di Napoli: Bollettino Ecc. Archidiocesi di Napoli 12 (1931) 61-66, 92-96, 121-123 and 140-142; H. Delehaye, Hagiographie Napolitaine: AB 59 (1941) 17-19; D. Ambrasi, Il Cristianesimo e la Chiesa napoletana dei primi secoli, in Storia di Napoli I, Naples 1967, 678-690; BS 9, 993-994; AB 110 (1992) 454; LTK³ 9, 504-505; PCBE 2, 2055 (n. 6).

M. Spinelli

SEVERUS of Ravenna (d. after 343). The only secure piece of historical information on Severus bishop of Ravenna is his participation at the Council of *Serdica (343), where, acc. to the information provided esp. from *Hilary of Poitier and *Athanasius of *Alexandria, he signed the decrees, the letter to Pope Julius II and the synodal letter to all the bishops (Mansi III,39, 42, 66). Information about him also comes from Agnello, the author of the Liber pontificalis of Ravenna (ca. 830–832) which reports a late hagiographical legend (Liber Pont. Rav. 13; 18, MGH scr. rer. lang., 283-287), from the Vita composed by the presbyter Liutolfus of Mainz shortly after 856 (AASS February I, 88-91), from two sermons of Peter Damian (Serm. IV-V: PL 144,522-534), from the sources pertaining to the cult and from iconography. He died on 1 February of some year acc. to the Mart. hier. (AASS Nov II, 2, 71) and the Liber pontificalis of Ravenna, which mentions that his place of burial was at Classis (Classe). He was honored as a saint from the 6th c. onward and was portrayed in a mosaic in an apse from the basilia of St. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna.

BHL 7679-7684, Suppl., 279; BS 11, 997-1004; PCBE 2052-2053.

A. Pollastri

SEVERUS of Synnada (5th c.). Bishop of Synnada (*Phrygia salutaris); he participated at the Council of *Ephesus (431), where in the first session, he signed for the deposition of *Nestorius (Mansi 4, 1224c). One of his brief speeches directed against the affirmations of the Nestorians, delivered during the council, has been preserved in *Ethiopian.

CPG III, 6141; A. Dillmann, Chrestomathia Aethiopica, Leipzig 1866, 99-100; S. Euringer: Orientalia n.s. 12 (1943) 127-130 (Ger. tr.); Bardenhewer 4, 200; B.M. Weischer, Qērellos, IV,1: Homil- ien und Briefe zum Konzil von Ephesos, Wiesbaden 1979, 39 and 62-67; Patrologia V, 33.

A. De Nicola

SEVILLE

I. Christian origins - II. Councils.

I. Christian origins. Seville was the ancient Hispalis in Hispania Ulterior; with the division of this province by the emperor *Augustus, it became part of *Baetica, for which it became the second most important city after the capital, Cordoba. Little by little, it grew at the expense of Cordoba, to the point of replacing it in its function. Destroyed by the *Vandal Guntheric on his way to *Africa (427), later, and for a brief time, it fell under the Suevian (441–456) and, then, under *Visigothic rule until the Muslim invasion (712). With the exception made for the brief period of *Byzantine domination in the 2nd half of the 6th c. Seville was the stage for *Hermenegild's conversion to Catholicism and his rebellion against his father, who had appointed him as governor of Baetica.

The history of Christianity in Seville, on the basis of the documentation that we have, begins for us during the era of *Diocletian, with the martyrdom of Sts. Justa and Rufina, during the episcopate of Sabinus who took part in the Council of Elvira as the titular bishop of the see of Seville. The catalog of the Codex Emilianensis speaks of another preceding bishop named Marcellus, of whom nothing else is known. But, judging from the intense Christianization of Baetica, brought to light by the aforementioned council, Christianity must have arrived much earlier, probably from Africa. Even in the religious sphere, Seville gained ground at Cordoba's expense. It is not known when it became a metropolitan see of Baetica; it is likely that the office of metropolitan was tied to one precise see, as had occurred in *Numidia. And at the end of the 5th c., Pope *Simplicius (468–483), after having praised Zeno the bishop of Seville, appointed him as his vicar for the territory—the geographic breath of which we do not know—with the duty of keeping watch over ecclesiastical discipline (Ep. 1: PL 58,35). The same privilege would be renewed by Pope *Hormisdas (514–523) to Bishop Sallustius, limiting him solely to the Baetica and *Lusitania provinces (Ep. 26: PL 63,425-426). Seville, however, reached greater prestige during the episcopate of St. *Leander (578–599) and St. *Isidore (599–636). At the local level, there emerged a celebration of two provincial councils, in 590 and 619, and perhaps a third. The episcopal school, called for by Leander, became a center of secular and theological learning; it would spread throughout all of *Spain and would nourish medieval Europe, thanks esp. to the literary production achieved by Isidore. Important for national life, Leander's influence and the conversion of Hermenegild to Catholicism should be remembered, a conversion that prepared the way for the conversion of *Recared and the entire Visigothic people. The church of Seville became the spiritual capital of Spain, and its influence was enormous through the Third (589) and Fourth (633) Councils of *Toledo, respectively animated by Leander and Isidore. After the death of these two bishops, Toledo took the lead, and the Baetican metropolitans were unable to reach their earlier prestige.

Bishops: Marcellus (?), Sabinus (ca. 300) at the time of the two martyrs Justa and Rufina, Evodius (who built or rebuilt the first cathedral), Deodatus, Sempronianus, Geminus, Glautius, Marcian, Sabinus (who had been expelled by the Suevian Rechila in 441 and taken back to the see with the arrival of the Goths in 458), Epiphanius (who had intruded during Sabinus's exile), Zeno (a contemporary of Popes Simplicius and *Felix), Asphalius, Maximian, Sallustius (a contemporary of Pope Hormisdas), Crispinus, Pigasius, Stephan, Theodulus, Hyacinth, Reparatus, Stephen II, Leander (578–599), Isidore (599–4 April 636), Honoratus (12 May 636–12 November 641), Anthony (646–653), Fugitivus (656), Bracarius (?), Julian (681), Floresindus (683–688), Felix (transferred to the see of Toledo in 693), Faustinus (693/694), Gabriel (?), Sisibert (?), Oppas (712, betrayer of King Roderic).

DHEE 2446ff., 2457; A. Morgado, Prelados sevillanos, Sevilla 1906; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne visigotique, Paris 1959; D. Mansilla, Orígenes de la organización metropolitana en la iglesia española: Hispania Sacra 12 (1959) 267-271; ES 9; A. Blanco Freijeiro, Historia de Sevilla. La ciudad antigua de la Prehistoria a los visigodos, Sevilla 1984 (Christian part 167-196); J. González, Hispalis, Colonia Romula. Ciudad y comunidad cívica en Hispania: siglos II y III d.C., in Cité et communauté civique en Hispania, Madrid 1993, 127-138; LTK³ 9, 506-507.

II. Councils. 590: provincial. Presided over by *Leander, seven other bishops from *Baetica took part in the council. The letter that the bishops sent to Pelagius the bishop of Ecija has been preserved, informing him of the decisions that directly pertained to him. Its three canons treat the issue of some of the church's slaves freed by the bishop, whom his predecessor had given to his own relatives, and some women who lived in the homes of clerics. The letter probably only contains the council's statements that pertained to the recipient.

619: provincial. Presided over by *Isidore, it presents eight other bishops. Of its 13 canons, the first two treat the question of the boundaries between some of the dioceses of Baetica; those that follow treat the question of the freed slaves, the treasures of the churches and the monasteries. The 12th canon speaks of a certain Syrian bishop, belonging to the "*Acephali," probably a *Jacobite bishop. The most important canon is the 13th, an extensive dogmatic treatise that refutes that heresy.

624: with respect to this council, see P. Séjourné, Saint Isidore, Paris 1929, 29-31.

J. Vivés, Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos, Madrid 1963, 151-153; 163-185; Synoden, passim (J. Orlandís - D. Ramos-Lissón, Historia de los concilios de la España romana y visigota, Pamplona 1986).

P. de Luis

SEXTUS, antignostic. Christian writer (end of the 2nd–beginning of the 3rd c.). Known exclusively through the mention in *Eusebius's church history (HE 5,27) of his name and one of his lost works On the Resurrection, which perhaps had anti-*gnostic contents.

E. Prinzivalli

SEXTUS, Sentences of. *Origen cited a collection of sentences (451; 610 in an enlarged edition), which had a Pythagorean tone and set forth a developed asceticism, and attributed it to the Christian Sextus. This work was used by *Basil of Caesarea (De baptismo) and *Evagrius of Pontus. *Rufinus translated it into Latin: more than 50 MSS (see P.M. Bogaert: RBen 82 [1972] 26-46) and some citations by *Pelagius, the Master, St. *Benedict, St. *Columbanus and others bear witness to its success. Rufinus attributed the work to Pope *Sixtus II. Two *Syriac versions, an *Armenian version, and the Sacra Parallela attributed to *John of Damascus, maintained the same attribution, which Chadwick does not consider unacceptable; the Sentences are clearly earlier for the most part, but the compilation was made in a Christian spirit, with Christian additions and revisions. The *Coptic fragments (nos. 158-180, 307-397)—bits of information from Codex XII of *Nag Hammadi (pp. 15-16 and 27-34)—unfortunately have neither the title nor the colophon. This small work supplies a typical example of the reception, at times unsuspected, of the asceticism and the piety of Hellenism in certain fervent contexts. In opposition to Rufinus, *Jerome tried to attribute it to a Pythagorean named Sextus, but it could be an invention that is entirely his own, given that this author does not appear in any other literary source.

CPL 1655; Verzeichnis 545; PL 50, 571-626; PLS 3, 21-23; LP I, 232, 237; III, 85; Patrologia III, 556-557; DTC 14, 2196-2199 (see Tables 4050); BS 11, 1262-1264; G. Wilpert, La proclamazione efesina e i mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore: AST 7 (1931) 197-213; R. Krautheimer, The Architecture of Sixtus III: A Fifth-Century Renaissance?, in Essays in Honor of E. Panofsky, New York 1961, 291-302 (now in Studies in Early Christian, Medieval and Renaissance Art, London 1971, 181-196); Id., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae, III, Vatican City 1971, 1-60; G. Bovini, I mosaici romani dall'epoca di Sisto III (432-440): CCAB 10 (1963) 67-80, 81-101; F. Magi, Il calendario dipinto sotto Santa Maria Maggiore, Vatican City 1972 (cf. REL 51 [1973] 41-48); N.A. Brodsky, L'iconographie oubliée de l'arc éphésien de Sainte Marie Majeure à Rome, Brussels 1976 (cf. RivAC 46 [1971] 179-183); Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976 (see index p. 1700); L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, 246-277; G. Zecchini, I "Gesta de Xysti purgatione" e le fazioni aristocratiche a Roma alla metà del V secolo: RSCI 34 (1980) 60-74; S. de Blaauw, Cultus et decor. Liturgia e architettura nella Roma tardoantica e medievale, Vatican City 1994 (passim); EPapi 1, 415-423.

A. Di Berardino

SEXUALITY. Early Christianity's assessment of the origin and meaning of human sexuality within the new economy of salvation has always been the object of latent tensions, which at times have exploded into open and dramatic conflicts. The reason for this should be sought in the spiritual and ecclesiological implications, in addition to the properly speaking theological and anthropological implications, of a decision on this topic.

As far as it is possible to schematize such material, we can say with sufficient precision that there exists in the ancient Christian sources a fundamental, even if variously articulated, opposition between the supporters of a rigorously ascetic attitude of the *Encratite type and supporters of more tolerant and flexible behaviors. Of the movements practicing erotic libertinism, which are documented for the *gnostic area, we must say that they go beyond strictly Christian discourse on sexuality, inasmuch as they are deeply permeated by pagan and syncretistic motifs.

1. The Encratite interpretation of sexuality seems clearly documented for the first time around the middle of the 1st c. in the community of *Corinth. Here *Apollo of Alexandria, in the name of the eschatology "already" accomplished in the laver of *baptism, which wipes out every ethnic, social and sexual difference (see Gal 3:28), preached that "it is good for a man not to touch a woman" and that babies are born "impure" (see esp. Paul's criticism in

1 Cor 7:1ff.). Widespread at the end of the 1st c., as also appears from the controversy recorded in 1 Tim 4:3 and 2 Tim 2:18, this radically pessimistic vision of sexuality was expressed on the literary level in various *apocryphal texts such as the Odes of Solomon (see the bitter plant of sex in XI,21), the Gospel of the Egyptians, the Coptic Gospel of Thomas and the apocryphal acts of the apostles (of *Peter, *Paul, *Andrew, *John and *Thomas). Over the course of the 2nd c. it found convinced propagandists in such authors as the Syrian *Tatian (in his work On Perfection According to the Savior) and*Julius Cassianus (in his work On Continence and Eunuchism). The *Montanists also preached the unbinding of the conjugal bonds in view of the imminent eschatological catastrophe (from this idea *Tertullian would garner support for his sexual rigorism and condemnation of second marriage), although a bishop like *Pinytus of Cnossus, in controversy with*Dionysius of Corinth, defended ascetic rigorism as the normal ideal of Christian perfection (Eus., HE 4,23,6-8).

The conception of salvation history underlying such positions was based on certain principles common to different doctrinal elaborations. According to the Encratites, God created man and woman and prohibited them from touching the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, but these first two human beings, by transgressing the commandment they had received, united and thus gave rise, after the creation of bodies symbolized by the tunics of skin (Gen 3:21) and expulsion from earthly paradise, to the chain of sin and concupiscence, birth and death (Gen 4:1). The revelation of Jesus Christ would then consist in offering believers the means, even sacramental ones such as the baptism font, to break the chains of corrupt generation and to inaugurate, after having set about on the path of the Teacher, a new humanity inasmuch as it is imitative, in chastity and poverty, of the example of the Lord. The ideal that towers in this way is that of the monachos (the word appears for the first time in the Gospel of Thomas, log. 16), a celibate and solitary man, a disciple and imitator of the Lord, to whom entrance into the kingdom is guaranteed (Gospel of Thomas, log. 49 and 75), and who already in this way participates in the angelic life thanks to his anticipation of the resurrection. The same pieces of information are garnered from the antienthusiastic controversy of the *Letter of Barnabas 4,10, where a negative judgment is expressed upon those who live in isolation (monazein) in the illusion of "already" being justified. According to the Encratites, to enter into the kingdom of heaven one must overcome sexual distinction, women must become males (Gospel of Thomas, log. 114). In this radically antiworldly intellectual context, the idea naturally developed that human birth is something intrinsically sinful and therefore newborns come into the world precisely stained by a congenital impurity (rhypos/sordes, Job 14:4), which is understood as the true and proper "sin of birth" (Ps 50:7) or "original sin" (on the properly speaking "Encratite" origins of the doctrine of original *sin, see P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Milan 1978); to be liberated from the curse of Adam's sin contracted by being born and from the ensuing slavery to the devil, humanity has need of baptismal purification (Clem. Alex., Strom. III, 100,5; ps.-Cypr., De centesima 2).

The structure of beliefs for which sex with its use, even within marriage, was always and everywhere considered negatively, gave place to forms of solitary life which at times reached to the point of the audacity of self-castration (see Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 29,2; Orig., Comm. in Mt. XV, 3; Eus., HE 6,8,1-4), but also to forms of ascetic cohabitation (virgines subintroductae, agapētai), which did not cease to give rise to scandals and reactions from bishops and controversialists at various times, esp. in the area of *Syria (Didache 11,11; Aphraates, Dem. VI, 4-5; John Chrys. PG 47,495-514), but also in the West (e.g., ps.-Cypr., De singul. cler.).

2. The controversialists who were hostile to Encratism, for their part, dialectically elaborated a theology of human sexuality which, having recourse to a different exegesis of the biblical passages involved in the discussion, rejected in no uncertain terms those things that were considered foreign excesses to the authentic Christian faith. A new theology of sex, which made reference to an anthropology based on different interpretive models of the "image of God" and "original sin," was taking form in the writings of orthodox authors of the first centuries. However, they did not hesitate to assume to themselves and to retranslate in Christian terms themes and motifs taken from the classical philosophical tradition that were markedly Stoic and Aristotelian, in the first place the issue of the legality and the goodness of a balanced use of sexuality, the just ethical ideal of metriopatheia .

*Clement of Alexandria, who dedicated the entire third book of the Stromata to refuting the gnostic and Encratite teachings, maintained that marriage is as holy as if not moreso than continence (Strom. VII, 12) and that marriage finds its specific reason for existence in the continuation of the species and the preservation of the world. Clement of Alexandria, as already *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. I,28,1), tended to misidentify the Encratites with the gnostics, attributing their devaluation of sex to cosmological and anthropological dualism that was proper of the gnostics, esp. the *Marcionites. This presentation of Encratite asceticism, which is notably imprecise and tendentious, would also be found, as a current heresiological topos, in the texts of others ecclesiastical authors who would also end up simply confusing the *Messalians and the *Priscillianists, heirs of the Encratite tradition, with the *Manicheans, heirs of gnostic dualism. This confusion of identification did not prevent many Encratite teachings from being received, after adequate reelaboration, in the most broad syntheses of orthodoxy, as, e.g., the idea that religious perfection consists in virginity in imitation of Christ, the doctrine of original sin, the postlapsarian interpretation of the tunics of skin etc.

3. The debate within the Christian communities on sexuality began again with great vigor over the course of the 4th c. The objective secularization of the church with its intrinsic risks released new monastic energies and extremist reactions such as that of *Eustathius of Sebaste. The vitality of the Encratite teachings and the ascetic ethos connected to it is demonstrated by the opposite resistance of numerous itinerant groups to the ecclesiastical pressures still in the Roman Empire, which by that time had become Christian. Encratite spirituality, which was based on the principle that the true Christian is the one who prays in a state of perpetual continence, in order to always be united to God, found convinced proponents, as was said above, in Eastern Messalianism and Spanish Priscillianism, and closely conditioned, dialectically, developments within orthodox monastic theology and spirituality.

On the other side, the spokespersons of the new social classes that had converted to Christianity, and often not for disinterested reasons, did not hesitate to challenge the Christian value of virginity to justify an aristocratic conception of the sexual and conjugal life, which was still deeply tied to the more noble values of the pagan tradition, and thus to combat the indiscriminate expansion of radical asceticism, which they opposed as an expression of the dreaded "Manicheism."

Among these often bitter conflicts, orthodox authors, the bishops responsible for the spiritual and monastic life of the community, attempted the difficult path of mediation that aimed simultaneously (1) to condemn in no uncertain terms both Encratite and Manichean excesses, if necessary with the help of repressive imperial legislation, and (2) to safeguard the supreme Christian ideal of virginity without having to condemn marriage and procreation. Such a situation, which was heavily marked by conflict, gave rise to a vast literature on virginity in which the most prestigious Greek and Latin patristic authors of that time engaged: *Methodius of Olympus, *Athanasius, *Basil of Ancyra, *Gregory of Nyssa, *John Chrysostom, *Ambrose, *Jerome, *Augustine and *Pelagius, with a significant difference, however, that while in the East theological speculation on sexuality moved primarily in the direction of a rejection of extreme asceticism, in the West the defense of Christian virginity was being worked out against its detractors, first pagans and then even Christians. The result was that the Latin Fathers seem on the whole to have been more inclined than the Greek Fathers to exalt virginity and continence. It is not by chance that ecclesiastical celibacy was affirmed starting from the 4th c. precisely in the West (the Council of *Elvira, can. 33).

In the East, John Chrysostom maintained the postlapsarian character of sexuality (De virg. 15,2; Hom. Gen. XVIII,3-4), and an *Origenist like *Didymus the Blind interpreted the tunics of skin in Gen 3:21 as bodies sexually differentiated and created as a result of sin (see the Tura papyri, in SC 233, p. 250). For Gregory of Nyssa, God added in humanity the mode of bestial and irrational propagation in view of sin and mortality (De hom. opif. 16-17), but *Theodore of Mopsuestia maintained that humanity was created gendered and mortal in his first katastasis, regardless of the sin that was committed shortly thereafter (Frag. in Gen. III, 17).

In the West, *Zeno of Verona was the sole witness of the survival of the ancient Encratite teaching of the sexual nature of Adam's sin (Tract. I,3,5,8). Ambrose and Jerome, renewing the African ascetic tradition of Tertullian and *Cyprian, defended Christian virginity against the assaults on this teaching by *Helvidius, *Bonosus, *Jovinian and *Vigilantius, although Pelagius worked out the criteria of the ascetic life for the Roman aristocratic milieu. But the controversy reached its apex over the course of the controversy that saw Augustine and *Julian of Eclanum take different positions with respect to original sin. Julian, who was educated in the school of the Antiochenes and who was influenced by Aristotelian philosophy, regarded human sexuality as intrinsically good inasmuch as it is created by God; only the immoderate use of concupiscence is sinful. As a result, babies are born innocent, without original sin. According to Augustine, however, sexual concupiscence is always and everywhere an evil, even when it is used while in marriage for the end of procreation, and therefore even the children of Christian parents are born with the stain of original sin. Only in the late and recently discovered text Ep.

6* (Divjak) written to Atticus of Constantinople did Augustine admit the existence of the good "concupiscence of marriage," the "concupiscence of conjugal modesty," by distinguishing it from the sinful "concupiscence of the flesh." In Augustine's thought, human sexuality reflects, in its postlapsarian condition, the state of the rift and the rebellion of the body against the control of reason which in turn reproduces rebellion, which in the beginning led the spirit to withdraw from God's commandment. That notwithstanding, Augustine was one of the first to elaborate a complete theology of the matrimonial goods: faithfulness, indissolubility and procreation. In this way, Augustine, while definitively breaking from the preceding uncertainties and the ascetic tensions, authoritatively revealed in Western Christianity the ideal of the essential compatibility of human generation with Christian marriage, elevating procreation to the dignity of one of the primary ends of the nuptial sacrament.

Finally, beyond some of the controversies on the origin, function and theological meaning of human sexuality, all Christian authors were unanimous in condemning those forms of behavior which, like pederasty and homosexuality, violate the ordered distinction between the roles established since creation. These sins "against nature" were repeatedly denounced, since the time of *Paul (Rom 1:24ff), in Greek and Latin apologetic literature and in patristic sermons as distinctive signs of the irreparable moral and religious perversion that afflicted the pagan world. Pastoral and penitential practices were esp. attentive to the religious and social problems posed by such "deviations" that were not foreign even to the Christian world. These were, therefore, heavily condemned in the post-Constantinian legislation, so much so that precisely in ecclesiastical and monastic contexts such temptations did not cease to manifest themselves again with noteworthy force (see the extensive documentation found in RAC 16,337ff.).

H. Crouzel, Virginité et mariage selon Origène (Museum Lessianum, Sect. théol. 58), Paris-Bruges 1963; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani: Annali della Fac. di Lett. e Filos. dell'Univ. di Macerata 2 (1969) 9-217; R. Gryson, Les origines du célibat ecclésiastique, Gembloux 1970; J.P. Broudéhoux, Mariage et famille chez Clément d'Alexandrie (Théologie historique 11), Paris 1970; Y.M. Duval, L'originalité du "De virginibus" dans le mouvement ascétique occidental. Ambroise, Cyprien, Athanase, in Ambroise de Milan 1974. XVI^e centénaire de son élection épiscopale (Études augustiniennes), Paris 1974, 9-66; K. Niederwimmer, Askese und Mysterium. Über Ehe, Ehescheidung und Eheverzicht in den Anfängen des christlichen Glaubens, Göttingen 1975; R. Cantalamessa (ed.), Etica sessuale e matrimonio nel cristianesimo delle origini, Milan 1976; P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Milan 1978; G. Delling, Geschlechter: RAC 10, 780-803; Id., Geschlechtstrieb: ibid. 803-812; Id., Geschlechtsverkehr: ibid. 812-829; G. Bonner, Some Remarks on Letters 4 and 6, in Les lettres de saint Augustin découvertes par Johannes Divjak, Paris 1983, 155-164; J. Gribomont, Askese, IV: TRE 4, 204-225; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Enkrateia e antropologia, Rome 1984; U. Bianchi (ed.), La tradizione dell'Enkrateia. Motivazioni ontologiche e protologiche, Rome 1985; Ch. Munier, Mariage et virginité dans l'Église ancienne (I^{er}-III^e siècles) (Traditio christiana 6), Berne 1987; P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York 1988; E. Pagels, Adam, Eve, and the Serpent, New York 1988; P.F. Beatrice, Keuschheit, III. Historisch: TRE 18 (1989) 120-130 (bibl.); Id., Une citation de l'Évangile de Matthieu dans l'Épître de Barnabé, in J.-M. Sevrin (ed.), The New Testament in Early Christianity (BETL 86), Leuven 1989, 231-245; R.A. Markus, Augustine's Confessions and the Controversy with Julian of Eclanum: Manicheism Revisited, in Collectanea Augustiniana. Mélanges T.J. Van Bavel, Leuven 1990, 913-925; P.F. Beatrice, L'eredità delle origini. Saggi sul cristianesimo primitivo, Genova 1992, 193-286; S. Elm, "Virgins of God": The Making of Asceticism in Late Antiquity, Oxford 1994; K. Hoheisel, Homosexualität: RAC 16 (1994) 289-364; P.F. Beatrice, Apollos of Alexandria and the Origins of the Jewish-Christian Baptist Encratism: ANRW II.26,2, Berlin-New York 1995, 1232-1275; V.L. Wimbush - R. Valantasis (eds.), Asceticism, New York 1995; P.F. Beatrice, Verginità, IV. Verginità, encratismo e matrimonio nel cristianesimo antico (sec. I-V): DIP 9 (1997) 1882-1896; Id., Ascetical Fasting and Original Sin in the Early Christian Writers, in P. Allen - R. Canning - L. Cross (eds.), Prayer and Spirituality in the Early Church, I, Brisbane 1998, 211-228; E.A. Clark, Reading Renunciation: Asceticism and Scripture in Early Christianity, Princeton, NJ 1999; for Augustine, esp., broad syntheses with bibliographic updates in the articles Asceticism and Asceticism, Pre-Augustine (E.A. Clark), Marriage (D.G. Hunter), in Augustine Through the Ages, Grand Rapids, MI-Cambridge 1999; G.-H. Baudry, Le péché dit originel (Théol. Hist. 113), Paris 2000; K.E. Børresen, From Patristics to Matristics: Selected Articles on Christian Gender Models, Rome 2002; Y.-M. Duval, L'affaire Jovinien. D'une crise de la société romaine à une crise de la pensée chrétienne à la fin du IV^e et au début du V^e siècle (SEA 83), Rome 2003; J. Wright Knust, Abandoned to Lust: Sexual Slander and Ancient Christianity, New York 2005.

P.F. Beatrice

SHAPUR. The name of some Persian sovereigns from the *Sassanid dynasty (Latin Sapor; Arabic Sabur). Shapur I consolidated the empire established by his father, Ardashir I, and reigned from AD 240 to 272. The *Chronicle of Arbela, ch. 9 [Kawerau, 34-35 = Mingana, 34] mentions the war that he waged against various peoples, among whom were the Medes of the mountains and the Geli, and esp. the Romans, with whom he battled "more times," conquering *Nisibis and Harran (Lat. Carre), advancing even to *Syria. Shapur I also knew how to face the ascent of Septimius Odaenathus of *Palmyra, who even came to the point of threatening Ctesiphon. Shapur I maintained *Persian power intact against the West and consolidated the Persian economy. He promoted a program of public works and, esp. in his later years, commissioned the translation of many Greek and Indian works.

The epigraphs Res Gestae Divi Saporis recall the victory that marks the end of the Parthian dominion and the beginning of Persian rule (28 April AD 224) and the victories of Shapur I over the Romans. The emperor Gordian III in the battle of Rish'ayna (243) defeated Shapur I's Persians with the help of *Gothic militias, but in 244 Shapur I was able to achieve peace with the emperor *Philip the Arab, a peace that guaranteed him power in *Armenia and *Mesopotamia, and in 260, after having occupied *Dura Europos and *Antioch, in the battle of *Edessa he entirely defeated and captured the emperor *Valerian, even with less help from the *Goths at *Rome; the Roman emperor died in prison. In 260 *Commodian saw in *Valerian a persecutor of the Christians, Nero redivivus and the first Antichrist, and in Shapur I the rex ab Oriente from the Sibylline Oracles and the second Antichrist, who came to destroy the empire and to bring about more quickly the end the world. Just as *Plotinus was at the assistance of Gordian III in the expedition of 243–244, so too in this campaign *Mani, the founder of Manicheism, was at the service of Shapur I: the sovereign in fact kept him under his own care. Many Romans, on this occasion, were deported to Persia and, as recorded by the Chronicle of Se'ert, "obtained in Persia a better living than in their own homeland, and through their work Christianity made converts in the East." In the West, the successor of Valerian, the emperor *Gallienus, suspended the persecution promoted by Valerian and restored to the Christians the freedom of worship and their own properties.

With respect to Shapur II (AD 309–379), the aforementioned Chronicle of Arbela speaks at great length, recalling his vain attempt to lay siege to Nisibis, "a city of borders," and his decision to "uproot from his land the religion of the Romans," i.e., Christianity, which, in the post-*Constantine era, at the time of the emperor *Constantius, was regarded in Persia by that time to be the religion of the Roman Empire. Thus in 339/340 a royal edict decreed the slaughter of Christians in Persia and the destruction of their churches, even if the mauhpata, the Persian governors, did not uniformly apply the edict. Thus, e.g., the mauhpata of Adiabene Pagrasp bargained with the noble Christians of Arbela to allow for the persecution only in the month of Ilul, around September, so that only very few were killed in Adiabene. Nevertheless, with the new mauhpata Piroz Tamshabor, the persecution was increased from the end of the year 340, and even more with his successor Ador-Parreh, chosen by Shapur in view of a new war against the Romans, which was desired "so that the Christians might be simultaneously deprived both of their priesthood and kingdom." From that point onward the king wanted to rescind the persecution, but the Manicheans and the Jews instigated the Zorostrians to convince Shapur II to persecute the Christians, claiming that "the Christians were all spies of the Romans and that nothing occurred in the kingdom of 'Persia' that they did not write to inform their brethren from there" (Kawerau, 53 = Mingana, 50). Christians were forced to worship fire and the sun; whoever refused to do so was sentenced to death: it seems that the slayings in Persia were very numerous, in the first place ecclesiastical officials and consecrated individuals, but also laypeople, from both high and low classes. At the end of Shapur II's kingdom, which frequently was at war with Rome, requiring the military efforts both of *Constantius II and the emperor *Julian (who in 363 died during one of his Persian campaigns; shortly after *Jovian made peace with the Persians), the persecution came to an end, which was narrated by *Daniel bar Maryam (John of Arbela) in his historical work: although the Christians of the Roman Empire from Constantine onward did not experience any more persecutions—with the exception of the "cultural" persecution introduced by the emperor Julian—and enjoyed the Roman-Christian pax, those in Persia underwent the first persecution officially instigated by the emperor, where before they occurred only as local events of intolerance and hostility, at times even incited by the Zoroastrians.

M. Sordi, Dionigi d'Alessandria, Commodiano e alcuni problemi della storia del III secolo: Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia (1962-63) 144; Id., Commodianus, Carmen apol. 892 ss.: rex ab oriente: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 203-210; A. Pagliaro, La Civiltà iranica prima dell'Islamismo, Rome 1935; E. Honigmann - A. Maricq, Recherches sur les Res gestae divi Saporis, Brussels 1953 (Académie Royale de Belgique. Classe des lettres et des sciences morales et politique. Mémoires 47, 4); R. Göbl, Der Triumph des Sāsāniden Šahpuhr über die Kaiser Gordianus, Philippus und Valerianus: die ikonographische Interpretation der Felsreliefs, Vienna 1974 (Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Geschichte Mittelasiens 3; Denkschriften / Österreichische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Klasse 116); Commodiano, Carme apologetico, intr., ed., comm. di A. Salvatore, Turin 1977; M. Back, Die sassanidischen Staatsinschriften . . . mit einem Textcorpus der behandelten Inschriften, Leiden-Téhéran-Liège 1978 (Acta Iranica 18. III Série. Textes et mémoires 8); E. Kettenhofen, Die Römisch-persischen Kriege des 3. Jahrhunderts n. Chr. nach der Inschrift Sahpuhrs 1. an der Ka beye Zartost (SKZ), Wiesbaden 1982 (Beihefte zum Tübinger Atlas des Vorderen Orients. Reihe B: Geisteswissenschafte 55); R.N. Frye, The History of Ancient Iran, Munich 1983 (Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft, III. Abt. 7); J. Wiesehöfer, Das antike Persien: von 550 v. Chr. bis 650 n. Chr., Munich-Zürich 1994, with extensive bibl.; E. Kettenhofen, Tirdad und die Inschrift von Paikuli: Kritik der Quellen zur Geschichte Armeniens im späten 3. und frühen 4. Jh. n. Chr., Wiesbaden 1995; I. Ramelli, Il Chronicon di Arbela, Madrid 2002, 21-22, 45-46, 55-56 and passim; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins: processus missionnaires chrétiens dans l'Empire Iranien, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002; I. Ramelli, Atti di Mari, Brescia 2007.

I. Ramelli

SHEEP. Already present in the OT and NT as a symbolic figure, the lost and found sheep of the parables in Lk 15:4-7 and Mt 18:12-14 were interpreted in various ways by the *gnostics: *Apelles believed it was the angel who regretted that he created the world, and thus acknowledged its evil (Tertull., De car. 8,3); the Simonians believed it was Ennoia, who, after leaving the Father's house, returned there as the redeemed church (Iren., Adv. haer. I,23,2; Tertull., De anim. 34,4; Hipp., Haer. VI, 19,2.3); the *Valentinians believed the 99 sheep were the incomplete *pleroma which needed to recover its unity (Iren., Adv. Haer. I,16,1-2).

Among orthodox Christians, the sheep of Lk 15:4-7 refers to all humankind created by God, lost, sought and found (Tertull., Adv. Marc. IV,32,1; Iren., Adv. haer. III,19,3; 23,1; Orig., Hom. IX, 3 in Gen.; Hilar., In Matth. 18,6; Cyr. Jer., Catech. XV,24; Jer., In Matth. III; Greg. Nyss., Hom. II in Cant.; Greg. the Great, Hom. in Evang. II,34,3); in other instances it refers to the sinner (Tertull., De paenit. VIII,3-5; Cypr., Ep. 55,15; Jer., In Matth. III), or the one who has not sinned grievously and can thus be forgiven (Tertull., De pudic. VII, 17-19), or the church set on top of a mountain, namely Christ (Aug., Serm. 37,2). The reciprocal awareness of the sheep and the Shepherd (Jn 10:14) signifies a union of family relation (Cyr. Alex., In Ioh. 6). Sheep is Christ's title proclaimed in Is 53:7 and Jer 11:19 (Cypr., Testim. II,15; Chrom., Serm. 23,3); it is the figure of the Jews or Gentiles on the basis of Mt 15:24 or Jn 10:16 (Aug., In evang. Ioh. 49,27). The sheep of Mt 18:12-14 are the poor and downtrodden (John Chrys., Hom. 59 in Mt.), while those of Ps 64:14 and 94:7 are the patriarchs and prophets, from whose flock *Mary came forth, the "immaculate and holy" sheep (Chrom., Serm. 23,3).

The meekness of the sheep accounts for their similarity to the disciple sent by Jesus (see Mt 10:16): only by being sheep can they overcome the wolves (John Chrys., Hom. 33 in Mt.). The sheep separated from the goats on the day of judgment (see Mt 25:31ff.) are indicative of the fruitfulness of the works performed by the righteous in contrast to the sterility of sinners (John Chrys., Hom. 79 in Mt.).

A. Orbe, Parábolas evangélicas en s. Ireneo, II, Madrid 1972.

F. Cocchini

SHENOUTE (Gk. Sinouthios) (ca. 350–466). *Abbot of the *monastery in the neighborhood of Atripe, near Achmim (Upper *Egypt), now called the "White Monastery" (Deir el Abiad) or the "Monastery of Shenoute" (Deir anba Shenudah). He lived from ca. 350 to 466. He was known primarily as the major original author of *Coptic literature, but his activity embraced numerous fields, spiritual and practical, and he left deep traces in the Egyptian church and monasticism. Unfortunately, the MS tradition of his works is in a deplorable state. The sources for his life are solely in Coptic because no *Greek source mentions them. Much can be deduced from his works. Study conducted in recent years by S. Emmel has permitted scholars to reconstruct in large measure the breadth and characteristics of his writings. Shenoute's works, in fact, had received, already during the life of the great archimandrite, an organization into a corpus divided into two parts: the so-called Canones, contained in nine books, and the Logoi, in seven books. Manuscripts exclusively preserved near the monastery of Shenoute were spread into groups of papers and a number of collections outside Egypt. Emmel was able to reconstruct them as much as possible. From Shenoute's works emerges a lively and intriguing figure.

Shenoute was first and foremost the head of his monastery, for which he created a broad series of rules of conduct, which were inspired by the *Pachomian rules but were adapted to the new times and demands created by the important role that monasticism had assumed in Egypt. He delivered frequent and long sermons to the monks, some of which have survived in part, which treat moral and spiritual topics. Outside the monastery, Shenoute acted in concert with the bishops of *Alexandria (he lived under *Athanasius, *Theophilus, *Cyril and *Dioscorus) to spread and consolidate Christianity in Egypt (his attitude toward a dying paganism was rather harsh) and to help the Alexandrian theses triumph in the entire catholic church (it seems that he accompanied Cyril to the Council of *Ephesus [431]). Moreover, he had numerous friendships with high-ranking civil officials, who called upon him during various difficulties, and he offered help and refuge to the nearby population during the barbarian invasions (i.e., the nomad tribes of the desert: the Blemmyes).

His literary work is a mirror of this activity. One must therefore mention the homilies and the catecheses concerning monastic topics and letters sent to various ecclesiastical and civil figures. Moreover, he also wrote theological treatises (esp. on *Nestorian ideas) and a work against *gnosticizing and *Origenist currents of thought.

J. Leipoldt, Sinuthii archimandritae vita et opera omnia, I.III. IV; CSCO 41, 42, 73; tr. H. Wiesmann: CSCO 129, 96, 108, Louvain 1906-1951; E.C. Amélineau, OEuvres de Schenoudi, I-II, Paris 1907-1914; K.H. Kuhn, Pseudo-Shenoute on Christian Behaviour: CSCO 206-207, Louvain 1960; numerous fragments have been published in various great places: see W. Kammerer, A Coptic Bibliography, Ann Arbor, MI 1950 (index); N. Bell, Besa, The Life of Shenute, Kalamazoo, MI (intro., tr. and notes). The only monograph was written before the edition: J. Leipoldt, Schenute von Atripe und die Entstehung des national-ägyptischen Christentums (TU 25,1), Leipzig 1903; S.L. Emmel, Shenoute's Literary Corpus Ann Arbor, UMI, 1993, 5 vols., PhD Diss. Yale University; T. Orlandi, Shenoute d'Atripé: DSp 14, 797-804; Coptic Encyclopedia 7, 2131-2133; Patrologia V, 544-551.

T. Orlandi

SHEPHERD, THE GOOD.
I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. Jesus referred to himself as the "Good Shepherd" in Jn 10:11, 14 and described the characteristics of such a figure: the Shepherd enters the sheepfold through the gate (10:1), he calls the sheep by their own name, leads them out from the enclosure (10:3) and walks before them (4); the sheep hear his voice (10:3, 27) and follow him (10:4, 27). The mutual awareness of the Shepherd and sheep (10:4, 14, 27) is established on the reciprocal knowledge of the Father and the Shepherd (10:15). The Good Shepherd offers his life for the sheep (10:11, 15) in comparison to the mercenary, who flees before the wolf (10:12-13); he grants them eternal life (10:28) and will also gather in the sheep that do not belong to the flock so that there may be "one flock and one shepherd" (10:16).

The use of the image of the Good Shepherd is very abundant in patristic literature from the very beginning (probably in *Abercius, Epitaph. 3-6). In addition to the occasional references to the Shepherd, this image was a specific object of attention in the Fathers' systematic commentaries on John (John Chrys., Hom. 59-60 in Jn.; Theodore of Mops., Jn.; Aug., In evang. Ioh. 45-48; Cyr. Alex., Jn.; Nonnus, Par. Jn.; Ammonius, Jn.; Bede, In evang. Joh.) and in several homilies (see Severian of Gabala, In mem. mart.; Aug., Serm. 137 and 138; Peter Chrysol., Serm. 40; Basil of Sel., Or. 26; Greg. the Great., In evang. 14). At times the title "Shepherd" was inserted into the list of christological titles (Orig., Comm. in Rom. VII, 19; Jn. 1,126.267; Hom. in Jer. I [III] 4: SC 238, 326; Basil of Caes., Eun. 1,7; De Spir. VIII,17; Greg. Naz., Or. 30,21; Euch., Formulae 6); this reveals Jesus' divinity (Orig., Jn. 1,22; Cyr. Jer., Cat. 10,3), bears witness to the necessity of an inner guide inasmuch as they are barely endowed with the Logos (Orig., Jn. 1,122,190.198; XIX, 39) and the care that Christ has for humankind (John Chrys., Hom. 59 in Jn. 2). They emphasized the adjective "Good" that qualifies the Shepherd (Jer., Tract. in psalm. 96,10; In Am. II on Amos 5:14-15; In Is. II on Is 5:20; XV on Is 55:3); this qualification often demonstrates in connection with Mt 19:17 and parallel passages the equality of the Father and the Son (Ephrem, Diat. XV, 9-12; Ambr., De fid. 11,2,25-26; In Luc. VIII, 67; Jer., Tract. in psalm. 142,10; In Matth. 19:17; Ces. Arles, Breviarium fidei adv. haeret.). Christ is the "shepherd of the Catholic Church throughout the world" (Mart. Poly. 19,2); being the Logos of the Father, he is the "watchful Shepherd of children," i.e., the *pedagogue "who leads us children to salvation" (Clem. Alex., Paed. 1,7,53,2-3; 9,83,3–84,2); he is not only the Shepherd of believers, in a general sense, but in the soul of every person, he is the Shepherd of movements devoid of reason (Orig., Hom. 5 in Jer. 6; see also Philo, De sacr. Ab. et Cain 45). Perhaps in polemics with the *Marcionites and the *gnostics, it was emphasized how only the Good Shepherd was also the lawgiver (Clem. Alex., Strom. 1,26,169,1-2). The Good Shepherd was compared to certain OT figures: Abel (Chromat., Serm. 23,2), Moses (Tertull., De fuga 11,1; see also Jer., Ep. 82,3), the shepherd spoken of by Ps 22 (see J. Daniélou, Bibbia e liturgia, Milan 1958, 235-253) and Ezek 34 (Clem. Alex., Paed. 1,9,2-3; Cypr., Ep. 8,1-2; Didym., In Zach. 11,39; Aug., Serm. 46 and 47; Jer., In Ezech. XI on Ezek 34:1-31; Basil of Sel., Or. 26,2), and the Paschal Lamb (Trad. Ap. 41; Apollinaris, Pasc. 2,2; Orig., Hom. 14 in Gen. 2).

The title and the characteristics of the Good Shepherd are also attributed to men: the apostles *Peter (Aug., Serm. 137,4,4; 138,4,4) and *Paul (Ambr., Spir. 11,10,108; Aug., Serm. 137,9,11; In evang. Joh. 47,3); the apostles, bishop martyrs and St. *Cyprian (Aug., Serm. 138,1,1); the person of the bishop (Ign., Philad. 2,1; Tertull., Pudic. 13; Const. App. 2,20,1; Leo the Great, Ep. 10,5); the leaders of the church who are pastors acc. to the image of the Good Shepherd (Clem. Alex., Paed. 1,6,37,3; Orig., Hom. 12 in Lc. 2; Cypr., Unit. eccl. 8; Ep. 69,5; Greg. Naz., Or. 33,15-16; Ambr., In Luc. VII, 50; John Chrys., Hom. 60 in Jn. 1); *Constantine inasmuch as he leads the flock to the knowledge and worship of God (Eus., Laud. Const. IV,65); and those who fight for the kingdom and sacrifice everything to the point of death for serving God (Ps. Mac. Eg., Hom. 17,1: TU 72,94). *Augustine clarifies the relationship between the sole Shepherd and the Good Shepherd, making the parallel between Jn 10 and Jn 21:15-17 (Serm. 46,23.30; 138,4,4) and declaring that the pastors are members of the Shepherd (Serm. 138,5,5; In evang. Jn. 46,7-8). From such an account one can conclude that the pastors must imitate the Good Shepherd (Basil of Caes., Moral. reg. 80,16; reg. 70,19; Aug., In evang. Joh. 47,2; 123,5), send forth his voice alone (Aug., Serm. 46,30), and that, esp. during the period of *persecution, the leaders of the church should not flee like mercenaries do in the face of danger (Tertull., De fug. 11,2; Cypr., Ep. 8,1-2); and when the wolf appears, one sees the difference between the mercenary and the true Shepherd (Greg. M., In evang. 14,2).

Other NT passages in which the image of the Shepherd is present occur in reference to God or Christ, even though lacking the designation of "Good Shepherd": Lk 15:4-7//Mt 18:12-14; Mt 15:24; Mk 14:27//Mt 26:31; Mt 25:32; Heb 13:20; 1 Pet 2:25; 5:4; Rev 7:17.

GLNT 10, 1193-1227; J. Knabenbauer, Commentarius in quatuor s. Evangelia. IV ev. secundum Joannem, Paris [2]1906, 335-349 (for patristic references); J. Quasten, Der gute Hirte in hellenist. und frühchristl. Theologie: Heilige Überlieferung, Festschrift für I. Herwegen, Münster 1938, 51-58; I. de la Potterie, Le Bon Pasteur: Populus Dei, in Mélanges A. Card. Ottaviani, Rome 1969, 927-968; P.R. Tragan, La parabole du "Pasteur" et ses explications: Jean 10, 1-18 (La genèse, les milieux littéraires), SA 67, Rome 1980 (bibl.).

A. Pollastri

II. Iconography. In the Asiatic tradition of the late imperial age, the pastoral theme was very widespread, responding to the need for representing the afterlife as a place of peace and serenity but at the same time an idealization of the rural leisure (otium). Among the various figures, a new characteristic was attributed to the one who carried the sheep or the ram on his shoulders, long considered to be the figure of Christ the Good Shepherd. The image originated from the idyllic-pastoral representations and was an abbreviated figure of a bucolic scene; it was an allegorical image before becoming the Good Shepherd in the Christian repertoire. Being a symbol of φιλανθρωπία ("philanthropy") or of humanity (humanitas), acc. to the iconographic tradition of the ram-bearing Hermes, in Christian art this image intends to emphasize salvific action and cannot be considered a depiction of Jesus Christ but is an ideogram, so that as a result it can be repeated more times in the same context or on the same handmade object (Wp 25; Ws 178,2; 269,1-4). The animal being carried on the shoulders is not a victim destined for sacrifice but a creature that has been rescued. Assimilating once again contemporary iconography, the salvific power of Christ was transformed into the image of the orans, and joining together the fundamental pair of the history of salvation: the Savior and the saved soul (Wp 117,1; Ws 1,2).

The *pagan repertoire therefore suggests an elaboration of Christian art scenes in response to the need for Christian craftsman and art patrons to introduce symbolic elements acceptable to the popular spirituality of the time and in harmony with the literary tradition of sacred texts. The theme of the Good Shepherd in fact originated from various passages in the gospels: in addition to the parable of the lost sheep (Lk 15:4-7), it recalls the words of Christ himself in the gospel of *John: "I am the Good Shepherd" (Jn 10:11), acc. to the tradition of the Shepherd affirmed several times in the OT as in the NT (Job 10:1-19; Ezek 24:11-12, 14-16, 23, 31; Is 44:28; Ps 22:1-5; 118:176, to cite only the most famous passages), who is described as the leader, guide and Logos for the Christian people, salvation for his flock of which he is the head. In this sense, *Abercius bishop of Hierapolis defines himself on his own epitaph as a "disciple of the godly Shepherd" (A Ferrua, Epitaffio di Abercio, 279ff.).

Particularly dear to Christians of the early church, the image of the Good Shepherd had a very wide diffusion in all the figurative genres. Some iconographic variations that bestowed a fixed narrative for a representation symbolic in itself were added to the common type of the ram-bearing Shepherd who at one moment was young and beardless, at another bearded, at another having a bald head: he is certainly displayed as his sheep drinks milk (Wp 117,1) or watches vigilantly over his flock with a shepherd's hook (pedum) in hand (Wp 117,2), while petting his dog and holding a pale of milk in his hand (Wp 66,2). The style of clothing is always the same with a few variants: it consists of a belt and a short tunic, exomis (Ws 1,2; Wp 66,1) or sleeved, at most with an alicula (Wp 116,2) and sandals.

One finds an exception to this rule in the so-called Good Shepherd who is in "singular dress" in a very rich Eastern style, depicted on the pavement of an oratory in *Aquileia, that has come down to us through restoration and adaptations ab antiquo (L. Bertacchi, Buon Pastore dall'abito singolare, 429ff.). On the basis of the literary evidence, this enigmatic figure is interpreted as a representation of Christ. But for this representation, as for the image of the shepherds, namely the one in the oratory of Cal estate at Aquileia (I. Bortolotto, Sacello paleocristiano, 26ff.), and the other on the Roman villa at Desenzano (M. Mirabella Roberti, Mosaico col B.P., 393ff.), the problem still remains whether it was a representation of the Good Shepherd or rather if they should be interpreted as an expression of a desire for peace, an idealization of the felicitas temporum that led people to choose bucolic themes for decorating the spaces reserved for private use.

The painting of an arcosolium in the cemetery of Balbina on the Via Ardeatina is unique and striking. The picture depicts a person with a halo wearing shepherds' clothes surrounded by twelve fish set in two lines, interpreted by the publisher according to a well-known passage of *Tertullian (sed nos pisciculi secundum ἰχθύν nostrum Christum aqua nascimur: Bapt. 1,3: CSEL 1,277) as an *allegorical image of Christ (A. Nestori, Pitture inedite, 156). The cubicle of Prestatus has a descriptive objective, but also at the same time a symbolic one (Wp 51), near the spelunca magna, where the Shepherd defends his flock on the right-hand side, using a virga* to ward off a wild donkey and a pig, two symbols of evil.

The certainty of the *resurrection and the Good Shepherd's reception of the flock after death are clearly expressed in the slab of Veratius Nicatora (Diehl 4463), where the Good Shepherd is depicted as standing between *Jonah, who was spewed forth by the sea monster, and a lion, a symbol of death. Besides funerary scenes, the image was esp. widespread in the decoration of the Christian baptisteries—e.g., Dura Europos, Naples (WMM 36-38) and the Lateran (WMM 256-256., fig. 73)—where the Good Shepherd appears alongside OT and NT biblical episodes, clearly alluding to the theme of salvation. Probably inspired by the parable in *Matthew's gospel on the sheep and the goats and the solemn judgment at the end of time (Mt 25:31-34) is the relief on the sarcophagus lid in the Metropolitan Museum of New York (Ws 83) with the shepherd in philosopher's clothing, who is patting his flock on the right-hand side and fighting off the goats on the left. But a complete assimilation of the pastoral allegory, in what is certainly christological iconography, appears in the mosaic of the Museum of Gall Placidia at *Ravenna, where Christ, adorned with a halo above his head and holding a processional cross, sits on a mountain surrounded by his flock. Frequently appearing on small objects and utensils (e.g., C.R. Morey, Gold Glass, pl. III,14; XX,18; var. aus., Age of Spirituality, 465), the ram-bearing figures are evident also on several statues in the round, interpreted through their chronology as a representation of the Good Shepherd (Ws 52,1; 52,5; 52,8), but because the provenance of these handmade objects is still unclear it is difficult to establish if they are generic pastoral representations or images of the Good Shepherd.

After an extraordinary flourishing of ancient Christian art esp. in the West, this type of iconography almost entirely disappeared during the Middle Ages, only to make its reappearance on some bas-reliefs or on the miniatures of a few codices.

DACL 13, 2272-2390; EC 9, 930-934; RAC 3, 11ff.; LCI 2, 289-299; EAA 2, 223-224; Wp I, 45ff.; Ws I, 63ff.; H.U. von Schönebeck, Die christlichen Paradeisos Sarkophage: RivAC 14 (1937) 289-343; J. Quasten, Der Guter Hirt in frühchristlicher Totenliturgie and Grabeskunst, in Misc. G. Mercati, ST 121, Vatican City 1946, 373-406; J. Fink, Mythologische und biblische Themen in den Sarkophagplastik des 3. Jahrhunderts: RivAC 27 (1951) 167-190; L. de Bruyne, La décoration des baptistères paléochrétiens, in Actes du V[e] Congrès Int. d'Archéologie Chrét., Vatican City 1967, 341-369; A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim. Die Vorstellungen vom Zwischenzustand and die frühchristliche Grabeskunst, Bonn 1957, 151ff.; Th. Klauser, Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der christlichen Kunst: JbAC I-X, 1958-1967 (see the note on p. 82 of vol. X, index); L. de Bruyne, Les lois de l'art paléochrétien comme instrument herméneutique: RivAC 39 (1963) 7-92; A. Grabar, Christian Iconography: A Study of Its Origins, Princeton, NJ 1968, 10-11; Id., L'art de la fin de l'antiquité et du moyen âge, III, Paris 1968; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse and Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster/W. 1973, 322ff.; N. Himmelmann, Sarcofagi romani a rilievo. Problemi di cronologia e di iconografia: ASNP 4 (1974) 139-177 (see 156ff.); P-A. Février, Naissance d'un art chrétien: Les Dossiers de l'archéologie 18 (1976) 18ff.; R. Giordani, Frammento di rilievo inedito con rappresentazione di Buon Pastore nella basilica di S. Marco a Roma: RAL 30 (1976) 342-360; W.N. Schumacher, Hirt und "Guter Hirt," Rom-Freiburg-Vienna 1977; N. Himmelmann, Ueber Hirten Genre in der antiken Kunst, Opladen 1980. The examples cited in the text: A. Ferrua, Nuove osservazioni sull'epitaffio di Abercio: RivAC 20 (1943) 279-305; C.R. Morey, The Gold Glass Collection of the Vatican Library, Vatican City 1959; A. Nestori, Pitture inedite del cimitero della via Ardeatina: Rend. PARA 45 (1972/1973) 151-163; M. Guarducci, Il Buon Pastore tra i pesci: ibid., 165-170; I. Bortolotto, Il sacello paleocristiano della CaL ad Aquileia, Udine 1973; L. Bertacchi, Il mosaico aquileiese del Buon Pastore dall'abito singolare: AAAd 12 (1977) 429-444; var. aus., Age of Spirituality, New York 1978; M. Mirabella Roberti, Un mosaico con Buon Pastore a Desenzano, in Atti del V Congr. Naz. Arch. Crist., Rome 1982, 393-405; TIP 138-139; M. Dulaey, Le berger divin, in "Des forêts de symboles." L'initiation chrétienne et la Bible (I[er]-VI[e] siècle), Paris 2001, 191-212.

A.M. Giuntella

SHIP. Navigation in the Mediterranean has a very ancient history, its prehistoric origins reflected in myths, such as that of the Argonauts in the Greek world and of the mystery of Isis in Egypt. The relationship of the ancients with seafaring, as in later times, is marked by contrasting sentiments of fear and daring, reflected in the variety of nautical symbolism. To navigate, in fact, means to brave a sea brimming with dangers, for which one needs a good ship, a courageous and able pilot, and also divine assistance: these elements are usually all incorporated by authors who use nautical symbolism. The idea of daring on the part of the pilot and at the same time the necessity of divine help are clearly expressed by the names given to boats in the ancient world: Hope, Joy, Daring, Providence. Another aspect emphasized in nautical symbolism is that of the common destiny of those aboard a ship: the expression "to be in the same boat" is found already in Livy (26,22,13) and Cicero (Ad fam. 2,5,1). The ship in which we are all traveling is, however, variously identified by the ancient authors: the ship of the state, the soul or the world or, finally, the ship of the church. The image of the state as a well-navigated ship we find across the classical world, esp. from *Plato onward, who compares the philosopher engaged in governing the polis with the pilot of a boat (Gorg. 511d; Polit. 296d and Resp. 488d-489d, Leg. 902d). A Christian author like *Eusebius uses the image to describe the Christian emperor, called to be a steersman in governing the world (Laus Const. 10 = GCS Eusebius I, 223,12-22). In the coinage of *Constantine we find depictions of the victorious emperor at the center of the boat of the state, with the labarum planted as if it were a tree, and sails bearing the signs of Christ on the lateen yard, while at the stern we see a winged spirit or guardian angel who holds the tiller (see J. Maurice, Numismatique constantinienne, Paris 1911, vol. 2).

At the anthropological level, the pair navigator-ship is used to express the relationship between the *soul and the *body (e.g., in Plato, Tim. 73d and 85e), but also the relationship of the soul of the *world with the individuals souls which have fallen into bodies (Plato, Phileb. 28d). *Ambrose too, e.g., speaks of the necessity of the flesh having the soul as a pilot (Hexam. 6,6,39 = CSEL 32, I, 230,24), but then in Christian *symbolism the pilot becomes more commonly identified with the Logos. *Clement of Alexandria, citing Pr 11:4 with reference to Philo, points to the nous and the logismos as the steersmen of the soul (Strom. 2,11,51,6 = GCS Clement 2,141,4-6), while ps.-*Macarius affirms that the soul, if it is left to itself without Christ as pilot, sinks in the tempest of the passions (Hom. Pneum. 28,2 = PTS 4, 231,19-232,24). *Augustine, later, describes the inhabitation of the Christ in human hearts as that of a sailor in a small boat (Enarrat. In Ps. 34,3 and 45,5: CCL 38, 520,6-521,5). Consequently, death can be described even by a Christian author such as *Gregory of Nyssa as a shipwreck in which the corporeal elements disintegrate (De anima et resurrect. 7,3), an image which echoes Plato and is found also in the Oration to the Assembly of the Saints of Constantine (Eusebius, Const. Orat. Ad sanct. Coet., 9 = GCS Eusebius I, 164,20-22). The ship therefore serves to express the Platonic doctrine of the anima mundi, identified by Christian authors with the Logos which vivifies the universe: as the soul guides the ship of the body, so the Logos guides the ship of the universe. Eusebius, e.g., comparing the Logos with the pilot of the universe, affirms that what occurs in the ship of the world in figure is accomplished by the *providence of the Father and the navigational art of the Logos in the ship of the church (Syriac Theophany I, 30,31 = GCS Eusebius III, 2,51,24-31). From the image of the ship of the world governed by the Father and the Son, there emerged that of the ship of the church governed by the same: the underlying theological vision saw the church as a ship guided expertly by the Logos, and in which individual souls, the state and the world reach their final destiny.

Christian authors, moreover, emphasize the fragility of this ship, destined to lead humanity to salvation, dwelling on the material of which it is made, wood. Wisd 14:2,5,7 (LXX), the first allegorical interpretation of the ark of Noah, underlines the value of that very small quantity of wood through which we attain salvation. The Fathers renew this repertory of images introducing the theme of the wood of the *cross: if in the first shipwreck of nature salvation came through the wood of the ark, so in the second it comes through the wood of the cross (Greg. Naz., Or. 4,18 = SC 309,110,2-4; Aug., Civ. Dei 15,26 = CSEL 40,2,116,23-26). The ark, in fact, had already been identified by *Tertullian (Bapt. 8,4 = CCL 1,283,17-27) as a symbol and prefiguration of the new ark of salvation, that is the church. *Hippolytus is more specific in his symbolic account of the ship, finding an equivalent for every component: if the ship is the church which braves the sea of the world, her pilot is Christ, her mast the trophy of the cross, her rudders the two testaments and her white sail is the *Holy Spirit, to limit ourselves to the essential elements (De Antichristo 59 = GCS Hippolytus I, 39,12-40,9). Among the biblical images which have had most influence on the image of the ship of the church, one which must be mentioned is that of Peter's boat, found in Lk 5:3, often identified with the ship in the storm guided by the same apostle in Mk 4:35-41 and parallel passages. Tertullian (Bapt. 12,6-7: CCL I, 288,34-43) compares the boat of the *apostles to the church tossed about by the tempestuous waves of the age, in which Christ sleeps (Mk 4:38), symbolizing Christ on the cross. The theme became traditional in subsequent authors: *Origen (HomCt 2,12 = GCS VIII, 58,17-26) says that Jesus, through the typology of the apostles and the boat, frees the church from the shipwreck of persecution, guides it to the coast, and leads it into the calm of the port.

Other authors insist more on the idea that the boat of the church is the boat of Peter. In the letter of ps.-Clement to James 3,5 (GCS Ps. Clementine I, 8) the apostle Peter, in the act of consecrating Clement bishop, speaks of the believers as under the guide of Clement as people who are on a sea journey, and therefore likens the entire church to a great ship, which gathers individuals in search of the *kingdom of God. God is the owner of this ship, while the pilot, the image of Christ, is the bishop, and the hierarchy of the crew reflects the hierarchy of the church. The image is subsequently used in the Roman tradition to ground the theology of the primacy of Peter (see Rahner, 822-824), even if it is rather the image of the miraculous catch of fish of Peter and the apostles which most richly expresses the theme. In full consonance with the letter of ps.-Clement to James are the Apostolic Constitutions* (2,57,2-4; 9-11 = SC 320, 310,4-312,16; 314,36-46), which however propose a correspondence not only between the ship and the church in the sense of a spiritual reality, but also between the ship and the church building, a vessel that, as it were, journeys toward the East. Naval catalogs are frequent across the whole body of patristic literature of both East and West, becoming a common motif right up to medieval theology (see Rahner, L'ecclesiologia, 522-527).

Tertullian sees the ship in the storm of Mk 4:35-41 as a figure of the persecuted church (Bapt. 12,7 = CCL I, 288,38-43), while others insist on the fact that this vessel cannot sink because its salvation comes from the "mast" of Christ's cross (Justin Mart., 1 Apol. 55,3 = PTS 38,110,8-9; Ambrose, De sp. Sanct. 1,9,110 = CSEL 79, 62,82-63,86). If the ship headed for the port of salvation is the church, which makes progress amid the waves of the sea of this world (Orig., Jos. Hom. 19,4 = GCS Origen VII, 413,6-10), shipwrecks should be identified with sinners, those who do not believe and *heretics (Orig., Ct. Com III = GCS 8,226,3-10). *Jerome (Alt. Lucif. 19 = SC 473,16-22) compares the furious tempest of the *Arians, calmed by the unexpected death of *Constantius, to the end of the storm at the sea of Galilee (Mt 8:23-24), and the steersman who carries the ship to safety to the bishop, image of the true steersman, Christ. The image of the church as a ship and of the bishop as its pilot lasted right up to the medieval epoch, even in the figurative arts.

Next to the image of the church as a ship built with the wood of the cross, the idea developed early of the crucified Christ as a ship, inspired by the use of the synecdoche "wood/tree" to indicate either the cross (Acts 5:30; 10:39; 13:29) or a ship. This equivalence is clearer when specific parallels are made between a ship and the cross: one of the motifs used is that of the ship made with the same wood as the cross of Christ; in a ps.-Chrysostomic text (Or. De Adoratione Crucis 3 = PG 529, 839) we read that the cross was constructed from cypress, pine and cedar wood, alluding to Is 60:13 (LXX). The triple wood of the cross became a common patristic theme. Also emphasized was the idea that the ship of the church is held together by the nails of the cross: *Venantius Fortunatus (Miscell. 2,4 = PL 88, 93A) in fact speaks of the "sweet crosses" and the "sweet nails." The act of embarkation is understood as a metaphor for mounting the cross, as for instance in Ambrose (Exp. Ev. sec. Luc. 6,39 = CSEL 32, 4,248,5-8).

The particular feature of the ship, however, that presents a more obvious symbol of the cross is that of the lateen yard, or more precisely the cross formed by the mast and the beam or spar of the sail: *Clement of Alexandria (Protr. XII, 118,4 = GCS Clemente I, 83,24-30) sees in Ulysses, bound to the mast so as to resist the song of the Sirens, a prefiguration of Christ on the cross. *Minucius Felix affirms that, when a ship advances in full sail, almost spontaneously one recognizes the sign of the cross (Oct. 29,8 = CSEL 2,43,10-15). The yard, symbol of the cross, is therefore called by *Justin Martyr the sign of victory (tropaion), without which it is impossible to sail the sea of the world (1 Apol. 55,3 = PTS 38, 110,8-9). Tertullian makes more explicit the connection between the tropaion, the stake on which the victors hang the weapons of their enemies, and the yard (in Apol. 16,7 = CCL I, 116,30-34 and in the parallel passages of Ad nat. 1,12 = CCL I, 30,24-32,12), saying that the pagans unconsciously pray to crosses when they plant stakes in the ground: in this way they pray to a god by halves, not fully, as Christians do when they pray to the integral cross. In Ad nat. 1,12 he finds the cross symbolized in many different places, among which are the human body and the mast with the intersecting yard.

H. Rahner, L'ecclesiologia dei Padri, Rome1971, 397-969; U. Weber, s.v. "Schiff": LCI 4, 61-67; L. Gambassi, s.v. "Nave," in F. Bisconti (ed.), Dizionario, Vatican City 2000, 228-230.

C. Noce

SICCA VENERIA. The city had various names in antiquity; it was primarily given the name of Sicca or Veneria or Sicca Veneria. Today it is called "El Kef" (Tunisia). It was part of Proconsular *Africa. Rooted on Mt. Erice, where a temple to Venus stood high, which was well-known for the voluntary prostitution of the matrons (Valerius Maximus, Fastorum II,6,15), and situated as well along the street which led from *Carthage to Constantine, the city soon aligned itself with the Romans; it became a Roman colony through the work of Octavian. In the 3rd c. the curator civitatis and the temple of Venus were the same person (CIL 8, 15881); in the 6th c. the emperor *Justinian supplied the city a new belt of fortifications (Procopius, Aedif. 6,7,10).

The presence of Christianity in Sicca Veneria is attested from the 3rd c. Among the bishops of Sicca Veneria we know of Castus in 256 (Sent. Ep. 28), Eparchius in 345–348 (Conc. Carth. sub Grato Ep.), Paul the Donatist and *Fortunatian the Catholic in 411 (Conference of Carthage). The latter was in contact with *Augustine, as was the case with Augustine's successor *Urbanus (Augustine, Ep. 148, 229). Augustine stayed at Sicca Veneria in 410 (Ep. 148,1). *Victor of Vita mentioned another Paul (Hist. pers. Afr. prov 2,6); Candidus was bishop in 646. Sicca Veneria was famous for *Arnobius the Elder, who was a professor of rhetoric in the city; when he converted in 295–296, his conversion so puzzled the bishop's entourage that he was asked for tangible proof of his sincerity. Arnobius fulfilled this request by writing the first two books of his Adversus Nationes. At the time of Augustine, the priest Apiarius of Sicca Veneria became famous by appealing to the see of Rome against the normal African customs.

The city also preserves the remains of early Christian buildings: (1) Dar-el-Kuss, a basilica dedicated to St. *Peter, as numerous keys on the façade indicate, which are still preserved; (2) the episcopal structure with a baptistery; (3) the building à auges adjoining to the great mosque.

DACL 8, 689-701; PWK 21/2, 2187-2188; LTK 9, 730; T. Ghalia, Hergla et les mosaïques de pavement des basiliques chrétiennes de Tunisie: plan, décor et liturgie, Tunis 1998.

V. Saxer

SICILY, Council of. The *homoiousian delegation that went to Rome in 365–366 and was convinced by Pope Liberius to sign Nicene homoousios, during its return home made a stop in Sicily. On this occasion a council of local bishops gathered, which confirmed Liberius's stance and the validity of the Nicene Creed of 325 as a criterion of orthodoxy. A letter of the Sicilian bishops was given to the delegates, which was read at the homoiousian Council of *Tyana (*Cappadocia), held in 366. (For the *archaeology of Sicily, see *Italy).

Hfl-Lecl 1, 976-979; Simonetti 397; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 764; EPapi 1, 345; A. Pinzone, Provincia Sicilia: ricerche di storia della Sicilia romana da Gaio Flaminio a Gregorio Magno, Catania 1999.

M. Simonetti

SIDE, Council of. In this city of Pamphylia between 383 and 394 a *council of 25 bishops gathered, which was presided over by *Amphilochius of Iconium. The acts of this council have been lost, but *Photius says that he had read them along with documentation coming from various bishops pertaining to the *Messalians. The question of the Messalians was discussed at this council. Some of their leaders were present, including their head Adelphius. Because they did not provide sufficient guarantees of their change of heart, they were condemned. The council sent a letter to *Flavian of Antioch informing him of what had happened.

Photius, Bibl., cod. 52; Mansi 3, 651; Palazzini 4, 184; DIP 5, 1262-1263. C. Stewart, "Working the Earth of the Heart": The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431, Oxford 1992.

A. Di Berardino

SIDI JDIDI. This local town from the Roman province of Byzacena (Tunisia, 10 km [6.2 mi] from Hammamet) corresponds to Aradi, the ancient little town of Punic origin, identified with an epigraph, concerning which only two of its bishops are known: *Fortunatian, who was exiled to the island of Corsica by the *Vandal king *Huneric in 484, at the time of the persecution of Catholics by the *Arians, and Emilianus, who took part at the Council of *Carthage of 525. No bishop, however, was present at the Conference of Carthage of 411, but a Christian community must have already been present in the 4th c., as one can gather from the excavations. The small town contained numerous Christian artifacts, among which three churches with connected buildings that have been recently excavated, turned with the façade toward the SW and the apses toward the NE. The Christianization of the space must have kept in mind the preexistent urban structure. The S church, with mosaics, dates to the 5th c. and, acc. to the excavators' opinion, was intended for worship services or the cult of the relics; it was completely reconstructed at the time of the *Byzantine domination and again with a mosaic floor. Its funerary use was very limited: two presbyters were buried there. The episcopal complex to the N, on the periphery of the town, from the 5th c., was composed of two parallel churches ("double basilicas") joined by an in- sula which were parts of the "episcopal group"; each one possessed its baptistery. The insula, suited for services for charitable activities, mill and olive press, was destroyed in the 2nd half of the 5th c., when the E church was no longer used. The two churches became the place for privileged burial; in the W church there was also a sarcophagus placed against the S wall, which marked the presence of the veneration of a martyr or a memorial for the bishop. This church was totally reconstructed at the moment of the Byzantine reconquest with the raising of the floor and the reorganization of the manner of operation. The baptistery was also reconstructed acc. to a cross-form layout in the most luxurious manner.

A. Ben Abed - M. Bonifay - M. Fixot - S. Roucole, La basilique méridionale de Sidi Jdidi (Tunisie), in Le mosaïque gréco-romaine, Tunis 1999, 1, 267-284; Id., Les basiliques chrétiennes de Sidi Jdidi: RivAC 76 (2000) 555-587; Id., Sidi Jdidi, Tunisie: MEFRA 111 (2000) 472-487; M. Fixot, Sidi Jdidi, la troisième basilique: MEFRA 112 (2001) 539-564; A. Ben Abed - M. Bonifay - M. Fixot - S. Roucole, Sidi Jdidi (Tunisie), l'îlot intermédiaire entre les basiliques: MEFRA: 114 (2002) 566-579; Id., Les deux baptistères de Sidi Jdidi (Tunisie): Antiquité Tardive 11 (2003) 129-150; Id., Sidi Jdidi (Tunisie), l'îlot intermédiaire entre les deux basiliques du groupe épiscopal: MEFRA 115 (2003) 511-520; Iid, Sidi Jdidi (Tunisie), les bâtiments annexes de la basilique III: MEFRA 116 (2004) 713-725; Sidi Jdidi, 1, La Basilique sud, ed. A. Ben Abded - Ben Khader et al., Rome 2004.

A. Di Berardino

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS (ca. 431–ca. 486). Sidonius (G. Sollius Apollinaris Sidonius: all these names are placed at the beginning of poem 9) was born at *Lyons on 5 November (Carm. 20,1) around 431 (as one can deduce from Ep. VIII,6,5) to a rich family of the Gallic-Roman aristocracy. His grandfather and father were prefects of *Gaul; the first served under the usurper *Constantine III, the second under *Valentinian III. He had an excellent preparation, even in Greek, first in his city of birth, then at *Arles. At around 20 years old he married Papianilla, daughter of Avitus, who shortly thereafter, in 455, would be elected emperor. In January of 456 he accompanied his father-in-law to *Rome and celebrated the taking of the fasces with a *panegyric. Once Avitus had been deposed by the coalition of Maiorianus and Ricimer and defrocked and divested of the imperial prerogatives, Sidonius was unable to overcome the ruin of his father-in-law, and in 458 he received the emperor Maiorianus at Lyons with a new panegyric. Once Maiorianus had been assassinated by Ricimer, Sidonius distanced himself from public life for several years and went—to read, write and strengthen his friendships—in the landholdings of Avitacum in Alvernia. The majority of his poems collected between the Nugae (Carm. 9-24) and the first books of letters are from the years 461 to 467.

His retirement came to an end in the autumn of 467, because, called on by an official letter, Sidonius went to Rome; here, a few months later (10 January 468), he delivered a panegyric for the emperor Anthemius. In compensation he was nominated prefect of the city of Rome for the year 468. After he had completed this duty—though not without several difficulties (see Ep. I,10)—he returned to Gaul. Here, although the *Visigoths were advancing, Sidonius, after having passed again a period of solitude in his landholdings, changed his course of life: after having been ordained—probably—a priest, in 471 he was elected bishop of Avernum (Clermont-Ferrand). It was not an interior crisis, but a regular choice among the aristocracy of that time, to which, in face of the barbarians, he did not resist "renouncing either homeland or crown" (Ep. II,1,4). But Sidonius led the life of the church with great seriousness, renouncing his previous life, family and letting go of his commitment to his lofty post. He committed himself to the needs of the city when it was being taken over by the advance of the Visigoths and became the protagonist of the resistance against the barbarians. When Alvernia was in the hands of *Euric, Sidonius was forced to go into exile at Livia, near Carcassonne. At the end of 477 he was authorized to reenter Claremont, but not before having made an act of homage, even with a poem in verses, to the Visigoth king. He lived his remaining years at work in his episcopal office, composing other letters and a few poems here and there. The last of these letters is datable to 481, but in virtue of references (not entirely certain) in other letters to subsequent events, the date of Sidonius's death should be placed after 486–487. After his death he was honored as a saint; his feast day is still celebrated on 23 August at Claremont.

Sidonius's verse compositions have come down to us in a collection of 24 poems, which were compiled by the author himself, almost certainly in 469. It seems to be the result of the merging of two independent collections, those of the three panegyrics and hexameters, for Anthemius (548 verses), for Maiorianus (603 versus) and for Evitus (602 verses), each one preceded by a brief preface likewise in verses, and that of the epigrammata or the nugae, in various meters. At a later time the following additions were inserted: ch. 9 (Ad Felicem), which seems to constitute its dedication, ch. 22 (a description of Burgus), ch. 23 (eulogy of *Consentius) and ch. 16 (eulogy of *Faustus bishop of Riez), longer and better written with respect to the other compositions, which are, apart from the two epithalamia (Carm. 11 and 15), two brief short works written for the occasion. Thirteen other compositions, in various meters, are inserted into the letters: they are epitaphs, inscriptions for churches and eulogies of friends and their writings. Sidonius's poems lack originality but are constructed acc. to good technique and are generally correct acc. to the meter; they are characterized by a continual imitation of Virgil, Ovid, Caecilius Statius, and *Claudian, and the mythological references are dense.

There are 147 letters, divided—acc. to the model of Pliny the Younger and *Symmachus—in nine books. Their layout is not chronological, but they obey literary and artistic preoccupations and, esp., for the objective of varying the succession of themes. Most likely the author initially published one sole book; an edition of the first seven books followed around 477, to which subsequently an eighth and ninth book were added. It is not always possible to determine the date of the letters. The most reliable dating for the majority of these letters is owed primarily to Loyen. Composed in an ornate and fairly painstakingly well-thought-out prose, supported by the constant (sometimes cloying) use of rhetorical devices, Sidonius's letters are "letters of art," edited for being published and destined for posterity. For the ideals of style to which it aimed, for the insistent professions of modesty with which the author so diminished (to the point of self-effacement) his own skills as much as he desired the applause of his friends and the recognition of his readers, for his insistence on formulas of courtesy, compliments, eulogies, for his vivid sense of patriotism, these letters are an expression of the "precious" custom of a learned and refined aristocracy, a lover of hyperbole to the point of extravagance and the more proud of his own Roman culture, the more it appeared to be beset by the presence of the barbarians. They have an exceptional historical interest because they offer us an enormous storehouse of comparisons, which are at times unique, on Gallic society of the 5th c., the situation of the empire, the aristocratic classes, the church and the barbarians.

Lost are Sidonius's translation of Philostratus's Life of the Appollonius of Tyana which Sidonius made during his exile at Livia (Ep. VIII,3,1), the contestatiunculae sent to bishop Megetius (Ep. VII,3,1) and the Rogationes introduced at Clermont in the winter of 472-473 (Ep. V, 14,1 and VII, 1,2).

Editions: CPL 986-987a; PL 58 (reproduces the ed. with Sirmond's comm., 1652); Ch. Luetjohann, MGH, Auct. ant. 8 (1887); P. Mohr, Teubner (1895); W.B. Anderson, Loeb (vol. 1, 1963; vol. 2, 1965); A. Loyen, Les Belles Lettres (vol. 1, 1960; vols. 2 and 3, 1970).

Studies: L.A. Chaix, St. Sidoine Apollinaire, 2 vols., Clermont-Ferrand 1867-68; P. Allard, St. Sidoine Apollinaire, Paris 1910; C.E. Stevens, Sidonius Apollinaris and His Age, Oxford 1933; A. Loyen, Recherches historiques sur les panégyriques de Sidoine Apollinaire, Paris 1942; Id., Sidoine Apollinaire et l'esprit précieux en Gaule aux derniers jours de l'empire, Paris 1943; K.F. Stroheker, Der senatorische Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948, 217-219, #358; S. Dill, Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire, New York ²1958, 187-223; S. Pricoco, Studi su Sidonio Apollinare: NDid 15 (1965) 71-150; W.H. Semple, Apollinaris Sidonius: A Gallo-Roman Seigneur: BRL (1967) 136-158; F.E. Consolino, Codice retorico e manierismo stilistico nella poesia di Sidonio Apollinare: ASNP 4 (1974) 423-460; I. Gualandri, Furtiva lectio. Studi su Sidonio Apollinare, Milan 1979; F.E. Consolino, Ascesi e mondanità nella Gallia tardoantica, Naples 1979, 89-116; M. Simonetti, La produzione letteraria latina fra romani e barbari, Rome 1986, 123-127; M. Zelzer, Der Brief in der Spätantike. Überlegungen zu einem literarischen Genos am Beispiel der Briefsammlung des Sidonius Apollinaris: WS 107-108 (1994-95) 541-551; J. Harries, Sidonius Apollinaris and the Fall of Rome, Oxford 1994; A. La Penna, Gli svaghi letterari della nobiltà gallica nella tarda antichità. Il caso di Sidonio Apollinare: Maia 47 (1995) 3-34; F.-M. Kaufmann, Studien zu Sidonius Apollinaris, Frankfurt a.M. 1995; S. Tamburri, Sidonio Apollinare: l'uomo e il letterato, Naples 1996; D. Pérez Sánchez, Realidad social, asentamiento bárbaro y prejuicios ideológicos en la Galia del s. V a través de la obra de Sidonio Apolinar: Gerión 15 (1997) 223-241; S. Santelia, Le dichiarazioni del poeta: il carme IX di Sidonio Apollinare: Invigilata Lucernis 20 (1998) 229-254; I. Gualandri, Figure di barbari in Sidonio Apollinare, in Il Tardoantico alle soglie del Duemila, Diritto religione società, ed. G. Lanata, Pisa 2000, 105-129; P. Mascoli, Gli Apollinari e l'eredità di una cultura: Invigilata Lucernis 23 (2001) 131-145; Sidonio Apollinare, Carme 24. Propempticon ad libellum. Intr., tr. and comm. by S. Santelia, Bari 2002; D. Amherdt, Sidoine Apollinaire: le quatrième livre de la correspondance: introduction et commentaire, Bern 2001.

S. Pricoco

SIGISMUND. Saint; king of the Burgundians. After having converted from *Arianism to *Catholicism through the work of *Avitus of Vienne, around 496–499, Sigismund succeeded his father, Gundabald, in 516. He made expiation for the sin of having his son Sigeric murdered (522) by doing penance in the monastery of St. Maurice at Agaunum (Vallese), which he enlarged and enriched in 515, and in which he instituted the continual worship laus perennis (Mansi 8, 533; officium psallendi die noctuque indesinenter). Conquered in 523 by the king of the *Franks, he was led to Orléans and drowned with his second wife, Constanza, and his children, Gundobald and Giscald, in a well at S.-Péravy-la-Colombe (Loiret). Around 535 the monks buried the bodies of the "martyrs" in the chapel of St. John of Saint-Maurice. Later the relics of St. Sigismund were spread around the following locations: Matzenheim (Alsace), Prague, Himmerod, Freising and Płock. In the *sacramentaries from that ancient era there frequently appears a *Mass in his honor to guard one from fever. His name appears in the Mart. hier. (1 May).

BHL 7717-7720; BS 11, 1043-1047; BBKL 10, 274-277; LMA 7, 1885; LCI 8, 349-352.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

SIGISTHEUS. *Vandal count who lived in *Africa presumably in the 5th or 6th c., the author of a brief letter of greetings addressed to a presbyter by the name of *Parthemius, which is full of deference and praise for the literary qualities of the correspondent; the response has survived.

CPL 803; PLS 3, 447-448; PCBE 1, 1077.

F. Scorza Barcellona

SILVANUS of Cirta (4th c.). The subdeacon of Bishop Paul at *Cirta (then, in the 4th c., Constantina; today Constantine, Algeria). When the Roman official, following the orders of the emperor *Diocletian, made an inventory of goods of the community of Cirta, Silvanus offered him his full collaboration. Sometime after, at the end of 304 or the beginning of 305—Lancel thinks it was the spring of 307—he was called on to succeed Paul in a very disputed and tumultuous election (see Gesta apud Zenoph.: CSEL 26, 192-196): because he was regarded by his adversaries to be a traditor* and was supported by the common people, although the seniores* offered the name of another individual from the same city whom they regarded as worthy of the office. The assembly of Cirta is well documented by the sources (Gesta apud Zenophilum: CSEL 26,186-197; *Optatus of Milevis, De schism. 1,14; Augustine, Ep. 43,2,3; Contra Cresc. 3,27,30-32). In fact, Silvanus openly handed over the sacred objects and accompanied the inquisitors into the homes of the electors to seize the sacred books. Despite the dispute among the bishops present, Silvanus was consecrated by *Secundus of Tigisis, the primate of *Numidia, who was also charged with the same crime (others were also guilty): these two individuals also contested the election of *Caecilian to the episcopal see of *Carthage (see Augustine, Contra Cresc. III,27,31: CSEL 52,437) and elected in his place *Maiorinus, who was supported by *Lucilla, giving rise thereby to the formal establishment of the *schism, for which they became important defenders in Numidia. Having excluded from his *communion the deacon Nundinarius, Silvanus was accused by this individual before the consularis Zenophilus as a traditor. The trial which was held at Cirta (and not at *Timgad), which at that time was the capital of the reunified province, on 8 December 320, is known to us through the Gesta apud Zenophilum (CSEL 26,185-197). During this trial extensive proof was given showing that Silvanus had been a traditor, a thief and a mercenary with regard to ordinations (see *simony) and as a result was condemned to exile.

Monceaux IV, 4-13, 24-32; PCBE 1, 788-789; 1, 1078-1080; S. Lancel, Les débuts du Donatisme: la date du "Protocole de Cirta" et de l'élection de Silvanus: REAug 25 (1979) 217-229; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne. Les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000.

A. Di Berardino

SILVANUS of Tarsus (4th c.). He was among the chief proponents of the *homoiousians at the Council of *Seleucia (359) and also participated in the subsequent discussions at *Constantinople before the emperor *Constantius. He was deposed by the Council of Constantinople (360) along with many other homoiousians; but after Constantius's death (362), he again undertook action against the *Arians, and in 365–366 he took part in the homoiousian delegation which went to *Rome, to Pope *Liberius, for help and solidarity: during this occasion he willingly signed the Nicene Creed, which affirmed the homoousios. He participated at the subsequent Council of *Tyana, in which the delegation reported its results from its mission to the West.

DCB 4, 669; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 763-764; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, see the index.

M. Simonetti

SILVERIUS, pope (536–537). The ancient sources on this pope are not in agreement and are actually at times contradictory. After the death of Pope *Agapitus at *Constantinople (22 April 536), it seems that the *Ostrogoth king Theodahad imposed the election of the subdeacon Silverius (8 June 536), the son of Pope *Hormisdas (d. 523). In the war between the Ostrogoths and the *Byzantines, he aligned himself with General *Belisarius, who, at the instigation of *Theodora, deported him to *Lycia (Liberatus Breviar. 22: PL 68,1040) on the accusation of being a friend of the Ostrogoths. The emperor *Justinian sent *Virgilius to *Rome in order to make a more serious investigation of the case against Silverius, but as soon as he had arrived, because of his machinations, Silverius was exiled to Ponza (21 March 537), where he died shortly thereafter (2 December 357). Virgilius was elected in his place on 29 March 537. Silverius is venerated as a *martyr for his defense of the faith of *Chalcedon.

LP 1, 290-295; AASS Iun. IV, 13-18; BS 11, 1069-1071; P. Hildebrandt, Die Absetzung des Papstes Silverius (537): Historisches Jahrbuch 42 (1922) 213-249; L. Duchesne, L'Église au VI^e siècle, Paris 1925, 151-154; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 129-130, 145-176; L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza dei patriarchi e imperatori bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 133; EPapi 1, 508-512; G. Pilara, La città di Roma fra Chiesa e Impero durante il conflitto gotico-bizantino, Rome 2006.

A. Di Berardino

SIMEON BAR SABBA (d. 344). Called "bar Sabba," i.e., "son of the fuller." The first testimony of his cult is found in a *Syriac martyrology from the end of the 4th c., which referred to him as a martyr "in the East" (*Sassanid Empire). His Passion, in the brief redaction, is very ancient, inasmuch as it was known by the church historian *Sozomen (HE 2,9-11) and *Cassiodorus (Hist. Trip. 3,2). Simeon was archdeacon of the *metropolitan (*catholicos) *Papa bar Aggai of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, the capital of the Sassanid Empire, and with other bishops conspired to depose him. Upon the death of the catholicos he was elected as his successor. In 340, the Sassanid king *Shapur II, after the failure in the siege of *Nisibis of 337, unleashed a persecution against the Christians upon the denunciation of the magicians and the Jews. Among other things, the king ordered the murder of the leaders of the communities, the demolition of the churches and the confiscation of church goods. Simeon refused to collect from the Christians a double tax claimed by the king. He was arrested and put in chains and carried through the city streets. He was therefore led into the summer residence of the sovereign at Karka de-Ledan, in Khuzistan (Bet Huzaye) along with a hundred Christians, among whom were many bishops. Simeon refused to venerate the king or the sun; Shapur then ordered his death. The persecution, which lasted for several years, produced many *martyrs. Scholars have greatly discussed the events that occurred at that time because the ancient sources conflict on the information even with respect to the system of dating used. Burgess dated Simeon's murder to 13 April 344 (Peeters to 341; Higgins to 14 September 344) and the "great slaughter" of the Christians to 345.

BHO 1117-1119; BHO 124; PO 4, 296-305; Patrologia Syriaca 2, 659-1047; BS 11, 1097-1100; LTK³ 9, 592; DTC 9, 166-169; J. Labourt, Le christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie des Sasanides, Paris 1904, 63-69; P. Peeters, La date du martyre de S. Syméon archevêque de Séleucie-Ctésiphon: AB 56 (1938) 11-143; M.J. Higgins, Date of Martyrdom of Symeon bar Sabbae: Traditio 11 (1955) 1-33; M.-L. Chaumont, La christianisation de l'empire perse. Des origines aux grandes persécutions du IV^e siècle, Louvain 1988; R.W. Burgess, The Date of the Martyrdom of Symeon bar Sabba'e and the "Great Massacre": AB 117 (1999) 9-66 (R. Mercier, The Dates in Syriac Martyr Acts, pp. 47-63).

A. Di Berardino

